In other words, if we dare try to revitalize a publishing firm, while so many others belong unfortunately to American interests, we would pay dearly. We are made instead to understand that if we are very nice to Gulf and Western, we might get major benefits. It may even be possible that, in the future, the Canadian editions of our authors will be widely distributed through all American book stores, that people will line up to buy Marie-Claire Blais and Jean Le Moyne in Chicago and Salt Lake City!

That is exactly what Hachette had promised us at the time. It is so funny that I must tell you about the following incident before concluding.

In certain quarters outside the trade, I should point out, we were given to understand that if Hachette were welcome in Quebec, Hachette would impose Quebec books on the vast French market and on the Francophone market which it had already cornered. Allow me to laugh along with all Quebec publishers who have not forgotten our first adventure with Hachette in that field. I have to tell you this, it is really funny.

After hard negotiations, the Association des Editeurs canadiens signed an agreement with Hachette in Paris on December 7, 1959—the dates are important!—for the distribution of our books in France. The agreement provided for a 50 per cent rebate, the absolute right to return unsold books, and the payment of return transportation charges and taxes by Quebec publishers.

So far, Hachette did not stand to lose much!

To minimize risks even more, Hachette accepted only 15 Quebec titles, the best. Depending on the author, the number of copies ranged from 100 to 250.

And so on December 22, 1959, for the first time in history, 3,690 Quebec books set off for France. More than a century after the famous voyage of La Capricieuse, the French ship that in 1860, brought Quebec the first French books to arrive there after the Conquest.

The first France-Quebec agreements were followed by a long silence . . . Finally, on December 7, 1963, four years later, we received the final report on the operation: Hachette managed to sell exactly 523 Quebec books in France and throughout the francophonie! We received a cheque for $606.79, to be shared among all participating publishers, after subtracting shipping costs of $222.51.

A few editors had their unsold books shipped back, at their expense. Gaston Miron was amazed when he discovered that Hachette had not even bothered to open the boxes containing works published by l'Hexagone, a very prestigious firm. The books had spent four years in France, in their shipping crate!

Finally, Hachette advised our publishers association that we would have to pay the cost of shipping back the 2,364 unsold books they wanted to return to us. Magnanimously, reacting much like beggars who lose their temper, we decided that those damn books would spend the rest of their days in France, come what may, and gave them to the Quebec delegation in Paris!

Since that day, and even after the Macdonald report, I must admit I find it hard to believe that a small country has anything to gain by negotiating free trade, whatever that means, with a big country. Small may be beautiful but big carries a lot more weight.

That is why, honourable senators, with the writers, booksellers and publishers of my country, I fervently hope that my fellow Canadians will rally around the wise policies of our Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse.

● (1730)

[English]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be discussing the matter before us, although I am a little ill at ease at coming to it under rule 46(g), which defines it as a matter of compelling urgency, because it is a matter that I have been interested in for many years. I would not have minded talking about it yesterday, for instance, or the day before. I simply wonder what happened since I was here yesterday to bring it now under rule 46(g).

Honourable senators, I was interested in Senator Grafstein's speech. I was impressed but not surprised by Senator Roblin's masterly speech. I appreciate very much Senator Hébert's review and overview. I did not know all that much about these Hachette. They are really a bunch of—I will not say what—but they do impress me in a negative way.

The opening words of Senator Grafstein, as I remember them, were to the effect that "crisis" is often an over-used word. With all due respect, I think that, perhaps, he over-used it. I do not think that anything has happened to bring down upon us a crisis atmosphere. Therefore, I hope that I will be pardoned if I am neither histrionic nor overwrought in my brief remarks.

I am also a little baffled because everybody seems to think that the Minister of Culture—as the Minister of Communications is sometimes known—is doing an excellent job and I do not feel as though we are in a debating forum here because I do not see a "pro" or a "con" in this regard. As I have said, we all think that he is doing an excellent job—in fact, one of the more interesting things to have happened over the past few days is his return to cabinet. I think that that is a development we all rejoice about.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: There are a couple more who could be invited back.

Senator Macquarrie: Well, I do not think that any senators will be invited back and I have no eternal or infernal or any other kind of springs bursting within me in that regard. I think that they will probably get along well without me and most everybody else here except for Senator Roblin.

Senator Argue: That is not quite what I meant.

Senator Macquarrie: I didn't think so. I suppose that we could say, as Robert Stanfield used to say, "Wait and see." Anyway, we might as well try to keep to this particular subject until 6 o'clock at least.

• (1740)

I was shaken when Senator Grafstein suggested that the Senate might become a cultural Auditor General. Think of that! I have been thinking off and on all afternoon about what in the world we would do and how we would do it, and who would do the most of it. Anyway, all of these things are very important and very worthwhile, and if I seem to be a bit facetious, it isn't so. I know that it is an enormously important matter which Senator Grafstein has brought before us, and has discussed with great lucidity and, I think, great intellectual perception.

There is no doubt that this country has had to struggle through the years to preserve, first, its territorial sovereignty, its independence, and what we might call its independence of spirit. Another great Manitoban, Senator Roblin, said:

Canada has preserved and confirmed the essentials of the greatest of civilizations in the grimmest of environments. It is an accomplishment worthy of a better fate than absorption in another and an alien society, however friendly and however strong its own ideals.

And the reason why I am not—

An Hon. Senator: It was Morton.

Senator Macquarrie: It was Professor W. L. Morton. I said "another great Manitoban," because I recall that Senator Roblin made some excellent comments along those lines in very fine language. I believe that has been the case.

Last week I was at a very fine function put on by the most excellent minister in charge of the environment, the Honourable Tom McMillan; and the theme of that was the creation, 100 years ago, of our first national park. I thought how interesting it was that that coincides with the completion of our first railway. The two are linked together, the physical fact of Canadian nationalism. Without the railway, we would not have had "the Dominion of the North", as it was called so eloquently and appropriately, and without that spirit in a pioneering society that our natural heritage must be preserved and set aside from any encroachment, whether it comes from big or small business or anyone else; that this belongs to the nation for future generations.

Then I believe even more significant in the parks program was the setting aside of historic aspects of our past, saying that in these, Canadians today and Canadians tomorrow, in all the tomorrows that our nation survives, will find here a common focus, a common challenge, to maintain the best of that which is our heritage.

We have had, as did our ancestors, public men who at times have had to take strong action and ask the state to buttress the culture. Not many people ever say too much that is good about R.B. Bennett, but he set us off on the course of public ownership of the great communications media. What became the CBC was established during his administration. That led to a lot of things that I suppose he never visualized; yet it is an integral part of our heritage. If it had done nothing better than to air "Anne of Green Gables" a few nights ago, it deserves credit. I thought, as I watched that, that, "Here is a little country girl from Prince Edward Island whose books this day are produced in the eight million." She never had a Canada Council grant, or anything of that kind, and I think that those who were involved in all of the writings about her today could not survive without some kind of assistance. Therefore I am very strongly in favour of the institutions that we regard as our important cultural institutions.

I am not troubled about this moment of peril or crisis, because I believe that those who are concerned about these things are the people who are in the seats of power today. I believe that Mr. Masse made one of the finest speeches on this subject in Quebec last July. He commenced his speech with an excellent quote from Albert Camus:

Without culture, and the relative freedom it presumes, society, even when perfect, is no more than a jungle. This is why every authentic creation is a gift to the future.

He goes on, in a succinct and thoughtful speech, to indicate the things which, under his leadership, and that of his colleague, is strengthening and sustaining the very aspects of cultural outgrowth which we are talking about today. So therefore I am not worried or disturbed.

Then I read a recent speech made by the chief negotiator on trade matters in connection with the United States—Senator Roblin referred to it—namely, the speech by the Right Honourable Joe Clark. His own department sets out a summary of the speech, and there are reassuring things here. In a speech made in New York, he said:

The protection of our distinct cultural identity is of singular importance to Canada.

Our government's intention to promote culture in Canada through direct financial support is simply not at issue in a trade negotiation.

Our government believes we can strengthen our cultural identity while at the same time building on our economic relationship with the U.S. That is the modern reality in Canada.

There once was a time, at the time of one of our great heroes in Canada, when we had to assert economic particularity to preserve our cultural identity. That was in the time of Robert Borden. But our institutions have matured. Our fathers were told in the maritimes that we had to have tariffs in Canada to protect the infant industries of Ontario; and some maritimers used to say—and I suppose the westerners also—“Yes, you are going to let them die of old age before you drop those tariff walls.” So we have matured; and that is why I think they have rightly come to the conclusion that the economic possibilities that are ahead of us are not a threat to this country, because we have become much more mature than we ever were.

At the same time, I want to take no chances. I liked the way that Senator Hébert closed his address. We should all support Mr. Masse and his colleagues in this, because we can take no chances. We have uncertainties, but we must look upon them with confidence.

I have to say that I learned something today. When I was a boy in Prince Edward Island, reading some of these books that were published by a certain Toronto publisher, my teacher always said that that was “Ginn and Company”, with a hard “G”. Now I hear it’s pronounced “Jinn and Company”, with a soft “G”. But then I remembered that Prince Edward Island was the last place in Canada that retained prohibition, and I suppose no one dared to use the word “Jinn” with a soft “G” in a decent little school in Prince Edward Island. So I have roughened up a bit and I am now prepared to call it “Jinn” and Company, with the soft “G”.

I was trying to refresh my mind on some of the things which great Canadians had said before about culture and one which amused me a good deal is:

No heritage is worth preserving unless it can survive the sun, the mixed marriage or the foreign periodical. Culture cannot be legislated, budgeted or protected with tariffs like potatoes.

That is Mordecai Richler. It is a very good one, but I do not know that I agree with him at all because we do have difficulty over potatoes. It is a very sensitive and delicate mechanism to get that tariff at the right time of the year at the right rate. Marshall McLuhan came forward, as one would expect, with a most interesting comment, and I find great verity in this:

The 19th century helped us make business into a culture. The 20th century turns culture into a business and all cultural matters are enormously profitable.

I am not such a babe in the woods, although I am pretty babyish in the field of business, and not so innocent as not to know that there is a great deal of this line of thought in the sudden and great interest of certain great corporations in how we pronounce coffee.

Honourable senators, I will give someone else the opportunity to take the floor and make their introductory remarks. I am very happy to have participated in this debate. I find that I am in agreement with almost everything that has been said. I think we must all follow the example outlined by Senator Hébert in his closing remarks and support Mr. Masse in his strong assertions on behalf of our cultural pride and our cultural identity. I am sure that all senators and all Canadians will do just that.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 8.10 p.m. the sitting was resumed.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, it is a great honour for me to have the opportunity to participate in this debate, following so many distinguished speakers and so many distinguished speeches. I would like to take the time allotted to me to talk about a narrow cultural area, the area of broadcasting, and I will, perhaps, try your patience a little with some numbers and some statistics.

I, myself, feel that there is currently a threat to the continuing evolution of a Canadian culture in the way that it has evolved to this point in our history insofar as broadcasting is concerned. I believe the threat exists because the will of the government to support public broadcasting seems to be in question. Symbolic of that lack of will is the current uncertainty about Canada's cultural industries in the face of trade negotiations with the United States. Hard evidence of that lack of will is the cut in funding to cultural agencies and the compromise and testing by government of the arm's-length relationship that it has with the cultural agencies that it funds. As I say, the context of my speech will be broadcasting, and I would like, as quickly as possible, to give some hard numbers on why I am concerned and why I think that all senators and citizens should also be concerned.

Culture is, by dictionary definition, the sum total of ways of living built up by a group of human beings which is transmitted from one generation to another. I would like to quote a former president of the CBC, A.W. Johnson. In making a presentation to the Applebaum-Hébert Committee, he said:

Broadcasting . . . is the most powerful means by which modern nations and peoples share a common experience, learn about their national identity, learn about their culture, learn about themselves.

As well, I would like to quote, both now and later, from an excellent article called "Changing Channels" which appears in the current issue of Canadian Forum. It is an article by Sandra Gathercole which states:

Television is the most powerful social force in the modern world, a force neither culturally nor socially benign. Television "refashions us in its own image," as the 1951 Massey commission charged of Hollywood movies.

We are what we watch. Television secretes a value system that is most effective when the medium appears to be at its most innocuous: when it is "entertaining" with dramatic programming. American "entertainment" programming is really the breeding ground for an American view of the world . . . Studies done in the last decade have shown that Canadian school children think the FBI is a Canadian police force and know more about the laws, institutions and mores of the United States than those of Canada. An Ontario Royal Commission on violence in the media, and a CRTC examination of sexual stereotyping on television concluded that we cannot correct these problems. They are a function of the fact that we import our television.

As a nation, we have nurtured a naiveté about the significance of this imprinting.

Broadcasting is only one of the means by which we are informed about ourselves, our ideas, our values, our faults. I think that it would be worth our while to spend a few minutes trying to identify what it is that we are watching. Before doing so, though, I, as many speakers have done today, would like to quote from our current Minister of Communications, Marcel Masse. The quotation I would like to bring to this debate is from a statement made in September of this year in Halifax at a federal-provincial conference. In that statement, Mr. Masse said:

What is the meaning of cultural sovereignty today? It means that the major institutions for self-expression contribute to the distinctiveness of this particular people. Furthermore, these cultural institutions must operate in such a way that they can and do reflect this people's uniqueness, in history, development and current society

Any people's cultural expression can best be produced, nurtured and promulgated, with vigor, by themselves. A young American, a valedictorian at the University of Pennsylvania, one Thomas L. Janeway, stated the case with prescience over one hundred and fifty years ago: "The true sovereigns of a country are those who determine its mind, its mode of thinking, its tastes, its principles; and we cannot consent to lodge this sovereignty in the hands of strangers."

To go back, then, to the matter of what we are watching, I would like to refer at this point to comments that were made in an address by the President of the CBC, a copy of which was circulated with the corporation's annual report which came out, I believe, a couple of months ago. The statement relates to this important question of what we are watching and it says:

Canadians now spend over half their leisure time watching television:

More than three hours per day for every man, woman and child in Canada.

More than 2 1/2 hours per day listening to radio.

By the time our children reach the age of 12, they will have spent about as much time watching television as they will have spent in school, namely 10,000 hours. For English speaking children, 80% of those television hours will have been spent with U.S. programs.

He then goes on to say:

In English television particularly, we have, in fact, developed a system which is substantially American—three-quarters American.

Only 28 per cent of all English language television available in Canada is Canadian.

In Prime Time—from 7 to 11—only 26 per cent of all programs available on Canadian screens are Canadian.

But let's look at the biggest problem of all! Drama.

English speaking Canadians have available more than 52,000 hours of television each year.

Out of this staggering 52,000 hours, about 14,500 hours are Canadian but perhaps the most important thing is that 17,500 hours are drama and they account for 50% of what people watch on television.

But of all these hours of drama that English Canadians can watch, only 375 are Canadian drama—about 1 1/2%. That includes everything: stories for children, for adults, situation comedies, other series, classical drama, etc.

In English, for every hour of Canadian drama on Canadian TV and cable, there are more than forty-five hours of foreign drama.

We have abandoned our national stage to another society.

That is a very powerful statement and one that I think is worthy of note, honourable senators.

I would like to turn now to some statistics. As I said earlier, I hope not to try your patience too much with them. I have already used some statistics, but the statistics I would like to refer you to now are contained again in materials that were distributed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at the time of its annual report. As is often the case, we receive these materials but, because of busy schedules, we are unable to spend the time on them that we would wish. The remarkable thing that I would like to draw to your attention, or draw to your attention again if you have already looked at these materials, is that there is information on the viewing habits of Canadians. The thing that is important to me, and I hope you will share my view of its importance, is that on all television stations in Canada, the CBC accounts for a total of 26.5 per cent of viewing time of Canadians; CTV accounts for 22.4 per cent; the rest is divided among other Canadian and other English, pay and American services.

While that is important and significant, it is of more importance and significance, I think, to look at the break-out of English and French. On English television, the CBC has a 22.2 per cent share of the audience; CTV has a 28.5 share; the American channels account for 31.9 per cent of the viewing time of Canadian viewers—far more than CBC; far more than CTV. Other independent Canadian stations account for the difference of 15.5 per cent; pay television accounts for 1.8 per cent.

On French television, the story is quite different: CBC French accounts for 43.8 per cent of the total viewing audience; TVA accounts for 49.2 per cent; Radio Québec, 5.5 per cent; and other French, 1.5 per cent.

These are important figures because they do confirm the statements that I have quoted from Mr. Juneau's speech to the effect that we are watching predominantly American programs. They are important to you because of the information I have quoted from, to the effect that we are, in many respects, what we watch, and we do spend a tremendous amount of time watching television.

To try to bring a little more life to these figures, I have asked for and received the most recent statistics on audience share of Canadian television. The statistics are for the week of October 28 to November 3. That was the most recent week's statistics available. With regard to that week, 33 per cent of the audience share was held by American stations; 27 per cent of the audience share was held by CTV; 20 per cent of the audience share was held by CBC; and all others, some 12 per cent. During that week the top 25 programs which were aired on CBC included 17 Canadian programs. Just as a matter of interest, the top program was an imported program, "Dallas", and had an audience of 3.7 million people. The next was a Canadian program entitled "Raccoons", which had a total viewing audience of 2.2 million; the next was "Hockey Night in Canada", which had a total viewing audience of 1.9 million. There is then a number of American programs, such as "Newhart" and "Walt Disney Presents". The next Canadian program on the list is "The National", which had an audience of 1.6 million with "Marketplace" having an audience of 1.4 million people. That gives honourable senators some idea of the reality of Canadian television during that particular week.

The top 50 programs aired on the CBC and CTV contained in the top 25 only five Canadian programs, one of which was aired on CTV and four of which were aired on CBC. The top program on both networks was "The Bill Cosby Show", which had an audience of 4.8 million people; "Dallas" was next, and then "The Miss Canada Pageant", which had an audience of 2.2 million people. That was followed by "Raccoons". That gives honourable senators an idea of the extent to which American programming has dominated our airwaves.

A picture of Canadian viewing is what I am trying to convey at this point in my speech. I am also trying to convey the fact that there is not enough Canadian entertainment on our airwaves. I will spend a few minutes discussing why there is not enough Canadian programming. Again, I should like to quote from the article "Changing Channels". In that article Miss Gathercole points out:

Long before the arrival of television, the Conservative government of R. B. Bennett had established, in setting up the CBC in 1932, what has been termed the most important cultural principle in Canada: that the airwaves are public property. Subsequent broadcasting legislation assumed a predominantly public, predominantly Canadian system.

Television began on this premise with a CBC monopoly because, in the words of the Honourable Lionel Chevrier, the then Minister of Transport, in reply to a question asked in the House of Commons:

—it is perfect nonsense for anyone to suggest that private enterprise in Canada, left to itself, will provide Canadian programs. People who invest their money . . . will certainly invest it where they will make the profit . . . by importing American programs.

As true, honourable senators, then as it is today, although some major breakthroughs have been made. I think it is fair to go on and quote further from that article:

The private sector's default is not a matter of moral inferiority but of structural inevitability. Commercial broadcasters in Canada honour domestic production commitments at the expense of their profit margin. Consequently, putting private broadcasters in charge of providing Canadian content is tantamount to giving up that objective. As the CBC's Mark Starowicz has said:

The Canadian marketplace is too small to generate such Canadian production from the commercial market; there will never be a Canadian Broadcasting System if it is governed by the rules of commerce and profit alone . . . the very words of R.B. Bennett.

Again, I will try to reinforce that by reminding you of the statistics that I have just quoted with respect to Canadian and American programming. I should like to give you some examples of why this is so. The program "Dallas" has a production cost, I am told, of approximately $1 million per episode. You will recall that during the week I used as an example that was the most popular program on CBC. The cost to CBC for a one-hour episode of "Dallas", I am told, is in the neighbourhood of $50,000 to $60,000.

Let us consider that in the context of drama produced in Canada. I am told that the outstanding production that some of you may have seen, "Anne of Green Gables", which was aired just this week, had a total cost of $3.4 million. That was for four hours of drama, and that translates to $850,000 per hour. Let me compare that to a recent American mini-series which I think is somewhat comparable, "North and South". The cost of that series was $25 million for 12 hours, which translates to $2,083,000 per episode. Of great significance is the fact that "North and South" will probably pay for its production costs through U.S. distribution. It is simple arithmetic; they have a prospective audience of 250 million people. "Anne of Green Gables" will not recover its costs through Canadian distribution. Hopefully—and I am sure it will because it is such an outstanding production on which the producers, including the CBC, should be congratulated—it will return its costs and be profitable, but that can only be done by having it distributed worldwide.

I do not want to make a lot of this, but I say that as substantiation of the fact that we do require public funding for our dramatic productions, and in the absence of that, we simply will not have them, and there can be no commercial motive to provide this because of the much lower cost of the imported product from the United States, which has very high production values to Canadian life, because they can afford to do the pilots, they can afford to scrap programs and do things that we, in Canada, are just not able to do because we serve such a smaller market.

The solution is not to say: "Well, produce programs that will serve both the Canadian and U.S. market," because the U.S. market will demand U.S. values and U.S. reference points, and to do that is self-defeating in terms of trying to encourage the private sector to produce Canadian programs.

I should now like to spend a few minutes on the subject of whether the cost of public broadcasting in Canada is exorbitant.

Another publication which accompanied the CBC annual report is a financial overview which contains some most interesting information. The overview indicates that for the last fiscal period the cost to Canadians on a per capita basis is roughly nine cents per day for the government contribution to CBC. That amounts to $32.85 per year per Canadian citizen. The overview illustrates some interesting comparisons to the nine-cent-per-day cost. It indicates that a daily newspaper costs 35 cents; a bus ticket, 90 cents; and a packet of cigarettes, $2.75. To that list I should like to add the comparison to a ticket to the production of "Cats" in Toronto, which costs $42.50 for two and a half hours of entertainment; and a ticket to the Canadian opera varies from $20 to $57. When you consider the immense entertainment value you receive for a public contribution to national public television in that context, I do not think it is a high cost; on the contrary, I think it is very reasonable.

Honourable senators, I happened to be reading an article recently which was a special in a somewhat dated Time magazine. I was interested to note a reference in that to NHK, the Japanese public broadcasting organization. The article states that the NHK, like the BBC, subsists on the collection of fees. I assume the figures are 1982 figures. The fees charged to subscriber homes in Japan for public television are $41 per year. Using the current Japanese population of about 118 million people, I tried to arrive at the per capita expense and, to the best of my ability, it worked out to four cents per day in 1982 figures, which, strangely enough, is almost exactly what our public contribution to Canadian public television in 1982 amounted to.

It is important for us to consider the costs of public television in the perspective of its cost per capita and its overall importance—and I should not say "primarily"—to our sovereignty because it is the most watched reflection of ourselves we have, bearing in mind the figures I used a little earlier on setting out the amount of time we spend watching television and what we watch.

The next question I should like to spend a few minutes on is this: Is the CBC inefficient? I think it is fair to say that the CBC has a bad image, although I am not fully aware as to why. In any event, let me quote again from the speech of Mr. Juneau, the President of the CBC, when he addressed the Sainte-Foy Chamber of Commerce on November 6. In that speech he said:

And spare us the foolish talk about the CBC being able to offer all the services requested of it by cutting its administrative expenditures or reducing the number of its vice-presidents. What foolishness! What stupidity! And what hypocrisy!

Some banks, which everyone regards as models of administration, have over 100 vice-presidents; the CBC has 14. Why must we measure things using different yardsticks? CTV, which manages only one English television network, no radio, no international service, no Northern service, almost no production, no local English or French stations, has nine vice-presidents. Once again, why two different yardsticks?

The CBC is administered as well as any government department.

One example: during the cuts last fall, the CBC laid off 350 people and abolished 1,150 positions, out of a total establishment of about 12,000 people.

The federal government, in its programs to reduce expenditures and personnel, laid off 130 employees out of 225,000 and abolished 3,000 positions.

The time has come to challenge the lies, slander and hypocrisy which circulate in connection with the CBC.

I should like to refer again to the article, "Changing Channels", and quote from it as follows:

If it is truly government policy to maintain a Canadian presence on television, this substantial expansion of public-sector programming must happen. In television, as in film, policy-makers have been blind to this obvious conclusion—despite the progressive deterioration of the private industry record—because of the misconception that public sector production is inefficient. In the late 1970s, an independent management study of the CBC conducted by McKinsey and Company, concluded:

The corporation carries out its mandate with fewer resources than could the aggregate Canadian private sector as it is now constituted. Where the CBC incurs higher costs in individual program areas, it is generally due to the corporation's interpretations of its mandate responsibilities rather than to inefficiency.

This country cannot afford to permit the marketplace to continue to decide the content of its television system. Policy must come to terms with the fact that the public sector has been the workhorse of Canadian content. To the extent that the Canadian television system is distinguishable from the American system, it is because of its public components; to the extent that the public sector is undermined, Canadian content is undermined.

The real and present danger to this country's television is that budget cutbacks and privatization of CBC's production will mean a public sector appended to the private sector as that sector is now appended to the American system.

I would comment that the American system is not a bad one, but the American culture is much more secure than the Canadian culture. I think it is fair to say that it does not need the same nurturing and the same public concern that Canadian television does.

In concluding, I should like to make a few comments concerning what should happen. It seems to me that what should happen and what we, as legislators, should be thinking about and attempting to achieve is that more funding should be made available for public broadcasting in Canada, and that could be done in a number of ways.

We also have a responsibility to examine closely whether or not the CBC is inefficient, and deserves the image that it has.

It is more than a question of money as well. We need time to develop production capability. The production of Canadian drama or, for that matter, news and current affairs is not something that can be turned on and off by simply supplying money. It is something that takes time to develop and to evolve. We should be aware of that. In that context, it is of the utmost importance that we do not lose the momentum and the small, but important, base which we have achieved to date in Canadian drama. In the case of Canadian news and current affairs, it is a very great and significant base which we have achieved.

What could we expect from additional funding? We have heard over the years from CBC presidents and the commission that what we could expect from additional funding for Canadian public broadcasting is better quality programming. We could expect a second channel in both English and French. This is a commitment of the CBC. We could expect more secure and better quality regional programming.

The governments in the past and this government have tended to spend a lot of time looking into the CBC. These inquiries have served to delay much needed action. We are currently awaiting the Caplan-Sauvageau report. It follows the Applebaum-Hébert report which came down in 1982 and was followed by "Broadcast Policy Review" which was the equivalent of a full investigation and full report.

On average, the CBC has been the subject of an inquiry every three years since it was founded. To add to concerns that I have, there is uncertainty about the effect which the proposed trade negotiations with the United States will have on cultural agencies. This has been discussed in the debate already. The Leader of the Government in the Senate has made reference to the Prime Minister's "Essence of Canada" statement. Part of that statement indicates clearly that our unique cultural identity is something which is not negotiable. I am looking at an article in which this has been discussed, and I cannot help but subscribe to the conclusion that, if we are really ready to walk away from the bargaining table, as Mr. Mulroney suggests, rather than talk about medicare, Canadian content in television or book publishing, we should make that clear from the start. I do not think that has been made clear from the start.

An article from Maclean's magazine of November 18 states:

With the disclosure of secret government documents in Maclean's, External Affairs Minister Joe Clark suggested in the Commons that the government intends to put cultural industries on the bargaining table in upcoming trade talks with the United States.

Quoting again from the Toronto Star of November 27:

Forming an agenda for negotiations, neither External Affairs Minister Joe Clark or his aides have asked advice from the CRTC or the government's other cultural agencies.

"I don't know if that will happen,"—

—André Bureau, Chairman of the CRTC, says—

—or to what extent we can help trying to define the position of our country. But the CRTC would be most willing to participate in consultations of that nature."

I am rather concerned that the cultural agencies which the government funds are not being consulted about this process. I acknowledge there is a group which has been established by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which includes the chairman of Baton Broadcasting; the chairman of Telemedia Corp.; the president of TVA Television Network; the chairman of Maclean Hunter; a lawyer from Edmonton; a representative of the Association of Canadian Editors; chairman of the executive committee of Global TV; president of Fitzhenry & Whiteside Limited; and one author, Mr. Graeme Gibson. I personally do not think that that is representative of the group of people who are responsible for Canadian culture. I am sure it is an important and worthy group but there are others who are concerned with Canadian culture who, I think, should be included and consulted.

I again express my concern when I see that Mr. Bureau, Chairman of the CRTC and, apparently, no other cultural agency funded by the federal government is being consulted or used as a source of information in these forthcoming negotiations.

It is interesting as well that the one novelist author in the group is Mr. Graeme Gibson who wrote a letter to the editor of the Globe and Mail which was quoted earlier today by Senator Grafstein. To refresh your memory of what Mr. Gibson said, let me read a couple of sentences from his letter. He is talking about a meeting of this group and he states:

We all tried, apparently in vain, alas, to persuade Mr. Clark that cultural matters must not be negotiable.

Since we seemed unable to persuade Mr. Clark, several proposals were made with the hope we might have better luck before it is too late.

It is very clear that there is some confusion with respect to the position that Mr. Clark is taking on these important issues and the position that is being taken by Mr. Masse who, I believe, has been complimented today by many honourable senators on both sides of this chamber.

In conclusion, I should like to state again that we must recognize that we have something of immense value in the CBC, Radio Canada, and, as well, Public Broadcasting which is sponsored by the provinces which includes Radio Québec, TVO and Access. Those are the only three provincial networks that I am familiar with but I am sure that there are many others equally worthy of praise.

If we are to retain and enhance our culture and thereby our sovereignty we must support our cultural agencies with more financial resources and, of equal or greater importance, with our attention and vigilance. We should expect nothing short of excellence from our cultural agencies. We should expect that public money is well spent. I believe that public money is being well spent and, if not, we should make careful inquiries to satisfy ourselves on this point.

I believe that the priority now, as far as broadcasting is concerned, is to end the resort to inquiries which are now unnecessarily delaying the making of essential decisions on broadcasting. I have suggested a course of action—more resources. I would not be specific on the manner in which those resources are made available. We saw considerable success with the initiative of the last government with Telefilm Canada, the successor to the CFDC, in encouraging the production of more Canadian drama. There are ways of doing it. There are ways of involving the private sector and this should be done where possible.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate said we want our culture to expand and grow. I believe we must translate that sentiment into action. We can do so by pressing the government to deal with the present funding crisis and to resolve the uncertainty about cultural agencies in the Canada-U.S. trade negotiations.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators, this is an auspicious occasion for me. It is the first time I have ever participated in an emergency debate.

Senator Frith: You have lots of company.

Senator Doyle: I had spent a wasted boyhood thinking in terms of things like Churchill meeting the war cabinet below ground during the crisis, and I find this is what it is really like. It is a pleasure to be a participant.

I should like to join the Leader of the Government in the Senate and Senator Macquarrie in their complimentary remarks earlier today to Senator Grafstein who, I think, did a good deal to set the tone of what has gone on since. I am particularly grateful to Senator Grafstein because he made a note of the fact that in a report submitted last August 23, and released a short time later as an interim report of the Special Joint Committee on International Affairs, both parties had reflected on the importance of retaining cultural identity in whatever went on in bilateral trade. We were not turning new ground. This had been a preoccupation of the government for some time. But it was a factor and one of the reasons why I was puzzled today when I heard that this was a sudden urgent matter to be dealt with in this kind of a debate.

I have a short memory but it does go back to November 7 when we discussed in this chamber what we might do in the period following Remembrance Day. The suggestion had come to us from the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate that we should take a week off as the House of Commons was about to do and then return to this place to attend to other business and particularly to committees, although he did not restrict it just to committee work. He said that there was work to be done.

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, cited tradition and practice and suggested that perhaps it would not be necessary for us to hasten back when we had so little work to do. I know that he was speaking of work in terms of dealing with legislation. I refreshed my memory today by reading some of the discussion that went on after the Deputy Leader of the Opposition went to his books and examined the record of a week off here, two weeks off there, and three weeks off at another time. There was no consistency but certainly good argument that perhaps a second week could be enjoyed.

Senator Frith: That is the word.

Senator Doyle: Yes, I think that was the operative word, although I do not think it was used in the debate itself. At least, I can find no record of it.

At page 1493 of the Debates of the Senate Senator Frith said:

For that reason, honourable senators, I ask that the Leader and the Deputy Leader of the Government consider amending the motion to provide for our return on November 26. It seems to me that in the absence of any particular reason for our return, we would be following a trend, a reasonably well documented tradition—

Senator Doody later replied:

I always worry that the longer the adjournment the more temptation there is for honourable senators to go elsewhere and perhaps attendance at committees would not be as great as it would be if we took a shorter adjournment, but I have no evidence to support that, and I hope that I am wrong.

Senator Frith then said:

I see nothing in the legislation before us or the anticipated legislation of the non-controversial type that will cause any difficulty for us in the chamber.

The idea was that there was not any pressing matter. While the discussion was about legislation before us, surely the great urgent issues of the day are always before us. This one was clearly before us because, as Senator Grafstein pointed out this afternoon, it had been drawn to the attention of this place and the other place by the joint committee. If honourable senators want to assume that it was an emergency when the joint committee reported on it, then it must have been an emergency at the time we all agreed to an extra week's absence from this place. Suddenly, today, it is an emergency.

It is not for me to comment on what happened overnight or over the period of a week. The suggestion could certainly be made that some honourable senators had gone home, found a parade and thought that they had better lead it. If there was a parade, well and good, because I think a great deal of effort has gone into the business of creating a parade—effort on the part of the leaders of the government, on the part of the Prime Minister, on the part of the Minister of Communications and, this afternoon, very notably on the part of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to dwell on quotations, but since there were so many handsome things said this afternoon about the role of Mr. Masse in this entire business, there is one quotation I would make. I found a paragraph of his famous Baie Comeau speech that is simply irresistible in the context of what we are discussing today. I would like to read it into the record:

If publishing is to serve the interests of Canadian cultural sovereignty and economic growth, there must be fundamental change. The government has recognized that there exists a direct link between the current condition of Canadian publishing and the role played by non-Canadian investment in this sector of activity. I believe we have created a policy which will respond to our cultural and economic imperatives, and which will nevertheless treat non-Canadian investors positively and fairly.

I think that that is a clear statement of the intent of the minister who has been blessedly restored to his office.

Honourable senators, the publishing industry in this country is one that has progressed remarkably over a short period of time. When I first went into the newspaper business in Toronto, I worked with a gentleman who was a pioneer in his way. He was the first book editor ever appointed on a full-time basis to a newspaper in Canada and his name was William Arthur Deacon. If he were alive today he would be well over 100 years of age. Deacon used to talk about and write about the early days of the Canadian Authors' Association, which he was instrumental in founding. In those days, the concern of that association was not with fighting American publishers—it was in finding publishers, finding someone who would print a book. The situation was such that the author might receive, by way of royalties, a few copies of his own book. The principal concern of the Authors' Association at that time was to take care of the poor, derelict authors, and in their number were some of the most notable writers of the day. They were impecunious; they had no money; they had no way of looking after their families; they had no residuals coming to them and they had no guarantee that their next work would be printed.

Honourable senators, I do not want to dwell on that past, I merely point out the remarkable distance we have come from that period in the twenties, the thirties and even into the forties, when there were so few who could survive in the business of producing Canadian literature. I think that we have come a remarkable distance. I think that it is the intention of the government, and I can find no evidence to the contrary, to continue that progress and to do so with a great deal of zeal.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, like others who have participated in the debate, I wish to express my thanks to Senator Grafstein for drawing our attention to this particular subject. Undoubtedly, the matter has been sparked by the up-coming trade talks that are to take place between the United States and Canada. While there are problems within the cultural industries, while there are objectives, while there are policies, as has been noted often this afternoon, it is likely that this subject would not be before us in the absence of the controversy that exists throughout the country on the question of the trade talks and the objectives of the government with respect to these negotiations.

I must say that I was disappointed this afternoon that the Leader of the Government, in his reply, did not take advantage of the occasion to give us some information on the objectives of the government, some clarification on how the negotiations are to proceed or attempt to ease some of the concerns that have been expressed by certain sectors with respect to the up-coming negotiations. I am in favour of trade liberalization and I am surprised that the government is allowing the debate to proceed in a way that daily undermines the objective of the government and is not taking the necessary steps to provide us with the information we require.

On Monday, I attempted to clear up some of the uncertainty and confusion that prevailed following the First Ministers' Conference in Halifax with respect to the role the provinces would play in the trade negotiations. Following that conference, several premiers made it clear that the provincial governments expected to be directly in the room in the course of the negotiations—that they, along with the Prime Minister, expected to form the body which would give the instructions to the negotiating team. I have asked questions in the Senate; members of the House of Commons have asked questions of the Prime Minister and of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Today it is Wednesday and that uncertainty still prevails. Nobody knows what the role of the provinces will be in these up-coming negotiations.

I must say that that creates additional uncertainty and serves clearly to undermine the objective of the government in seeking to launch these trade negotiations. I refuse to believe that the premiers made such a fundamental mistake in reporting the results of the conference. Since I asked my questions on Monday, I have had an opportunity to look at the transcript of the interview with Premier Peckford on CTV's "Question Period", which was taped on Friday, November 29, and aired on Sunday, December 1. I would like to direct the attention of honourable senators to a question directed to the Premier of Newfoundland on this particular matter. The questioner said:

Mr. Peckford, you reached an agreement of sorts requiring provincial participation in free trade negotiations. Now there are a number of interpretations as to what that agreement actually includes or what is intended, but it seems to be premised on the idea that there is full participation by the provinces in the negotiations. Does that mean, as some of your colleagues suggest, that provinces have a veto over what is included in any trade deal, or even what is on the table?

I found the reply of the Premier of Newfoundland quite useful, because he said:

That is a very difficult question for me to answer at this point in time. I wouldn't say that it means that.

Let me see if I can just describe it to you this way: most of the provinces, if not all of the provinces, want to have a role with the Prime Minister, say—or if there is another minister, then his counterpart—in this case it is going to be the 11 of us—in saying to a negotiating committee "Here is your mandate in this first round."

So the Premier of Newfoundland, in attempting to describe with care his understanding, claimed that the 11 is to be a committee which gives the mandate to the negotiating team. He goes on to say, honourable senators, that if later a further mandate is required, then the negotiating team will have to come back to all of the first ministers, who will give the negotiating team a fresh mandate.

So I ask the members of the government party in the Senate why it is not possible to have a clarification of this matter. Why are the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs—all of them—refusing at this point to give us any information and refusing to clarify a fundamentally important matter?

I think it is important that it be clarified, because if it turns out that the premiers are mistaken, then they ought to discover their error immediately—because it may avoid the bitter disillusionment when they find in two or three weeks, or at the end of three months, that they were taken in in Halifax. On the other hand, if it is true that the negotiating mandate will come from 11 first ministers, then we all ought to know at the present time that we have created an unworkable system with which to conduct trade negotiations with the United States.

So here it is. With respect to this aspect of the trade negotiations, namely, the form of provincial participation, there is uncertainty, lack of information, contradictory statements, and all contributing to the undermining of the negotiations.

I must say that the same uncertainty, or lack of clarity, exists with respect to the cultural field. The motion that we are asked to debate with respect to the trade talks deplores that certain items have not been excluded from those trade talks—namely, the cultural industries—or that some guidelines have not been established which would direct the negotiations with respect to the cultural industries.

At the present time the government has told us that everything is on the table. We had the Minister for International Trade before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on, I believe, October 16. He was asked by Senator van Roggen whether agriculture was to be excluded from the negotiations. His reply was that everything was on the table except those items that had been excluded or spelled out by the

[Senator Doyle.]

Prime Minister in his statement to the House of Commons on September 26. Well, the Leader of the Government has already referred to the statement made by the Prime Minister on September 26. However, I think it is worth repeating, because it does illustrate how vague is the government's approach at the present time, and it does explain why persons like Senator Grafstein and the cultural groups in the community are asking for clarification of what is in the government's mind. The Prime Minister said—and I particularly want to quote this sentence:

However, there is general consensus that we must seek to secure and improve our trade with the United States.

That was on September 26. Honourable senators, whatever consensus existed on September 26 has been weakened in this country since that date. It has been definitely weakened, and I have already referred to some of the reasons for that weakening. The Prime Minister went on to say:

To shrink from this challenge and opportunity would be an act of timidity unworthy of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: It is odd that he didn't say it would be unbecoming temerity; but he said "timidity, unworthy of Canada". He said:

It would be contrary to our national interest.

He then went on to make as follows the comment to which Mr. Kelleher referred.

It would be contrary to our national interest. Our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our commitment to fight regional disparities, our unique cultural identity, our special linguistic character—these are the essence of Canada. They are not at issue in these negotiations.

To deal with this question by the use of the phrase "our unique cultural identity" is to add to the problem rather than to contribute to its solution. It is necessary to define precisely, in these negotiations, and before the negotiations, what the government sees to be "our unique cultural identity," and how it intends to protect that "unique cultural identity" in the negotiations. Because it has not eased concern, because it has not cleared up this matter, we have a debate today and we have anxiety among the cultural groups which will grow and grow and grow and will only stop growing when the government accepts its responsibility and clarifies the situation.

We had a report which was tabled by Senator Flynn earlier in this session. It was the report on Canada's International Relations, which dealt with the question of the trade talks. The report recommended—and reference has already been made to this—that certain items be excluded from the detailed bilateral negotiations. In fact, the precise words of the committee are as follows:

The Committee wishes to make several further recommendations as to the process and content of the discussions, as follows:

1. The Committee recognizes that both Canada and the United States will want to identify exceptions to the range of subjects to be considered in any detailed bilateral negotiations. These should include policy areas and policy instruments that are of fundamental importance to the maintenance of a distinctive Canadian identity or to keeping solemn commitments made to significant elements of Canadian society. At the top of the list would be cultural industries and cultural policy, social policies, the agricultural sector and the workings of the Canada-United States Auto Pact.

It was not my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, who made this recommendation to this house. That recommendation was made by a group of senators including Senators Flynn, Doyle, Gigantès, Grafstein and Stollery. We have just heard from Senator Doyle, who completely overlooked this particular aspect of the resolution because the resolution is complaining that the government failed to exclude cultural industries from the negotiations. Senators Doyle and Flynn were among those who recommended to the government that these items be excluded. Indeed, when Senator Flynn made his speech to this house, he gave us the benefit of his experience as co-chairman of the committee and summarized the recommendations of his report. The report was ignored by the government on this point and is now being ignored by the senators on that side who brought it to the Senate, particularly Senator Doyle, who totally ignored in his speech his own participation in the formulation of a recommendation which is fully incorporated in this motion. In providing us with a summary of the report on October 2, as it is recorded in the Debates of the Senate at page 1318, Senator Flynn said:

However, the committee gave, and this is one of the sensitive points which has already been debated and which will continue to be debated, a list of items that the Canadian representatives would not be authorized to negotiate. Therefore, matters of social and cultural policy deemed essential for the preservation of a distinct Canadian identity would not be negotiable.

Those are words of Senator Flynn when he reported to this house as co-chairman of the joint committee in recommending to the government the very conclusion which Senator Grafstein has put before us for debate in this resolution. Senator Flynn told us that Liberal and Conservative senators unanimously agreed that cultural industries should be excluded from the negotiations.

Senator Haidasz: He is laughing now.

Senator MacEachen: Why did they feel that way? Did they agree in recommending the exclusion that the cultural industries would be threatened in any such negotiations? They must have had some concern and that concern is reflected in their recommendations and now in this motion. It is clear that the Prime Minister, Mr. Kelleher and Mr. Clark have said, "No, we will not accept the recommendations of the Special Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate on this point, and we intend to put everything on the table except those items that come under that vague phrase, 'our unique cultural identity.' I wonder whether the Prime Minister will say to Mr. Reisman, "Simon, you can negotiate everything except our unique cultural identity."

Senator Frith: To which Simon will say, "Oh, I understand exactly what you mean."

Senator MacEachen: And Simon Reisman will be permitted to decide for himself what that means and what is excluded. That is the situation that prevails at the present time.

I would ask honourable senators to follow the questions that have been addressed to both Mr. Clark and Mr. Masse in the House of Commons. Since his return to the House of Commons, Mr. Masse was asked explicitly, "What about the inclusion of cultural industries in the trade talks?" Instead of taking the opportunity at that time to clarify the situation, he referred the question to Mr. Clark. When Mr. Clark is asked about cultural policy and the trade talks, he engages in the same type of useless, vague generality that is contained in the Prime Minister's utterance, "our unique cultural identity." He talks about strengthening and preserving Canadian culture. He makes an even more brilliant comment intending to give reassurance to the cultural community in saying; "We intend to protect those who require protection." Those are his very words.

Senator Frith: Even Senator Flynn finds that ridiculous.

Senator MacEachen: I think there is a reason. I am respectful of the references that have been made to the cultural statement made by Mr. Masse at Baie Comeau on July 6—

Senator Doody: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen:—in which he made a number of very important comments—

Senator Balfour: Let's close the debate on that note.

Senator Frith: Why not, and leave them laughing.

Senator MacEachen:—and which have been repeated—

Senator Frith: Quote Joe, that will leave us all laughing.

Senator MacEachen:—in the debate today.

Senator Doody: Don't be nasty.

Senator MacEachen: For example, he said, "While the government is stating clearly that it considers Canadian control of this activity essential, the policy which it is putting forward is positive and fair." He is saying there that he regards Canadian control over book publishing to be essential. That is an important statement on cultural policy.

Senator Doody: Absolutely.

Senator Phillips: And a good one.

Senator MacEachen: Why is it that when Mr. Clark and Mr. Masse are asked about cultural policy and when the Prime Minister is asked about cultural policy and trade policy there is no linkage between the cultural objectives of the government and the trade policy of the government? I ask honourable senators to consider that point because when for example, the Canadian ambassador in Washington delivered a letter, we are told, to the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, urging upon the minister that he ensure that Canadian ownership in the publishing industry not become an impediment to the trade talks and urging a reversal of that policy, the Government of Canada did not take the opportunity to lay out clearly the guidelines which would govern its negotiator at the trade talks in the field of culture. It is too late now for the government to accept the recommendation of the joint committee which recommended that the cultural industries be removed from the negotiations. That is too late. The recommendation has been ignored, even though it carried the sponsorship of such a distinguished co-chairman as Senator Flynn. That has been ignored; we have lost that battle. What is required now is some clarification from the government with respect to what guidelines it intends to give to the negotiator regarding the protection of its cultural industries. These guidelines have not been given; they have not been made public and it is only today that a leading member of the cultural community has once again expressed dissatisfaction with the attitude taken by the Government of Canada.

On Monday, yesterday and today, in both houses of Parliament, the government has been given an opportunity to clarify its policy on the role of the provinces. It has failed to do that.

The industry has been asking for weeks now for the government to clarify its policy with respect to culture and the cultural industries, and the government has failed to do that. Today, the Leader of the Government had another opportunity to do that. He certainly gave a lively speech, but it added further to our confusion.

The fact of the matter is, honourable senators, that when the government launched this trade initiative, it did not know where it was going. It still does not know where it is going. It does not know where it is going with respect to provincial participation in the negotiations; it does not know where it is going with respect to the linkage between cultural policy and trade policy. It does not have the answers today to any of these questions. In conclusion, I want to say that, unless the government gives its attention very soon to these problems, and unless it provides some answers and eases some of the concerns that have been raised, then this important initiative in the direction of trade liberalization is bound to fail and, if it does fail, then the government can take that responsibility on its own shoulders.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I feel a bit like the little boy who followed the elephant in the parade. It is a little difficult to answer the questions of so experienced and wily a politician as the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I see that by a stretch of logic he was able to extend the venerable speech which he gave to us yesterday during question period, and continued the same argumentative discussion, replacing what today, I thought, was an agreeable discussion with what he seems to want to turn into an argumentative debate. I cannot take part in that debate, sir, because I must put it to you that, through your vast experience and distinguished career, not only in the cabinet of Canada but particularly as Secretary of State for External Affairs, you know and recognize that it is not possible to negotiate with the government of another country by laying bare your position and showing your adversary, or your friend, across the table exactly where you stand. You must keep a few "hole" cards. Moreover, your vast experience must have told you long ago—

Senator MacEachen: Why don't you check with Senator Flynn and his colleagues, who took the opposite view?

Senator Barootes: You have done that for me, thank you very much.

Senator MacEachen: You should get your act together over there, and don't accuse me.

Senator Barootes: He knows that it is not possible for 11 people from 11 different jurisdictions to sit down and argue and negotiate as one. Surely they can get together on a consensus, on a position or on an approach, but it is not possible for 11 different and disparate groups to make one single argument at one single table. I doubt if there would be room at such a table.

However, the honourable Leader of the Government on our side was unable or unwilling recently to answer these numerous questions, and far be it from me, honourable senators, to try to answer the same questions that were asked yesterday ad infinitum.

I had a very odd experience this evening; I missed my supper period. We had a committee meeting and I sneaked away from it for half an hour or so. You may have noticed that I attended a group visiting in Ottawa, which brought to us "Shine on, Saskatchewan". In addition to that you will notice that I have been given a very interesting emblem. This is not an OBE; it is not a CBE; it is not an Order of St. Michael and St. George but it is extremely important. It is called "Hooked on Saskatchewan" and that is why the honourable senator and I absented ourselves from our meeting for half an hour and, in so doing, missed our supper. Senator Argue is ashamed to wear his. I am delighted and honoured to wear mine.

Whilst there, I want to point out a couple of the things that we experienced this evening by way of Saskatchewan culture. One of them was the gift of this record: "Saskatchewan After Dark". Lest you think that we lack culture, I want you to know that this record was produced—

Senator Frith: We have a bill before us on that, do we not?

Senator Barootes: If you want to play it, you could probably sing to it. You have such a lovely singing voice, I understand. This was produced by Studio West Canada Ltd. in Saskatoon, and I will give you the address so that you can obtain copies of it, because this will be a very limited edition.

Senator Frith: This is for us, not for our friends, right?

Senator Barootes: This is being done for our Heritage 1985 celebration year, and it will be interesting for you to know that this record was produced by over 100 of Saskatchewan's finest performing artists who have pooled their creative resources to give you "Saskatchewan After Dark", and they are giving away all of their profits generated from the sale of this album. I wish you all to get one.

Senator Frith: Nothing pressing or persistent, I hope.

Senator Hicks: Do they know about Bill C-49?

Senator Barootes: May I proceed? The profits generated from this album will be used to develop these and other Saskatchewan artists in the future to enhance our culture.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: Moreover, honourable senators, I wish to tell you that we in Saskatchewan have a publishing group, which is what we are supposed to be discussing this evening—in other words, book publishing. This is called "The Western Producer" which Senator Buckwold and Senator Hazen Argue will tell you about. It is an off-spring of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool organization and it publishes a number of books and, in fact, we hope that in preserving the health of the book publishing industry of Canada, our Western Producer group can also thrive, as can those in eastern Canada.

Honourable senators, this has been a glorious opportunity today for honourable senators to ensure that they have engraved in print for the future their intellectual loyalty to the preservation and enhancement of Canada's cultural sovereignty in the book publishing and distribution business, as well as in other aspects of Canadian culture. Indeed, you have done it admirably.

It is not surprising to me tonight to realize, as we unfurl the Canadian flag, that nearly everyone in this chamber is in harmony with the principles that have been expressed by so many distinguished speakers and with such eloquence.

All of us wish to be identified as protectors of the Canadian cultural industry. In fact, honourable senators today seem to be in a contest to see who is the greatest Horatio on the bridge of cultural sovereignty repelling foreign invaders. It is difficult to determine who is going to be the winning warrior in this battle because, in fact, we are all on the same side. The speeches have been eloquent and stirring and worthy of a modern day Demosthenes. I congratulate each of the speakers, but there is an old United Empire Loyalist aphorism about this, and that is that "fine words butter no parsnips." So, it is by our actions that we will be known.

Since we are all proud of and supportive of these Canadian goals, I assume that we can all agree with the statement that was read—that was as clear as could be, as clear as water, as clear as glass—by the honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate when he quoted the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada. I think we can all agree with the Right Honourable Joe Clark when he said in regard to free trade negotiations on November 18 in New York, and I quote:

Under no circumstances are we prepared to agree to any measures which weaken those Canadian industries or undermine their capacity to serve our cultural needs.

Senator Haidasz: Do you believe that?

Senator Barootes: I have to believe someone, and I am certainly no less inclined to believe the Prime Minister and the Minister of State for External Affairs than I am to believe anybody else in this chamber.

Senator Grafstein: That is a double negative.

Senator Barootes: Double negatives give a positive.

Moreover, may I go so far as to quote another person who has been, I think, lauded in this chamber today, and that is the Honourable Marcel Masse. He spoke specifically about the book publishing industry on July 6, 1985, at that wonderful shrine of political integrity in Canada, Baie Comeau. He said this:

In this country, reading follows closely after television as a leisure activity.

I hope the senator believes that:

It is, therefore, only normal that we treat books as an instrument of our culture, in the same way that we regard radio, television, or the press. In order to fulfill its role on the cultural scene, Canadian publishing must, on one hand, be under Canadian control, and, on the other, be able to influence its own development. Our publishers will not be able to exercise these choices if they do not control a significant share of their own market. This is the goal we seek.

I must say that I am mildly surprised that this subject of cultural sovereignty should suddenly become such an urgent subject for discussion. I am at a loss to recognize the logical reason for that. Note that I have used the word "discussion" rather than the word "debate", which the Honourable Leader of the Opposition would dearly love to make this.

Senator MacEachen: That is what we are here for.

Senator Barootes: I have used the word "discussion" rather than the word "debate" because that is what we should be doing here and are actually doing here this evening. We are not arguing, we are not debating, we are discussing.

Senator MacEachen: What's wrong with debating?

Senator Barootes: The reason for that is that our objectives are the same and are consistent with those of the current government and the former administration.

Senator MacEachen: Never!

Senator Barootes: We are really identical in our aims. We can, therefore, only reinforce our views and aims in this discussion, reinforce our desires, our intentions, and our objectives because, essentially, there is no disagreement on either side of this chamber.

Nothing seems to have changed from a day ago, a week ago or a month ago in respect of this issue. Why, then, the urgency of this motion? Is it because, like little schoolboys, we want to be first in line, or at least in the front row as champions of Canadian culture and book publishing? Why this precipitate concern about book publishing today? Are my honourable friends opposite, by any chance, anxious to obtain primacy of position on something that the policy of this and former governments has been to support and to guard? Why are we trying to make a political football out of what I regard as a universal concern for the book publishing industry in Canada? Why are we not supportive of the same principles?

I hope and I pray that I am wrong, but I believe that this motion was raised as a pure matter of political opportunism, of "me, too-ism", in an effort to gain some little political advantage on something that, more or less, we all support.

A couple of decades ago I went to the Minister of Education in Saskatchewan and to the Director of Curriculum because I was disturbed with the books which my children were reading in public school and in high school. I asked Mr. Janzen at that time: "Why are the books of that particular nature, and why is the department using those books in the schools?" It turned out that our history books, and nearly all of the other books that he had for review, were, as was pointed out elsewhere, American publications. At one time those textbooks had been the product of a rather thriving publication business in this country. The school textbook industry had been sufficiently profitable to enhance and support the publication of other books and periodicals before that industry was turned over to or allowed to be purchased by American organizations. I want to point out to honourable senators that I deplore the beginning of that invasion of our publishing companies in Canada, but I wonder when and under whose administration that sell-out began. It began approximately two decades ago. Surely, we do not wish to ascribe that fault to the current administration.

Senator MacEachen: That seems argumentative to me.

Senator Barootes: I agree with all honourable senators that this sell-out must be reversed and repatriated, lest our school books become an instrument of mindbending of our young people.

Since we are all of a similar view, and all looking for the same outcome, why should we even be trying to raise points of political blame? We are all in sympathy with the clear and straightforward statements that have been made by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and we have all praised the activities of Marcel Masse.

If we all wish, as I interpret it, to attain the same objectives of a healthy and strong Canadian publishing industry, let us not impair our government in reaching its objective by controversy or by questioning and arguing the method, the technique or the instruments which are going to be employed to reach this desirable result. Let us be a help and not an impediment to our own progress in revitalizing, repairing and repatriating this vital and crucial Canadian industry. Let us not be part of the problem.

Again, honourable senators, I wish to thank and congratulate the speakers who prepared such stirring addresses on this important subject in advance and express my empathy with their ideals and with their aims in the hope that they will reciprocate by accepting the sincerity, the integrity and the similarly worthy support on this serious national subject which has been offered by this side of the house.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Buckwold: —I am delighted to follow Senator Barootes who is a long-time friend, our friendship going back many years. I might say that he could have given my speech and did, in fact, use some of the material I intended to use. I can assure him that this is not a political argument.

Senator Barootes: I totally agree.

Senator Buckwold: The reason I am participating is because I do have some concerns which I want to express.

I was glad to hear that the Saskatchewan senator, Senator Barootes, is hooked on Saskatchewan: He is wearing his fishing hook symbol. I think he has swallowed it hook, line and sinker.

I am glad he referred to the Saskatchewan recorded album that he had entitled, "Saskatchewan After Dark." I highly recommend it, especially because, during the winter in Saskatchewan, we have very long nights.

Honourable senators, I should like to draw the attention of the Senate to an important segment of the Canadian publishing industry which is often ignored. I refer to regional publishers which publish books which often do not have a national market.

In my home city of Saskatoon, we are proud of such a regional publisher. The Western Producer, referred to earlier by Senator Barootes, is a division of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, an organization made up of about 70,000 farmers. Its editor is a most capable and highly-respected newsman, Bob Phillips. The Western Producer has a large circulation and is, for those who do not know it, a weekly publication.

The Western Producer has a major book-publishing department which produces beautifully printed books of high quality which are usually of regional interest although some have received national support and distinction.

Titles of books recently published include: Prairie Birds, featuring birds of western Canada; Christmas Concerts in the West, which is a compilation of memories of various individuals of Christmas concerts of days gone by; The 100th Anniversary of the Calgary Stampede, which occurs in 1986, written by the well-known Canadian author, Jim Gray; and Prairie Lights, a beautiful book of photographs by Courtney Milne. These are just some of the types of publications that I am sure many of you have seen and which we in Saskatchewan feel can be highly recommended.

Honourable senators, I believe that Canada needs these publishers for the publication of books of regional interest. These regional publishers, such as The Western Producer, must not be weakened in any way; otherwise, these important books, with a limited printing run, may not be published.

The editor of The Western Producer is concerned with the possible sale of major Canadian publishers to foreign owners. I was pleased to hear the assurance of Senator Barootes that this is not likely to happen. The editor believes, as do most Canadian book publishers, that this country needs a strong national industry. Foreign ownership means that publishing decisions will be made by foreign owners. For example, whether the printing is to be in the U.S. or in Canada will have to be decided. It will mean a foreign perspective on books of Canadian interest, and that includes books of regional interest.

Anything that weakens the major publishers has some effect on regional interests. That is why a publisher like The Western Producer-Prairie Books has a very real concern about these possible takeovers of important national publishing firms. If the large companies are weakened, all will be weakened.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Roblin, in his very fine address, said that he was proud of the growth and development of Canadian culture. I was glad to hear him say that. I agree with him, but I believe all of us want to keep it that way. The sale to foreign owners of Prentice-Hall, Ginn and Company and Copp Clark Ltd. would have a negative effect on the Canadian publishing industry and Canadian culture.

As Senator Grafstein said so ably, Canadian ownership does make a difference.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul David: Honourable Senators, I have listened with the utmost interest to this debate on culture—a debate on a very high intellectual plane.

I think that the thoughts expressed by the honourable senators so far show that our culture is not at all endangered, at any rate, not in the Senate!

It must be conceded that a culture is irreplaceable. I have the impression that on this point, both sides of the chamber share the same philosophy, the same ideal, the same goals.

I have been wondering, since the debate, why it was so urgent. I am a doctor, and I have yet to see any symptoms that would require an emergency operation like this debate.

Nonetheless, since this seems to be a situation that has recurred in the history of Canada over at least the past twenty years, and since we own around 20 to 25 per cent of the cultural industries, we had better look on it as an emergency debate that has been going on for twenty years. Sooner or later we obviously had to get together to discuss the best ways of regaining lost ground.

Now is a good time, since it's surely easier to improve on 20 per cent ownership than on 80 per cent.

Moreover, just because I share the view of my colleague, Senator Barootes, who said that really this isn't a debate, because we all share the same opinion, that doesn't mean I think we can be indifferent to the discussion or exchange of ideas.

We can't brush it aside, either for the English-speaking Canadians or for the French-speaking Canadians in Quebec.

As a Quebecer and a francophone, I understand the apprehension that anglophones might feel of cultural assimilation by the United States through the latter's ownership of the levers of the economy.

From that standpoint, I think we in Quebec have acquired a traditional experience, which has made us neither better nor worse than others elsewhere. With respect to the techniques of the fight, I think we can serve as an example.

For me, culture can be a book, a film, television programs, magazines—but it's more than the sum of such parts. It's a way of thinking, of behaving, of being, of reacting.

For me culture is our past, our present, and most certainly our future.

Finally, there is a question of will and of faith. I think Quebec has already shown its will.

In this perspective, it's obvious that we can only express the same idea, that is, that to some degree we fear this commercialized invasion of our culture by our friends to the south.

Faced with this fear, we all agree that we share it and that we want to improve matters. Like many of the senators who have preceded me, I am delighted to note that our Minister of Communications is ready to rise to the challenge and fight vigorously to preserve the culture we all hold so dear.

[English]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I welcome this very important debate occasioned by the important motion of Senator Grafstein. We have heard important speeches made by Senator Barootes from Regina and by Senator Buckwold from Saskatoon.

At dinner time this evening I attended a reception at the Château Laurier, along with Senator Barootes, which was sponsored by the Mayor of Regina, Larry Schneider, who was in Ottawa promoting tourism for Regina and Saskatchewan. I believe that that is the second occasion that he has done a similar thing. I want to congratulate him, the City of Regina, the provincial government and the citizens of Regina who were there this evening and everyone else who played a part in coming to Ottawa, the capital of Canada, to show to those who came to the reception some of the cultural and recreational attractions of Saskatchewan. I was proud as a Saskatchewan resident to be there with Larry Schneider this evening and to give him, along with Senator Barootes and others, some support in the efforts that he has undertaken on behalf of my city and Senator Barootes' city, and the province of Saskatchewan.

I want to associate myself with Senator Buckwold and Senator Barootes in the tribute that they have paid and the acknowledgment they have given to the good work of The Western Producer Publishing Company in publishing a large number of books dealing with the culture, the history and the life of residents of western Canada. They always have, I believe, not only a western flavour, but a strong Canadian flavour. With 70,000 other former members of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, we own this publishing company. I certainly agree with Senator Barootes when he said that we must as a nation now undertake the repatriation, by way of Canadian ownership, of the book publishing houses of this country.

[Senator David.]

I am proud for many reasons to be a Canadian. One of the reasons is that I feel our country and our culture is strong, and that we can resist the cultural inroads from the United States and the volume of television that is ours to see at any time. Another reason is because we have French Canada and that makes us different. A lot of French Canadians spread the kind of fervour and patriotism that many of us would do well to listen to and emulate.

Senator Barootes seemed to play it both ways tonight. He was constructive and responsible but every once in a while he said, "Well, there is a little bit of cheap politics." Politics is politics and I am not ashamed of playing it and I do not think I play it in a cheap way.

I think it is important that this debate goes on in the Senate. When Hansard is printed for this day it will be an important edition because it will have within it speeches by honourable senators on both sides of the house and from all parts of Canada saying, with some differences of emphasis, but saying together that we want to keep and develop our Canadian culture. We are different from the Americans and in going into these negotiations we want to do what is good for Canada and come out with success for our nation. I am happy to take part in this debate.

On November 6 I initiated, with the support of the Liberal caucus members, an emergency debate drawing the attention of the Senate—and I hope that I drew it to the attention of Canadians in many parts of the country—to the desperate situation facing farmers particularly in the drought stricken areas of western Canada. In putting forward that motion I had the support not only of honourable senators on this side of the house, and a lot of farmers and business people who wanted a flow of money into that part of the country, but I also had some prominent persons on the government side of the house, or attached to the government party, say to me, "Hazen, we need some pressure. We need to put some pressure so that action is forthcoming."

I can put pressure in a public or a private way and I am not really disturbed whether I achieve something by confidential telephone calls or representation to bureaucrats or have to make a contribution in a public debate, but the main thing is to try to get something done. I think that that debate played a part, although many others also played a part, in encouraging the government to come forward with an announcement and in strengthening the hands of those who wanted an announcement soon.

I do not know whether the press is going to pay attention to anything we say tonight or not. They are not here in droves; they are not hanging over the balcony writing down the words that are being said.

Senator Frith: There is room for a couple more.

Senator Argue: I think that the Canadian Press, as an organization, is not sufficiently aware of the crisis in the agricultural community. They think that a long debate on an agricultural crisis is just listening to another group of people who are hollering and complaining. But I noticed at the First

Ministers' Conference the main item for discussion put forward by many premiers, and the most repeated item at that conference, was the crisis in the agricultural industry.

Senator Barootes: And who started that?

Senator Argue: I guess we all had a part in starting it.

Senator Barootes: Premier Grant Devine.

Senator Argue: Oh, some of us were here 20 years before Grant Devine. We started it long before him.

Senator Barootes: He started it.

Senator Argue: He did not start it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order! Order!

Senator Argue: He went to Saskatoon to have a conference with some learned bureaucrats. He didn't start anything. I give him credit for what he said, though, and I give others credit for what they said.

Senator Doody: You're a lovely man!

Senator Argue: I try to be but I don't get it from listening to the Deputy Leader of the Government's side of the house. But I should not be distracted.

I was pleased that agriculture was put forward as a main item. I think that the Canadian Press should be paying more attention to the agricultural debate.

The debate in this chamber today is also important. We shall see whether three senators from Saskatchewan, speaking on somewhat the same theme, will be reported in The Western Producer. I have a particular interest in The Western Producer. I suppose that I am one of those once removed members, through the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, who hauled our wheat there and became part of the system that way. At any rate, it is a good effort and I think it is one that should be supported.

We are going into trade talks with the United States, having come out of the Shamrock Conference. I do not think that it was well organized or well planned on the part of the Government of Canada or the Prime Minister of Canada. He seemed, at that Shamrock Conference, to be more inclined to curry favour with the President of the United States than to even follow the appropriate protocol—namely, to have arranged for the Governor General to meet the President of the United States.

Apart from that, honourable senators, I think that we are going into these free trade discussions at the worst possible time. In my judgment, we have a great deal to lose and perhaps not much to gain. Today we have a $20 billion trade surplus with the United States. We are winners and we have been winners. We are into that market and we are a growing strength in that market. Eighty per cent of the goods are duty free, 15 per cent have a 5 per cent tariff and 5 per cent have more than a 5 per cent tariff, so now we say that we are going to negotiate. Well, there are many people who are worried about those negotiations because of statements coming from eminent people in the United States administration.

I quote from the Toronto Star of November 6 of this year:

A major U.S. concern in free trade talks with Canada will be to reduce Canada's huge trade surplus with the United States, according to U.S. Consul-General Donald Blevins.

Pointing to the huge U.S. trade deficit, which is expected to exceed $150 billion this year, Blevins said it is the American view that "this can't be allowed to continue indefinitely."

He said that, while Japan has the largest trade surplus with the U.S., Canada has the second-largest trade surplus.

"There will be a lot of desire on the U.S. side about how to relieve that deficit . . .

Honourable senators, I am afraid that we are, through these negotiations, exposing ourselves to pressure from the United States. The negotiations will not be conducted on an equal basis because we are not of equal size or equal strength. Last year, Canada's surplus in trade with the United States was $15.4 billion U.S., or approximately $20 billion Canadian. That is a sharp 32 per cent increase from the previous $1.7 billion surplus posted in 1983. We are up 32 per cent in one year; we have a $20 billion surplus, and we say, "Great, we had better have trade negotiations." The Americans have made it clear that they want to reduce our surplus, and I suppose that there are two ways in which to do that. We can let them flood our country with their products or they will stop our products from entering the United States. I think that we are on dangerous and shaky ground.

I was recently part of a task force which was organized by the Liberal caucus and which visited four western provinces. We heard representations from many farm organizations and learned that they are absolutely terrified of free trade talks. The egg producers are afraid that their industry could be wiped out; the chicken producers are afraid that their industry could be wiped out; the turkey producers, dairy producers and wheat producers are all terrified of what surplus products could do to their industries. The breweries do not want free trade—they are scared to death. The co-operatives are also worried. I have had some experience with this government and its handling of co-operatives. I have in mind a case which took place in Hamilton last year. A co-operative was organized to take over a local porcelain company that was going bankrupt. That co-operative arranged financing which was assured through credit unions to the amount of $1.1 million, but this government allowed an American company to take over that porcelain company. This government rejected the bid of the local co-operative.

I am concerned that, in these trade negotiations, we will not be in a strong position. We want to protect our cultural identity, we want to improve Canadian content and Canadian control of our industries. It has been pointed out that in 1968 broadcasting in Canada was controlled by non-Canadians.

Through Canadian legislation and Canadian action, however, that situation has been changed. That industry is now owned and operated by Canadians. It is a paying industry. It is a revenue-producing industry and it is a Canadian controlled industry.

As to the Canadian film industry, it has won international acclaim. Thirty to 80 films are produced annually, but the distribution of movies and the movie outlets in Canada are controlled by foreign companies. Although $400 million was spent at theatre box offices in Canada, only 2 per cent of the revenue was derived from the showing of Canadian films.

With respect to book publishing houses, 18 per cent of the English language books sold come from publishing houses controlled by Canadians. The proportion of French-Canadian works from Canadian publishing companies is somewhat higher at 26 per cent. In my judgment, the crisis arises not only because of the attitude of this government towards the cultural industries of Canada in these negotiations, but also from the fact that the government is starting to cut back on its allocations to and its support of the arts in Canada.

I suppose it is understandable that, coming from my part of the country, I am interested in the economic benefits that flow to that area from these industries. I am interested in the impact they have on rural communities. There is a particular effort being made in Saskatchewan to bring the arts, in their various forms, to rural communities. From an article entitled "The Arts as an Economic Development Generator", written recently by Brenda Baker, we see that for rural Saskatchewan there is an important economic impact generated by the arts communities. It is pointed out in that article that when an artistic event takes place in a rural community, if approximately 200 people attend, 30 per cent will drive into town for the show. They will spend a total of $400 on gasoline. Perhaps 20 per cent of the people will make an evening of it and dine out, which will account for approximately $300 spent on meals. Others will go out for coffee or drinks after the show, which will generate the spending of another $250. Senior citizens will take cabs, which will amount to about $75. The artists and crew, averaging eight in number, will live in the community for at least a day and a night, spending $500. The result is that, for every $7 ticket sold for the performance, about another $7 per person will be spent at local businesses.

The arts are important. They constitute a big industry. The information I have is that it now earns about $10 billion annually. About 400,000 people are employed directly and indirectly in the industry; the industry pays $1.2 billion in federal taxes alone, an incredible 90 per cent return on Ottawa's investment.

There is a thriving and important arts community in the city of Regina. I have in my hand an article written by an eminent authority, Professor Michael Scholar, of the University of Regina entitled "The Economic Impact of the Arts". I should like to quote briefly from that article. It says:

[Senator Argue.]

I would like to discuss strategies because it seems ever more obvious to me that we have been losing ground for some time now in the court of public opinion. For too long we have been arguing for increased funding—or even "zero growth" funding—by reminding Canadians that we are contributing to the preservation of Canadian culture. But the politicians have answered that the arts are a luxury they can no longer afford. The great debate in modern society is now based on economics—what can society afford? How can governments save money, reduce spending, and lower deficits for the general good of all?

He goes on to say:

... let us prove to society that we can justify our existence in financial terms.

He adds:

According to a recent census of manufacturers, the arts are the sixth largest industry in Canada... We are the eleventh largest in terms of revenue... We number more than 414,000 workers, about 4 percent of the labour force. That means we are nearly as large as agriculture, and we are larger than the total labour force of the Federal government, including the Crown corporations. Between 1971 and 1981, when the general labour force of Canada grew 39 percent, the arts labour force grew 74 percent. We are net generators of direct income for all levels of government. We pay more money directly to government in the form of taxes than we receive from government in grants.

In Canada and the United States, surveys taken to measure the economic impact of the arts in their communities have all confirmed that the spin-off effect of arts activities is a magnitude of roughly ten to one. As one brief put it, for every $100 spent, we generate $1,000 in revenue for the communities we serve.

Professor Scholar goes on to outline an action program to convince governments—the federal government, in the main—to give greater consideration to the arts industry. I shall quote a few of the points he makes.

We must provide continuing support to public personalities on the national level who have already spoken out... in support of the arts.

We must answer misinformed and misleading remarks when they are cited in favour of cutbacks...

Direct political action is called for. Just as we have organized ad hoc committees to protect heritage properties, so too we must be willing to form political action coalitions to fight cutbacks in the arts;

It seems to me that support for our arts community is support for the very life and soul of the Canadian nation; and Professor Michael Scholar and others have said, in supporting this very important economic endeavour, that really, in a sense, it is self-sustaining because it generates revenues that go to governments at all levels. Then, for every reason—for the sake of our country, for the sake of our future, for the sake of our economy—we should support the arts and we should not agree that cutbacks are required.

To get a little more parochial, I believe that the city of Regina deserves greater consideration from the Canadian government in the kind of grants that should be available to various cultural groups, such as the following cultural groups in the city of Regina: the Cultural Exchange Society; the Multi-Cultural Associations; the Regina Symphony; the Saskatchewan Theatre Ballet; the Wheatland Theatre, Neutral Ground; Dance Works and the Norman McKenzie Art Gallery.

I believe there is great theatre produced in Saskatoon as well as Regina. "Paper Wheat" came out of the 25th Street Theatre in Saskatoon. It was a play depicting the growth, development and contribution of the co-operative movement in the province of Saskatchewan. It was very popular and very well supported. The Globe Theatre in Regina recently produced "The Hanging of Louis Riel", representing a very sad event for Canada, but a play that attracted crowds day after day and evening after evening. That kind of theatre, that kind of support of Canadian culture, that kind of support for the Canadian soul, deserves the support of all honourable senators and of the Canadian government. In dealing with the United States in trade negotiations, the Right Honourable Joe Clark needs to go in feeling that he has a powerful hand, that Canadians want to support, and fully support, our arts community; and we want him to say "No" to any frittering away of our control, management and development of the arts in Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, it is always delightful to listen to Senator Argue, and during my brief stay in this chamber I have been fortunate to be present when he has delighted us with his presentations. As we would say down home, he is a gutsy politician who believes immensely and enormously in what he is doing and saying; and that is good.

I have listened with considerable interest to the debate—or, rather, the discussion today—and certainly I agree with some of my colleagues who would prefer to call this a "discussion" and not a "debate", because, if I have understood correctly, we are all debating the same side of the issue—or almost all of us are—in support not only of the cultural community, which really permeates all of our lives, but in support of the government's position and stated policy, which I shall re-enunciate in a few moments.

In listening to the speeches, or the discussions, today, I thought that I should dig out a little information. Senator Argue has referred to some of this information, but I shall present it perhaps in a different way, because it is so important to remind ourselves where we have come from. Some honourable senators have rightly spoken about the fragile state that we in Canada seem always to be in regarding the development of our cultural community, and have pointed out that we must nurture it and protect it. This debate, this discussion, is excellent in this regard, because, honourable senators, I believe that it shows that we are all concerned and that we are speaking to this issue with a sincerity and dedication of support that is very important.

But in looking at where we have come from, I note the reverse side of the situation that Senator Argue identified. I do it because I think it is important. The penetration of Canadian markets by the United States cultural industries is such that 71 per cent of all programs viewed by Canadians on English-language television stations are American. Ninety eight per cent of screenings in Canadian cinemas are foreign, primarily American; and 85 per cent of domestic sales of records and tapes manufactured in Canada are made from imported master tapes. Seventy five per cent of our domestic book market and 71 per cent of our periodical market are imported foreign products, primarily American. Of course, the other figure that has been mentioned here today on a number of occasions is the $1.1 billion in revenue from book publishing of which only 20 per cent is Canadian ownership. That is not a particularly good record, and we know how hard successive governments have had to argue and to fight even for that limited success. Certainly, those figures are nothing to be particularly proud of, and much co-operative energy is required if we are going to advance those figures to a more significant level.

The results of those figures did not occur overnight. There are other problems our cultural community is experiencing and they should not be ignored. I hope that some honourable senators are not suggesting that the cultural community must not be discussed at all in these trade talks. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, stated in New York in November that our commitment to cultural sovereignty should not stop us from seeking better trade rules for cultural industries and that from Canada's point of view better rules are both possible and desirable. He cited the example that Canadian performing artists and writers have proven their excellence but have found U.S. immigration rules a barrier to access to that country. Our film makers would like to increase their presence in the United States market, but they have found the distribution system a major obstacle. However, we have one rather delightful success story right now. Perhaps some of you have seen the delightful Canadian made film, "One Magic Christmas." This film at present ranks third at the box offices in the United States for this week. That says a great deal for that particular production and the quality of work of our people in the film industry. Certainly, this film is one of the successes of the Canadian film industry for this year. However, our artists, writers and so on are experiencing problems, and somewhere along the way it is important that we try to alleviate some of them.

I do not want to prolong the debate, but I would like to reiterate the policy of the federal government. In preparing myself for this debate I reviewed some of the statements made by and on behalf of the government. I am delighted that there have been so many positive statements in the documents I was able to pull out, not only by Marcel Masse, who is such a good minister, but by the Prime Minister, by Mr. Clark and others. If one reads many of these statements carefully, one will know that the government is committed to the cultural community and to the preservation and development of that community.

I have been advised that this is the first time that Canada has stated a particular policy for book publishing. Various governments have talked about it but we are finally edging into a policy position. The government's policy supports a strong Canadian book publishing and distribution industry, owned and controlled by Canadians. The policy is designed to help protect and enhance Canada's cultural identity and sovereignty and, certainly, it will enhance the economic viability of the industry. The government is interested in seeking new arrangements which will allow these firms to acquire greater access to markets abroad. Honourable senators know what the Investment Canada review is all about and know about the importance of those statements by the minister. In looking over this information and our very strong position, I feel satisfied, but not complacent, that this government is moving in the right direction. I am delighted that so many senators in this assembly have spoken in support of those policies in this excellent discussion.

I must say that I have found it very interesting to listen to the speakers in this debate. I feel that we are on the right path. However, I cannot see the urgency, as so many honourable senators have suggested, for the debate. I have spoken in other places during many emergency debates, and I must say that this is the calmest emergency debate I have ever participated in. It is so civilized.

Senator Argue: You are in the Senate.

Senator Robertson: If this is to be the tenor of emergency debates in this house, obviously emergency debating and discussion will be a very pleasant experience for all of us because it takes the acrimony out of this type of dialogue and offers one an opportunity to explore the issues with a much more sane, thoughtful approach. I am only sorry that some of us did not have the opportunity to do our homework. I should have realized that something was up this morning when Senator Gigantès indicated to me that he had been up all night writing speeches. In any event, I am pleased to have had this opportunity to participate in this debate and to support the policy of the government. I believe that we are on the right track.

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I would like to say at the outset how grateful I am to our colleague, Senator Grafstein, for initiating this debate. I think it has been an extremely useful and thoughtful discussion. I am sorry that I have not heard all the speeches. I heard Senator Grafstein's thoughtful speech and I heard the Leader of the Government who, I thought, was in fine form. However, I must say that while I was touched by his sincerity, as I often am, I find it difficult to accept his rationale. With regard to cultural sovereignty and cultural integrity, in my judgment this government is marching determinedly backwards.

Senator Doody: No!

[Senator Robertson.]

Senator Frith: And in step.

Senator Davey: There have been a number of references to the statement made by the Right Honourable Joe Clark in New York, and I would like to deal with that statement in a few minutes.

The important question, off the top, is: Does Canadian cultural sovereignty really matter? For me, the answer is unequivocally yes, and I suggest that is probably the answer for the majority of senators. The most effective statement of this cultural sovereignty that I have is something which was written 15 years ago in the Senate Committee on Mass Media. I am delighted that Senator McElman is assuming the Chair, because Senator McElman was with me all through the days of that Senate committee and I am sure he will recall this quotation. I have used it many times and in many places:

Geography, language, and perhaps a failure of confidence and imagination have made us into a cultural as well as economic satellite of the United States. And nowhere is this trend more pronounced than in the media. Marquis Childs on the editorial page. Little Orphan Annie back near the classified ads. Nixon and Tiny Tim and Jerry Rubin and Johnny Carson and Lawrence Welk and Timothy Leary on the tube. The Beach Boys and Blind Faith and Simon and Garfunkel on the radio. The latest VC bodycounts courtesy of A.P. and U.P.I. The self-image of an entire generation shaped by Peter Fonda riding a Stars-and-Stripes motorcycle. Need we continue?

We are not suggesting that these influences are undesirable, nor that they can or should be restricted. The United States happens to be the most important, most interesting country on earth. The vigour and diversity of its popular culture—which is close to becoming a world culture—obsesses, alarms and amuses not just Canadians, but half the people of the world.

What we are suggesting is that the Canadian media—especially broadcasting—have an interest in and an obligation to promote our apartness from the American reality. For all our similarities, for all our sharing, for all our friendships, we are somebody else. Our national purpose, as enunciated in the B.N.A. Act is “peace, order and good government,” a becomingly modest ideal that is beginning to look more and more attractive. Their purpose is “the pursuit of happiness,” a psychic steeplechase which has been known to lead to insanity.

Canadian culture, then, for me at least, is everything that makes us different from the Americans. Especially, it is the difference in our vehicles of communication because without them, without Canadian vehicles of communication, we would communicate totally through the American media and, of course, we would soon become Americans. I suppose there are some Canadians who do not care about that. However, a distinct majority does care and I refer to a recent Gallup Poll, released on November 11, 1985, and I quote:

The majority of Canadians, (58%) continue to feel our way of life is being influenced too much by the U.S.A. This opinion has remained fairly stable over the past two decades, but in 1956, only about one-quarter (27%) were concerned about American influence.

Regional differences are relatively small, ranging from a 50% level of concern in the Atlantic Provinces to 62% in Quebec. And a majority of both young and older Canadians feel that there is too much U.S. influence in our way of life.

That is why, over a series of years, we have built a series of safeguards; everything from the CBC to Bill C-58; from the National Film Board to the Canada Council. That is why the CRTC had spelled out specifically its Canadian mandate under the Broadcasting Act. The scary thing, honourable senators about this Tory government is not just its love affair with everything American from Rambo to Boeing, but its branch plant mentality; its apparent willingness to do anything, including giving away the store, to curry favour with the United States. One of the most effective descriptions of the problem appeared under the byline of Mavor Moore in the Globe and Mail in an open letter to Allan Gotlieb, our Ambassador in Washington who wrote not such a private and confidential letter to Sinclair Stevens. Let me quote that letter in part. The Ambassador said:

I regret having to say, but it is my job to do so, that the substance and the method of presenting the new publications policy (championed by the Minister of Communications) will go some distance towards undermining the notable achievements of the Government to date in changing the image of Canada abroad.

I think you will be interested in the way in which Mavor Moore responded to that comment by the Ambassador. Mavor Moore is one of the really, truly great Canadians involved in cultural affairs over a long period of years. He said:

The only thing unique about the Canadian situation, let's confess, is the degree of our exposure—a familiar condition to you. Canada has been prompted to a “principal” role in this contemporary drama precisely because the rest of the world accounts us first in the path of the biggest cultural juggernaut of all time, and is waiting to see how we perform. The new technology can either give us what we want or persuade us to want what we're given. Those in the former category are rich, in terms of the new economics, and those in the latter poor.

Our mutual friend, the late Chief Justice Bora Laskin, once stated his “conviction, supported by experience, that individual creative activity, whether in the arts or in the humanities or in science or in technology, constitutes our social capital.” Old Bora had no hesitation in using the vocabulary of business to discuss culture, because he had a firm grasp of the imperatives of the new age. I wish I thought all you high-principled fellows in charge at the moment had grasped the same point. Obviously the Americans have, or they would not be so all-fired anxious to buy up more of our publishing, broadcasting and film industries than the three-quarters or so they now hold, or to make a “right” to do so the precondition to general trade negotiations. They know damn well that what is gravy to them is blood to us.

All of this has little to do with political or monetary doctrines such as lib-left and neo-con, and everything to do with capital investment in a future in which The Force lies with those societies with the collective wit to maintain their own creative plant. That is the only sense, my dear fellow countryman, in which Canada has the remotest chance of remaining a “principal” power.

Honourable senators will realize that I have been concerned about this problem throughout my entire political career. Indeed, On June 19, in the debate on Investment Canada, I posed a set of nine questions to the Honourable William Kelly who was sponsoring that bill through the Senate. I suggested that these were not rhetorical questions and that I would like specific answers. I received absolutely none, so I put the same questions in a Question Period to the government leader. I did that on September 25. Again, I have not been graced with the courtesy of an answer, so let me again put on record in this debate these nine questions, because I think they are important. Rhetoric is wonderful, but let us have some specifics.

(1) Will this government continue to guarantee that all newspapers published in Canada, and all radio and television cable stations in Canada, will continue to be owned and operated by Canadians?

(2) Will this government give Canadians an ongoing commitment to public broadcasting in general, and to the CBC in particular? Can we be assured that the CBC, as we know it, will continue to serve Canada?

(3) Will this government continue to enforce Canadian content requirements on both radio and television?

(4) Will this government continue to protect Canadian magazine publishers by continuing to eliminate the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying space in American media?

(5) Will this government commit itself to the policy of its Liberal predecessor when it comes to government advertising? That is, that all advertising on behalf of the Government of Canada, appearing in Canada, will be created and executed exclusively by Canadian advertising agencies?

(6) Will the government continue to support Canadian broadcasters with such all-important policies as the substitution of simultaneous American programs on cable, the deletion of American advertising on cable, and, of course, the aforementioned elimination of the tax deduction for Canadian advertisers buying time on American television?

(7) What specific steps is the government prepared to take to protect the Canadian book publishing industry?

(8) What specific steps is this government prepared to take to protect the Canadian film industry?

(9) Will this government guarantee the future of the Canadian Football League by spelling out in specific terms that American professional football will be neither desirable nor welcome in Canada?

I added a tenth question, which vexed my friend, Senator Flynn, which was about the possible incursion or return of Time magazine to this country.

I should like to comment on several of those questions because I think they are relevant in terms of this discussion. First of all, I should like to say a word or two about television and radio. I do so, honourable senators, because the statistics are impressive, yet alarming.

No doubt, television shapes the lives of almost all Canadians. A Canadian youngster aged 12 will have seen 12,000 hours of television; over 80 per cent of that, 10,000 hours, will have been American programming. The adult numbers are almost as frightening: 75 per cent of all Canadian television programming is American; 98 per cent of all dramas are American.

As the Association of Television Producers and Directors said in a brief to the Honourable Marcel Masse last March, and I quote:

We are the only country in the world that imports the total television output of another nation and uses its own distribution system to spread it into every corner of the land.

Yet, the Americans want more, and apparently this government is prepared to discuss those realities with the Americans: "If you want more, talk to us about it."

I will leave it to others to address border advertising, commercial cable deletion, and the future of the CBC.

The government's ongoing love affair with everything American does, of course, have supporters in high places. One example is Michael Hind-Smith. Michael Hind-Smith, as some honourable senators will realize, is the President of the Canadian Cable Television Association. He was speaking to the Canadian Conference of the Arts at a conference on broadcasting in October. Michael Hind-Smith, the head of the Canadian Cable Television Association of this country, said that Canadians only "pay lip service to the importance of Canadian cultural identity." He went on to say that what Canadians really want is less regulation and a greater availability of American television programs. Of course, that is what the cable industry wants—commercials on cable and more American programs.

Happily, Michael Hind-Smith was wrong, because that is not what a majority of Canadians want. I now quote from a survey conducted by Martin Goldfarb, which states:

75 per cent of Canadians feel that CBC's programming should provide a continuing expression of Canadian identity and contribute to Canadian unity;

80 per cent feel the amount of Canadian programming is either too little or about what it should be.

75 per cent say the CRTC should concentrate on improving the quality of Canadian programming.

The government, it is true, did establish a curious task force on broadcasting, which has not yet reported. That task force is headed by a New Democrat, Gerry Caplan, who told the CBC on a Sunday morning broadcast that his credentials were that he was "not a Liberal." Well, he is not a Liberal, and I am grateful for that. In fact, he is not a very good political organizer either. While he was the chairman of this important task force he took the time off to head a candidate's mayoralty campaign for the city of Toronto. Can you imagine! Needless to say, his candidate lost.

But never mind the task force because, as honourable senators are aware, it has one important advantage for the government: The government, by appointing it, has been able to procrastinate and postpone decisions while waiting for the task force to report. We have been told that the government will not have to do anything until that task force has reported.

Well, almost everything was put on hold, because both the government and the CRTC got into the act in different but equally distressing ways.

Let me read a press release from the CRTC, dated December 2, which states:

The CRTC announced today that it will hold a public hearing at the Sheraton Centre in Regina on 11 February 1986, to reconsider matters relating to its Decision 85-756 issued 12 September 1985, that approved application by SaskWest Television Inc. to operate English-language television services in each of Regina and Saskatoon.

On 8 November 1985, the Governor in Council—that is, the cabinet.

—referred Decision CRTC 85-756 back to the CRTC for reconsideration and hearing.

I will not speak about that but will allow the Winnipeg Free Press to do that. In an editorial in that paper on Sunday, November 17, entitled: "The Aroma of Politics", the following appears:

Many Canadians will detect a distinct aroma of politics in the federal cabinet order to the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission to reconsider its award of a third English-language television licence in Saskatchewan to Saskwest, a subsidiary of Canwest Broadcasting of Winnipeg. The majority of the CRTC members were appointed by the previous Liberal federal government. Canwest is controlled by Izzy Asper, a prominent Liberal. The complaint against the awarding of the licence was laid by Harvard Development Limited of Regina, part of the real estate, land development and broadcasting conglomerate of Paul Hill, a prominent Conservative. The federal cabinet which ordered the review is Conservative and pressure was applied by the Saskatchewan Conservative caucus.

That is an absolutely unprecedented decision by the cabinet. Liberal governments, whether you like it or not, my friend, never once intervened in the granting of a licence. This is really quite an unbelievable precedent and a very distressing one for people who care about cultural integrity.

Three important questions remain: Should the CRTC again grant the licence to SaskWest, will the cabinet veto that and say, "I am sorry, SaskWest can't get it." There is no precedent for that, I agree, but there is no precedent for what it has already done.

The second question is: If SaskWest is not granted the licence, will the government pony up about half a million dollars which SaskWest has already invested since the time the licence was granted?

The third question relates to a news release the President of SaskWest, Mr. D.C. Brinton, issued, in which it is stated:

Therefore, we have officially asked the Clerk of the Privy Council to make all such documentation available in order for us to determine what steps to follow in preparing our case.

The "documentation", of course, was material used by the cabinet in coming to its decision to refer back.

What has the CRTC been doing in the interim? Not very much that is good. Just recently, in November, the CRTC granted the requests of four FM stations, CFNY, Brampton, CJAY, Calgary, CIKR, Edmonton and CKAR, Edmonton, to reduce their Canadian content.

Honourable senators, let me quote a column which appeared in the Toronto Star under the byline of Mr. Henry Mietkiewicz who said:

Canadian content rules, introduced about 15 years ago by the CRTC, still irritate some broadcasters who favour a deregulated system. The policies, however, are widely credited with having accelerated the development of the recording industry by providing airplay for Canadian music.

There is no doubt about that. Those regulations created the music industry of this country, and we should not be cutting back on those Canadian content regulations. It is an absolute disgrace.

I now quote the President of CIRPA, which is the Canadian Independent Record Production Association. He said:

If these decisions are allowed to stand, we can see a serious erosion of the Canadian broadcasting system . . .

Any erosion of Canadian content on radio presents a grave threat to Canadian musicians and the record industry, and diminishes the opportunities audiences have to hear Canadian music.

The article further states:

—the association's executive director, Earl Rosen says his members fear the CRTC has established a dangerous precedent by rolling back levels that have been in effect for years. This means more stations, in seeking licence renewals, may request and be granted reductions in Canadian content.

The result, says the brief, "will be a decrease in the amount of Canadian music on FM radio."

Those are incredible facts. It is fine to sit and say that we are all friends together on both sides of the house, and that we are all good people who believe in country and cultural sovereignty; I think we do, but let us face some facts and let us get some hard decisions made by this Tory government.

I turn now briefly to the magazine industry in general with a specific reference to Time. More than 75 per cent of all magazines sold in Canada are American. That is a dreary fact of life. The 25 per cent footnote of the Canadian magazine industry exists primarily because of a series of protective measures introduced by the federal government to foster and protect our home and native magazine industry.

Honourable senators, I think that is very important because I believe that magazines are special. I believe that magazines foster in ourselves a sense of self, as is the case with no other media. I think it is extremely important.

Bill C-58 repatriated Time magazine to what it has always been—an American magazine and still available. It also resulted in the creation of Maclean's, our own weekly news magazine.

I do not know about every person in this chamber, but I, personally, like to view Canada as I like to view the United States and as I like to view the world—through Canadian eyes. I think that is very important.

All fall we have been listening to mutterings, rumours and comments about the rebirth of Time in Canada. Apparently, or so we are told, the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada have been pressured to rewrite Bill C-58.

Senator Murray: By whom?

Senator Davey: Presumably by Time Inc. and some of the people I am going to talk about.

Apparently, Time Inc. would be 25 per cent involved in a joint venture with Comac Communications of Toronto, who would own the other 75 per cent. However, to make the gimmick work, to complete the letter of the law, Revenue Canada would have to consider this new magazine as substantially different from other foreign magazines. That is where things stand.

Some people think that Revenue Canada may have already, long-since, granted a favourable ruling to Time magazine. However, the Prime Minister may not think that, and, in that regard, I should like to quote from a Globe and Mail article of several months ago where it is stated:

Mr. Mulroney also appeared to scotch reports that a new so-called Canadian edition of Time magazine has won government approval, saying he, too, has read the reports but is aware of "nothing to give it (the reports) much credence."

Meanwhile, the Globe and Mail in an article seems to agree with Mr. Mulroney. It quotes Time Inc. of New York as follows:

Time magazine . . . is not engaged in any effort with the Canadian government to alter the terms of the tax deductibility of magazine advertising—

This was said in a statement in New York. The article goes on to state:

Suggestions that Time is seeking to curry favour with the Canadian Government through manipulation of editorial content are irresponsible and totally inconsistent with long-established editorial policy of the magazine.

Amen. The next paragraph states:

A senior Time official, however, told the Canadian Press in a not for attribution interview earlier this week that the company does want the Government to change the law so it can revive a Canadian edition of Time.

"Absolutely," the official said. "We're saying that the legislation is an inequity as it is now . . . We think changes in that could contribute to the Canadian editorial marketplace."

● (2310)

As most honourable senators know, what goes around comes around. Stay tuned for this one: In 1958, Henry Luce, the godfather of Time, came to Ottawa and gave a lavish, sumptuous banquet in honour of John George Diefenbaker. At the end of the banquet, they presented Mr. Diefenbaker with a marvellous portrait of himself on an earlier Time cover. And what do you think happened in the first budget after that lavish, sumptuous banquet? In the first Tory budget after the banquet, believe it or not, they abolished the tax on advertising in Time magazine.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Davey: Believe it or not—and I could not possibly make this up—where do you think the Prime Minister of Canada is tonight? He is in Chicago.

Senator Doody: Not Chicago.

Senator Davey: He is in Chicago as the honoured guest of Time magazine. No doubt, right about now, they are presenting him with a portrait of one of the two cover stories that they did. I will leave the rest up to you.

Senator Frith: Maybe a necklace that says, "I'm hooked on Time."

Senator Davey: Well, we will see what happens. It is going to be interesting.

I would like to say a word about Canadian football because I happen to think that football is a part of our culture. The CFL, honourable senators, is in trouble. Every sports page in the country has had a comment—you have all read the comments on every sports page wherever you live—saying how much trouble the Canadian Football League is in. Yet, the National Football League is poised to come into Canada to put teams in Toronto, Vancouver, Edmonton and Montreal. Is that really what we want? No more Canadian football; no football in Hamilton, Ottawa, Calgary, or in the greatest football city in the country, Regina; no more Grey Cup. Do we really want those things to happen?

When the same sort of thing was happening in 1974, the Liberal government was ready with Bill C-22 which prevented foreign football from crossing the border. Where does this government stand?

NFL owners are talking right now to people in every major Canadian city. The Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport, the Honourable Otto Jelinek, a friend of mine whom I respect, will not say what he would do. He says that he is a friend of the new commissioner, who happens to be a Tory—and good on both of them. However, make no mistake; the intrusion of the NFL is not, as the minister says, hypothetical, and I think he must know that.

I quote Greg Fulton, the Secretary-Treasurer of the CFL, as reported in an article in the Globe and Mail:

I think the Government realizes the importance of the league. They wouldn't want to see our league destroyed by something like (NFL expansion) happening."

The article goes on to state:

Fulton doesn't think that the Tory arguments against Bill C-22 11 years ago really meant anything, because "they knew their opposition wasn't going to mean anything anyway."

I think Greg got it right. After all, honourable senators, if you follow football at all, you know that the Oakland Raiders moved to Los Angeles; the Baltimore Colts moved to Indianapolis. Anything can happen. Any senator who cares about this issue and sits silently, thinking they will not come into Canada, is kidding himself.

This government should spell out its intention in block letters. Then, and only then, will the Canadian Football League get its own act together.

Just in passing—so often when I talk about this, I am asked about the Blue Jays and the Expos—baseball coming to Canada was a great thing because it created an interest in baseball all over the country. It destroyed nothing. American football coming into Canada would destroy a Canadian institution.

I want to say a word about another matter which some may argue is not culture. I believe it is culture. Whether we like it or not, it is a form of culture. I refer to advertising. In my judgment, it is an integral part of culture. The fact is that the Canadian advertising industry is clearly in peril. The facts are alarmingly simple. According to Marketing, which is the advertising trade paper, in 1963 three of Canada's top 15 agencies were American. Today eight of the top 15 agencies are multinational. More than half of the top 20 advertising agencies are American. The fact is that big American advertisers use big American advertising agencies. For years Canadian subsidiaries were allowed to employ Canadian advertising agencies. Some still do, and the ones that come to mind are General Motors and Ford, but the trend now is moving dramatically in the opposite direction. Canadian subsidiaries are being forced by the American head office to turn their business over to American agencies. I think that that is an appalling fact of life.

I can give you two remarkable examples. For more than 30 years Canada Dry was an account of Foster Advertising. That is an agency which is not unknown to my friends on the other side. It recently lost its traditional business to the Toronto branch of Young and Rubican, an American agency which is the second largest advertising agency in the world. The president of Foster Advertising, Tom Scott, was, to say the least, distressed. Actually, he was irate. The vice-president of marketing for Canada Dry informed Scott that the Canadian company had participated in the decision. What part of the decision had they taken part in? Can you believe they had taken part in the timing.

Another horror story is Stirling Products which is a big American drug manufacturer. Its Canadian subsidiary markets a well known analgesic aspirin. The advertising was handled by a middle-sized Canadian advertising agency with the initials SMW. The agency did great work. About a year ago the American head office ordered an agency review. It included the small Canadian agency SMW, another Canadian agency, the big New York agency and several other miscellaneous agencies. SMW, the Canadian agency, won the review hands down. In fact, they were given additional advertising. They won some industry awards. Six months later there was a change in the directorate of the management of the head office in New York. That resulted in another review. What do you think the result was? SMW was out of business and the business went to the New York agency, their Toronto office SSCB Lantise. This is a very distressing story.

Almost as bad, in my judgment, are big Canadian advertisers who employ American advertising agencies. Shame on them! Labatt's recently took its $20 million account from one big American agency and gave it to another big American agency. Canadian Tire, which is the biggest local advertiser in the country, employs an American agency. In my opinion this is not because these American agencies are any better, but if this trend keeps up they will be. It is no wonder that so much Canadian creative talent is moving to these American shops.

What of the dismal trend on Canadian advertising to use so-called American stars to sell Canadian products? I think that that is appalling. For instance, there is Carol Channing for People's Credit Jewelers, Mike Thomas for Sealtest, Robert Young for IDA, Bea Arthurs for Shopper's Drug Mart, Johnny Cash for Canada Trust, the Hillstreet Blues for Speedy Muffler, Matt Houston for Midas Muffler. It is only one man's opinion but I boycott all those products. What kind of a rabby country do we live in?

Things were different 15 years ago. I remember appearing before a select committee of the Ontario Legislature. Of course, then it was a Tory government and that select committee of the Tory government examined the advertising industry in considerable detail. They made a series of excellent recommendations but nothing happened because the Canadian advertising agencies felt that they had the matter under control. Maybe they had it under control then but they do not have it under control now, and I think that this is something that the Government of Canada should be examining.

Honourable senators, so much has been said in this debate about book publishing that I propose to confine my observations on that subject to two rather remarkable realities. The postal rate subsidy for books is provided indiscriminately using a single category available to any mailer regardless of whether any Canadian books are being sold—this is a postal subsidy for the book publishing business—or whether any of the books sold are acquired from the Canadian book publisher, or whether the subsidized mailer is a Canadian or foreign controlled company. As a result, this expenditure serves none of the objectives of federal policy for the book industry. It does not support Canadian authored books; it does not strengthen the Canadian controlled sector of the book industry; and it does not even support the maintenance and strengthening of Canadian book distribution structures. For the many U.S. book clubs, mail order publishers and wholesalers who make extensive use of these subsidized rates, the result is that they pay much less to mail their books to Canadian customers than they pay in their home market where the American postal service has implemented major rate increases over the past few years.

No doubt there are some honourable senators who belong to the Book-of-the-Month Club. I have an envelope here from the Book-of-the-Month Club Inc., Camp Hill, Pennsylvania 17012. It is printed in the U.S.A., sent to an address in Toronto, postmarked Rexdale, Ontario, and they charge 68 cents for postage. In other words, what the Book-of-the-Month Club does is have these things printed in the United States, packaged in the United States, then they bring them over the Canadian border and mail them out of Canada and they save hundreds of thousands and, indeed, millions of dollars. They do the same thing with the books. They bring them across the border and our postal subsidy pays for the distribution of these books.

I should like to say a word about copyrights. I will quote from a document entitled "Charter of Rights for Creators." It is a report of the Subcommittee on the Revision of Copyright, Standing Committee on Communications and Culture, Gabriel Fontaine, M.P., Chairman. It was published in October, 1985, and I quote in part:

A great many submissions filed by the writing and publishing segment of the creative community stressed the importance of protection against the importation of competing foreign editions. Some witnesses ranked this as an issue second only to the problems created by reprography. Because the main debate on the importation question was in respect of books, it is appropriate to address the question of importation protection in the writing and publishing of this Report.

Witnesses repeatedly stated that territorial divisibility is a fundamental and necessary part of international copyright. The present copyright law provides importation protection for all works. From Gutenberg to Telidon proposed to remove this importation protection for some works but not for others. Included in the non-protected category would be artistic works and computer programs.

The report went on to say:

The second observation concerns the purpose of Canadian cultural policy. The Canadian Conference of the Arts presented some pointed testimony on this issue. Although given with respect to the publishing industry, it is equally applicable to the producers of other works. The testimony focused on the question of why Canadian consumers should be required to buy more expensive Canadian editions of copyright works when cheaper foreign versions could be imported.

The answer came as a surprising acknowledgment that important protection in the Copyright Act is a particular type of government protection for certain industries. The CCA stated it would be quite willing to agree to the removal of importation protection if the footwear or clothing industries were able to survive the removal of their protection from foreign competition: "... let someone else be the laboratory experiment and not us."

Based upon this country's past and continuing attempts to encourage and develop a unique Canadian cultural identity, as expressed by Canadian cultural industries, and the fact that other jurisdictions maintain similar protection for the same reasons, the Sub-Committee is of the view that the importation protection of the present law should be maintained for all copyright works.

But because the government refuses to endorse the importation protection, this report talks about massive "buying around" being the order of the day and says, in effect, that we have one-way free trade with the United States which does not seem to work the other way.

An interesting court case is taking place at the present time in California. I quote from an article taken from News of the Week:

A federal judge will hear arguments on December 5 on a ground-breaking case brought by eight American publishers against a California importer of British books. The case involves copyright, anti-trust and First Amendment issues.

Because of the action's ramifications, the Association of American Publishers, which organized the plaintiffs, finds itself in opposition to the American Booksellers Association and the Northern California Booksellers Association. Both retailer organizations filed friend-of-the-court briefs supporting the First Amendment rights of the defendant...

According to Ann Fisher, attorney for Stark—who is one of the importers

[Senator Davey.]

—the court has allowed an unusually long argument period of two-and-a-half hours, signaling Judge Legge's awareness of the complexity of the case and the constitutional issues involved. "There are no case references to this dispute," Fisher said. "We will be setting a precedent on every point."

The suit—filed in July 1984 by the Hearst Corporation (Avon), Bantam, Berkley, Dell, New American Library, Warner, Simon & Schuster...

Honourable senators, Simon and Schuster is a subsidiary of Gulf and Western. In other words, Gulf and Western wants to keep British books out of America but proposes to flood Canada with American books.

Much has been said about the comments made by Joe Clark in New York City. I would like to complete my remarks by a reference to what he said on that occasion, and I want to be extremely fair to the right honourable gentleman. He said, and I quote:

Finally, there is my view that it is at least worth looking for advantages that might come to Canadian cultural industries (through freer trade).

Honourable senators, I thought that the most effective response to that came in the November 16 issue of the Financial Post, and I quote:

A two-page list of acquisitions of U.S. publishing concerns by Canadian-based firms, delivered late last month by U.S. Secretary of State George Shultz to Canadian External Affairs Minister Joe Clark, has left much of the Canadian book publishing industry mystified.

For one thing, the list of 50 acquisitions, dating back as far as 1974, is dominated not by book publishing take-overs but rather by purchases of newspapers and periodicals.

For another, among the deals mentioned is one involving Methuen Publications of Toronto, a firm controlled by British interests.

But the biggest mystery late last week, when The Post obtained a copy of the list, was the document's origins. It bears no identification markings, and no one contacted by The Post was able to describe with certainty just how the list got into Schultz's possession and then became part of his strong pitch for lowered Canadian investment barriers.

Two U.S. State Department officials said the list originated with Gulf & Western Industries Inc. which has been lobbying heavily to get Investment Canada's approval of its indirect purchase of Prentice Hall Canada Ltd. An official with G&W's New York office said he had no knowledge of such a list. And a Canadian official based in Washington said he had been told the list had been compiled by the U. S. Commerce Department.

In fact, the Commerce Department did compose such a list several months ago, U.S. officials say. And, if anything, they say, that list depicted more dramatically the growing presence of Canadian firms in the U.S. publishing field.

The Shultz list, which includes takeover prices in only 15 of the 50 cases, appears to be based on media accounts of publishing takeovers rather than on actual company-supplied data. The largest price given is U.S. $100 million cited for the purchase of the Houston Post. Buyer is identified as Maclean Hunter Holdings Ltd. (Maclean Hunter, which also owns The Financial Post, has a half-interest in the Toronto Sun Publishing Co. Ltd., which purchased the Houston Post in 1983. . . .

By far the most frequently cited buyers, however, are the Thomson newspaper interests which, through entities variously identified as the "Thomson family", Thomson Newspapers Ltd. or Thomson Equitable Corp Ltd., are listed in 33 of the cases. Maclean Hunter is mentioned in five deals. And companies related to Torstar Corp., which publishes The Toronto Star, get four listings.

Asked to explain the preponderance of nonbook publishers in the listing, a U.S. official, who asked not to be identified, suggested that U.S. concerns were directed at more than just Canadian investment policy relating to the book sector. The official said the controversial July policy announcement by then-Communications Minister Marcel Masse "anticipated policy changes" beyond book publishing.

A Communications Department official in Ottawa flatly denies that contention. But a second Canadian official does confirm that American concerns have drifted well beyond original questions about the G&W takeover bid to include all aspects of alleged Canadian cultural protectionism.

Honourable senators, I think I have made my point. I think that really says it all. Free trade in cultural matters might work, honourable senators, for media barons, for communications tycoons or for powerful information conglomerates. These are all, I concede, friends of the government. But for the hundreds of thousands of ordinary, grassroots Canadians involved in various forms of cultural activity, there will be absolutely nothing to cheer about because most of them would lose their jobs. I can only conclude—

Senator Phillips: Please do.

Senator Davey:—by expressing my concern and by saying, "Welcome back, Marcel Masse—for heaven's sake hang tough".

Hon. Finlay MacDonald (Halifax): Honourable senators, because of my attendance at various committee meetings today, I regret to say that I did not have the opportunity to hear all of the distinguished speakers who have preceded me. I did, however, hear the opening remarks of Senator Grafstein, in many of which I join. I was reluctant to take part in the debate this evening. Because I was ill prepared, I thought that I would ramble. But having listened to Senator Davey, I feel very much at home and very encouraged. I do not believe that I will repeat too much of what has been said today, because I will not be dwelling on the subject of book publishing, for instance. I am aware of the policy statement of the Honourable Marcel Masse. It seems to speak for itself, and I gather that no voices have been raised in this chamber today against that policy.

I want to remind Senator Davey—I am sure he knows this already—and also Senator Grafstein that we share something in common, in that we have been associated with the media. I claim to be a Canadian nationalist. Senator Davey will recall that in 1954-55, when I was President of the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, I defected on the position taken by that private body before the Fowler Commission at that time, because I totally supported, as I do today, public ownership of broadcasting in Canada; and I fail to understand why Senator Davey should have launched into an attack against the co-chairman of the existing task force appointed by the Honourable Marcel Masse, namely, Mr. Caplan, who appears to be giving that task force great leadership, and who only the other day—long before the report is to be released, which I gather is soon, and on time, and within budget, I am told—made a sterling defence of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the recommendations of the committee for its continued support. I am surprised that he gave the recommendations in advance of the hearings. Mr. Caplan is a very distinguished Canadian. I am sure that honourable senators have been reminded by Senator Davey that the Prime Minister is indeed in, or was in, Chicago this evening, speaking at a seminar jointly sponsored by the University of Chicago and Time magazine. He said the following:

If we and our American partners cannot strike a deal that will achieve these goals, a deal will not be struck. Our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our commitment to fight regional disparities, our unique cultural identity, our special linguistic character—these are the essence of Canada.

They are not at issue in these negotiations. Canada is a bilingual country, in law and increasingly in practice. Our bilingual character is one of the reasons federal and provincial governments promote culture through direct financial support; it is why there are special rules regarding our cultural sector in our Investment Canada legislation. When it comes to discussing better trade rules for cultural industries, you will have to understand that what we call cultural sovereignty is as vital to our national life as political sovereignty.

I repeat:

. . . you will have to understand that what we call cultural sovereignty is as vital to our national life as political sovereignty. And how could it be otherwise living, as we do, with a country 10 times our population?

He concludes:

Canada and the United States are different sovereign democracies. In the United States, you cast the net of national security over more areas than we; in Canada, we cast the net of cultural sovereignty more widely than you.

That is where the quote ends.

Senator Phillips: Don't you wish you had that when you spoke?

Senator Davey: I am glad I didn't.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Senator Grafstein referred to a sense of perspective. Well, the Macdonald commission said that what Canada needs most in a debate on free trade is a sense of proportion. We appear to be getting ready to commence with the process by which we begin negotiations with the United States. While there appears to be a general willingness in Canada to explore these matters, other voices have been heard with legitimate fears. But Senator Grafstein would give the impression that we are rushing headlong into something that means the end of everything that we hold dear. He said that we have reached the point of no return. I say to him that we are nowhere near the starting line. We have not yet got near the forest, let alone got near the underbrush, or determined who the foresters are. Who is rushing? Consultation with the private sector and the provinces is essential to the quality of these discussions, and so it is to be, as we learned last week. Why now this strident cry from Senator Grafstein in the name of book publishing? The Macdonald commission went on to say that it was:

profoundly impressed by the confidence that Canadians have come to show in themselves as individuals and in their country as a political community.

The day of the apologetic Canadian is gone and there is no reason to suppose that our present confidence will be undermined by an arrangement designed to secure a continuing exchange of goods and services with the United States.

No one suggests or has suggested that these negotiations will be only economic. The ability of our political system and our culture will also be very much entwined. As quoted in a Globe and Mail editorial:

Unity and commitment have not been typical of Canada's national life in recent years. Can new challenges inspire better ways, better habits, or must old ways make new challenge opportunities missed.

Certainly there are important differences of opinion about the consequences of liberalized trade—but the only crisis we have today is the one manufactured by this mischievous motion. While Senator Grafstein may reflect an area of concern, a sense of proportion is not a feature of his discourse. Fear seems more to the point. Let the process plod on. We have a long, long way to go.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have listened to the debate and have much admired what has been said on both sides of the house. I heard with pride Senator Barootes with whom I share a common allegiance. But he seems to have lived in a world that is a little different from mine. He said that you do not go into a negotiation and put your cards on the table.

I remember in my youth going into negotiation to convince some young lady to come with me to a tea dance. Her mother put the cards clearly on the table and explained what wasn't on the cards. Now, of course, I was only a sailor, whereas Senator Barootes was a fledgling doctor; and any mother would let her daughter disport herself with a doctor more than with a sailor. I admit that.

But it seems to me that it is not unknown to go into negotiations of any kind, and there are endless historical examples of this, saying there are some things that are not for discussion, that are not for sale. The biggest danger for us is that the Americans do not understand why we are different, why we want to be different; and when there is any evidence that seems to indicate that we do have this feeling, they get very angry and they start talking of a scorched earth policy. If a private individual went to a merchant and said, "If you do not sell me your store, I will torch it," we would consider that to be a criminal act. But if a U.S. multinational does it, we do not seem to be sufficiently shocked. I am not too shocked myself, because I do not think that Gulf and Western wants to play at being the criminal underworld. It simply is unaware of, if not indifferent toward, Canada, the best ally of the United States. Gulf and Western do not see why we should want them to operate under our rules. This is a challenge to our very right to make our own rules in a very important field. Gulf and Western seem to be saying, "Are not the United States rules the very best? Isn't Canada virtually a part of the United States, and why shouldn't they accept United States rules?" That is a very old misconception. It starts with Ben Franklin. During the U.S. revolution, Ben Franklin came up here and was very surprised that Canadians, especially the Quebeckers, did not want to join the American revolution.

I would like to quote some passages from a series of articles published by the Globe and Mail in 1960, 25 years ago. What they describe is similar to what is going on today, particularly in the media. Senator Doyle was with the paper at that time, and I think he had a hand in editing these articles. The articles begin with the title "No Melting Pot to Homogenize the Immigrants." I am an immigrant. The article says, "American citizens rarely believe in a separate Canadian identity." "There is no such thing," says Eric Sevaried of CBS, a very important and respected American commentator. Twenty-five years ago he did not believe that Canada was a separate entity. Here is another quote, "We think of Canada as being practically one of our states." That comment came from Senator Hiram Fong of Hawaii. Another quote reads, "I cannot see in what way Canadians differ from us." That comment was made by David Brinkley who still practises broadcasting. These are well informed people. "Other U.S. citizens when apprised of Canadianism smile tolerantly much as they do at Texan eccentricities."

I admit that it is difficult in crossing the border from Montana to Alberta or vice versa to realize that one has crossed the border. However, there are differences. The phrase "melting pot" signifies a very great difference between Canada and the United States, and it is important for those of us who constitute the third entity of Canada, the immigrants. This is where you begin to see the differences between the two countries very clearly. They exist and that is where they are most visible. On Ontario beaches you can hear Italian, Germanic basses in the tones, Slavic woodwinds, Parisien French and accents of Quebec. These are important things. We are different and perhaps we are not even compatible with the Americans.

I would like to quote again from those articles some other passages. I quote Dr. Forsey, our former colleague, who said that French Canada is what makes Canada separate from the United States. In his words, the "intellectualism" of French Canada sets us apart, and it "is far superior to that of the English Canadians." I shall not get into a debate on that point, but that is Senator Forsey, an English Canadian, speaking about his French brothers. Another person by the name of Professor Crowe, said:

—the long co-existence of two distinct cultures within the same state is a unique experiment, a unique contribution to the political evolution of mankind. The mores and formulae that have emerged, that have been devised to make this co-existence possible are a large part of Canadian identity.

According to Professor Crowe, from this concept of cultural co-existence has sprung the mosaic aspect of Canadian development. No melting pot compulsion here, no rendering down of new immigrants to pour them into a common mould stamped, "Made in Canada". Professor Crowe quoted Lord Tweedsmuir in that article who said that to be a good Ukrainian in Canada is to be a better Canadian. He went on to say, "I do not maintain that this concept is necessarily favoured by the majority in the country, but it is backed by the majority of what you might call opinion-formers." That is a very important distinction between us and the United States. This same series of articles devoted one entire article to this cultural issue entitled, "To Avoid Engulfment, Should We Not develop a Superior Culture."

The concerns that we are discussing today were alive then and have remained alive throughout Canadian history. They have not changed. The Globe and Mail wrote:

Canada's mind is in danger of being made in the United States. Insidiously, the Jack Paars, the Ed Sullivans are storing the Canadian mind with a folklore of the United States.

The better aspects of the U.S. cultural life have an even more powerful attraction for the best Canadian brains, who leave their provincial milieu for the bright lights of the intellectual meccas south of the border, for the rich fellowships, for the fat Broadway and Hollywood salaries and the impressive pay scales of the United States.

This is still going on 25 years later. The article goes on:

In the Middle Ages Turkey scoured her Christian dependencies for the ablest boys whom she then grabbed for her elite palace guard. Intellectually Canada is still being subjected to the same sort of process.

This by almost universal consent, is considered a far bigger threat to national identity than U.S. control of the economy. Senior civil servants, Cabinet ministers, opposition leaders, professors, writers, directors of the CBC, all have spoken feelingly of the cultural threat and it was easy to make them confess a lack of specific remedies they would advocate—after all, no intellectual can avoid feeling embarrassed when it comes to discussing, not tariffs to protect the country's secondary industries, but intellectual tariffs to protect Canada's culture.

The reactions against this threat are well known: I found no one who did not give full marks to the CBC for turning the tide a little, at least in the television field (another instance where basic conservatism is strained by the desire to preserve identity through a state enterprise).

Dr. Forsey was worried 25 years ago over the Canadian content of the private TV stations and said that he would keep an eye open to see that Canadian programs were presented during prime time viewing. There were suggestions that Canadian cultural identity was a continuing concern and that we have always had it. It was suggested that there should be pooled efforts by Canadian newspapers to have more Canadian foreign correspondents abroad. We heard Canadian journalists express the same desire and the same anxiety about all the sources of our information coming from the United States when they appeared before the joint committee on Canada's foreign relations.

The protection of Canada's cultural identity, said the Globe and Mail, could be taken a step further and consider bilingualism. Dr. Forsey was suggesting 25 years ago that bilingualism should become obligatory as a means of differentiating us from the Americans and keeping us distinct. He was explaining his worries, because with universal literacy, with nearly universal ownership of television and radio sets, inexpensive books, comics, widespread possession of motor cars and therefore ability to travel—especially to the United States—culture is no longer the monopoly of a class, of an elite, said Senator Forsey. The audience of culture—of pictorial and performing arts, of literature—has become the property of the entire population. It was this popular culture that seemed to be most threatened by American penetration 25 years ago, and this is true today. Because of the economies involved, because of the system, Canadian mass culture, the Globe and Mail was saying 25 years ago, was bound to resemble U.S. mass culture.

How very true that prediction was. We are very little different from the United States and if we did not have Quebec, I do not know how different we would be. Protecting our cultural identity may hinge on Canada's willingness to embark on an extremely ambitious experiment, said the Globe and Mail 25 years ago, that of raising the nation's mass culture to an elite level. In a supply and demand economy where freedom of choice exists, the only way of achieving such a cultural revolution is to create a mass demand for elite culture. The article went on to say that there had to be intervention by the state; there had to be protection for the vehicles of Canadian culture in order to protect this very precious thing that is the tenuous difference that separates us from the Americans.

We do not want Americans to be able to come here and buy our television stations and flood us with programs featuring the Rev. Falwell and the other strange fauna of the American religious scene. Our cultural industries are delicate plants. They need special care and watering. They could die.

Senator Doyle was saying: What is the crisis now? I would like to answer that. While Mr. Masse was minister, until he took that two-month break, there was a strong voice defending Canadian culture. Then that voice was diluted by a series of statements by colleagues of Mr. Masse. Perhaps those colleagues did not intend their words to carry the full meaning that they did carry, but that is how they were interpreted. The cultural industries of Canada were worried. Then Mr. Masse comes back and he is asked, "What is happening?" and his voice does not sound now, after his return, as clear and as resonant as it sounded before his departure. That is what we are worried about, those of us who are speaking now. We are worried about it. We are worried about it because there have been cutbacks—very severe cutbacks—in the CBC. We are worried because various provincial governments are cutting the universities—and the federal government is going along with them. This is not a partisan thing, because other governments have done it, too. How are we to elevate our culture to an elite level if we are striking at our universities and our education?

I do not want to be American. I had a free choice. I could have been American, or British or Greek or French. I really had all of the papers to be welcomed in any of those four countries. I chose to be Canadian. I think this is the best country there is. I think we are different from the others. We do not have the brashness of the Americans, but we have some of their get-up-and-go; we do not have the stuffiness of the British, although we have their sterling qualities; we do not have the irritating aspects of the French whom we encounter. Instead, we have the lovable Quebecois who are so much better than the French of France.

This is God's own country. It should stay different. It should not become an American colony, intellectually or culturally. Other cultures have avoided being swallowed because they have taken care of their cultural industries. Traditionally, kings in ancient times had bards, and to make sure that those bards did not go away, they blinded them. Homer had been blinded so he would not run away. Pisistratus, tyrant of Athens in the 6th century B.C. bribed the bards to include mentions of Athens in the Iliad to make Athens sound greater than it was. It was straight propaganda, but that is what culture is, to some extent. Pericles subsidized the production of the plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides, and even subsidized the citizens to go and watch those plays. We would not have had Michelangelo without Pope Julius II, nor would we have had him without the Medici. We would not have the great collections of arts around the world if there had not been a conscious effort, sometimes by very small, very impecunious civilizations, to foster the arts, to foster culture, regardless of the demands of the marketplace.

What worries some of us on this side of the chamber, Senator Doyle, is that I do not see many Medici in the government. Perhaps Mr. Masse is one. I do see too many people who, whatever their words, do not seem to consider the cultural and educational aspect of this country, the basis of our difference, as sufficiently important.

I do see an excessive admiration for the United States; a willingness to consider them as the be all and end all. America is marvellous and I do admire it. Americans are very exciting and enthralling, but they are not us, and because they are friendly and because we are close, because we love them, the seduction is so much more easy; the disappearance of the difference is so much more easy.

[Translation]

Honourable Senators, I don't want to see Canada disappear. Even Quebec's francophones are threatened. Their young people no longer want to listen to French music. Quebec radio stations are applying for permission to play more and more rock music. I would like it to be Canadian rock music, with Canadian lyrics, and in Quebec French lyrics, so that we can preserve what is characteristic of our country.

[English]

It does not have to be a very big difference. In fact, it is a small one and because it is small and weak, it needs preserving; it needs protection; not just ringing statements but a real belief in the gut such as the one Mr. Masse has, and which I feel other people who have been quoted tonight do not really have, whatever they say—people who have said one thing and meant another; people who have said one thing one day and the opposite on the next; who have said in front of two television cameras—and I saw this with my own eyes and have it on tape—one thing to the francophone audience and the opposite to the anglophone audience, in the same minute.

I do not like games being played with the identity of the country I love.

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, the discussion of what was described as a crisis in Canada's cultural industries focused mainly on the publishing industry and has ranged far and wide. We have all learned something from each other and about each other.

In Mary Stewart's, A Clubwoman's Creed, there is the following paragraph:

Grant that we may realize that it is the little things that create differences and that in the big things of life we are one.

This evening's discussion has been far-ranging. It is only because it has been so far-ranging that I stand here not well prepared—because, as honourable senators know, this was said to be a "crisis", and I was concerned about what the crisis was all about and have listened instead of making detailed preparation.

To some, the words "cultural industries" mean the book publishing industry; to others, those words mean television and radio; to others, those words mean the visual arts—paintings and sculptures—and to others, those words mean the performing arts, music and drama. We each enjoy, appreciate and perform in whatever our cultural background is; from what we learned as we grew up, whether in this country or in some other country.

I want to draw to honourable senators' attention the fact that although we have accepted in Canada two official languages, perhaps more than one-third of the people in Canada are not of English or French origin. If any member of this chamber were to go to Alberta during Heritage Days—which are held during the first week of August—that senator would see the world at our doorstep because of the number of different cultural backgrounds from which these people originated. Therein is a cultural demonstration and celebration of the fact that they are in a country that is free. They display their ethnicity and their own cultural wares, whether those be crafts, cooking, music or drama. That is part of the Canadian cultural industry, too.

As a former teacher, I look to the public schools of the nation to see our culture grow. When children do art, participate in plays, dances or games, many of their talents show. Many children do not perform well in the academic field but have talents in other areas, such as in art, music or drama. A teacher can always find something in a child to praise and encourage.

I went to my office and took off the wall a drawing of this chamber that was done by a 12-year-old child on October 27, 1981. That young child saw the Senate in action and wanted to make a sketch of it then and there. That sketch was treasured by that child and by me. In fact, that child went on to bigger things; he was commissioned to do a sketch for a ceramic mural for a swimming pool in his home town.

During the 90th anniversary celebrations of the first Ukrainian people to arrive in Alberta, the Ukrainian women of the city of Edmonton commissioned a bronze statue of a young woman holding a sheaf of wheat, and called The Madonna of Wheat. They dedicated that statue to pioneer women of Alberta. I thought that the Ukrainian women had come a long way by including all women, not only Ukrainian women. Those women had really grown to embrace all nationalities.

This evening is "show and tell night" in the Senate. I have with me a painting which I did back in 1975 depicting a grain elevator in my home town. This is painting number two of "Vanishing Scenes" in my home county. Why did I bring it here? Because it is part of my life; it is part of my culture.

On the subject of book publishing, I have with me a book entitled, The Blue Book of Canadian Cuisine, which is a tribute to elected Progressive Conservative members and senators. It is a "Galaxy of good eating." This was compiled and co-ordinated by a native of Saskatchewan. We heard about citizens from Saskatchewan promoting their province in Ottawa today from honourable senators of their province, and Senator Barootes had with him a record made in Regina, so I thought this could be added to "Saskatchewan Day". This was put together by the Taylor family of Melfort, Saskatchewan. The front cover was photographed by Patricia Holdsworth of Regina, Saskatchewan. The book was designed, printed and produced in Canada by Centax of Canada. Honourable senators, it is a totally Canadian publication. This proves that it can be done.

Honourable senators, speaking totally off the cuff, to me it seems perfectly clear that cultural education must begin in our schools and continue in other educational institutions.

I know that recently a play was produced by a woman in Jasper. It was advertised on television, but, unfortunately, as yet, I have not had an opportunity to see it.

We talk constantly about the American influence but seem to forget how many talented Canadians have gone across the border and have become famous in that country. I think exchange is a good thing.

As citizens of Canada, I believe we have to take a look at how much attention we pay to cultural education in our schools.

Nowadays, we hear constantly about computers and that one computer can do so many things. Why should our unemployed not be more involved in the arts?

Honourable senators, my five-year-old granddaughter, when asked if she goes to school, replies, "Oh, no, I am only five." Then, when asked if she attends kindergarten, she says, "I am not in kindergarten either; I am just too busy." She is a five-year-old who is in her third year of violin; plays the piano; dances ballet; and this year, she says, "I am also taking taps." That child has no time for a lot of other things.

Cultural education has to start with our children. It is true that mothers with children who are educated in the arts, are usually also very busy. It is true that a lot of money has to be expended to train children in the arts. I believe the lack of education in these areas means that our nation is losing out.

Honourable senators, whether I have contributed to the debate or not, I should like to make a plea that we look at what is going on in our classrooms as far as these arts are concerned.

Honourable senators, I may have omitted to say some things that are now perhaps out of context, since it is after midnight. I am wearing a badge that says, "Meeting Tomorrow's Challenge Today." Well, tomorrow is here!

Senator Haidasz: There is a long day ahead of you.

● (0030)

Senator Bielish: Today is long gone; tomorrow is here.

In closing I would like to reiterate—I do not know if anybody else has done this or not because I was not here all the time—and I am reading from the statement of the Right Honourable Joe Clark of November 18, 1985, when he said:

Protection of our distinct cultural identity is of singular importance to Canada.

Our government's intention to promote culture in Canada through direct financial support is simply not at issue in a trade negotiation.

He was speaking in New York.

We are prepared to discuss with the U.S. ways we can strengthen cultural industries through trade. But under no circumstances are we prepared to agree to any measures which weaken those Canadian industries or undermine their capacity to serve our cultural needs.

With that, I stand.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, I would never dare return to the ground so magisterially covered by my learned and eminent friend, Senator Jacques Hébert, publisher and writer. I shall then confine myself to certain clouds where I am usually to be found.

After all that has been said today, I cannot pretend to too much originality, but what I have to say I say with courage.
[Translation]

Honourable senators, some people, regardless of the image ascribed to them, can invariably recognize themselves without any hesitation. We Canadians are a little like the man referred to in the Epistle of St. James, chapter 1, verses 23 and 24, who, having looked at himself in the mirror, immediately forgot who he was. The mirror does not give us a clear image because our form is imprecise, unclear, composite.

The man in the Epistle according to St. James was distracted and therefore unable to get a lasting image of himself. He was not able to put into practice the words he had heard. In this instance, the word is culture. The French, for example, are not absent-minded. They have a clear sense of their own culture that has been developed and nurtured and practiced faithfully and admirably by them for more than 1,000 years. Canadians, on the other hand, have not yet developed for their own edification a similar, identifying culture that is radically theirs.

Depending on which branch of Canada's pluralistic society we belong to, we embrace and adopt a certain word of culture. We are receptive to other cultures, not only those beyond our borders, but those within the country, more specifically within each Canadian province. However, we cannot embrace entirely and as faithfully these second cultures. Except in rare cases, this remains an impossibility, in view of the present state of human development.

In quoting as I just did a biblical passage relating to man's integrity, I wanted to call to mind the extreme complexity of the Canadian condition. Our country and its peoples do not appear to enjoy the unity and stability of completed forms. For example, while anglophones from western Canada seem impervious to francophones, whether it be those living in the region or in eastern Canada, they do appear to be influenced to some extent by the Orientals living among them and even more so by the Americans living on the Pacific coast with whom there is a natural north-south link. Similarly, we residents of eastern Canada tend to look to the Atlantic coast, to Boston, New York and Miami. There is nothing preventing Francophones in western Canada from being influenced by what they hear.

Elsewhere, say in central Canada, several cultures co-exist, such as the English, French, Ukrainian, Polish and even Icelandic cultures. And along our indistinct border, there breathes, always, the immense American giant.

In eastern Canada, specifically in Ontario and Quebec, there is a wealth of cultures, all of which present many possibilities. The English and French cultures co-exist with the Irish, German, Italian and Jewish cultures, whereas in the southern regions of these two provinces, the American presence is strongly felt. It comes to us loudly in all imaginable forms from such lofty places as Chicago, Detroit, Boston, New York and Philadelphia, sites of prodigious activity and the beginnings of a giant conurbation that will eventually swallow up Toronto, Montreal and Québec City.

In the Maritime provinces and on the Atlantic coast, the diversity is evident in the three principal groups, namely the English, the Scots and the French who in turn are distinguishable from the French Canadian group known as the Acadians.

This brief overview of the cultural makeup of Canada may give a false impression of a general hustle and bustle of activity.

The fact is that this country is disproportionately vast when compared to heavily populated western Europe. Its population, which numbers some 25,000,000, is unevenly distributed. More than half of the population resides in Québec and Ontario. More than one province has barely one million inhabitants. More than 90 per cent of the population resides somewhere along a strip of land three to four hundred kilometres north of the border. An intrepid traveller could conceivably plunge into the wooded area 75 kilometres from Montréal and travel all the way to the Arctic, with his chances of not encountering another living soul being excellent.

Any natural environment leaves a singular imprint, and ours is no exception, given the size of the territory and the power of the elements. The environment quickly transformed the French, the first settlers to Canada, into "habitants", an expression still used in Québec and one that hints at the daily rigours of life in Canada and the changes it brought about. In short order, New France's settlers and pioneers lost their French identity. The environment and the threat of death demanded an immediate transformation. The North American identity had firmly taken root by the time of the conquest.

That which is true of our French ancestors also holds true for our British ancestors. If there is a physical and psychological point where the two main cultures cannot help but come together, it is in the face of Canada's immense, harsh and beautiful landscape. As the colonization and development of the country pushed ahead and we learned how to defend ourselves, the influence of the environment clearly diminished, although it remained nonetheless significant. Celebrated Canadian journalist Blair Fraser, who died during a foray into the most untamed regions of Canada, saw the principle of the Canadian identity in the communion with nature and in the certainty, either clear or vague, that our country would always have undisturbed areas. It is true that our natural environment is important to us and forms a large part of our being, regardless of our tastes. It is true that it leaves a pronounced mark on our daily culture; it is true that the wide open spaces, so vast that we can hardly imagine them or know what to do with them, are never very far away, and are easily accessible when we need to renew the strength of the Antaeus within each of us, Antaeus the mythological figure who regained his invincibility whenever he touched the earth. Finally, it is true that nature has made it easy for our intelligence and our instinct to be in touch with one another: in a way she has unified us, and in so doing has given us a kind of innocence that astonishes the European, rooted to the same spot for centuries. It is true: our transplantation to the American continent was a purification, a rebirth. Renewed, new, we created the New World.

Nature gave us our culture: she spoke and we listened, and learned. But however fundamental and decisive the natural world was for us, it is far from explaining everything that makes us unique and enables us to survive. Our situation cannot be categorized simplistically: we must confront our own complexity.

In accordance with the law governing any incarnation, we first looked at our surroundings; our brief examination enabled us to determine a certain common denominator, or rather, a first integral. The complexity we are tackling now forces us to restrict our attention very severely. I will therefore only consider those factors in our development that strike me as indisputably dominant. They are: the English fact, the French fact, and the American fact.

Whatever his language or race, no Canadian can be existentially indifferent to any of these facts.

The French fact is the most homogeneous: it corresponds more or less completely to those we will call, for purposes of discussion, the French of Canada, whether in Québec or in other provinces, with a dusting of other assimilated elements, Canadian or foreign. From this definition it is obvious that the pull of the French gravitational field is very weak here.

If the English fact is not as homogeneous as the French, it is more weighty. The ratio in its favour is some two to one. It corresponds primarily to the English or British stock in Canada, but it also includes those other English-speaking elements, the Scots and the Irish, and the immense majority of the groups that came from continental Europe or Asia. The Jews, the Greeks, the Hungarians, the Chinese, the Japanese, who settled in Canada or who are coming to settle here, opt for the English-speaking community, and English becomes their language. The same is true for nearly all our aboriginal peoples.

Evidently, then, the English fact is by itself extremely complex. And since we have to consider it as the tensor in the Canadian equation, we will have to use it to refer to English-language culture as a whole. After all, to revert to our initial analogy, the English language is so widely used in Canada that we can attribute to its culture a very high degree of consistency, if not homogeneity.

As for our third fact, the American, it speaks with a cultural voice that is heard round the world. In Canada, in France, anywhere—we stop our ears in vain, American-ness gets through, and one way or another it becomes part of how we behave. And deservedly so. Let us take a quick look at how it affects us.

Like Canada, the United States is a European invention. But the Europeans who created the United States stand up before us and speak to us as people who have triumphantly completed their differentiation as North Americans. They are called "Americans", and that says it all. Whereas in our case, "Canadians" does not say it all, since we always have to take care to distinguish English Canadians and French Canadians; that says it all, and we are seen as North Americans who are not completely detached from Europe.

Obviously every nation springs from an older nation. The United States remains a tributary of Europe to a certain extent. No individual really stands alone, and no country either. The traditions by which a people live and are sustained are long-lasting and fertile. But the Americans, like the Romans vis-à-vis the Greeks, enjoying that completed identity which for both individuals and communities is the source of creative originality—the Americans are now teaching Europe and the world by a pedagogy as restrictive as that of the Romans themselves. And they are our next-door neighbours, on a continent whose main geographical axes are north-south rather than east-west.

The American presence among us is so vivid and so various that to do it justice we could use the images of osmosis, or a magnetic field, or impregnation, or invasion: all good images and all expressing in some way the fundamental reality of our lives.

The Americans are such good neighbours that at the border they usually ask nothing but our names. From one end of Canada to the other, we are more likely to visit the States than travel to different parts of Canada; we are obeying natural lines of force.

The Americans are our neighbours, but they are much more than that: they are a part of our very being, because there they are before us and within us, the only example of a complete North American differentiation. Their culture speaks with the most intimate, the most familiar, the most easily understood voice we hear. And it speaks more, and more constantly, than any other.

This being so, how can we explain Canada's existence? Canada was, and more than ever is, an act of will, the will to be a certain way that has not yet been perfectly defined. Canada has defied the north-south axes, and in part has succeeded in neutralizing them, thanks to the communications network that holds the country together. The result is admittedly by no means as solid as that of the Heavenly Jerusalem, which the Psalmist tells us admiringly is "built as a city that is compact together". Far from it, alas! A glance at the history of the railways, roads and electronic lines that are the concrete affirmation of our will to be a nation, is enough to reveal how tenuous and precarious our bonds have at times been.

The American radiance is so intense and pressing that we are tempted to build our identity on the basis of our resistance to it. Resistance to the American way is obviously a factor, and if we let it slip, we would soon be lost. But we are not only the negation of the United States. Our will to be has positive sources: they rest upon our two basic allegiances which, far from being servile, are creative and are exposed one to the other.

While both allegiances are equally strong, they differ considerably by way of their historical context.

Our French allegiance had, from the start, extremely deep peasant roots, which the indefectible stubbornness of the intellectual elite protected and nurtured. This stubbornness could be but narrow, which explains why our allegiance survived in such isolation and poorness that it is difficult for us today to comprehend; furthermore, it laboured under the deep dualism of our ancestral Catholicism, which was a Good Friday rather than an Easter religion, that fostered a visceral and pathogenic guilt which we are still far from having eradicated, as indisputably evidenced by our literature.

One must not forget that our French allegiance had to survive in the midst of the English allegiance which, right from the time of the conquest, became its political background.

Although, originally, the English allegiance did not have strong and colourful peasant roots like our French allegiance, it immediately drew on an immigration of high quality which never stopped. Therefore, after being quickly solidified by the arrival of hardy Loyalists, following the American War of Independence, it will, so to speak, be kept constantly replenished and will never be isolated. Sustained by numbers, exalted by its domination, it spread over the entire territory, severely but powerfully stimulated by a faith which tended much more than classical Catholicism to consider the acquisition of material goods as a blessing. But its very diffusion impoverished it and kindled the process of differentiation.

With the final result that English Canadians are as differentiated in North America as French Canadians and that their attitude towards their motherland, to use an even more outdated expression, is as unsubmitive as that of the French Canadians towards France. Let us not be blinded by the explosion of feelings which this or that Queen or Head of State fosters: neither of us have forgotten the lessons of history.

And history has taught us that France never took New-France seriously, that it never understood America or Canada, and that it is just starting to understand them, and more through her businessmen than through her leaders. In fact, under the old regime, we barely received what was necessary to become "habitants" and be advantageously conquered. What we have received from France since the time of the conquest, we have taken it as we could, at arm's length, or we went to get it. And we have only one regret: that of not having been greedy enough.

History also taught us that Great Britain took possession of Canada without realizing its good fortune, and that she wished to be as predominant and greedy as the French of the old regime, in keeping with the style of another era and of another mentality; it taught us that she despised us all as "colonials", that she mainly sent people who came of their own free will, and that the full autonomy which Canada enjoys today under the British Crown is a result of the skillful erosion of power in London, undertaken by the very first responsible government, before Confederation, and pursued ever since with a truly admirable aptness and subtlety.

The scandal of our borders is evidence that London did not know much more than Paris about the size of Canada, and did not have any more continental awareness than its rival. Look at a map: having understood its importance, the United States bought Alaska as they had bought Louisiana, leaving us only a door on the Pacific; and Maine, because of the strategic wedge it thrusts deep in Quebec towards the lower St-Lawrence, cancels the value of Newfoundland and of its straits and deprives us of Portland, which would have been the most "natural" of our Atlantic ports. The Americans had and still have what one may call the continental sense.

In spite of the fact that exchanges between Canada, France and Great Britain are quite smooth today, we are actually alone with the Americans, facing them. I would add that, while taking American economic ownership in Canada into account, we are not confronted with an old-fashioned type of imperialist threat, but with a most disconcerting resemblance.

What a close resemblance! We have seen how the special nature of our ties with the English and French cultures distinguish us. But for all their fruitfulness, our two Canadian cultures are incapable of distinguishing us to the point where they can serve as a foundation of our identity or as a bulwark of our permanence. In both cases, we have not achieved a sufficient degree of originality for us to recognize our collective signature, and reap the guarantee that a universally verifiable signature procures.

We do indeed have undisputed political, economic, scientific, technical, industrial, social, educational, artistic and literary originality. But regardless of these successes we are dependent on too many foreign sources of inspiration and we retain too much ambiguity to dispel our hesitations.

In the areas where human activity is most explicit, where the human spirit attains its broadest scope, that is, in philosophy and literature, English Canadians and French Canadians have reached exactly the same point. Canadians have no philosophy to propose for universal discussion, while the Americans do; nothing in either of our two literatures is more than commendable and we have no overwhelming yet inspiring giants, that is, no classics, while American literature does.

What we have and do, even when rounded out by what we borrow from elsewhere, is inadequate. And taken in isolation, the contribution of English Canadians is not enough, faced with American pressure and attraction. The same is true of French Canadians. Having a shared language with the Americans negates the English-Canadian community's numerical advantage over French Canada: in that respect they are more vulnerable than the French Canadians. Taken as a whole, the latter do not even match the population of greater Paris, and they are buried in an English-speaking mass of some 200,000,000 people: in their case the advantage of a different language is compromised by numerical weakness.

Left to itself, English Canada would fall apart; left to itself, French Canada would begin a fatal process of implosion, and, shrunken, packed in upon itself, sterilized, it too would crumble in the end. Great Britain would not save English Canada, nor France French Canada: they are too far away and too weak, and Canadians—let us repeat it—are not and have not for many years been either British or French. In the existential immediate, our mother countries are almost entirely beside the point, out of the game.

Thus, taken in isolation, Canada's two cultures are not original enough to ensure their own identities: how much less the identity of the whole! How then can Canada achieve its own indispensable identity? The intuition that we perceive today in the brilliant compromise of the Fathers of Confederation is the answer we have been waiting for. Our embryo of fundamental originality is already present in this fact: the two founding cultures of our country have had to open to one another, however little, however grudgingly. The federation as it exists at this time is thus Canada's only decisive originality, and it is only in an increasingly open federalism, dynamic and demanding, that Canada has a chance to perfect the North American differentiation of its elements, and to ripen and refine its identity, give itself an image from which nothing can distract it, achieve wholeness, be of interest to itself and the world, by becoming a cultural crossroad where Europe and North America can renew their connection and their creativity. Faithful to this ideal, which is already beginning to identify our country, Canada would show how the infantile stage of foot-stamping nationalism can be avoided, and that the great Western cultures can flourish in the smallest compass. Faithful to this ideal, Canada would contribute to humanity's advancement toward a planetary federation.

[English]

Honourable senators, this Canadian identity which subsists and affirms itself in such difficult, precarious, noble and promising ways, instead of keeping on it a faithful and generous watch, instead of confirming it in all its expressions, instead of seeking means to compensate for its limited field or markets—I do not like this word!—instead of striving to inform Canadians about the price they must pay for the permanence of their identity, that is the price to be paid out of their very own resources to remain what they are still choosing to be, an incredibly erratic government shows itself tempted to sell away, piece by piece, what constitutes our very soul. And that, honourable senators, at a time when Canada has just made, thanks to the action of the previous Liberal administration under Pierre Trudeau, a great and decisive step toward full independence and maturity.

This government acts as if it were tired of Canadian history and wanted us to get out of it and slip into what it must hold to be the overwhelming North American stream. But the majority of our compatriots are neither tired, bored nor overwhelmed. We recognize that being integrally Canadian is hard and costly; but whatever the cost, we have decided to persist in our being. We do not believe that the country should be put up for sale and left to some monstrous college of entrepreneurs. We do not feel that we are for sale, piecemeal or whole.

Though relentless, the dangers of the past and present American osmosis to our Canadian identity are very little indeed compared to the massive process of assimilation that would start if our cultural institutions were to be deprived of their natural blood, Canadian subsidies, and infused, poisoned and perverted by American capital and authority. At first it might not be apparent, except for those gifted with a sense of honour and a real Canadian instinct; but the process of the final solution of the Canadian difficulty would already have been launched as the cultural policy of this government, if not specifically, then apparently advocated by Mr. Masse. To revert to our metaphors, the American word would then become the last word, the determining word of culture, and in the mirror we would not recognize ourselves at all.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would have liked to have been better prepared when poised to speak for the first time. For the past few days, I have been working on a statement which I will now present tomorrow, in view of today's debate. As a rule, my thoughts are more precise and my ideas more logical and cohesive. Usually I can think better when I have in front of me my own text as well as those of the speakers who preceded me. This allows me to reflect more on the subject at hand, express my viewpoint while respecting a certain ethic and thus engage in a friendly debate with those seated across from me.

Unfortunately, that is impossible this evening because I decided at the very last minute to make this statement, although I did benefit from the learned speeches given by certain senators during the course of the day, even though I was busy with some committee work. I am very anxious to read the speeches delivered today by the other senators.

This day has been a very busy one. Undoubtedly, a major contribution will have been made to the protection and promotion of our culture.

Honourable senators, I believe that we must be gentle and generous and not trip up over the commas and adopt Senator Grafstein's motion as tabled. I want to warn you right now that I will support the motion, despite the fact that I consider it to have some shortcomings. The situation did not become urgent all of a sudden during the last 24 hours. I'm not denying that there is some degree of urgency, in view of the statistics, the percentages and the foreign control of Canadian cultural industries. I would have preferred more advance notice to discuss this issue, if these people had been totally serious. Clearly, there is some urgency, but the manner in which we were forced to discuss the issue at the last minute did not serve the cause we wanted to defend. I believe that the motivation in this instance was political. An attempt was made to embarrass the ministers and senators on this side of the house. The motion says that if this one transaction were approved, if the government did not refuse this acquisition, cultural industries would be undermined and disrupted and the already fragile Canadian market would be closed to Canadian authors and books. I think that that is taking things a bit far. Nevertheless, I will support the motion. I was struck by the unanimity of the senators. I see that they will give their outright support to the motion. The issue itself is fundamentally urgent, as certain senators have indicated.

Setting aside partisan considerations, strategies and political parties, the individuals on this side will want to support the motion.

It would have been nice to have been able to count on the same generosity and unanimity in another house during the past fifteen years, at times when important national interests were at stake and when some of us were fighting for funds to protect and promote not only New Brunswick's culture, but also the Acadian culture, one even more endangered. Yet, there was no shortage of discussions. When there was talk of revising the Official Languages Act, a debate which has been going on in the province for the past year, not many people defended the Act. Often, the political concerns and strategies of the individuals on the other side prevented them from lending us their open, unconditional support. The same happened when there was talk of honouring Acadians with their very own provincial newspaper, so that they might communicate with each other, etc. Some were more interested in playing the game of politics.

I hope that today's debate will establish a happy precedent and that when the government is called upon to act, as it has been in the past, it will decide to come to the aid of the trust set up to ensure the existence of this Acadian newspaper. After all, that's what culture is all about. I hope that the Opposition senators will be as generous as they were today and will display the same unanimity.

Obviously, we would have appreciated this support on other occasions. We in New Brunswick know what a culture threatened with assimilation is. We did not discover this fact yesterday or at 2 o'clock this afternoon. That is why we invite all those, regardless of status or province, who have some influence or power or even just something to say to support the demands of the Acadians as well as those of other minorities.

It is unfortunate that an attempt was made today, albeit a vain one, to embarrass the present government, considering that it has shown its good faith by stating its intentions clearly and lucidly. As was briefly mentioned, and I would like to quote from a document which the government used to announce its cultural policy. I am referring to the statement made by the Honourable Marcel Masse on July 6 at Baie

Comeau, in which he outlined a clear, precise and equitable cultural policy which could have positive effects on certain sectors. One must, I think, have a lot of imagination to try, using statements, televised sequences, or even a statement from the Prime Minister—and his statement of today will, I hope, reassure those who still have doubts—I'm alluding here to his statement in Chicago. But from the statement made by the Honourable Joe Clark, in New York, and that made by the Honourable Marcel Masse, in Baie Comeau, and that of others, to try, I repeat,—and this succeeded in the past—to divide in order to rule, that is try and embarrass them, and have them contradict one another. But that is part of the game, I suppose, in the political arena.

Yet, if this is such a serious issue, I think we could have done better because, as far as I am concerned, the statements by the Honourable Prime Minister and those by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and by the Minister of Communications, among others, should point to the fact that the government is serious and intends to go ahead with its policy.

A few months ago I held another office; I was one of those who talked about the importance of culture, even in terms of employment and of the economy. The Honourable Marcel Masse told us, in Moncton, several months ago, that culture could be a job-creating industry, as evidenced by the statistics he produced in Baie Comeau and which others have quoted.

Then, even if it were only for the jobs involved and even if no one really believed in culture—and one knows that one cannot even think about that—we know that the present federal government considers job-creation as one of its main commitments. When they can create 300,000, they boast about it. I really think the government wants to create a strong job-creating cultural sector. One hears about one billion dollars for the distribution of books, and for publishing. So it is important.

Besides, even if there is a lot of talk about free trade and even if, at the domestic level, there is a whole range of programs which support the efforts of our artists, our authors, our publishers, it seems—and the figures are there and were all quoted today—that this is not enough and that is why the government wants to do more. The reason being that the government is earnest, and is taking its time, that it is leaving the process—how is it called “Investment Canada”?—follow its course and is inviting public discussion of its policy. It is also because it had become clear for this government that a far-reaching change in matters of ownership was necessary that it is proceeding the way it is, otherwise it would only be increasing its aid to maintain the status quo.

That, I believe, is what is at stake, and what appears to be bothering some people, but that is the conclusion the government seems to have drawn: to control ownership, but not just any old way and not in a senseless way, but in accordance with a specific process and by establishing a series of approval criteria, for it believes there is a real deadlock and it must be solved.

But, I repeat, it is not because a request has been made to Investment Canada that conclusions must necessarily be drawn, that emergency situations must be created and that all sorts of intentions should be attributed to the government. Let the process take its course. I am confident that this agency will make the right decision and, in any case, the minister always has the final word, even after the agency's decision.

For the purpose of our debate I wish to specify that any acquisition, even indirect, be studied intelligently, and that an acquisition, even of a company already under foreign control which would fall into the hands of another foreign company—as is the case in the motion—would have to meet the approval criteria, the first of which being:

No acquisition shall result in a marked decrease in the competitiveness of any Canadian firm in a given sector of the book market.

And secondly,

The investor is committed to giving up control of the company in favour of Canadians, at market cost, within a reasonable two-year deadline.

My friends, honourable senators, I do not think this promotes the cause of our cultural sector. These are not my words but those of our friend Senator Finlay MacDonald, quoting his fellow clansman the chairman of the Macdonald Commission, who said that one of the worst enemies of culture, and not just of culture—because I think he was speaking of the whole area of free trade—was panic.

I think today we're panicking a little. I think that the policies enunciated by the Minister of Communications—and I spoke of a balanced, positive and dynamic policy—could have provoked a more substantial discussion. However, I grant you that the debate enabled a number of people to be heard and that we can count on a progressive improvement in the cultural sector, hoped for and appreciated by the public.

I do not wish to be partisan, and I know that Senator Thériault would not recognize me if I were—

Senator Thériault: I certainly wouldn't!

Senator Simard: —but I hope that all the positive remarks hold true. I think that lots of people have expressed, perhaps indirectly, over the grapevine, good wishes and a quite exceptional confidence in the Minister of Communications, Mr. Masse, today.

I think he would have appreciated getting all these tokens of esteem several months ago, but better late than never. There is real confidence in him, or he wouldn't be known in certain circles—if not in this chamber, then outside—as SuperMasse. People repeated what the papers had said.

If he's SuperMasse—and looking at the general relief displayed when he returned last Saturday, he would seem to have a promising career ahead of him and a lot of hopes riding on him—I think he'll put his powers to work defending the cultural community, Canadian cultural sovereignty.

I invite my colleagues to continue to lavish their support on Mr. Masse; I myself will spare no effort, because I live in one of those regions on the border of Quebec and Maine, and for many years now I, like many of my fellow citizens, deplored the absence of French CBC television in our part of the country, since it was only recently that we were able to pick up broadcasts from Moncton. We've been able to get radio for more than 12 years.

We had broadcasts from Quebec so we were reasonably well served, but there was no New Brunswick content, whether “chiac” or “brayon”. That was what we objected to. We had to fight, but we won in the end. Now we're fighting for a newspaper.

But we go on being invaded by American television coming from the other side of the border.

Out of a dozen channels, I think half of them come from the United States, and some of my colleagues and I had to fight, and we finally won last week. I suspect that Senator Finlay MacDonald helped me with this, because we weren't getting a single Canadian channel where we lived. We didn't get CTV or ATV. They didn't go any farther than Grand Sault.

And yet, I appeared before the CRTC two or three times. I have a friend who is still with the CRTC and the past four or five years I used to call him regularly and say, “Listen, why can't we get this channel or that?”

There were always technical reasons. But now, fortunately, apparently—as I said—with the assistance of Senator MacDonald, the problem has been solved.

All this by way of explaining to you that we've always had to fight for our culture—fight every day to win advantages that were doled out with an eye-dropper.

Where I come from, we know what it is to have to fight, and that's why I think we won't just support the Toronto lobbies, we'll fight for the communities. There's nothing wrong with high finance, but I urge you—I implore your support in situations where there is serious injustice going on, unacceptable in 1985.

I hope your support will be unconditional, and as unanimous as your other manifestation of support today.

In conclusion, may I say that I have confidence, and I know that the government is serious and is going to keep on. For my part, I'll be among the people who call the government to order when I think it's succumbing to a lobby, American or otherwise, or when it seems unable to find the political courage to hang on to the end.

That will be my approach in the coming months and years, at least I hope so.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, Canadian cultural sovereignty is a very nice-sounding phrase or title that stands out. As the dictionary states, "sovereignty" means (1) supreme, greatest; (2) greatest in rank or power; (3) independent of the control of other governments.

Honourable senators, when Sir John A. Macdonald, Georges Étienne Cartier, George Brown and all the Fathers of Confederation met at Charlottetown in 1864, these are the words they were referring to when the two founding races, French and English, met at that meeting place, on common ground and, in their great wisdom, decided that, by joining together the two founding races in Upper and Lower Canada, and later all the other provinces, this would give the world this great country we all cherish and love—Canada: The best, the finest country in the world. Can any honourable senator explain why, when residents of other countries visit Canada, they all want to stay here? In many instances, when they return to their homeland, they contact their friends and relatives in Canada, advising them that they want to come to Canada to work, live, play, marry and raise a family.

Honourable senators, why? What has this country to offer these visitors? I suggest, first, hope for the future and, second, realization of their dreams and the maintenance of their cultural identity as a member of another country. Above all, Canada offers these people freedom—Canadian freedom. This is what makes this country so great, so wanted and so desired by our new Canadian friends. The total desire to live in complete freedom with no one dogging their footsteps or watching their every move. As long as these new Canadians work hard and pay their taxes, they live in total freedom so long as they live within our Canadian code of law and order.

Today, in 1985, all cultural institutions operate in their own Canadian way as they reflect clearly the Canadian people's uniqueness in history and the development of our current and future society.

Over and above the two founding races, and especially after the First and Second World Wars, immigrants by the thousands came to Canada where the streets were paved with gold, as they were told in their homeland. They fanned out across this land, worked hard and developed hamlets, towns, villages and cities in their own unique way and, at the same time, maintained their native country's language and traditions in food, dances and religion. Thus, today Canada is blessed in so many ways as a truly multicultural society enriching us all.

Unlike the United States of America which is a melting pot, Canada stands out proudly as a cultural diversity, second to none in the world. Down through out history, Canada has encouraged our new Canadian friends to help build this country. The Fathers of Confederation and all our forefathers would be pleased that we have accomplished so much in respect of our cultural integrity, cultural sovereignty, ownership, economic viability and cultural identity. These four interlocking elements have served us well and have helped define, build and strengthen Canada's voice in the world of commerce, and made its cultural personality truly Canadian so that all residents of Canada are proud to say, "Yes, I am a Canadian."

[Senator Turner.]

We should not allow this greatness to be bartered in the free trade debate. Culture is the very heart and soul of Canada. When one visits the schools, dance studios and art studios, etcetera, one gets the feeling of a truly Canadian mosaic in action. The hard work, dedication and long hours that these young Canadians devote to their craft—these young Canadians who come from all parts of Canada with differing cultural and ethnic backgrounds are striving to be the best in their chosen fields. Surely we, as older Canadians, cannot sit back and allow any foreign government to ask us for the right to allow our cultural industries and cultural agencies to be discussed at the trade talks.

During the early years of my service with the CNR, I fired on the London to Owen Sound and the London to Toronto passenger trains for a very quiet engineer nicknamed "Silent Joe" as he had very little to say during our trips. He was a very proud man, a proud Canadian and, above all, proud of his church, his faith, and his children.

During my early career as a member of Parliament, I received a call from one of his sons asking for assistance for his daughter who was in the London Drama School, and who had the strong desire to continue studies at the London, England, School of Drama. We were unsuccessful in helping her to procure funding from the Secretary of State and eventually had to go to the private sector, and with the family's financial sacrifices, they were able to come up with the necessary funds to send her to England. With her pleasing personality, drive and determination, she soon rose to the top of her profession as a great actress and has now come back to work in the United States and Canada. "Silent Joe" Nelligan was her grandfather, and her name is Kate Nelligan, a truly great Canadian artist and actress.

We have many agencies which award grants to Canadian cultural agencies so that our Canadian children can develop their skills in the arts, ballet and T.V. I have been informed that in the Soviet Union if a child is a good performer, and has the desire and will to pursue that career, the government agencies take such a child who is then provided with complete training in his or her chosen field. Honourable senators, this idea makes a lot of sense and no one is denied the chance or opportunity because of lack of funds. This program is one of the reasons that the Russian sportsmen and artists are at the top of the world competitions.

In Canada, we have many instructors and highly trained teachers and they should be given the opportunity to become our top Canadian teachers and should be allowed, without a shadow of a doubt, to obtain the top jobs in our cultural art agencies before any person is brought to Canada to take a job that can be filled by a Canadian. Many thousands of parents have worked hard at low wages in years gone by to pay for lessons to enable their children to be educated in the cultural and art schools.

Honourable senators, all government grants, provincial and federal, should be fully accountable so that all Canadians are 100 per cent assured that the money is used solely for the purpose for which it is given. In this way we can be guaranteed that all cultural agencies are not wasting hard-earned tax dollars on travel and unnecessary expenses.

Honourable senators, December 4, 1985, is a very important and historic date for the Senate of Canada because a group of senators have stood up for Canada's cultural groups, which touch every community in Canada. Canadian authors, publishers and all artists, regardless of their freely chosen profession, would be cut off from having Canadian owned television programs, as well as schools which help foster new visions of ourselves. It is possible that all Canadian performers and artists will find fewer outlets for the development of their many talents. Our cultural industries give all Canadians a pride of accomplishment and a sense of Canadian identity as a people.

Honourable senators, as many thousands of immigrant new Canadian friends have told me many times during my 17 years of political life:

Mr. Charlie, I love my country, Canada. I want this country to be strong and safe for my wife, my kids, my grandkids.

Mr. Charlie, I love this country. Please help us to protect it all from sea to sea.

Canada is truly the greatest country in the world. I go home for a visit, but, Mr. Charlie, I come back home to my Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, the impact of the imminent trade talks between Canada and the United States on culture has sparked quite a bit of controversy across Canada in the past few months and we feel morally obligated to get involved in the debate.

When the Canadian government invited the U.S. government to take part in these talks, Prime Minister Mulroney stated that "our political sovereignty, our system of social programs, our unique cultural identity... are fundamental Canadian constituents and are not at stake in the negotiations we are planning to undertake."

Later, however, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Clark, made some public statements which appeared to contradict the Prime Minister.

Media reports and the questions that they raised have fueled and justified these fears. We can expect American interests and the U.S. government to exert strong pressures in an effort to have cultural industries made a bargaining issue. To a great many people, the Canadian government appears weak, easily influenced and unsure of itself. It claims that cultural sovereignty is not negotiable, but that cultural industries are, which is hardly a more reassuring statement. If we are to understand correctly, External Affairs seems to believe that the success of our trade negotiations can only be impeded by our objectives of cultural sovereignty, that compromises will have to be made and that despite everything, Canada has more to gain than to lose by putting culture on the bargaining table.

Mr. Marcel Masse, for one, stated last September that the purpose of a Canadian book publishing policy was to create an environment that would allow this sector which is controlled by Canadians to become competitive, both in Canada and abroad, and to prosper as an industry. He added that while the government has a natural preference for Canadian ownership and control, it recognizes that foreign investments have their place in the cultural sector.

The Canada Council, our cultural watchdog, has brought these contradictions to light and has asked the government to clarify and strengthen its commitments to bring them in line with the Prime Minister's statements. Since this is apparently not enough, the government may have to be pressured even more to adopt a clear, forceful stand. Therefore, the public should take further action to make known its views in an unequivocal manner.

The debate in which we are taking part today will no doubt appear fastidious since the speakers cannot help but be repetitive in some respects. However, it will at least have the merit of having examined an important issue from every conceivable angle. Having been for more than 15 years an arts, music, film and literary critic and having participated in many radio and television programs either as a writer, commentator or invited guest, I agreed to make a modest contribution to this evening's debate by calling to mind this period of my life when culture was my main concern.

Several years ago, Peter Gzowski devised a contest on the CBC and asked his listeners to complete the following phrase: "As Canadian as . . ." Immediately, without effort, we think of the beaver, the maple leaf and so forth. However, the best answer was judged to be: "As Canadian as possible, under the circumstances". That is perhaps truer now than ever before.

In view of our geographic location and our relatively small population, how can we withstand the wave of cultural products from our immediate neighbours, so wealthy, so powerful and so supremely confident of their superiority in all areas? As the Canadian Conference of the Arts put it so eloquently in their brief, barring a few exceptions, in all cultural industries, some principal components are under foreign control, whether it be the producers or the distributors.

Consider for a moment the film distribution industry which, according to Mr. Masse, is in a very gloomy position. I will spare you the details. While the situation with respect to the publishing industry is not quite as gloomy, there are many points of comparison in terms of foreign ownership and distribution.

Regarding another matter, we know that it is extremely difficult for an artist to exhibit or for a Canadian group to perform in the United States. Free trade could have an adverse effect on the number of cultural performers who would come to Canada. In 1984, no less than 31,618 entered Canada. Of this total, 27,561 were from the United States. This year, the Department of Employment and Immigration has tightened its control over the issuance of visas. However, if there is free trade, such controls could no longer be applied and the number of foreign artists, particularly Americans, entering Canada would increase considerably.

Faced with mounting foreign penetration, the Board of Directors of the Canadian Conference of the Arts wants some guarantee that there is a firm, unequivocal intention on the government's part to increase and maintain its support of Canadian cultural activity before undertaking free-trade talks with the United States. This is the essence of recommendation number 3 contained in the brief's conclusion. In the latest issue of L'Actualité, an excellent journalist named Michel Vastel reports rather troubling facts about Marcel Masse and his role of protector of our cultural industries before his resignation, which role he will probably, at least we hope so, still want to play now that he is back in cabinet. In his article entitled "Why is Hollywood afraid of Mickey Masse?", Mr. Vastel says that it was only four days after the surprise resignation of Mr. Masse that the American Trade Secretary, Malcolm Balbridge, reminded the Canadian government that there would be no exception to free trade, not even in the name of cultural sovereignty, and that it was at about that time also that the new American Ambassador placed "broadcasting, publishing, magazines, cable distribution, cinema, and so on" on the negotiation table.

The article reports that Mr. Masse had previously received instructions to relax his position under the threat of an asbestos boycott, which industry is located in his own constituency of Frontenac. Last July, he had nearly convinced Mr. Stevens that the profitability of cultural industries is subordinated to ownership and that the right of Canada to regulate its cultural industries is a matter of sovereignty.

I truly enjoyed the metaphor used by Mr. Vastel when he wrote: "In Washington, people were beginning to frown as they became interested in this Mickey Masse who was sprinkling flat notes on the score of the hymn to free trade in which Mulroney and Reagan had joined a few months before at the Grand Théâtre in Quebec City."

What becomes clear in this analysis, which will provoke much interest because of the little-known facts it reveals, is that Mr. Masse, who had attracted a lot of hostility in the beginning among cultural circles, especially among English-speaking Canadians, was able to turn the tide of opinion in his favour once people understood what he wanted to do.

Based on this article, it would appear that when the cat is away, the mice will play, since it seems that Mr. Stevens and Mr. Clark both softened their stand somewhat once Mr. Masse was out of the picture, even though Mr. Benoît Bouchard who replaced him, hastened to deny it in a press release aimed at reassuring the anxious.

We therefore hope that, now that he is minister once more, Mr. Masse will regain his firmness at the same time as his portfolio and consolidate the ramparts which he had apparently begun to erect against American demands.

However, many Canadians are convinced that the cultural occupation of Canada by the Americans is already a reality.

[Senator Lapointe.]

This includes Mr. Tom McPhail, of the University of Calgary Communications Department, who is the author of many books and studies on Canadian cultural policy.

As he tells it, when the American network NBC attempted during the twenties to take over all Canadian radio stations, the Government created the Aird Royal Commission as it did not know whether or not this was a good thing. The direct consequence of this inquiry was the creation in 1936 of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, which has played an enormous role in the development of the Canadian culture. Mr. McPhail then speaks about the creation of the National Film Board, which was mandated in 1939 to give a Canadian perspective to its movies, in which it proved to be quite successful.

Further on, however, Mr. McPhail deplores the fact that, in 1960, the Fowler Commission did not tackle the question of cable television. According to him, cable TV has revolutionized the Canadian broadcasting system, and massive imports of American programs have made competition very fierce for Canadians.

In the realm of cinema, he says, investors who want to be eligible for capital cost depreciation appoint a Canadian producer, hire Americans to make the film and, among Canadian actors, more often than not there are only drivers, jacks-of-all-trades, Margaret Trudeaus,—cameo stars. In short, the idea is to find Canadians for minor roles.

The treatise of Professor McPhail should be read by everyone. On the whole, he is very pessimistic. Still he undoubtedly reflects the feelings of an enlightened citizen of southern Alberta who reacts every day to situations somewhat different from those experienced by Quebec residents for instance.

We should not hide the truth: the decisions which will be made by our government will affect the whole country and once the first step has been taken it will be practically impossible to back down even if we realize we have made a faux pas. Esau sold his birthright for a dish of lentils. Our freedom to be different from our neighbours is costly, it is true, but we would deeply regret relinquishing our cultural specificity bit by bit if we were to lend an overly attentive ear to foreign offers that may be tempting or, worse still, if we were to give in to ransom or strong-arm tactics. Unfortunately, economic terrorism does exist.

It is therefore the responsibility of people who will be making those decisions to synchronize their approach first, then to stand firm, avoid haste and cultivate reflection. Arts and culture are not a vulgar commodity; they are not a mere tool of our society; they are an essential element of the collective existence of all Canadians. Why should man conquer the universe, only to lose his soul? as they used to teach us. Countries also have a soul which is made up of all the souls of their inhabitants. It is up to each one of us to provide inspiration. In conclusion, and to paraphrase a song by Lucienne Boyer which dates from way back, I should like to say: There is no other country like ours; it is not the country of others, it is something better.

Our endeavour today is basically aimed at protecting our country against foreign threat. We thank our colleagues of the party in office who took part in the debate and the others who patiently listened to us; we hope they will at least ingest the substantive marrow of our remarks, as Rabelais would say.

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, you have heard today why Liberal senators believe that the question of our cultural industries is a crucial one to be debated and considered by Canadians. You have heard the well-argued case made by Senator Grafstein, and you have heard the Leader of the Government in the Senate say that this crisis is nothing new. So, I was relieved to hear Senator Davey, Senator Hébert and others put the record straight, the historical record of why, indeed, the situation is new and why the situation is urgent.

I should like to add a variation on the theme to today's debate. Culture does not refer only to the lively arts, the fine arts and the accompanying industries. Culture means our symbols and the values we place upon them which provide Canadians with identity in the world and meaning in terms of our individual lives. Ideas and symbols, mathematical, scientific and material, as well as others, are the heart of any nation's survival. In Canada our survival has been an important and pressing question for each generation. We are part of a world economic system, as Harold Innis made so evident to Canadians in his analysis of our economic development. We have a particular economic history in that world, a history dominated by the political power and capital of European empires, for the most part, since the seventeenth century and through the various industries which have been developed in this country such as the cod fisheries, the forest industry, mining and then by the new imperialism of foreign capital investment.

In our century, profit, rather than political dominance in any direct sense, has been the hallmark of the contemporary empire. Viewing profit-making as both a desirable economic goal and a valid spiritual exercise, western capitalists developed a system of investment and risk-taking that spread western financial power throughout the world. The industrial revolution and the technological and profit-making possibilities implicit in that development increased the financial resources and the economic power of Western Europe enormously. In the world economic system which has developed over this century, countries have been categorized as being core economies, a peripheral economy or a semi-peripheral economy.

The examination of the differences among types of societies depends upon two major sets of factors. The first is the investment of capital. We are all too familiar in this country with our semi-peripheral status in forms of foreign investment, a factor of major historical importance and still a factor of major importance today. The sale of de Havilland to Boeing has just intensified in this sense our semi-peripheral status.

The second major sets of factors are cultural ones. Core economies are not only the major investors in peripheral and semi-peripheral economies, but they also dominate in science, technology and methods and theories of social, political and economic organization. Peripheral and semi-peripheral societies imitate and adapt the models of the core societies. Often those models do not fit. It is easy to see in today's peripheral economies just how much the models of the two core economies of our age, the U.S.A. and the U.S.S.R., do not fit the circumstances of most African nations, for example, as we contemplate the drought, desolation and poverty of those countries. I remember vividly staying in a small town in Ethiopia some years ago where there were bulldozers and street lights, poverty, desolation and starvation. It is more difficult to see how little the models of the core economy fit the semi-peripheral societies such as Australia, Canada, Hungary or Czechoslovakia. Those who were watching the British series on the Public Broadcasting System on the influence of television over these past few weeks will have seen last week cultural representatives from Hungary, Czechoslovakia, Zimbabwe and elsewhere deploring the way in which the dominance of American television was taking from those societies the cultural meaning of their lives.

Throughout this century, as we have accepted foreign capital, we have accepted foreign science, technology and political and economic systems whether or not they have suited our people, our traditions, our climate or our economic development. Why is it urgent now? Through the 1960s and 1970s especially, Canadians have been struggling to resist the latest imperial invasions, particularly in matters of Canadian culture and its control and development. It is urgent now because the small group of elites who are commanding this debate at the present time are lacking in insight about the nature of our own society, our own scientific enterprises, our own technological problems, opportunities and needs. Culture is about ideas, symbols and understandings.

The culture of science and technology in Canada is important both to our economic and cultural sovereignty and we must embed these activities in our Canadian institutions if we are ever to struggle out of our semi-peripheral status. How do we do that?

Science and technology are created, developed and transmitted in institutions which have been discussed extensively in this debate, in universities, in publishing and research institutions. Some of you will argue that most of the scientific ideas of this country come from outside our borders. Most of the technology we use has been developed elsewhere. Science, scientists love to say, is an international language.

All this is true. But it is equally true that those scientific ideas are developed and changed to meet the conditions of living in our country and in our culture. If they are not so developed, analyzed and understood in the context of our own society and in our own material and technical conditions, then they will certainly take us no further.

Honourable senators have talked about the problems of book publishing, of film making, of broadcasting and the need to nourish our culture in Canada. One could also talk about the problems faced by scientists who are forced to join American scientific societies because Canadian societies are not sufficiently funded or organized to get together. Such scientists are forced to look at their data and their problems through the frame of a foreign country, a foreign set of conditions, a foreign economy and a foreign population. We could talk about the desire of such Canadians as Professor Dixon Thompson, of the University of Calgary, to found a Canadian association for the advancement of science or the desire of people to practice scientific exchange on the east-west dimension instead of the north-south. If you think of our scientists and researchers who must publish in the journals of a foreign country or not be published at all because there are no Canadian outlets for their work, you are thinking of our culture.

We have excellent scientists and technicians who are better known abroad than they are in Canada. We have great experts whose ideas are never applied here at all. The brain drain continues. The MRC, NSERC and the SSHRCC put money and priority to developing teams of scientists. They develop an idea, a project, and the results are reported first south of the border. A bright American lures our scientists south without their ideas ever being available to Canadian industry or directly to Canadian science students. The journals and the possibilities in this country are being threatened by the under-financing in the Canadian network.

The policies of this government in last November's economic statement and last spring's budget have weakened considerably the base of science and technology by weakening the employment of workers in these areas, by cutting grants to agencies, by cutting out such projects as the joint Guelph/University of Toronto Toxicology Centre and more. Why is that so? Because it seems that this government has bought lock, stock and barrel the objectives of the modern empire to the south. Too many members of this government are members of the comprador elite of the profit-seeking objectives of international capital.

This morning on Canada AM we saw the man who sold de Havilland for Mr. Mulroney making his case. As he described it this morning, profit was everything. Profit was all. Mr. Marshall does not seem to know culture from a pineapple. He knows profit. He will sell anything you can put up for sale, no matter who the buyer is. He is the chosen agent of this government. Watching him this morning in the light of our debate today was a very depressing experience. Where are Canadians to draw the line? Where are we to resist? Those who have read The New Canadian Encyclopedia will understand what forms resistance can take. We can read there, in the section on business elites:

Few members of Canada's business elite have resisted Canada's Americanization. In fact, it may be the only national elite in history that has cheerfully participated in its own demise . . .

This let's-surrender-with-profit syndrome has prevented Canada's capitalist class from attaining any clear perspective of itself and its long-term role.

[Senator Marsden.]

Nate Laurie, in his column of today's Toronto Star, makes precisely this point. He talks about some South Korean children who are here for some heart surgery they could not get at home and contrasts this with a Korean auto maker opening a plant in Canada. He says:

Were these events a simple coincidence, or do they suggest that Canadians have the capacity to save lives, but not to create jobs?

In his column he goes on to say:

Within the business community today, there are some who believe that we can't create jobs precisely because, in part, we're so good at saving lives. According to this view, programs like Medicare impose an inordinate financial burden on our economy that shows up in our cost structures and inhibits our ability to compete in international markets. Their prescription is straightforward: To create our own jobs, we're going to have to reduce the burden of social-program costs.

In digging in his heels on federal cuts in health and post-secondary education funding at the first ministers' conference in Halifax last week, Prime Minister Brian Mulroney demonstrated a degree of sympathy for this narrow point of view.

The point that Mulroney missed, however, was the link between these programs, technology, and high-skilled jobs. Our social structures have helped to create a medical industry that offers major opportunities for Canadians. And our post-secondary education system has been critical in ensuring that we have taken advantage of these opportunities.

But the post-secondary educational system, that world of science and technology and medicine, cannot happen without the protection and development of our cultural industries in the broadest possible sense. All of the arguments made by my colleagues on this side apply to science and technology. If there are no cultural industries such as publishing, if there is no indigenous science and technology because of those events, so there will be no economic base, no trained workers and no Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané: Honourable senators, it was Noel Cormier, one of the principal advisers of Clément Richard, until quite recently, Quebec Minister of Cultural Affairs, who said that film was the repository, as it were, of our twentieth century mythology. In fact, we can say that this new mode of expression which was invented at the beginning of the twentieth century and has had a profound impact on contemporary civilization, is one of the unique characteristics of our time.

Honourable senators, I think a country that only sees films made elsewhere has surrendered a major form of cultural expression.

[English]

The future of the film industry in Canada is that of tremendous domination by American production. An important part of the problem lies with the distribution network. Distribution service is controlled by the big Hollywood studios. Eighty per cent of total revenues, $400 million made by Canadian movie theatres, is accrued from productions distributed by big American companies. The latest statistics I have show that 97 per cent of the distribution profits were made by companies under foreign control. The situation is so critical that, under the Liberal government of the last year of the Trudeau administration, the Minister of Communications, Mr. Francis Fox, said that he would try to negotiate a satisfactory agreement with the American movie producers. He said that if those negotiations failed, then the government would consider taking strong measures. Fortunately, his successor, Mr. Marcel Masse, said that he will pursue the same policy as that of Mr. Fox; that is, if within six months there is no more positive reaction, he will also move.

Essentially, dear colleagues, we do have free trade in the cinema sector at the moment. The situation, according to the former government, is one where corrective measures are needed. Therefore, when Mr. Clark says that the matter of cultural industries will be on the table, what he is saying, essentially, is that those corrective measures that Mr. Masse is considering will have to be forgotten and that the free trade situation that exists in the cinema sector will continue, despite the commitment that his own minister made a few months before and also in contradiction of what his Prime Minister has said.

On the production side, of course, the Canadian government, through Telefilm Canada and through the 100 per cent cost allowance, has allowed Canadians to produce annually about five times more films today than in the sixties. However, as I have said, the distribution network of the cinemas is controlled by the Americans. If my statistics are correct, barely 1 per cent of the films shown in Canada in our movie theatres are Canadian films. Mr. Marcel Masse has said that he wants to correct the situation and come in with measures, yet the Secretary of State for External Affairs says that cultural industries will be on the table for negotiation. What he is saying, essentially, is that he is listening to the American distributors who are lobbying strongly to preserve the status quo and who seem to have Washington's ear. Putting cultural industries on the table would mean threatening the possibility of needed governmental action to make more Canadian films available to Canadian viewers. This is what Mr. Clark is doing. He is renouncing those measures that are warranted by the present situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there are a number of questions we could ask ourselves about the policy announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, which I feel is harmful, first of all, because it attacks our Canadian cultural sovereignty.

Making Canada an integral part of the U.S. domestic market for the convenience of the multinationals constitutes a negation of the sovereignty of our territory.

In the current situation, many of the programming decisions affecting all Canadians are made outside Canada on behalf of foreign economic interests.

This applies to decisions on what films will or will not be available to the public, the emphasis or lack of emphasis on marketing those films and the extent of their distribution in our large urban centres and the regions.

The impact of these decisions, which is initially felt at the movie theatre level, has a ripple effect on other markets such as family VCRs and pay and conventional television. In fact, Canada's autonomy and cultural identity are at stake.

If we look at the economics of the matter, I wonder how many of my colleagues realize that Canada ranks first in size of the market for films outside the United States.

Although our population is relatively small, in 1981—and these are the latest statistics I have—the most important market for American film distribution companies was Canada.

The Americans were ahead of France, the Federal Republic of Germany, Great Britain and Japan.

In 1980, foreign distribution companies made over $160 million and pocketed 97 per cent of the profits made in the industry in Canada. In 1982, Canada paid $140 million in royalties to foreign producers.

Basically, these profits and royalties are reinvested in foreign productions, mostly American. This means that all new jobs and new economic activity are created abroad.

Authors, directors, technicians, scenario writers and foreign performers benefit from film distribution profits made in Canada and are given chance to create new work and enrich their cultural heritage.

Another disastrous result, Mr. Speaker and dear colleagues, is that the choice of films Canadians have is getting smaller.

In 1980, foreign businesses active in Canada, in addition to their share of high receipts, were responsible for 23 per cent of new full length films distributed in this country. I may recall that they got 80 per cent of the income and 97 per cent of the profits.

This is due to the fact that large U.S. corporations are only interested in productions that are likely to be a major commercial success in North America.

Canadian distribution companies were therefore basically responsible for the wide range of films offered to Canadians, because they distributed 77 per cent of new films, in other words, 629 of 831 full-length features.

The expanding activities of foreign corporations since that time have considerably weakened our Canadian distribution companies whose profit margins were already very narrow. The result has been a significant drop in the number of new full-length features offered Canadians every year.

This impact was felt particularly in Quebec, where as we all know, people had access to the widest variety of foreign films anywhere in North America.

Between 1980 and 1982, the number of full-length features was reduced by 100, leading Quebec to adopt legislation to protect Quebec film distribution companies. I remember that when Francis Fox was Minister of Communications, he congratulated the Quebec government on adopting this legislation. I mentioned earlier that Mr. Fox had intended to have similar legislation adopted for Canada. That is what Marcel Masse was about to do when Joe Clark pulled the rug out from under him.

The situation is similar in the other provinces.

● (0220)

[English]

In the other provinces, the status of independent Canadian distribution companies declined even more rapidly and many of them were driven into bankruptcy.

If the situation continues to evolve in the same direction and only free-market laws dominate, Canadian companies will see their market share decrease even more and will not be able to survive. Over the short or medium term, we risk seeing their almost total disappearance, followed by a standardization of distribution on the North American level based on distribution models chosen in the United States.

We should recall that these models are such that only a negligible percentage of total screen time is currently set aside for non-American productions in the United States. For all of the movies produced worldwide in a language other than English, this percentage is limited to one per cent in the United States—and that might explain a lot of the reaction of Americans, where 99 per cent of the movies they see are those produced in the United States. This is a model which traditionally has made the United States a closed market for foreign film cultures. This is quite different, I would submit, to the Canadian mentality, which is a lot more open in works of art and production of other countries.

By assuming this model, or the current situation which prepares for it and promotes it, we risk literally depriving Canadians of an opening to the world, which is a specific and distinct trait of their natural cultures.

Finally, it would be an obstacle to the production of Canadian films—and that will be my last word, my dear colleagues. It is an established fact that the existence of a strong national distribution sector is an essential prerequisite for the development of a healthy and prosperous film production industry. The United States and France—the two most important film-producing nations in the western world—are eloquent examples of this fact.

A solid and dynamic national distribution sector is an important source of financing for productions, and also contributes to increasing the quality and commercial value of films. The involvement of national distributors in production also promotes better marketing and better dissemination of Canadian productions. It contributes to creating closer ties between national cinema and its audience.

The increasing predominance of foreign companies in Canadian distribution activities, and the resulting weakening of Canadian companies, deprive Canadian film producers of a normal and indispensable source of financing as well as of important expertise.

Incidentally, this has forced Telefilm Canada and the assistance companies set up in Quebec, Alberta and Manitoba, to compensate with larger public investments or loans.

But surely we cannot continue helping Canadian artists and producers through those grants from Telefilm Canada or the 100 per cent cost allowance, to produce films and, afterwards, no outlets to show them. So I believe that Mr. Fox and Mr. Masse were right when they said that free trade in that sector, since 1922, has not produced any results for Canada, even if one of our great Canadians, Mr. Louis B. Mayer, from Saint John, New Brunswick, became the President of MGM in Hollywood. So I believe that free trade has not given us any positive results. That is why the present Minister of Communications, like the former minister, said that he wants to act on it; and now, of course, the American lobby is applying pressure that free trade continue and that the solution envisaged be abandoned—all in the name of free trade.

So, for all those reasons, I would like to support the motion that has been put and respectfully ask the government to reconsider its position on putting the question of our identity on the table.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, as a member of one of the minority ethno-cultural groups of Canada, I want to say that this debate should not be concluded without stressing that the ethno-cultural groups also have their cultural industries. They also have their radio and television programs. They also publish books and magazines and print newspapers. That is why they also have concerns and needs, and they also want to express their fears that Canadian cultural sovereignty will be at risk if it remains on the negotiating table at the forthcoming U.S.-Canada free trade negotiations.

It was a proud day in October 1971, when the Right Honourable Pierre Elliott Trudeau stood up in the House of Commons and announced his government's official policy of multiculturalism, which was also supported by the Honourable Robert Stanfield, by Mr. David Lewis, and by Réal Caouette, leaders of their respective parties in the House of Commons at that time. Therefore, I want to congratulate Senator Grafstein for initiating this very important debate. I am sure that all Canadians share his views and the views of honourable senators who have expressed themselves so eloquently during this debate. I support this motion. Senator Grafstein has played a great role in bringing to the attention of the Canadian government the fact that our cultural industries must not remain on the negotiating table at the forthcoming free trade talks.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I must remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Grafstein speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, it is nearly two o'clock in the morning. Yesterday, last night, this morning we have heard moving and personal stories from senators about their own cultural experiences. We have heard lucid, critical, even brilliant insights into all aspects of our cultural industries. The motion has generated a historic response in the Senate. I am informed that more senators have taken part in this debate on one central issue, a single continuous debate over two days, than in any other such debate in the living memory of those senators present. The Senate has responded to the crisis defined in the motion. Senators have responded by their actions both yesterday and this morning. Senators from all regions and on both sides have participated with pride and passion, eloquence and excellence. Together we have constructed a historic moment, a short footnote to history.

Today the Senate has demonstrated that it can act as a guardian of the cultural sovereignty of our country, that the Senate can be the conscience of the nation. As most senators agree, we have reached a broad consensus. The Senate has sent a quiet message, a velvet message to the government that to place Canadian cultural industries on the negotiating table is to do so at great peril. Tonight as well, we have gained implicit support and assurances from the Senate, particularly the government side, respecting the Gulf and Western, the Ginn and Company and the Copp Clark matters.

This has been a long day, a good day for the Senate and a great day for the Canadian ideal. Northrop Frye, in his book,

"The Great Code" wrote in the concluding passages of that magnificent work these words:

Yet perhaps it is only through the study of works of human imagination that we can make any real contact with the level of vision beyond faith. For such vision is, among other things, the quality in all serious religions that enables them to be associated with human products of culture and imagination, where the limit is the conceivable and not the actual.

Honourable senators, let us not limit the scope of our writers nor censure the imaginations of our cultural vanguards. Let us not foreclose the opportunity of our writers to write books about themselves, and about ourselves and to weave exciting tales of our nation.

Finally, may I thank honourable senators, those who spoke and those who sat, the staff, the clerks, the messengers and, particularly, the interpreters and the reporting staff for their patience and their participation.

I conclude this debate by withdrawing the motion to adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, on your behalf, I thank the Hansard staff for their excellent effort today in recording this debate.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE
REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1986

WEDNESDAY, December 4, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (B) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 7, 1985 submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From the Treasury Board:

Mr. J.L. Manion, Secretary;

Mr. D.J. McEachran, Senior Assistant Secretary, Program Branch.

From the Department of Finance:

Mr. J.H. Sargent, Assistant Deputy Minister,
Financial Sector, Policy Branch.

In examining Supplementary Estimates (B), the Committee compared the information contained in these Estimates to that found in Part IIIs of the Main Estimates. The Committee felt that this was relevant because of the Auditor General's comments in his 1984-85 Annual Report about the importance of the Part IIIs to parliamentarians. To focus this attention, some Senators chose to examine the request for $12.3 million by the Secretary of State to be used as contributions for the Centre of Specialization program. Part III of the Secretary of State for 1985-86 indicates that the Centre of Specialization program, established in 1983-84 with a budget of $24.5 million, was to end in 1984-85. Treasury Board officials explained that when Part III was written, this program was to be fully expended and terminated at the end of the fiscal year 1984-85.

Because of lengthy negotiations with applicants to the program, the department was able to spend only $10 million of the $25 million, even though it was still the intent of the government to spend the full $25 million. The witnesses indicated that when this became known, the government decided to continue the program in 1985-86 with the possibility of some funds expended in 1986-87. While the actions of the government in extending this program were correct, the only way parliamentarians were to know about this was, as one senator put it, by "sleuthing" it out. In this case, the Part III of the Secretary of State department was not of much use since it was simply a snapshot of the department's plans and intentions at the time it was written. Because the policy was altered and funds were reallocated, this Part III could not reflect this change until the following year. This example demonstrates a problem endemic to all Part IIIs.

Because Part IIIs are a relatively recent innovation and, as indicated by Mr. Manion are, "far from perfect", alternative ways have to be found to update information for parliamentarians without their having to "sleuth" it out. Accordingly some members of the Committee felt that the Treasury Board might look into the feasibility of making available to parliament on a monthly basis, for example, Treasury Board decisions affecting funding allocations, along with a brief explanation. Such a report would be for information only and would not affect the timing of supplementary estimates. The availability of such a report would help parliamentarians to be better informed and thereby allow them to play an even more responsible role.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC,
Chairman.

APPENDIX TO THE REPORT

LIST OF ONE DOLLAR VOTES INCLUDED IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B), 1985-86

These Supplementary Estimates contain six one-dollar votes of which four are entirely financial in nature in that they seek authority to transfer funds between votes and to establish or adjust grants within the same vote. Of the remaining two, one vote seeks authority to issue a loan guarantee, as authorized by Section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, while the second seeks authority to transfer funds between votes and, in addition, to amend the terms of loan insurance provided for in a previous Appropriation Act.

The six votes are as follows:

Energy, Mines and Resources

Energy Program

Vote 5b: Energy — To authorize a guarantee (pursuant to Section 22 of the FAA) by the Minister of EMR, to NewGrade Energy Inc., for loans not exceeding in the aggregate $275,000,000, for a heavy oil upgrader.

Vote 20b: Canada Oil Substitution Program — To authorize the transfer of funds to this Vote.

Regional Industrial Expansion

Vote 1b: Operating Expenditures — To authorize the transfer of funds and extend a previous appropriation act to provide that the aggregate amount of insurance outstanding at any time in respect of de Havilland DHC-7 and DHC-8 aircraft does not exceed $230,000,000 Canadian and $200,000,000 U.S. — This proposal seeks to change the authority from the current, one-time cumulative ceilings of $230M Canadian and $200M U.S., for issue of loan insurance, to continuing amounts which could be reissued as outstanding guaranteed loans are retired.

Vote 10b: To authorize the payment of grants with funds already appropriated.

Vote 16b: Payments to Canadair Limited to authorize the transfer of funds to this Vote.

Solicitor General

Vote 1b: Operating Expenditures — To authorize the transfer of funds to this Vote.

THE SENATE

THE SENATE

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order or, possibly, a question of privilege, whichever will cover the situation. I think that probably both terms are applicable. I have looked at the scroll and have discovered that Order No. 2 is:

Consideration of the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting Supplementary Estimates (B).

That report is not appended to Debates of the Senate for yesterday. I discovered, when I received my copy of Debates of the Senate for December 4, that it covers only the debates up to 6 p.m.

Senator Flynn: They thought the rest was superfluous!

Senator Frith: Oh, no, because much of your speech is in there.

Senator Flynn: Anyway, that is not when you began to speak.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps at this point we should decide who is the Speaker or who is in charge of the Senate—Senator Flynn, the Chair or the Senate as a whole. I want to tell Senator Flynn that we on this side are rather fed up with his constant interruptions and irresponsible behaviour. I would appreciate it if occasionally he took the work of the Senate seriously, as I am attempting to do—

Senator Flynn: If you behave otherwise, I will.

Senator MacEachen: —in raising a point of order with respect to an incomplete account of our debates yesterday.

The title page has the inscription Debates of the Senate Wednesday, December 4, 1985. That is a misnomer and it is inaccurate. It does not contain the debates of the Senate; it contains the debates of the Senate until 6 p.m. on December 4, 1985.

Senator Walker: Isn't that shocking!

Senator MacEachen: I do not know who is responsible for this, but I want to say that, in my opinion, it would be much better to delay the production of Debates of the Senate until all the speeches can be included. We could wait until later this afternoon or even until tomorrow morning, if necessary to get Debates out. I think that the procedure followed is less than preferable. There should be an explanation on the front of the document indicating that these debates cover only a portion of the debates of the Senate of yesterday.

I draw this matter to the attention of honourable senators as a serious point of order because I think it is an unsatisfactory outcome. In the absence of the report to which I referred, I assume that it will not be possible for us to deal with Order No. 2 today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I fully appreciate Senator MacEachen's concern. Perhaps this matter should be looked at by the Internal Economy Committee. His Honour the Speaker is chairman of that committee, and perhaps he will take it upon himself to have the committee look at the matter.

Senator Flynn: Or refer it to Senator Frith!

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I am told that it was completely impossible, because of the necessity for having the translation available, to put out a complete Debates of the Senate today, and that the soonest we can get a complete copy is tomorrow. Without my knowledge, they chose to publish the debates up to 6 o'clock. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition that perhaps there should be a note on the front of the document to say that it is a partial document. Perhaps they should be replaced when the full debates are published, if that is the wish of honourable senators.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, perhaps I can help in this process. I would refer honourable senators to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, December 4. Printed as an appendix to that document is the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Perhaps the honourable Leader of the Opposition could refer to it. It may help him in his present quandary.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) presented Bill S-6, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a convention between Canada and the Cooperative Republic of Guyana and an agreement between Canada and India for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, December 10, 1985.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S ACT
GOVERNOR GENERAL'S RETIRING ANNUITY ACT
SALARIES ACT
JUDGES ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, December 5, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-78, intituled: "An Act to amend the Governor General's Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Salaries Act and the Judges Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 28, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN,
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CAPTAIN RONALD G. McBRIDE

UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL SCULPTURE—VISIT OF INDUSTRIAL MISSION FROM FRIULI, ITALY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 10, 1985, I will call the attention of the Senate to the unveiling ceremony, at Toronto Downsview Air Base on October 20, 1985, of a sculpture in memory of Captain Ronald G. McBride, who lost his life in active service on May 16, 1976, while surveying the earthquake area of Friuli, Italy, and to the visit to Canada of an industrial mission from Friuli headed by the Honourable Gioacchino Francescutti, Minister of Industry, and Mr. Gianni Bravo, President of the Udine Chamber of Commerce.

THE ENVIRONMENT

AIR POLLUTION ON PARLIAMENT HILL AND PUBLIC EDUCATION CAMPAIGN—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before I read my notice of motion, and as part of the background thereto, honourable senators will remember that a week or so ago we were advised of a notice of a motion by Mr. Caccia in the other place regarding leaving engines of cars running on Parliament Hill. I thought that we should decide to deal with that in some way.

Therefore, honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, December 10, 1985, I will move:

That the Senate urge all Senators and drivers of other vehicles on Parliament Hill to abandon the practice of leaving vehicle engines running within the precincts of Parliament Hill as such practice adds to environmental damage and, further, the government should launch a public education campaign inviting all Canadians to do the same and to invite the provincial governments to take the same steps; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 10th December, 1985, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I should like to take this opportunity to run briefly through the legislation that is now before the Senate, and by that I mean legislation that is actually before Senate committees or the subject matter of which is before Senate committees for pre-study.

Honourable senators, in running through the legislation that is before the Senate in one form or another, I will specify the items that the government thinks are essential at this time. I will ask for the co-operation of the Senate in trying to expedite the legislative calendar of the government between now and the scheduled adjournment date for the Christmas recess. Obviously, the Senate, as I have no need of saying, is its own master and will do as it sees fit. It is, however, my duty to run through the list of legislation which is considered to have an element of priority.

Now before the Senate is Bill C-66, respecting the Canada Development Corporation Reorganization. I understand that the debate on second reading of that bill will continue later this day.

Being examined by Senate committees are the following bills: Bill C-81, to amend the the Criminal Code (lotteries);

Bill C-49, to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution); and Bill C-59, respecting Customs.

Under pre-study by various Senate committees are the following bills: Bill C-79, the CCB-Northland bill; Bill C-83, the Tax Rebate Discounting bill; Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act; Bill C-46, Bill C-47 and Bill C-48, which have been pre-studied, although I noticed that they were again considered in committee on Tuesday when the Minister of Justice and Attorney General for Canada appeared. Two of those have been reported on, and the third is being dealt with as an inquiry on our order paper. There is also Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, which is, in effect, a bill respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act; and Bill C-55, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976. Also before various committees for pre-study are the following bills: Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973; Bill C-80, respecting the Excise Tax Act; and Bill C-82, to amend the Gas Revenue Tax Act. There was some suggestion that the Petroleum Incentives Payments bill may be before the Senate very soon, but that has not been confirmed.

Senator Frith: What is the number of that bill?

Senator Doody: I do not have the number. I saw a copy of that bill this morning but did not take note of the number because I have not been officially informed about its status. It is possible that that will be before the Senate in the near future.

Honourable senators, I simply bring this to your attention. I know that it is our hope to start the Christmas recess on Thursday, December 19; that is the target date. I sincerely hope we make that date. If it is necessary to meet on Monday, December 16 in order to facilitate the work of committees, or to work an extra day, such as Friday of next week, I am sure honourable senators will be only too pleased to do so. At least, that has been our custom in the past. If we achieve our ambition and adjourn on December 19, then I would look forward to returning on January 21, which is a Tuesday. I understand that the House of Commons will be returning on January 13, and I think it is our usual custom to reconvene a week after their date. These are the guidelines that we are operating under at the present time. Obviously, nothing is cast in stone or lodged in ice when the House of Commons is passing legislation and sending it to us, but these are the bills with which we have been asked to deal and this is the time frame within which we would like to see them dealt with.

● (1410)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, without commenting on any of the other items, does the Deputy Leader of the Government think it reasonable to ask both houses to deal with Bill C-84, which is a very bulky income tax bill containing, I believe, 30-odd tax measures and 135 clauses within that time frame? It has only been tabled in the House of Commons and came to us for pre-study just a short time ago. I wonder whether it is reasonable to expect a complete study of that bill by the proposed adjournment date and whether there is any urgency to having it done by that date, since additional study might be justified.

[Senator Doody.]

Personally, I express some bewilderment that such urgency is attached to that bill given the short time frame and in view of its importance.

Senator Doody: I have been told, and I can well understand it, that the government feels that Bill C-84 has some urgency attached to it and would like to have it dealt with before the Christmas break. I can understand the honourable gentleman's bewilderment because I sat on that side of the house for six years or so and I constantly expressed bewilderment as we came close to the Christmas deadline or the summer recess or any other break. There seemed to be a tremendous flurry of activity and a tremendous amount of urgency about bills on the other side of the building around that time.

As to whether or not that bill can be properly dealt with by the committee during the period that we have left, I leave that question to the chairman of the committee to comment on. Obviously, I am conveying the message of the government that they feel that that bill is one they want back before the Christmas break. As I said at the beginning, it is up to the Senate to decide how to dispose of the legislation put before it, but I would invite comments from the chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, we took a fairly healthy first cut at this legislation last night in the presence of officials from the Department of Finance and with the assistance of our own committee counsel, Mr. Gillespie. In the course of last night's meeting we were able to identify a number of issues, technical and otherwise, that are of concern to honourable senators. We instructed our counsel to give further thought to some of these matters. We asked him to try his hand at some draftsmanship on some of these matters, and we have received an undertaking from the officials that they will get back to us with additional information on some other questions.

There are a number of bills before the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, but I have scheduled another meeting on the pre-study of Bill C-84 for next Tuesday morning at 9.30. My assessment of the situation in committee, given the time left to us, is that we should be able to meet with whatever frequency is necessary between now and the adjournment to deal effectively with the pre-study of the bill. I hasten to add that nobody in the committee has given me any commitment as to when we could terminate the pre-study. So I am not making any commitment on behalf of the committee except to say that I think we could meet with whatever frequency is necessary between now and the Christmas adjournment to deal with it.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I think one of the jobs of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee and, indeed, of any of our committees dealing with a tax bill, is to allow the private sector enough time to go through it, examine it and see whether there are any defects, anything that has been overlooked by the department. If we rush it too much, we do not get that input from the private sector. My concern is: Have they had enough time to go through the bill thoroughly and, if they want to raise something, do they have enough time to do so? We are not going to turn the bill down; all we are going to try to do is improve it or point out defects.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CULTURAL INDUSTRIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in a sense, I want to continue the debate we had in the Senate yesterday by asking a question based upon the statement made in Chicago last night by the Prime Minister that there would be discussions now between Canada and the United States on better trade rules for the cultural industries.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether he could tell us in some explicit detail which cultural industries will now be subjected to discussion in the expectation of getting better trade rules. Does this include book publishing, films and the whole gamut of industries mentioned yesterday?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I stated on the other occasion, I can reply in general terms using the words of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and say that any discussion on cultural matters will be aimed at strengthening Canadian cultural powers and potential; not in any way to decrease our capacity to develop our culture in our own country to suit our own ways. That is still the intent of the government.

I am not sure whether I am going to be able to answer my honourable friend in any further detail in respect to the point he has raised, but I will make some inquiries and see if I can furnish further information.

THE ECONOMY

UNITED STATES INVESTMENT IN CANADA

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have questions relating to two different areas and I will deal first with the one which arises out of the address of the Prime Minister in Chicago yesterday.

According to the text of that address, he said, "Canada has always been a good place to do business." I think that is an accurate quotation.

I draw to the attention of senators that it was only a year ago that the Prime Minister, before the Economics Club of New York, said that Canada was "now open for business". These statements seem to indicate some change in the rhetoric, at least.

When the Investment Canada bill was introduced in this chamber, honourable senators were told that we could anticipate a flow of American investment. Today the Canadian dollar is still at a discount of about 37 per cent. My question is: When are we going to see that flow of American investment?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I can say to my honourable friend, with respect to his preamble, that it is perfectly true that Canada is a good place to do business, but sometimes it is a better place to do business than at other times. I think we have seen that happening in the policies the present government has been implementing. I point out to my honourable friend that he knows better than most people what happens to the pressure on the Canadian dollar at this time of the year, for reasons which are well known, and one does not know how far the dollar will be carried down. As for the aspect of American investment in Canada, we will simply have to wait and see what the figures produce.

Senator Sinclair: As a supplementary to that, honourable senators, I note that the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that the policies of the government make Canada a better place to do business. Did he have any reference to de Havilland in his mind when he made that statement?

Senator Roblin: I made the statement of general application and it stands.

Senator Sinclair: I hope, honourable senators, that, in accordance with some undertakings that were given in the debate on the Investment Canada bill, we will be provided with some evidence in the form of figures as to the flow of American investment into Canada. I recognize that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not have that information at hand, but I wonder whether he could undertake to provide to us some figures, preferably on a quarterly basis, which would indicate net American investment in Canada.

Senator Roblin: I think that those figures are routinely available to any Canadian through the DBS publications.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CULTURAL INDUSTRIES

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Can we assume from the Prime Minister's speech in Chicago yesterday, that cultural affairs will not be on the table in any free trade discussions with United States?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that the Prime Minister's words speak for themselves. I certainly do not attempt to put any gloss upon them.

Senator Davey: Surely my question is a fair one. I have read the press reports of his statement. Is that what he was trying to say? Surely that is a reasonable question.

If not, let me try another one. Did the Prime Minister's comments in Chicago yesterday mean that there is no possibility of a so-called revised edition of Time magazine? Surely there could be a yes or no answer to that question.

Senator Roblin: Surely there cannot be. Whether there is a revised issue of Time magazine depends on the Time magazine people. That is not a matter within the purview of the government.

Senator Davey: In other words, the lobbying which Time magazine is presently conducting in Canada, involving Mr. d'Aquino from the Business Council on Issues, and others, will continue. It seems to me that what the government leader is saying—and I would be the last person in the world to attempt to put words into his mouth—is that there is the possibility of a so-called revised edition of Time magazine.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is asking me what Time magazine is going to do. I do not know.

Senator Davey: Surely the government leader realizes that what Time magazine is going to do depends on the actions taken by the Government of Canada. Is the Government of Canada prepared to take those actions or not? Surely the honourable senator realizes that the revised, so-called, edition of Time requires action by the Government of Canada. As I read the statement of the Prime Minister that was delivered in Chicago yesterday, I was encouraged to believe that that may not happen. But the Leader of the Government in the Senate is saying to me that it still might, if Time wants it to.

Senator Roblin: Is my honourable friend talking about Bill C-46 of yesteryear?

Senator Davey: I am talking about Time magazine coming back into Canada with a revised, so-called, Canadian edition. That is really what I am talking about.

Senator Roblin: I repeat that I have no information about that whatsoever. If my honourable friend is asking me whether the Government of Canada intends to change a policy that will affect the decisions of the Time company, the answer is no.

Senator Davey: That is the answer I had been hoping for. I am most grateful.

Senator Flynn: Put the question correctly.

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I am now more confused than I was after the debate of last evening, when I thought that there was broad agreement that cultural matters would be treated separately and that the book publishing industry, in particular, would be treated separately from general economic matters. I thought that a strong consensus had been reached in that regard on both sides of the house. If I may, I will come to the Prime Minister's statement in Chicago and will go over some of the ground covered by Senator MacEachen. What Mr. Mulroney said in Chicago was this:

When it comes to discussing better trade rules for cultural industries—

Does that mean that there will be trade rules for films, trade rules for books and trade rules for magazines, including Time magazine? Will there be such trade rules? I presume that means trade rules between Canada and the United States with respect to these industries. Could the Leader of the Government clarify this, because the impression left by the press reports yesterday was that the Prime Minister was saying that cultural industries were not for sale. But when one looks at his text, it says that he is about to discuss trade rules for cultural industries. Which is it? Are we still going to be discussing trade rules for cultural industries, and does that not necessarily mean that those cultural industries are going to be negotiated? Which is it?

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend really mixes up the issue, certainly in my mind. If he is as confused as he sounds to me, he is very confused. The answer is that the Government of Canada does not consider these cultural matters as being economic issues. That is the clearest interpretation that can be put on the statements made by the ministers and by the Prime Minister himself. They are not economic issues; they are cultural issues. If we can find some advantage for cultural issues, well and good; but they are basically cultural issues and, as such, are not negotiable in any sense that they derogate from our cultural sovereignty.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Grafstein: Why are we discussing trade rules for cultural industries that are not to be negotiated? It doesn't follow.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend would take the trouble to read again, either tomorrow or the next day, the reply I have just given him, he will find the answer to his question.

Senator Flynn: He doesn't want to understand.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it seems to me that it would be helpful if the Leader of the Government would tell us, then, what it is that culture, in his mind, or in that of the Prime Minister, is—because, for example, there is great contradiction, as I understand it, between what we have been discussing—that is, the Prime Minister's statement in Chicago that our culture is not for sale—and the sale of a very important part of our culture to Boeing. As Mr. Young says in today's Citizen, Boeing has bought two or three decades of research work at the National Research Council, the right to produce and sell the world's best short take off and landing, the STOL, aircraft. If that is not our culture, what is it?

Senator Roblin: On the basis of that line of questioning, I am not sure if there is any aspect of our activities in this country that could not be described as "cultural". In my own mind, that particular matter is economic.

Senator Marsden: That exactly illustrates my point. Could you please tell us where you draw the boundary around culture? What is culture and what is not? I think we have to have that definition, because you have now introduced the term "economic versus cultural", and you are really leaving us in the position where we can include everything or nothing. There must be some balancing.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid that, much to my honourable friend's amazement, the rule of common sense will prevail.

Senator Marsden: The rule of common sense will not prevail here. We need a definition. It is not useful to talk about common sense in these terms, because there is not shared sense, which is what common sense is; and what we are telling you is that we do not share your understanding. That is what our discussion yesterday was about. We are trying to arrive at some common definition of what we are talking about. Could you help us, please, by telling us what you consider to be cultural?

Senator Roblin: I will report to the Minister of Communications that my honourable friend thinks that the de Havilland issue is a cultural one.

Senator Marsden: That's fine; but could you please tell us what you mean by "cultural"?

Senator Roblin: I think that I can go no further than I have already gone in dealing with that matter.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FITNESS OF MEAT FOR CANADIAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, seeing that we have to deal with common sense, and things like that—

Senator Flynn: That remains to be seen.

Senator Sinclair: —may I direct the minds of honourable senators to a statement that was made in our national newspaper, the Globe and Mail?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Careful now.

An Hon. Senator: English language national newspaper!

Senator Sinclair: I am told to call it the "English language national newspaper!" In any event, it is the newspaper that I believe businessmen outside of Canada read. In today's edition there is the following headline: "Fails export tests, meat fit for Canada". It goes on to say that out of the east came meat to the west, and Dr. Merle Olson, from the University of Calgary, said:

At the very most they should be used for dog food,—

An Hon. Senator: It was from New Brunswick.

Senator Sinclair: An honourable senator said it was from New Brunswick. Well, that is correct. My question is: Can the Leader of the Government inform us who called? Did Premier Hatfield call, and whom did he call; and if he did not call, who did call?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe my honourable friend is a little confused. Premier Peckford is not the Premier of New Brunswick. The honourable senator has the wrong man. I do not know what telephone the honourable senator has been tapping into, but he has the wrong man. He is probably talking about Premier Hatfield.

● (1430)

Senator Sinclair: I said Premier Hatfield.

Senator Roblin: You said Hatfield?

Senator Sinclair: Yes.

Senator Roblin: I am relieved. I knew that my common-sense friend would at least get that part of his story right in any case. I will tell him this: I will be glad to obtain from the Department of National Health and Welfare the reports that were rendered in respect to this transaction in order to assure him, if that is possible, that no danger to the health of those who might eat that food arises.

Senator Doody: Including the honourable gentleman.

Senator Frith: Get the dope.

Senator Sinclair: What has happened in the department to change the government's view as to the views of their inspectors with regard to meat as compared to fish?

Senator Frith: You will get that information, too.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as is often the case, my honourable friend's premise is completely false.

Senator Frith: Oh, you are not going to get that information.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I do not know whether or not my honourable friend wants to answer the question, but I will be glad to repeat it if he would like me to put it more clearly.

Senator Roblin: Yes, I would.

Senator Sinclair: Does he think that the people of western Canada should be protected from meat that is not fit for export?

Senator Roblin: I think the people of Canada should be protected from meat that is not fit to eat, and that is why I intend to get for my honourable friend the report I mentioned.

Senator Argue: If the Americans won't eat it, we will have to.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I asked the leader whether he feels that the people of Canada should be protected from eating meat that is not fit for export. Is his answer no?

Senator Roblin: I have given my friend the answer. There is a great difference between the rules that govern export products and those that govern domestic products. The question at issue is, is this meat healthy? The rest of what has been said is, to a large extent, a side issue. I shall find out about the health aspect of the matter and let my honourable friend know.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think we all know that people are very sensitive these days—

Senator Frith: Did they eat buffalo in Chicago last night?

Senator Roblin: No, corned beef.

Senator Argue: That is pretty corny.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think everybody in this chamber must know that the people of Canada are very sensitive to inspected products being made available for human consumption. In light of that, I would hope that Canada's English language national newspaper would indicate that Dr.

Merle Olson is not to be believed, according to the government.

Senator Roblin: I do not know what Canada's so-called national newspaper will do, but I do know that I will produce for my friend the health report in which he is interested.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION—TABLING OF MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, like most Canadians I have been watching very closely what has been said, both in the press and in the other place, on the events surrounding the proposed give-away by the government of de Havilland Aircraft to Boeing. In my short experience in this place, I have come to realize that the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is a knowledgeable committee with very knowledgeable and experienced members sitting on it. Before the total agreement is finalized between Boeing and the Government of Canada, I wonder whether the memorandum of agreement could be provided to this house so that the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee can take a look at it and advise us as to who is wrong and who is right.

Certainly, in my reading of the press reports on this affair and in my humble opinion, this is the greatest give-away that the Government of Canada and the people of Canada have ever been subjected to. There is talk about $90 million, $165 million, insurance guarantees, royalties and so on. According to many of the press reports, it is a complete give-away with no real guarantee as to whether or not ten years down the road Canada will have an aerospace industry at all. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate inquire of his government to determine whether that memorandum of agreement can be made available to this house?

Senator Flynn: You know the rules.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, by no means do I accept the preamble or short address with which my honourable friend has favoured us in raising this matter. It is customary, I guess, to expect this kind of thing in Question Period. My answer to his question is succinct: Yes.

AGRICULTURE

NATIONAL SUGAR POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, prior to entering the chamber this afternoon I received a copy of a telegram sent to the Prime Minister from Mayor Andy Anderson and the City Council of Lethbridge, Alberta, urging the Prime Minister to become personally involved in the resolution of a national sugar policy for Canada and expressing the alarm of the farmers in that area that such a statement has not yet been forthcoming. Given that cabinet usually meets on Thursdays, I am wondering whether the government leader has any words to convey to those concerned in Southern Alberta.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as my honourable friend has pointed out, this telegram was addressed to the Prime Minister. It was not addressed to me, and I have not seen it. I have every confidence that the Prime Minister will answer it in the most satisfactory way that is open to him.

Senator Argue: In which year?

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS— EXTENSION OF TIME—BUDGET

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Minister of Justice has approved the request by Mr. Justice Jules Deschênes to extend the work of his committee which is investigating Nazi war criminals in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I believe that matter is under consideration at the present time.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Could the leader also tell us what was the initial budget for the work of this commission, which was to have brought down its report by December 31 of this year?

Senator Roblin: Of course, my honourable friend knows perfectly well that I do not have that information. It is really not the type of question that should be raised in Question Period. If he will table his request for information in the usual way, I am sure that we can get him an answer.

STATUS OF WOMEN

FUNDING OF GROUPS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate about a matter concerning the status of women. At our penultimate meeting in this chamber, I asked the leader what the government's response was to the premiers' proposal in Halifax last week, and he declined either to comment or to obtain further information. There are now rumours that the government is planning both to cut and to re-align the funding support of the status-of-women groups in this country. I wonder if the leader would tell us the time at which we will know about the funding plans for such groups for this year, so that we can know when those rumours will be confirmed or denied.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I remember correctly, when the point was raised I advised the chamber that this question was one which was not settled at the premiers' conference, like several others; that it was left over for further consideration. The responsibility lies with the Prime Minister and the premiers to set that joint consideration in motion. I have really no means of telling when that will be or if and when we may expect further information that my honourable friend seeks, but as soon as those discussions are completed I am sure that a statement will be made on the matter.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government will appreciate that there is a great desire on the part of the people concerned with the status of women to be as effective as possible in presenting their case. As is traditional in this country, this depends on the support that the government offers to status-of-women groups and other groups interested in making their cases. Can the Leader of the Government tell us whether there is some relationship between the government's funding plans and the lack of response to the premiers in Halifax?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend would probably agree with me if I were to say that the present government's policy with respect to the status of women has been a considerable advance over anything we have seen before in terms of the activities of the federal government, and certainly that the legislation that is being proposed, or will be proposed if it is not already on the order paper, with respect to that matter is a substantial advance. That activity represents the policy of the government. We are interested in making progress, and that is what we hope we will be able to do.

Senator Marsden: Let me say that I would not agree with the honourable senator. I do not think it is an advance in any way, shape or form. However, my question was about funding, which, of course, is not legislated, and I wonder if he could respond to that.

Senator Roblin: I gave my honourable friend a chance to express an impartial and detached view of the matter. I must say that she did not live up to my expectations.

With respect to the question she asked, there is no relation.

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH IN CHICAGO—DEFINITION OF "JOINT TENANCY" AND "CONSTRUCTIVE INTERNATIONALISM"

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we leave Chicago there is another expression I am taking from the text of the speech of the Prime Minister in Chicago. It reads as follows—and when he says "we", he is speaking of the United States and Canada:

And we are more than economic partners. We have joint tenancy of this great continent and of its environment.

Senator Flynn: Succotash.

Senator Frith: Yes, I would think that succotash is right. Senator Flynn calls this succotash, and that is an interesting way to describe it.

In any event, what we should understand is that the Prime Minister is a lawyer, and I assume that he is not confused—even though Senator Flynn is also a lawyer and he seems to be confused about this—about the term "joint tenancy", which means, of course, an undivided half interest in the whole. That means that he feels that we own half of all of the continent, and so we own half of the United States. The United States also owns half of all the continent and so owns half of us. He also says, "and of its environment". I assume that means the water, et cetera. It would be nice if we could own half of Florida. In any event, I am sure that the Prime Minister was using the term in another context. Incidentally, there is another side that I suppose would not apply to this use of the term "joint tenancy". One of the incidents to joint tenancy is that the survivor inherits the whole. Therefore when either side dies, the other gets the whole estate, which is not the case with tenants-in-common.

In any event, quite apart from this legal dimension, it is an interesting political concept that there is joint tenancy, and when we consider that the person who used the words is not only the Prime Minister of Canada but is also a lawyer—

An Hon. Senator: He thought that Canada was bankrupt.

Senator Frith: Yes, he thought that Canada was bankrupt; that is true. However, we can assume that he did choose the words carefully. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would give us some idea of what the Prime Minister meant by "joint tenancy" and perhaps expand that interesting phrase for us, as he was at pains to do after the election when it came to another semi-legal expression "sacred trust".

Senator Hicks: Don't you think he meant "tenancy in common"?

Senator Frith: He might well have, but he does say "joint", and a lawyer is presumed to know the difference between joint tenancy and tenancy in common. I do not expect an answer to this today, but perhaps some day before the break we can have an explanation as to what the Prime Minister meant by that expression.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): After listening to my honourable friend, this is one of those rare occasions when I thank God I am not a lawyer.

Senator Frith: There are those of us who share that view.

Senator Roblin: I think you are well advised to do so. However, I will convey to the Prime Minister, in the most delicate terms that I can, that my honourable friend really thinks that terminological exactitude is not his forte.

Senator Frith: No, that is not what I want; I want to understand what he meant by it. I want to give him an opportunity to explain.

Senator Roblin: You are allowed to make your own interpretation.

Senator Frith: Of what? I did not get anything to make an interpretation of.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): While we are still in Chicago, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would tell us what the Prime Minister meant in his description of the tasks facing the new Government of Canada—although it is getting a bit stale by now. He said that the tasks facing the government were national reconciliation—and we have seen where that is going in the last week—economic renewal and constructive internationalism. I wonder if the Leader of the Government would tell us what this task is that the Prime Minister has now assigned to his government called “constructive internationalism”. Is it a new task?

Senator Roblin: I am going to tell the Prime Minister that the exegesis of his text being conducted by the gentlemen opposite should give him some degree of satisfaction, because they certainly appear to have read his words with some attention.

With respect to the—Senator Frith: Perhaps we will get some satisfaction in return, then.

Senator Roblin: You won't get much satisfaction from me, because—

Senator Frith: What, no quid pro quo? You will take all of the satisfaction and give none back?

Senator Roblin: No. I am not here to give satisfaction. I am here to answer questions as best I can, and of course there are some questions which I will not be able to answer to the satisfaction of the gentlemen opposite.

Senator MacEachen: Will the Leader of the Government undertake to enlighten us as to what this term “constructive internationalism” means? After all, it is a task in which the Leader of the Government now must share; to produce “constructive internationalism.” What is it? Is it a new orientation for foreign policy or is it just a word that the Prime Minister's speech writer thought would be interesting? I would like to know; which is it, a new thrust or a new phraseology covering current policies?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend really ought to table an inquiry on this so that we can have a debate. If I were to launch into an exposition of the attitude the government is taking in the United Nations, for example, in the last few months with respect to international affairs, one would be able to detect some changes in our attitude towards various matters. Also, if I were to discuss with my honourable friend the initiatives in foreign policy that are now before the joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the matter, it might also shed some light on the subject. But I am not going to do any of those things, because they do not lend themselves to rational question-and-answer activity such as we enjoy at this stage in our daily proceedings. However, if my honourable friend wants to table an inquiry and to debate these matters, I am sure a number of senators will be glad to join with him.

Senator MacEachen: The Honourable Leader of the Government has used an odd expression. He says that these kinds of things are not subject to rational discussion in the form of questions and answers. What does that mean? Does it mean that we must be irrational and table an inquiry?

Senator Roblin: No, I simply mean that Question Period was originally designed for short questions and short answers, and that a discussion of Canada's foreign policy fits neither of those two descriptions. I really cannot understand how a parliamentarian with the vast experience of my honourable friend, who understands Question Period both ways, can be in any doubt as to the matter.

Senator MacEachen: Let me give you a short question, and illustrate your theorem that we ought to have short questions and short answers: Does the Prime Minister project a new orientation for Canadian foreign policy when he uses the term “constructive internationalism”?

Senator Roblin: I think it is a method of describing the foreign policy which the government is presently endeavouring to implement.

Senator MacEachen: I see.

UNESCO

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a short, simple question on foreign policy which I would like to direct to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Now that the government of the United Kingdom has followed the example of the U.S. by withdrawing from UNESCO, is Canada far behind?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think Canada is following in the wake of any country with respect to its policy on UNESCO.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH IN CHICAGO—DEFINITION OF “CULTURAL SOVEREIGNTY”

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate refers to the exegesis of the Prime Minister's text, and it is vital to us. We are really trying very hard to understand exactly what the Prime Minister and the government mean, which is why we were still in this chamber at some time after 2 o'clock this morning.

I wonder if, in speaking to the Prime Minister, you would add to your list a request for his explanation of the term “cultural sovereignty”. He is quoted as having said in Chicago yesterday:

—you will have to understand that what we call cultural sovereignty is as vital to our national life as political sovereignty.

We saw what the Prime Minister thought of political sovereignty this summer in the case of the United States ship that went through our northern waters. I think it would be very helpful, indeed, if boundaries could be defined around the term “cultural sovereignty”.

● (1450)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend has failed to take note of the fact that when that ship was in Canadian northern waters it provoked a reaction on the part of the Government of Canada which certainly was missing on previous occasions. That led to a statement with respect to sovereignty which expands the sovereignty of the nation, just as we are hoping to expand our view of the sovereignty of cultural industries of the nation as well. I think it is rather unbecoming to belittle that statement because it was important and is, I think, supported by many in this chamber.

Senator Frith: Unbecoming temerity!

Senator Roblin: I will, however, convey to the Prime Minister my honourable friend's perplexity.

Senator Marsden: I am certainly not trying to belittle the statement regarding sovereignty: I am trying to understand what is cultural, what is economic and what is in and what is out. I would be grateful to have a response.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, the Minister of State (Multiculturalism), the Honourable Otto Jelinek, is reported in the press to have had some discussions with members of the Japanese-Canadian community respecting an apology and the question of compensation to be made by the Government of Canada.

It has been some time since the Prime Minister promised that his government would deal with this question. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring us up to date on this? Is there legislation and acknowledgement or some form of compensation being planned that he could tell us about today?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Contrary to the position established by its predecessor, the current government has undertaken to express the feelings of the Canadian people toward that unfortunate event, which took place during a period of war, in the form of an apology. That undertaking still stands, and at an appropriate time—when it seems it will be most acceptable to all concerned—action will be taken with respect to that.

We are also going a little further because this government is undertaking to amend the War Measures Act in due course in order to make sure that that kind of thing will not so easily occur in the future. I think that position on the part of the government will receive the support of my honourable friend.

The government does not propose to offer financial compensation to the people concerned, but it is willing to make a financial contribution in another way which will lead to a diminution of the—I almost used the word “prejudices”—misunderstandings which arise between different cultural and language groups of the country.

Senator Grafstein: Could the leader go further and tell us when we might expect to be informed whatever the government intends to do in more precise terms? We have heard these assurances since May 1984, when the then Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Mulroney, promised Japanese-Canadians both an acknowledgement and a form of compensation, yet we have seen nothing. Can the leader tell us when this matter might come before the Senate?

Senator Roblin: The matter is one of priority for the Minister of State (Multiculturalism); he is going to produce a resolution on the matter at the earliest possible date. Beyond that, I cannot say.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION REORGANIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barootes, for the second reading of the Bill C-66, intituled: “An Act respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation”.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have two matters I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate with regard to this bill. Senator Doody said earlier today that this bill is one of those that the government wants handled in an urgent manner. This bill was introduced in the other place last June, but in the Senate only last week. It seems to me to be rather unusual that a matter that was before the other place in printed form for some five or six months has been before the Senate for only a short period of time.

There is no question that this is an important bill. Senator Kelly described it, I think accurately, as an evolution of a corporation that was set up some years ago. The corporation is a very fine one; it patriated Kidd Creek Mines Ltd. It has taken over and advanced Connaught Laboratories. The reason for bringing it fully into the private domain was described by Senator Kelly as “one of the investments of the government that was no longer necessary for public purposes”. Those are not his exact words, but that is the purport of what he said.

It was done in an unusual way. This is a publicly-traded company with a large majority of its shares in the hands of the government. The government has decided to reduce its investment. The normal way of doing that for a publicly-traded company is through a secondary. But in this instance that method was not used. What the government did was advance a rights issue, a two-tiered or two-sliced rights issue.

If I understand the reason for this unusual departure, it was because the government believed that market conditions were such that it should move quickly to take advantage of them. That advice was given to the government by two merchant bankers who, I am sure all business people in the chamber will recognize, are always urging that action be taken “now”, rather than “later” with regard to equity issues. It is up to the owner to decide whether he wishes to go forward or not; obviously the government accepted that advice and did so in this most unusual way.

So unusual was the activity in the stock prior to the fixing of the price of these rights, referred to by Senator Kelly as "a slight premium over market," that in another place outside of this city but in the province of Ontario a regulatory tribunal is looking at the matter. Therefore, I do not think it is open to us to spend time on that issue, interesting though it may be. I do not think it is open to us to discuss that because we do not have the expertise or the people before us to give us all of the evidence that would be required to arrive at a balanced conclusion.

The reason for putting this government controlled company into the hands of the private sector is that it is no longer needed to be controlled in light of the public interest.

The other purpose of the bill is to make sure that there is not going to be concentration. The continuance that was provided for under Bill C-66, which was referred to by Senator Kelly, was modified so that, notwithstanding the provisions of the continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act, there were restrictions introduced. One of these restrictions is the reason for the question I put to Senator Kelly last week. I know that he referred me to clause 5(a) but I understand that he really meant to refer me to clause 6.

That is a very interesting clause and was referred to by Senator Godfrey. I think that he rightly drew the attention of this chamber to the issue as to whether the avowed purpose of preventing concentration was, in fact, brought about by the terms of this bill.

He made reference to the fact that Fasken & Calvin and Fraser & Beatty, two eminent law firms in Toronto, had come to different conclusions as to the interpretation of that clause. He pointed out that the one who supported the view that it was a clear prohibition really did not address the question.

I picked up from the table the Oxford Illustrated Dictionary, 1962 Edition, Clarendon Press, and with your permission I would like to read the definition of the word "require" from that dictionary. It is a verb and it states:

Demand of (person) to do; demand or ask in words, esp. as of right;—

And this is important—

—lay down an imperative.

That is the normal use of the word in the context in which it is used in clause 6(h) of Bill C-66. That is important because if it is not so interpreted, then the type of agreement that is referred to there takes on quite a different connotation.

There is the view that the proper interpretation of this bill and its restrictive provisions regarding co-operation to arrive at control or concentration are flawed.

This is not an easy question and requires careful study and the view of people knowledgeable in the way businesses operate. Certainly, I would think that all senators would understand that you could draw an agreement that did not require certain things, but you could have an agreement without that requirement that would, in effect, have the result of concerted action.

The shares already sold by way of rights have a value on that price of $11.50 on the first tranche and $5.75 on the second tranche, which has brought the government $253 million.

Senator Frith: What is the word you used?

Senator Sinclair: Tranche.

Senator Frith: Do you mean "cut"?

Senator Sinclair: Yes. It is not a small figure. Senator Godfrey raised the question as to whether changing this act to make it clearer or to go beyond contravention which bars further concentration in our land, might result in the remission of the right issue.

Again, here there was a conflict of opinion as to whether such was material. I would suggest to honourable senators that that turns on whether there has been an absence from the fundamental principle of the bill in the amendment that is advanced. Does it change in any way, or in any substantive way what the bill intended to do? If the bill intended to vary the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act in regard to share transfers, as it did, and it did it for the purpose of preventing concentration, and it went to the extent of listing associates and defining associates in a number of clauses, then I would suggest to you that it does not, by an amendment making it clear, change the substantive provision in such a way as to cause remission or the cancellation of the rights issue.

In a matter so vitally important as concentration, and this being the first of many bills of this government's privatization plans, I think we should be careful to have a clear understanding and a detailed investigation of this important clause.

Honourable senators realize the importance of concentration. For example, in the financial institutions and companies of this country it has moved forward so that it is not only concentrated but it is family concentrated. What this really has done is to bring in and bring forward proprietorship in many of our companies away from professional management and the wide holding and wide ownership of some of our most vital industries.

As I pointed out earlier, CDC is certainly a vital company with the Kidd mine and Connaught Laboratories.

I congratulate the government on having come to the conclusion that the public policy did not require the CDC to be controlled by government any longer, because times have changed. The Kidd mine, for instance, had been patriated. Having congratulated them on that let us all make certain that we congratulate them also on not bringing about concentration.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Kelly speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Senator Sinclair.]

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I am surrounded by all the documents and briefing material with which, as you can imagine, I would surround myself when I knew I would have to respond to some comments made by my good friend and occasional adversary, Senator Sinclair. I have listened with great interest to the comments made by Senator Godfrey and Senator Sinclair on the matter of Bill C-66 and the sale of the CDC shares. I would like to try to see if we cannot concentrate on the issues that are central here.

● (1510)

It is not difficult to argue, as businessmen, that the sale of 23 million shares at $11.50 was a good deal for the Government of Canada. The market today is just a little bit above $9. It was clearly a good transaction. Senator Godfrey said that and, I believe, Senator Sinclair, at least on a price basis, agrees—at least, he did not disagree.

Senator Frith: When you say “good”—good for whom?

Senator Kelly: Good for Canada, the Canadian taxpayers and for the owners who made the sale.

Senator MacEachen: Our cultural sovereignty!

Senator Kelly: The shares traded last year from a low in the vicinity of $5 to $11.25 immediately prior to this offering.

Senator Sinclair mentioned at the outset the time difference between when the bill was presented in the other place and when it reached this chamber. I think that is an important point to keep in mind because, during that period, an exhaustive examination was carried on in connection with that bill in a House of Commons committee. If you have confidence, as I have, in the democratic process, we saw the adversary system, I hope, working at its very best before that committee. Those who were in favour of and those who were opposed to the bill researched the material presented to them, I assume carefully, and every possible argument that they could think of is now a matter of record. That is probably what took a lot of time. By the time the bill reached us, that material was available to all of us who had a deep interest so that we could examine the testimony of witnesses and make a judgment on the nature, substantive or otherwise, of what had been said. I think that is an important point to make because of what I want to say a little later.

Senator Sinclair did refer to the dictionary definition of a word in clause 5(6)(h). I think I have it right this time.

Senator Sinclair: It is subclause 6(5), paragraph (h).

Senator Kelly: Both Senator Sinclair and I, and many others in this place, know that court decisions often do not rely solely on dictionary definitions. They have a relationship, but they are not necessarily central.

The major concern, however, expressed in this chamber and also in the other place, I believe, has centred on the definition of “association.” The concern is raised that more than 50 per cent opens up the possibility of undue concentration. I must say that I share that view. I am always concerned about that possibility, although I will say that I felt warmly towards Senator Sinclair’s reference about the difference between family management and professional management. We are both professional managers and, as such, we tend to love a broad shareholder base, because that means the shareholders cannot bother us and we can run the company as we please.

Senator Sinclair: Not in Canadian Pacific.

Senator Kelly: I think we are moving in a direction, perhaps, of the emergence of a sponsoring shareholding group, which is not a bad idea, to keep professional managers, such as Senator Sinclair and, to a much lesser degree, myself, in line as an additional force in addition to the marketplace.

However, I was reassured, as Senator Godfrey stated he was, at the outset, by my interpretation of clause 5(6)(h). Senator Godfrey indicated that that reassured him until he looked at it again. He produced two opposing positions by two eminent law firms. It is not unusual for eminent law firms to disagree. He produced the position of Fasken & Calvin who say that this clause offers little or no protection in the defence against undue concentration; and Fraser & Beatty who said that it did. We have since received the advice of the Department of Justice, who happened to agree with Fraser & Beatty. Now, we have three opinions: We have the one that there is not enough protection; and we have another law firm, plus the Department of Justice, who says that there is. When we realize how many lawyers there are in this country, I would suggest that we could probably get thousands of opinions.

Senator Doody: We shudder.

Senator Kelly: For the moment, I think we have reason to be reassured.

I have to come back to the basic issue, to me at least, which is that I think we are now facing the possibility of frustrating what I think is a good business deal if we amend this bill in any substantive way and allow the present purchasers of those rights to back out. Certainly, the decision on the extent to which an amendment is substantial would be made in the courts: We know that.

I believe, with the share price being at its present level, there would be every likelihood that a number of buyers might well want to change their minds and argue that any amendment is “substantial.” They may not be able to win their case on that issue, but I do believe we have to bear that in mind.

I should like to deal briefly with the matter of referring this bill to committee. Clearly, if that is the wish of this chamber, I would be prepared to do that. I can only say that this will be simply raking over old ground and old arguments.

In the matter of the protection against concentration and the difference of opinion on the questions concerning clause 5(6)(h), I have dealt with the fact that the Department of Justice seems to feel comfortable. I understand Mr. Hampson wishes to present himself and his arguments before a committee if it is referred, but I would point out that his evidence and the evidence of many others is available in the transcript of information, advice and recommendations offered to the committee in the other place. I believe it has probably been read by most of us already.

Do we really want to risk frustrating a good business transaction?

In a more general sense, honourable senators—and I risk a bit in saying this—when we consider the material already available to us, the discussions we have had here and the fact that ritual, perhaps, calls for a matter like this to be referred to a committee, I, for one, would really like to see some willingness in this chamber, on the part of all of us, to move away a little from what seems to me to be a growing habit and the desire to turn this chamber into a mere image of the other place where they ask questions and we ask the same questions; they bring witnesses before their special committees, and we bring the same witnesses before our committees. I do not sense that we pay enough attention to what is said in the other committee to, perhaps, save some time.

Perhaps we should ask a witness who has appeared before a legislative committee, “Do you have something new to offer, because we have the transcript of what you said before?” Or we could say, “We have read the transcript of what you have said before, and we have this one question to ask.” I have a feeling that we are repeating ourselves in this process, and I wonder if, in this case, we may, for once, avoid that route since I do not know how productive it is going to be.

Why can't we be content with a thorough debate on this matter on second reading? Surely we have all the necessary information. There is agreement that the sale was a good deal. The outstanding question deals with the adequacy of protection against undue concentration. Again, we have a two-to-one opinion on the strength of clause 5(6)(h).

I have to repeat my remarks regarding an amendment of any significance. Here I should like to refer to the prospectus that accompanied this offering, which states the consequences if the bill is not proclaimed into law in substantially its present form with respect to such permitted level of ownership. I would draw your attention to the word “substantially.” It all hangs on whether an amendment is substantial. If we feel we want to take that risk, fine. If we feel there are really matters that we have to address before a committee, and if this is referred to committee, then, obviously, it should go there. But if we are trying to refer it to committee simply to rehash everything that has been said before, then I really think that is not even responsible. Finally, I respect the reference that Senator Sinclair made to the one sensitive area, namely, on the question of the offering and the price at the time of the offering. I do honour him for acknowledging that this is neither the time nor the place to discuss that. It is being examined.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I recognize what Senator Kelly has said, namely, that the Department of Justice has considered the problem, and presumably it has also considered that this does give protection. If that is so, then, to make it clear, it cannot be a substantial change. All I am suggesting is that we should make clause 5(6)(h) absolutely clear. I believe that a discussion with people from the Department of Justice, with Mr. Hampson from the CDC—that may be enough—we could resolve this issue and make it a better bill without any difficulty arising from changing it substantially. I would suggest that a couple of hours spent in committee might be beneficial.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wonder if honourable senators will agree that the National Finance Committee is the appropriate committee for this bill. Under the committee's terms of reference, the second reference is to government finance. No doubt that could cover this particular matter, because obviously there is government finance involved. It could also go to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, which deals with private bills; or perhaps it could go to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee which has corporate affairs as one of its terms of reference. At this point I would prefer to see it go to the National Finance Committee. All of the committees I have mentioned have a number of items to deal with, and therefore, if honourable senators agree, the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is as good a committee as any.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking to the reference, there are two points. The first is the one raised by Senator Doody. I believe there is an overlap and the bill could conveniently go to either one of those committees. Perhaps the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee would be the most remote of the three mentioned. I believe it could go quite properly to either the National Finance Committee or the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee. If, as the Deputy Leader of the Government has said, it is more convenient for the bill to go to the National Finance Committee, then I would accept that.

I should like to comment on Senator Kelly's observations on the use of committees in the Senate when a bill has been studied by a committee of the other place. I believe, on this particular question of reference to committee, we should work on the principle that all bills should go to committee, and that there should be a strong and persuasive reason for not sending a bill to committee. In other words, the burden should be on the person arguing against its going to committee, rather than on those who think it should go to committee.

While I understand Senator Kelly's concern about what seems to be duplication, repetition of work already done, I believe we should remember that basically the committees of the Senate do a different style of work on legislation—normally, not always; it might not apply in this case—from the type of work done in the House of Commons. While it is true that sometimes there is a certain amount of partisan debate in Senate committees, generally speaking one can say that the level of partisan debate is noticeably lower in the Senate committees than it is in committees of the other place.

Senator Murray: And the quality is higher.

Senator Frith: The newly-arrived chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee adds that comment, and I agree. But it depends on what one means by "quality". The quality of the political work done in committees of the other place is quite high, and that is a necessary part of our system. But we are here essentially to try to improve bills, and to try to take a more careful and do, perhaps, a more scholarly—if I can go that far—study in looking at legislation. I believe that is part of our job. When we do that, there is no doubt that we often cover ground that has already been covered, as Senator Kelly has said; and it is in that context that we should always observe the rule that the burden should always be on the person who does not want a bill to go to committee. In other words, we should always assume that legislation is going to committee unless good reason is shown why it should not.

Senator Kelly adhered to that framework. Although he does not like the framework, he works within it, because he tried to persuade us why the bill should not go to committee. He was quite in order to do that; but I wanted to explain where I thought the burden should be placed with respect to whether or not a bill should go to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

CANADA'S INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—INTERIM REPORT ON BILATERAL TRADE WITH THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN RESEARCH ON STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE DEBATED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Interim Report of the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations pertaining to Bilateral Trade with the United States and Canada's Participation in Research on the Strategic Defense Initiative, tabled in the Senate on 17th September, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to take part in this debate and to share with you a few thoughts about the United Nations and the difficulties that the world has experienced in relation to talks on disarmament.

At the end of the Second World War, the leaders of the world met in San Francisco to lay the foundation of the United Nations. The mandate of the United Nations was to provide the world with an international forum where countries could sort out their differences and resolve their disputes in a peaceful and rational manner, and to promote educational and material help to needy countries.

On the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of this world organization, I believe it is worthwhile to examine the accomplishments of the United Nations and to see whether this institution lived up to the expectations that were created at the time of its founding.

For a start, we have not had a third world war. That, in itself, is quite an achievement. While the United Nations has not been able to prevent many armed conflicts that have taken place in different regions of the world, the United Nations General Assembly and Security Council have contributed to world peace and stability in a significant way.

Affiliated agencies such as UNESCO, the World Health Organization and UNICEF have also contributed to improving the quality of life in providing, as an example, many small villages in the Third World with clean water pumped from their own wells; in eradicating many diseases; decreasing illiteracy and sharing knowledge around the world. These are tangible achievements that have benefited indirectly each one of us individually. They prove that the objectives of the UN are attainable. The weaknesses of the UN lie not in its inability to provide an effective mechanism for resolving disputes between nations, but, rather, in the unwillingness of some of its members to entrust their problems to this world organization. This sentiment was echoed by the Secretary General of the United Nations, Mr. Javier Perez de Cuellar, on his recent visit to Canada. He noted that the UN is like a Stradivarius violin. It may be perfect, but if it is played badly or not played at all, one ought not to blame the violin.

Despite its weaknesses, however, and its many critics, the United Nations enjoys widespread support in different ways from hundreds of millions of individuals around the world, from its member countries and from international organizations like the Inter-Parliamentary Union. At the 70th Inter-Parliamentary Conference held in Seoul, Korea in 1983 the delegates passed a resolution calling for the strengthening of the United Nations and its institutions. Among the many reforms suggested was the enhancement of the capacity of the United Nations institutions to negotiate, inquire, mediate, arbitrate and, ultimately, settle disputes among the member nations. It was felt that the Security Council could be strengthened in order to play a more prominent role in these conflicts and that the International Court of Justice should have more cases referred to it. In general, it was felt that the nations of the world should be using the institutions of the United Nations more frequently to resolve their disputes.

What the United Nations lacks is the political will of its members to make it work more effectively. Having said that, we should also ask ourselves, "Are we expecting too much from this world organization?" Have we come to expect progress in international relations with the same speed that we have been witnessing progress in the technical and scientific field, where technology appears to double every five years? Can human beings and countries as a whole cast aside their past overnight; can they forget the tragic lessons of recent times?

We have approximately 5,000 years of written history. A history that records a myriad of violent conflicts and human suffering caused by racial differences, religious intolerance and plundering greed. There are a thousand and one examples of broken treaties, broken accords, betrayal of friends and surprise attacks on neighbours. It is this history that has created a deeply ingrained feeling of mistrust. It is this feeling of mistrust that is at the root of our present international tension. It has been estimated that the world spends $800 billion a year on armaments. Some countries acquire new offensive weapons to deter aggression while others are developing defensive systems, like the United States SDI system, better known as Star Wars, which is designed to destroy missiles in space before they reach their targets. Real progress in disarmament cannot be made so long as mistrust persists. The East and the West are divided by two diametrically opposed political ideologies. They are both competing in each other's camps. No side is prepared to accept the status quo. Over the centuries borders have changed hands many times and they continue to change hands to this day.

Can these major differences and stumbling blocks be set aside in order to pave the way for talks toward meaningful disarmament? The prior question which must be addressed is that of trust, without which any agreement will be hollow and ephemeral. Trust does not just happen, but it can be built up through painstaking consultation and willingness to put common understanding for mutual benefit ahead of seeking unilateral advantage.

This elemental psychology behind disarmament is particularly relevant to the nuclear age. Traditionally, war strategies have been based on relatively simple win-lose propositions. Successful aggression or resistance to aggression is dependent on military might or the ability to mobilize patriotic sentiments. With the advent of nuclear weapons of mass destruction, actual large-scale war has become unthinkable. At the same time, in thinking about such a war, strategic analysis has become increasingly intellectualized and computerized. A hypothetical game of nuclear roulette has replaced brute force and grand emotions. As Anatol Rapoport, Professor of Peace Studies at the University of Toronto, remarked in a recent radio interview, "Nuclear war could be started by a young lady at the console." According to Professor Rapoport, the nuclear arms control dilemma can be compared to the classic game theory situation known as the "prisoner's dilemma." Suppose there are two sides, A and B. Each can make either a yes or a no move, but does so in ignorance of the other's move. If both A and B say yes, each wins an equal small amount. If both say no, each loses the same small amount—again a tie, but with a negative payoff. If one says yes and the other says no, the one who says yes loses a large amount and the one who says no gains by an equivalent amount. Obviously, it is in the individual interest of each side to avoid saying yes when the other side says no. However, if both sides could get together beforehand and agree on a common course, they would both win. Collaboration of this sort, of course, would require trust.

Now, suppose we apply this logic to the two sides of an arms race. Each side acknowledges that continued military competition is a costly drain on their economies and threatens each other's security. It is, therefore, in their common interest to say yes to stopping the arms race.

Returning to East-West relations, can we expect the two superpowers to abandon the quest for strategic superiority and to settle instead for co-operation which we know to be in the interest of the entire world? One should not be too sanguine, but there are at least some grounds for optimism. Some of the statements that have been made prior to November 19, the day on which Reagan and Gorbachev met in Geneva, are encouraging. In early June President Reagan declared that the U.S. would continue to abide by the never-ratified and soon-to-expire Salt II Treaty, "as long as the Soviet Union exercises equal restraint." Another positive sign has been recent Soviet moves to suspend nuclear tests and to permit on-site inspection for the first time of its nuclear reactors.

The new Gorbachev regime has indicated very strongly that it wants a return to detente. Just before the tenth anniversary of the Helsinki Accords, the Soviet Union announced a five-month ban on nuclear weapons tests to begin August 6, the 40th anniversary of Hiroshima. The moratorium would continue beyond that initial period if the United States were to reciprocate. This move followed closely an announcement in Washington that President Reagan had invited Soviet observers to witness a U.S. underground nuclear test as a gesture to inspire an increase in trust between the superpowers. Since that time the Soviet Union has called for an international conference to prevent the militarization of space and has invited the United States to resume the negotiations between the U.S.S.R., United States and Great Britain on a comprehensive test ban, which were suspended following the invasion of Afghanistan.

A long-standing, sticky point in any test ban has been the issue of verification. Canada has worked hard on conditions for a ban using primarily national technical means of verification. In mid-August, Soviet officials confirmed that inspectors from the Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency would visit Soviet civilian nuclear reactors in the next six weeks.

This marks the first time that the Soviet Union has opened any nuclear site to international inspection. It was a positive prelude to the review conference on the non-proliferation treaty which had just begun in Geneva. An historic meeting has taken place in Geneva between the leaders of the two superpowers, Reagan and Gorbachev. The joint statement that was released at the end of the summit did not contain any dramatic announcement of a breakthrough in arms reduction, but it did contain some new initiatives which will hopefully lead to confidence-building measures and thus increase trust in each other's motives, paving the way for more progress at the next round of negotiations. If either side should cheat, we would be back at square one and mistrust would prevail over confidence-building measures. We must not let this happen. It would reverse the process of detente and set off an arms race all over again.

It is still too early to tell whether any of these modest overtures will ultimately bear fruit in a new arms control agreement. The door to trust, co-operation and reciprocity has been opened slightly. The nuclear dilemma cannot be wished away; any opportunity for mutual progress must be seized, otherwise we will all remain prisoners of the arms race, with each side vainly trying to beat the odds as the world falls evermore under the shadow of the mushroom cloud. We must all return to the spirit of 40 years ago and the ideals which led to the founding of the United Nations.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD B. HATFIELD

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, November 6, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's Fifteenth Anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick.

He said: Honourable senators, further to my notice of inquiry to call the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's Fifteenth Anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick, it is with great pleasure and considerable emotion that I rise today in this august assembly, for the first time since my appointment to the Senate.

Ever since I was called to the Senate on June 26 of this year, I have tried to concentrate on learning the customs and rules connected with this function. Today I feel ready, with perhaps a touch of overconfidence, to deliver my maiden speech.

It is almost as though history had a hand in this, because exactly fifteen years ago, I started my career in the New Brunswick Legislative Assembly.

It is true that history often repeats itself, and in that case I can look forward to remaining in your company for another fifteen years at least. I hope you find the prospect as attractive as I do.

As stated in my notice of inquiry and because I wanted to combine business with pleasure, as it were, I would like to take advantage of my first speech in this chamber to pay tribute to Premier Richard Hatfield who, on November 12 of this year, celebrated his fifteenth anniversary as leader of the Government of New Brunswick, ever since the Progressive Conservative Party won a majority in the election held on October 26, 1970.

He not only holds the record for the longest term for a premier in the history of my province, he is also the dean of Canada's first ministers today.

For fifteen years, Premier Hatfield has made a dynamic and creative contribution to Canadian politics.

His energetic participation in the debate on patriation of the Constitution has, I feel, given him a special place in the history of our country.

[English]

One of the most dramatic and emotional events in Canada's history occurred only three and a half years ago when the country's Constitution was patriated; fully 115 years after the country actually began; and the people of Canada thus came to assume sole responsibility for their political institutions and their destiny.

History will record that this was possible in no small degree because of the leadership and indomitable will of Richard Hatfield who, as Premier of New Brunswick, placed the issue of the Constitution above party and other political considerations and made it a personal priority, at no inconsiderable risk to his own political future.

Senators will recall the explosive—and at times, almost hysterical—atmosphere of the time, as governments and people in Canada disassembled in a manner hitherto unknown, at least in periods of civil stability and peace.

Throughout it all, however, the Premier of New Brunswick unerringly pursued four main constitutional objectives, all of which he was eventually to see firmly enshrined in this fundamental document which became our Constitution on April 17, 1982.

For the benefit of the honourable members of this house, I would like to speak briefly to each of them, for they give the measure of the man's deep understanding of Canada and his acute sense of the real duty of an elected leader.

The first objective was patriation; that is, to finally give all Canadians the opportunity to take ultimate responsibility for their own country, so that the nation's political structures and destiny would be shaped as they should be: By Canadians, for Canadians and in Canada.

His second objective was to secure the right of every Canadian man, woman and child, from discrimination and arbitrary action of any kind by urging that the Constitution include, for the first time, a Charter of Rights spelling out fundamental democratic and legal rights for all Canadians. In a country like Canada, with two orders of government, each possessing significant constitutional powers, the right of citizens to fair, decent and non-discriminatory treatment is a matter which required special attention, as our history often lamentably illustrated. The Charter of Rights helps secure that.

The equality of the French and English languages in New Brunswick was a further constitutional objective of far-reaching political, as well as personal, significance to Richard Hatfield. Perhaps more than any other premier in the history of my province, Richard Hatfield has worked tirelessly and effectively to advance the cause of language equality in New Brunswick; and he has taken his campaign for equality to every part of this country where he saw the rights of the English or French minority endangered.

New Brunswick is the only province in Canada with two official languages, something I am personally very proud of and which also owes much to another honourable member of this house, Senator Robichaud who, as Premier of my province, first put the concept into law in the late 1960s. It was Richard Hatfield who put it into the Constitution in 1982.

The rights of all the people of Canada, no matter where they live, to make a livelihood, to educate their children and to live a full and prosperous life, were also very much part of Richard Hatfield's hopes as he worked for constitutional reform and patriation throughout the 1970s and into the early 1980s.

• (1600)

Equalization, which is one of the unique contributions which Canada has made to the administration of federal states, was considered by Premier Hatfield to be a basic component of any patriated constitution for this country; and in that he was also successful.

It is now not only a matter of parliamentary practice, but of constitutional edict that Parliament, and the legislatures of Canada, are committed to, and I quote:

"The principle of making equalization payments to ensure that provincial governments have sufficient revenues to provide reasonably comparable levels of public services at reasonably comparable levels of taxation."

This is an achievement of inestimable importance for the people of Canada in general and for the people of New Brunswick in particular.

But this is only part of it. A constitutional commitment to reduce economic disparities is the other. For, in the long run, the Canadian people will only achieve full prosperity when everyone has the opportunity to contribute to it. Parliament and the provincial legislatures are therefore committed to, and I quote once more words of the Constitution which Premier Hatfield helped write:

"Promoting equal opportunities for the well-being of Canadians; furthering economic development to reduce disparities in opportunities".

Over all, the premier has worked diligently for regional development in his province, and with success, as I am sure other honourable members of this house will attest. For it was during many of those years that Senator Romeo LeBlanc, who was New Brunswick's federal cabinet minister, worked with the premier to the same end, as did another honourable member of this house, Senator De Bané, who served for a time as the DREE minister.

The job, however, is not over; for although we now have a constitutional basis for what should be done, translating it into reality will continue to occupy such leaders as Premier Hatfield and the present government.

Honourable senators of this house will be aware of the need for vigilance to ensure that the commitment to regional development, which is explicit in the Constitution Act, 1982, is observed in practice as well as in principle.

[Translation]

As for me, Mr. Speaker, whatever the political stripe of the federal and provincial governments of my province, whenever the main interest of New Brunswick and Canada will be at stake, I have the firm intention of taking a non-partisan approach like Richard Hatfield and encourage those governments to remain faithful to the spirit of the Constitution, or strongly denounce them should the need arise.

But Richard Hatfield has done a lot more than taking part in the repatriation of our Constitution.

He also took decisive action at home by undertaking a basic review of our provincial legislation on the official languages. He was one of the artisans of the adoption of our statute acknowledging the equality of New Brunswick's two official linguistic communities.

He is an authentic Canadian who has understood the meaning and nature of relations between francophones and anglophones in Canada and, in his province, he did not spare any effort so that the francophone community of New Brunswick might be a real partner in the political life of the province, thus correcting some of the major injustices which mar the sad history of Acadia.

But we are indeed indebted to our anglophone Prime Minister who, with great generosity and great respect, acknowledged the reality of the French fact, the legitimacy of the aspirations of Acadian men and women, and the need to give the francophone community of New Brunswick the basic development tools to ensure, no longer its survival, but its growth, its expansion and a certain autonomy.

On several occasions he stated that the stronger the Acadian community, the stronger the province of New Brunswick. By the same token, I suggest he contributed to consolidate the foundation of the Canadian federation. Together with my colleague and very good friend Senator Brenda Robertson, I had the great honour to associate myself with Premier Hatfield in the great debates and achievements which have characterized the development of what we call back home the linguistic vital space which respects the basic dignity of men and women in New Brunswick.

History will say that over the past 15 years, Acadian men and women have had their national holiday of August 15 and the Acadian flag officially recognized by the Government.

Mr. Speaker, given the importance of such symbols in the history of civilization, we realize that these actions themselves bear witness to an uncommon open-mindedness and generous feelings.

For Richard Hatfield was not satisfied with symbols.

He has put an end to the tiresome and painful struggles of many generations of Acadian men and women to obtain French schools and the administrative control over the educational system for their children. In the areas where the minority situation of francophones might have resulted in their assimilation, he has established a number of French community centres which have become sources of Acadian influence, which reinforce the social fabric of New Brunswick, accelerate the evolution of mentalities and ensure a social stability conducive to a better economic climate.

More recently, he has taken steps to create an independent trust fund to finance an Acadian daily to serve New Brunswick generally, which could become a true means of expression of the pluralistic aspiration and vision of the francophone community and a true forum of animation and awareness.

I dare hope that the federal government will soon co-operate with the provincial government and help make this project come true, which would no doubt help as much Acadian men and women in the areas of information and communication as the creation of the Moncton University did for education.

Dear colleagues, all these political steps are in line with the historical efforts made in 1960 by our illustrious colleague Senator Louis Robichaud whose program of equal opportunity has been a source of tremendous hopes for the future.

When in 1970 he turned over the reins of power to Premier Hatfield, Senator Robichaud could have said: "If I had to be defeated, I am lucky it was by a man like you who, I am sure, will continue in the same direction."

Dear friends and colleagues, New Brunswick has been involved over the past 25 years in a major debate dealing with the harmonization of cultural ties between the two official linguistic communities. We could call it the New Brunswick "Quiet Revolution".

It is true that this political process sometimes causes a stir and some resistance in certain peripheral French-speaking communities in the process of being assimilated, which has been happening in recent years as well as in English-speaking communities, whose spokespersons do not hesitate to make reactionary comments which can be surprisingly aggressive, inaccurate and intolerant.

Their historic shortsightedness leads them to speak the worst nonsense, in defiance of any logic.

Some of them seem to believe that thickheadedness is a sign of intellectual depth.

In such a context, it is not surprising that some people would attack the leadership of Premier Hatfield because he is guilty in their eyes of having done too much for Acadia, as though allowing Acadians to have access to real political power necessarily meant less power for the English-speaking community.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, this is what is truly at stake in this process.

However, the French-speaking citizens are not taken in, as indicated by the massive support they give Premier Hatfield.

The specious arguments raised by some bigoted people to justify their petty criticisms of the leadership of one of the greatest politicians in the history of New Brunswick do not stand under scrutiny. In fact, these are only diversionary tactics which they believe to be clever enough that they will eventually allow them to begin eroding the status quo, and even worse, to initiate a return to the past. French-speaking citizens would never accept this and it would have totally disastrous political effects for the social peace of New Brunswick.

When you know about the determination and perseverance which have always been the hallmark of the fight by the French-speaking people to have their rights recognized at times when their community had barely enough to survive, it is easy to imagine what would happen today when the Acadian community has the means to defend itself.

In the minds of the great majority of French-speaking and of tens of thousands of English-speaking citizens, it is absolutely clear that those who want to bring about the fall of Richard Hatfield are basically trying to undermine the Acadian community, whatever their rhetoric.

Richard Hatfield will defeat these chance opponents because he has been able to go beyond political and ethnic differences to find consensus where no one thought it existed.

He has been able to rally around him English- and French-speaking youth among others in an uninterrupted search for political truth.

He was the first man since Confederation to make the New Brunswick Conservative Party accessible to French-speaking citizens, and more than any other political personality, he was able to ensure the progress of our own party, of course, but even more important, of our community and our province.

More than anyone else, Richard Hatfield has a claim on our loyalty, and I am sure that the people in my former riding and throughout the province will want to show their gratitude and loyalty to a man whose generosity is legendary.

Honourable senators, it is with the same spirit of loyalty that I now embark on the second stage of my political career.

Thanks to the loyalty of my constituents, we worked together for fifteen years to make Edmundston a better place to live, more outward-looking and better equipped to take charge of its own affairs, more confident in its ability to flourish and expand, and also more positive with respect to its economy and more determined than ever to play a dynamic role in New Brunswick politics.

That was in fact the program I put before my constituents when I entered provincial politics in 1970, because it was my dream to give Edmundston a firm say in the government's decision-making process.

Honourable senators, that dream was probably inspired over the years by the example I was given by two of our illustrious predecessors in the house, the Honourable Jean-François Pouliot, Liberal, and the Honourable Edgar Fournier, Progressive Conservative.

It was Senator Pouliot, who, when I was a high school student, exactly 40 years ago, gave me a tour of the other place and a taste for politics. And more important, throughout his career in both Houses of Parliament, he proved that for a politician, whether elected or not elected, determination and loyalty to his constituents rather than to his party is still the best policy and generally the most successful one.

Jean-François Pouliot, a former federal member for the region of Rivière-du-Loup, where I was born, was a respected and popular M.P. Today, his name still conjures up memories of those happy years among the people he served so well. I therefore wanted to pay tribute to the senator at the first opportunity available to me.

As for Senator Edgar Fournier, whom most of you were able to know and appreciate since he did not leave the Senate until February 1983, I would say that he was the dominant political figure in northwestern New Brunswick during the last 30 years.

As a provincial minister, a federal M.P. and a senator, the man I have been known to refer to as my political "father-confessor" always remained true to himself. He never retreated from battles either within or outside his party when the interests of his part of the country were at stake.

Honourable senators, I am sure that when I visit Senator Fournier this week-end, I will be bringing him your best wishes for a long and healthy life and your expressions of appreciation and friendship.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Simard: On behalf of all New Brunswick citizens I say to Senator Edgar Fournier, "Thank you for your outstanding and deeply human work throughout a brilliant career."

In conclusion, dear colleagues and friends, I intend to live up to the confidence shown in me by the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, when in June last he asked me to sit in this house.

I have the firm intention of continuing my political action by remaining faithful to the political approach of my former leader, the Honourable Richard Hatfield, by remaining faithful to the citizens of Edmundston and New Brunswick, to the new vision I have of our province since 1970. It is a province inhabited by two communities each with its own institutions, enabling each of them to develop at its own pace, to the benefit of a province which is now stronger, more united, and which contributes even more to Canada in many ways.

To all my new colleagues I extend my sincere thanks for the warm welcome you gave me.

I hope you will continue to help me benefit from the experience you have acquired throughout your impressive political and professional careers.

In return, I can assure you of my fullest co-operation, as non-partisan as possible, in keeping with the main objective of the Senate which is to approve legislation, programs and budgets in the interest of all Canadians.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have no idea whether the speech of the previous speaker was the epitaph of the Hatfield government in New Brunswick, or the beginning of the by-election campaign for the seat left vacant by my colleague, the Honourable Maurice Simard, in his former provincial riding of Edmundston. In any event, I intend to make a few comments on this issue. Since I have to attend the proceedings of the special committee on youth, I move that the debate be adjourned.

[Senator Simard]

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

REGISTER OF SENATORS' INTERESTS

MOTION FOR CONSIDERATION BY STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE OF RELATED MATTERS—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 3, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider matters related to the establishment of a Register of Senator's Interests, and report on these and any other matters relating to registration of Senators' interests, including the form and content of such a Register, considering among other matters relating to the registration of Senators' interests, the following:

- (a) remunerated directorships of companies, public or private;
- (b) other remunerated positions or offices;
- (c) remunerated trades, professions or vocations;
- (d) the names of clients when the interests referred to above include personal services by the Senator which arise out of or are related in any manner to his or her membership in the Senate;
- (e) any payments or any material benefits or advantages received from or on behalf of foreign Governments, organizations or persons;
- (f) land and property of substantial value from which a substantial income is derived; and
- (g) the names of companies or other bodies in which the Senator has, to his or her knowledge, either himself or herself or with or on behalf of his or her spouse or dependents, any beneficial interest including, among others, shareholdings of a nominal value greater than one-hundredth of the total capital assets of the company or other body.

He said: Honourable senators, I would have moved this motion yesterday but I detected a rather keen lack of interest in hearing further words of wisdom at the hour of 2 a.m., which is the reason for moving the motion this afternoon. There was the possibility that some honourable senators might like to speak to this motion before it is referred to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, that the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider—

Hon. Senators: Dispense.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I know of no reason why we should not just adopt the motion. Perhaps we should adjourn the matter until Tuesday in case some senator wishes to speak to the principle of the motion itself. Certainly, as far as I know, we support the motion.

Honourable senators, I move the adjournment in my name so that any other honourable senator who wishes to do so will have an opportunity to speak to this motion.

Senator Doody: I thank Senator Frith for that since it means I will not have to tackle that tongue-twister again on Tuesday.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 10, 1985, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

RAOUL WALLENBERG

PROPOSED CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Monday, December 9, 1985

RESOLVED,—That:

Whereas during World War II millions of Jews were exterminated in death camps at the hands of the Nazis in then occupied Europe;

And whereas hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews were facing extermination in 1944 through deportation to Germany under the orders of Adolf Eichmann;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg as Secretary of the Swedish Legation went to Hungary in the summer of 1944;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg, with extraordinary courage and with total disregard for the constant danger to himself, saved the lives of almost one hundred thousand innocent Jewish men, women and children, a considerable number of whom now live in Canada;

And whereas the Soviet Union, in violation of Raoul Wallenberg's Swedish diplomatic immunity and of international law, seized him on January 17, 1945, with no explanation ever given for his detention and subsequent imprisonment;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg has been a prisoner in the Soviet Union since 1945;

And whereas reports from former prisoners in the Soviet Union, as recently as January, 1981, suggest that Raoul Wallenberg is still alive and remains a prisoner;

And whereas history has revealed that heroic acts of salvation were tragically rare during the massacre of millions of innocent human beings during World War II;

And whereas the significance of this symbol of humanity's concern for its fellows has been reduced by the wall of silence that surrounds the fate of Raoul Wallenberg;

Now therefore the House of Commons resolve that the said Raoul Wallenberg is hereby declared to be an honorary citizen of Canada;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House in the said Resolution by filling in the blank with the words, "Senate and the".

ATTEST

Michael B. Kirby for The Clerk of the House of Commons

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(i), I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden:

That the Senate do agree with the House of Commons in the said Resolution by filling in the blank space left therein with the words "Senate and the"; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to crave the indulgence of honourable senators to indicate my serious reservation about granting leave on this matter. I think it should be pointed out that if this became the will of the Senate it would be the first time in the history of this country that an honorary Canadian citizen had been created. While I have not the slightest hesitation in stating that Mr. Wallenberg is one of the great men of our time, I think it is perhaps ill-becoming for the Senate to take on a matter of this importance, this precedent-making importance, and to proceed in a matter of minutes to add to a resolution the three words that are requested.

I think that great occasions require great consideration. Senator McIlraith used to say, "Let us do these things decently and in good order". I think that Mr. Wallenberg deserves a greater tribute than the possible seemingly perfunctory addition of the Senate's approval to a resolution of the other place.

I have not had time to study the resolution, but there are some things there that pain me. I am not at all happy about the suggestion that "heroic acts of salvation were tragically rare during the massacre of millions of innocent human beings during World War II". I cannot forbear casting a thought to our thousands of young men and women who were there, some of whom did not return. I think we should proceed with this motion in the usual way so that the Senate may have an opportunity to reflect upon the importance of this event. Then, I hope the resolution will be passed. Certainly, I shall be supporting it.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that unanimous leave is not granted.

Senator Nurgitz: Therefore, honourable senators, I move that the message be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That will require leave. Certainly, I am prepared to grant leave for one day, as long as we know what we are doing. It is a substantive motion and would, therefore, require two days' notice.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, rule 45(1)(h) states that one day's notice shall be given for the making of a substantive motion.

Senator Frith: Then the granting of leave is not necessary. Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Murray, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

ADMINISTRATION OF PAROLE PROVISIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which pertains to some observations made over the weekend by Mr. Norman Fagnou, a regional executive officer of parole in the Prairie regions. In discussing Bills C-67 and C-68, which will be coming to this chamber shortly from the House of Commons, Mr. Fagnou observed:

We can tinker with the details later, even shift the responsibility of gating to some other body if it is seen as necessary.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could assure me that Mr. Fagnou was indeed stating government policy in those remarks.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): To the best of my knowledge, the gentleman was speaking for himself. However, I think the best course would be to have the matter considered in committee when the bill is under study.

Senator Hastings: I have a supplementary question. I would like to clarify whether it is the government's policy to "tinker later" since that would have a very great bearing on the discussion of the bills in committee. We have the evidence from the Chairman of the National Parole Board that it is simply a band-aid measure which offers no long-term public protection. That, in effect, makes the bill simply "tinkering" now. If we are going to "tinker" now and "tinker" later, why not send the bills back to those expert "tinkers" in the Solicitor General's department and ask them to bring forward a proper bill?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that I would like to take responsibility for the use of the word "tinker" that my honourable friend refers to. He obviously has some strong feelings about these bills, but I think the place to ventilate them is in the committee.

Senator Hastings: I have a further supplementary. Would the government leader, then, ask Mr. Fagnou to dedicate his efforts to the administration of parole, and leave the legislation to legislators?

Senator Roblin: If the government were to rebuke every public servant who made a comment on legislation or other government activities, we would be pretty busy people.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, on several occasions in the last few days I have asked the government house leader if he could give us some indication of when or on what basis payment in the amount of some $150 million, announced several days ago, will be made to farmers under the Drought Relief Program. The reason I am asking this question again today is that in the absence of any explanation of what the formula will be for calculating the payment, there are, of course, thousands of farmers who do not know whether or not they will qualify. So far as I can determine, no geographical area has been described, nor have any of the other requirements of that formula been made public. Therefore I would implore the Leader of the Government to attempt to obtain some information so that farmers will know when they can expect a payment and also so that some indication can be given to the farmers as to whether or not they will ever qualify. At the moment, that is unclear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is true that some 30,000 farmers will qualify, according to the preliminary statements made by the government. I am extremely sympathetic with my honourable friend's position and I will press the matter as vigorously as I can.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is a reasonably satisfactory answer but it is still fairly vague. Could we have at least an explanation by the ministers involved as to when they expect to be able to make such an announcement, if they are not ready to do so within a day or two?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has described my answer as reasonably satisfactory. I am not going to press my luck any further.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF MR. VICTOR CLARKE AS SPECIAL ADVISER TO CANADIAN HIGH COMMISSION IN LONDON

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the communiqué on December 9, 1985, from the Department of External Affairs announcing the appointment of Mr. Victor Clarke as Special Adviser on Investment to the Canadian High Commission in London. Part of the press release states:

● (1410)

Mr. Clarke will work closely with potential U.K. investors to assist them in evaluating specific investment opportunities in Canada.

[Senator Hastings.]

My question is: Why is this necessary when all the major Canadian banks have large staffs in London, and where merchant bankers, such as Wood Gundy, Dominion Securities, McLeod Young Weir and others also have specialists in mergers and acquisitions available, and when the entire work done by the banks across Canada is available? Why is it necessary to go to the expense of having another bureaucrat situated in London?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would normally be rather sympathetic to my honourable friend's suggestion, but the reason we have another bureaucrat in London is that there is perceived to be a gap in the information that is available to those who might seek to invest in Canada.

I will take the question as notice and obtain a definitive statement from the department.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I notice that in that press release it says that Mr. Clarke is to join the Canadian High Commission in London, which is fine, but the appointment has been announced by Mr. Kelleher, the Minister for International Trade. I had assumed that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was in charge of the Department of External Affairs, including the Canadian High Commission in London. I was surprised that the authority normally existing in the office of the Secretary of State for External Affairs was being exercised by another minister, a minister who does not have the authority to make an appointment such as has been announced. I wonder if the appointment was made by the Governor in Council and why the announcement was not made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will know that there are three ministers engaged in the Department of External Affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, of course, is the senior minister, and the other two ministers report to him. So, I do not find it strange that one of those two ministers would be given the job of making this announcement, particularly when it is in the field of his own special responsibility in connection with the department.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government in the Senate misunderstands the situation. The Secretary of State for External Affairs is in charge of all aspects of the department, including trade. Any authority which Mr. Kelleher exercises is delegated authority.

We have seen many occasions since this government took office when Mr. Clark has, somehow, been undermined and downgraded in his post. Why is it that an appointment to the Canadian High Commission in London—which is normally announced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—is now announced by the Minister for International Trade, as if he had any authority to issue instructions to the Canadian High Commission on any point?

I find this confusing, and I think it would be helpful if the Leader of the Government in the Senate tried to clarify the situation for us.

Senator Roblin: The Secretary of State for External Affairs hardly needs me to say that, in the opinion of the government, he is doing a first-class job, and any suggestion by my honourable friend that he is not will certainly not get my support.

Senator Olson: He did not make that suggestion!

Senator Roblin: I think that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is doing a good job, and I do not think there is any disposition on the part of anybody, from the Prime Minister down, to deny that fact or in any way to take away from it.

I have no direct knowledge of this matter, but it seems to me to be perfectly reasonable that the Secretary of State for External Affairs asked one of his colleagues to make this announcement. I do not think that that, in any way, derogates from his position.

Senator MacEachen: I made no comment whatsoever on Mr. Clark's performance. I have views on that, but I have not made any comment, and I do not see why it was necessary for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to come to Mr. Clark's defence when he was not attacked.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that Mr. Clark asked Mr. Kelleher to make the announcement. Normally in that case the announcement would say, "Mr. Kelleher, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, makes the following announcement." Would he now tell me whether, in fact, Mr. Clark asked Mr. Kelleher to make the announcement and, if so, why did he not make it himself and retain the symbolism, at least, of his authority, if not the reality? We know the reality, if the honourable minister wants to dwell on that terrain, has been eroded but why has the symbolism now been eroded?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend takes the trouble to read Hansard tomorrow he may find it conceivable that something he said does not reflect favourably on the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I feel that that gentleman needs absolutely no defence from me, but I am quite willing to state my confidence in him. If my friend wants to know what bureaucratic procedure took place in respect to this matter, I will be glad to oblige him.

Senator MacEachen: It is not a bureaucratic procedure but a ministerial one, and it is not a bureaucrat, unless the honourable Leader of the Government describes Mr. Kelleher, who made the announcement, as a bureaucrat. It is a minister who is not in charge of the Department of External Affairs. I want to know why the minister is not seen by the public and seen internationally as being in charge of the department. If the Leader of the Government wants to get testy over this I can give him a few examples in which Mr. Clark was indeed undermined internationally by his colleagues, including the Prime Minister.

Senator Roblin: I promise to get no more testy than my honourable friend gets on the matter.

Senator MacEachen: Fair enough.

Senator Doody: These are testy times.

Senator Roblin: I will report to the Secretary of State my honourable friend's extreme interest in this matter and endeavour to find an answer which might, perhaps, placate him.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning drought payments. There was some confusion when the announcement was made as to when the initial payment of $95 million would begin. The Minister of Agriculture indicated it would be before Christmas; departmental officials said that it may be next March or April; and the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board said it might be tough to begin making these payments before Christmas. Could the Leader of the Government clear up that confusion and tell us if it will be possible to get that money into the hands of farmers prior to the Christmas recess?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question in precisely those terms was addressed to me a few days ago and I have already answered it.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, if the question has been answered, I would like to know when. I remember asking the question but I do not remember getting an answer. The Leader of the Government said that he would try to get an answer, and I know that that is the best he could do. If he has answered it, I would like to know when.

Senator Roblin: I do not think my honourable friend has been following this interchange quite as closely as he should. The question the honourable senator asked me had to do with payments before Christmas or after Christmas. That question I have already dealt with. The question my honourable friend is raising is as to what the rules of the game are, and the answer to that question I still have to provide.

SEXUAL ABUSE OF CHILDREN

BADGLEY COMMITTEE REPORT—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it is now 16 months since the Badgley committee report on child sexual abuse was given to the Government of Canada. We have yet to receive a response of any significant nature from this government. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us why there has been no response and no legislation so far, and when we may expect some?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend with complete accuracy that the matter is considered a high priority one and is receiving attention now. The problem, of course, is that it involves a great many considerations that run across several departmental streams, so it is not an easy matter to come to grips with. It is being dealt with and a statement will be made when the government is able to do so.

I have had some bad luck recently in making forecasts involving time so I am somewhat gun-shy on that point. I do not think I should try to give my friend a statement as to what the time element is. The best I can do is say that the matter has not been forgotten and we are working on it.

Senator Marsden: I am glad to hear that. Do I understand from the Leader of the Government's answer that the response to the report will take the form of legislation?

Senator Roblin: That is a very good possibility but I cannot vouch for it at the moment.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I do not wish to be testy at this time but I do wish to commend the Solicitor General on the initiative he has taken in forming a task force to seek a successor to Mr. William Outerbridge, Chairman of the National Parole Board, who will be retiring. I commend the Solicitor General for that initiative.

● (1420)

I wonder if it might not be worthwhile to ask the Solicitor General to instruct the committee also to seek nominations to fill the other vacancies in the Parole Board, including the three vacancies in the National Parole Board, some of which have existed for a year, and also to recommend to the minister suitable nominees for the 22 vacancies for part-time members of the board.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If I recall correctly, the other day my honourable friend asked me a question which was precisely the same in substance, and I think I gave him the answer that I would do my best to convey his sense of impatience to the minister.

Senator Hastings: I am not impatient, honourable senators. I simply wonder if it might not be a worthwhile initiative for the Solicitor General to commend to that task force the added responsibility of seeking suitable nominees for the positions that he seems incapable of filling.

Senator Roblin: I think he is capable of filling them.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved second reading of Bill S-6, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a convention between Canada and the Cooperative Republic of Guyana and an agreement between Canada and India for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of this bill is to implement an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a convention between Canada and the Cooperative Republic of Guyana and an agreement between Canada and India for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

[Senator Roblin.]

The three tax conventions under review follow the general pattern of the conventions previously approved by Parliament. The number of Canadian tax treaties currently in force is 36. The conventions with Brazil, Cameroon, Ivory Coast, Kenya, Sri Lanka and Zambia approved by Parliament in 1984 and 1985 have yet to be ratified. After their ratification, the number of conventions in force will reach 42. The total number will reach 45 once these three conventions under study are ratified.

I would like, honourable senators, to indicate briefly the main elements of these tax treaties. Generally, dividends paid by Canadian enterprises may be taxed in Canada at a maximum rate of 15 per cent under the conventions. Under the Canada-India Double Taxation Agreement, the rate of withholding tax on dividends is reduced from 25 per cent to 15 per cent only if the recipient is a company which owns at least 10 per cent of the shares of the company paying the dividends and if the dividends are paid out of profits from investments made after the date of signature of the agreement. This was signed on October 30, 1985.

In the case of interest paid by a resident of one country to a resident of the other country, a general rate of 15 per cent will apply. There are, however, a number of exceptions for interest on government bonds or interest paid to the central bank, the government, a political subdivision or an agency wholly owned by the government or the subdivision. Interest paid by a resident of Guyana to a resident of Canada is subject to a rate of 25 per cent withholding tax.

With respect to royalties, the conventions provide for a general rate of 10 per cent in the source country except that under the tax agreement with India a rate of 30 per cent on royalties and fees for technical services will apply, but only in respect of technology transferred under arrangements made or contracts entered into after the date of signature of the agreement. In Canada, the statutory rate of 25 per cent will apply.

Some of the other matters also dealt with in these tax treaties include capital gains, non-discrimination, pensions and double taxation relief.

Under the Canadian Income Tax Act, a non-resident is subject to tax on capital gains arising on the disposal of "taxable Canadian property". Such property includes Canadian real estate and business assets, shares representing a substantial (25 per cent) interest in a Canadian public corporation, all shares of any other Canadian corporation and interests in certain trusts and partnerships. The right to impose tax on capital gains realized by residents of the U.S.S.R., Guyana and India is protected under the respective conventions.

Under the conventions, discrimination on the basis of nationality is prohibited, thereby ensuring nationals of a country equal treatment with nationals of the other country in the same circumstances. However, this does not prevent a country from providing fiscal incentives—for example, the small business deduction—on the basis of the residence of the taxpayer.

The right of Canada to tax pensions and annuities paid to non-residents is protected. Under the Canadian Income Tax Act, pension and annuities payments are subject to tax at the lesser of the statutory rate of the non-resident withholding tax and the graduated personal rates.

In Canada, double taxation of foreign source income of Canadian residents is alleviated by way of a foreign tax credit, in accordance with the limitations provided for in the Canadian legislation. In addition, dividends received by a company resident in Canada from the exempt surplus of its foreign affiliate resident in a treaty country will be exempt from tax in Canada.

The conventions also contain “tax-sparing” provisions in the case of Guyana and India. Under these provisions, the tax incentives granted by the domestic legislation of those countries will be recognized in computing Canadian tax and, therefore, Canadian residents will be allowed to deduct the amount of tax which would have been payable in the absence of the special incentive legislation in the other country.

On balance, the terms of the respective double taxation conventions provide an equitable solution to the various problems of double taxation existing between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Guyana and India. Each of these countries hopes to implement the bilateral tax convention as soon as possible. Consequently, I commend this bill to the most favourable consideration of this house.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, Senator Walker intimated to me that he wished to speak on this inquiry. He subsequently expressed some doubt as to whether he was going to enter into the debate. I am prepared to close the debate, but I think that it would be proper to wait a little longer so as to give Senator Walker a chance to intervene if he wishes to do so.

Order stands.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no desire to delay this matter. If any other honourable senator wishes to speak to it, I would be only too happy to yield. If no one wishes to speak at this point, I will stand the order again. It is not my intention to run it off the order paper.

Order stands.

THE ENVIRONMENT

AIR POLLUTION ON PARLIAMENT HILL AND PUBLIC EDUCATION CAMPAIGN—MOTION—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 5, 1985, moved:

That the Senate urge all Senators and drivers of other vehicles on Parliament Hill to abandon the practice of leaving vehicle engines running within the precincts of Parliament Hill as such practice adds to environmental damage and, further, the government should launch a public education campaign inviting all Canadians to do the same and to invite the provincial governments to take the same steps; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion supports that made by the Honourable Charles Caccia in the other place. The House of Commons acquainted us of the motion. One version asked for our support, and the other said that we were to be acquainted of the action taken by the other place.

I should like to hear what other honourable senators have to say on this motion, but I can put some facts on the record. Apparently the emissions from the exhaust of motor vehicles include the following: carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide, nitrogen oxides, hydrocarbons, lead and soot; and, according to research, they all affect our health.

Senator Doody: Does that cover cigar smoke?

Senator Frith: Would that it did. At least we do not have to include in this motion that no cars should be allowed to idle during committee meetings or within the precincts of committee hearing rooms. Apparently the documentation is quite sound and reliable on the question of the health hazards of lead, particularly for children. It is one of the ingredients used in the cheaper grades of gasoline. Nitrogen oxides are substances that damage our lungs. Apparently they can cause throat and nose problems, and it has been proven statistically that they aggravate asthmatic conditions as well as increasing the number of admissions to hospitals in certain meteorological conditions.

On a larger scale, it has been proven by scientific research that sulphur dioxide and nitrogen oxide, together, contribute to the formation of acid rain. I do not want to get into the whole question of acid rain, because I believe that most honourable senators are familiar with the extent of the problems created by acid rain.

Why should we think that we are going to solve all of those problems by suggesting that persons with vehicles on the Hill refrain from letting them idle during the cold weather—or, for that matter, at any time? The intent of the motion, as it was put forward in the other place, was to set an example. If we, as parliamentarians, are aware of the extent of this problem on the larger scale, then we have an opportunity to set an example here and to use such prohibition as a launching pad for an educational program on the dangers of exhaust fumes and why motor vehicles should, if at all possible, not be allowed to idle—because I understand that the problems are even more serious when a car is idling than when it is running and being used.

Of course, it does leave the question in the minds of many people as to how it is possible to have people who are required to sit in their cars in the cold weather do so without the provision of additional heat provided by running the motor and the heater. The answer is that it is possible to obtain or buy heating fans that run on the batteries, and can be used in circumstances that justify the use of a heating apparatus while the driver must stay in the vehicle.

Honourable senators, those are the bare facts, as I understand them, that can be cited in support of this motion. I therefore ask that we support this motion which is in line with that moved in the other place.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, if this practice is bad on the Hill, then it must be bad elsewhere. I cannot see why the honourable senator should single out vehicles parked on Parliament Hill. If it is bad for the environment, then it is bad everywhere. Does the honourable senator not think that we should urge legislation or regulation, and perhaps the senator could explain how much it would cost to have that additional equipment to heat the vehicles during the winter when, perhaps, a chauffeur is waiting for someone.

Senator Frith: On the first question, perhaps the honourable senator did not hear what I said. I pointed out that the intent of the motion recognizes a much larger problem than that on the Hill. The purpose of the motion is really to increase public awareness of the problem, and to set an example on the Hill and perhaps elsewhere. I would accept an amendment prohibiting that use on a larger scale, so far as that larger scale is within our jurisdiction.

On the question of the cost of the equipment to heat the vehicle without burning gasoline, I will have to get that information. I do not have it.

Senator Flynn: Does the honourable senator feel that there should be a regulation to prevent that from happening on the Hill?

Senator Frith: As I have mentioned, the intention is to use this as a start—first, to give an example; and, second, to launch an educational program. It seems to me that we would then be in a position to pass legislation or to make regulations.

Senator Flynn: Why cannot we have this matter referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration? It sounds to me to be a very pious hope. You are probably asking what they had in mind in the other place. They passed it there because they did not want to have a debate. They cannot afford to have a debate to look into this matter in depth. Therefore, the idea does not appeal to me to follow blindly what was said in the other place. I think we should give the matter serious consideration, rather than expressing a pious hope and saying, "We are doing it because they have done it." Perhaps the sponsor of the motion should consider referring the matter to the Internal Economy Committee to determine whether it is worth adopting regulations for the Hill.

● (1440)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree with what Senator Flynn has said on all scores. First, we should not pass the motion simply because the Commons has passed it. Second, I am sure that it received less attention in the other place than we would like to give it here. Therefore, I think the idea of having a committee look at the matter is a very good one. Perhaps it could be referred to the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee. If someone adjourns the debate—perhaps, Senator Flynn—it would give honourable senators who wish to an opportunity to speak to it. Then, we should look very seriously at the suggestion of referring it to committee.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, may I ask Senator Frith a question?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Marshall: Was there ever a proposal before the Internal Economy Committee that plug-ins be provided for parking spaces outside the Senate?

Senator Frith: Yes, honourable senators, there was. It was included in the estimates for 1986-87. The matter was studied by the Internal Economy Committee, but the committee has not included in its report on the estimates an amount for plug-ins, at least, at the Victoria Building. I think the estimated cost for the plug-ins was approximately $60,000 and some honourable senators thought that it was a bit extravagant.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Before the debate is adjourned, perhaps the sponsor of the motion can tell us whether it includes RCMP cars. Usually they have a number of cars with their motors running sitting at various points on the Hill.

Senator Frith: In the debate in the other place, the RCMP patrol cars were specifically mentioned. I assume that they are included. The motion includes ministers' cars and others that are commonly found with their motors idling during the cold weather.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Senate met at 4.30 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to the reason why we have been called together for the second time today, I have an apology to make. I am sorry to say that I did not properly consult with my friend, the Leader of the Opposition, when dealing with the matter of this second sitting of the Senate. It appears to be a discourtesy to him; it appears to be a discourtesy to the Liberal Party. It is not, however, a discourtesy which I offered willingly. Nevertheless, to the extent that it may appear that I was discourteous, I hope that he will accept my sincere regrets at the inconvenience caused him by my failure to talk to him as I should have. I ask Liberal senators, who, naturally, are a little concerned and upset about the matter as well, to accept my explanation and apology for an oversight for which there is no good excuse. I simply hope that this expression of my shortcoming will be adequate in dealing with the matter.

The reason we are back is to deal with the resolution to confer honorary Canadian citizenship on Mr. Raoul Wallenberg. On a previous occasion we were asked to give unanimous consent to deal with this matter, and that was refused. The senator who was involved in that has been notified that we are meeting again to discuss the matter and, I believe, he will not be present, so that objection will not be repeated.

The reason it is considered expeditious to deal with it now is that other people outside Parliament have made arrangements to observe this occasion this evening. Therefore, if we were not to concur with the motion of the House of Commons those observations and celebrations, if they may be expressed in those terms, would not be able to take place. Therefore, I am seeking the unanimous consent of my colleagues in the chamber to allow us to deal with the matter now and to have the two senators who intend to move and second the motion do so and, let us hope, concur in the resolution that is before us. I appreciate the courtesy of honourable senators for coming back, and I hope that I have unanimous consent to make this move. I say again to the Leader of the Opposition that I am at fault and I am sorry. I hope that I never have to do it again.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us that Senator Macquarrie has, in fact, been informed of the holding of this sitting and what the government side proposes to do?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I personally spoke to Senator Macquarrie and explained to him the dilemma in which I found myself and solicited his advice as to whether he would be present or not. He said that under the circumstances he thought he would not be present. He is fully aware of the events.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, since Senator Macquarrie is not here and since he was the senator who raised the objection, I think that Senator Macquarrie should be here to withdraw that objection with unanimous consent, because without unanimous consent he could not withdraw it even if he wanted to, according to our rules. I think we should ask Senator Macquarrie to come in and withdraw his objection so that we can give unanimous consent to that withdrawal and then proceed from there.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid that that does not seem to be a practical proposal at the moment because I am not sure where Senator Macquarrie is, and I do not think I would like to ask him to do that. As this is a separate session and we are proceeding with the order paper in the usual way, we can deal with this matter now if we have unanimous consent of those who are here on this occasion.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, if Senator Macquarrie has been so informed, as the government leader says he has, and if he chooses not to come into the chamber, then I believe that it really would not serve the purpose of this chamber to ask him to come in and withdraw his objection. I think that what he is doing is being done constructively, and, therefore, I would certainly support the motion.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has told us that the reason we have been summoned for an extraordinary sitting is because there are outside observances to be held which we must accommodate. I have no knowledge of what these are, and when the question came up none of my colleagues had any knowledge of what these observances are. Therefore, I would like to know, and I think it is fair to ask, what these celebrations are which we are asked to accommodate, where they are being held and who is participating in them.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Are the doors open or are we still talking behind closed doors?

The Hon. the Speaker: Let the doors be open.

Senator Roblin: I noticed that the doors were closed during the interchange here and I want to tell the Senate that I have no objection to my remarks in extenso being in Hansard because having made my apology I am quite satisfied that it should be a public one.

The point raised by my honourable friend is quite reasonable and I wish I could satisfy him on it, but the fact is that the information given to me is rather sketchy, and I am afraid that I do not have the information that he would like to have.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, somebody must have made the decision to summon us, and I am asking why. It may not be the Leader of the Government who can provide that information. I have not examined the rules but I understand that public interest must be involved in order to bring about a special recall of the Senate after it has adjourned. I am really eager to know what matter of public interest has intervened to put aside the adjournment which we took a very short time ago and what matter of public interest brings us back. If the Leader of the Government says that he has sketchy information, then I will not prolong the matter except to put my views on the record, because we are all eager on this side of the house to extend the honour now which we were prepared to extend earlier in the day. We are prepared to do that, but there still remain questions that will have to be addressed by this honourable chamber.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate my honourable friend's co-operative attitude and I am sorry that I do not have anything further to add at the present time.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, since this is a new sitting before we get to the Orders of the Day where this item would be listed, am I correct that we have to go through the regular order of business and Question Period again?

Senator Roblin: The first item on the Orders of the Day is that dealing with the Wallenberg resolution. When that is disposed of, the Senate can decide what it wants to do next. I would propose that we adjourn after we deal with the Wallenberg resolution.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if this is another distinct sitting, then I think we have to go through the order of business as outlined under rule 19, unless we have unanimous consent not to do so.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we could move that Orders of the Day stand until the next sitting of the Senate, thereby proceeding to Motions, at which time we could deal with this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to proceed to Motions?

Senator Frith: Rule 19 says:

At each daily sitting of the Senate, the Speaker shall call for, in the following order:

(a) Presentation of petitions;—

and so on. It seems to me that it would be more in order for Senator Doody to ask that, notwithstanding rule 19, we proceed to Orders of the Day.

Senator Doody: That seems perfectly in order, Your Honour. I suggest that we stand the Order of Business, beginning with Presentation of Petitions and including all of the items preceding Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 5:

Consideration of the following Message from the House of Commons:

Monday, December 9, 1985

RESOLVED,—That:

Whereas during World War II millions of Jews were exterminated in death camps at the hands of the Nazis in then occupied Europe;

And whereas hundreds of thousands of Hungarian Jews were facing extermination in 1944 through deportation to Germany under the orders of Adolf Eichmann;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg as Secretary of the Swedish Legation went to Hungary in the summer of 1944;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg, with extraordinary courage and with total disregard for the constant danger to himself, saved the lives of almost one hundred thousand innocent Jewish men, women and children, a considerable number of whom now live in Canada;

And whereas the Soviet Union, in violation of Raoul Wallenberg's Swedish diplomatic immunity and of international law, seized him on January 17, 1945, with no explanation ever given for his detention and subsequent imprisonment;

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg has been a prisoner in the Soviet Union since 1945;

And whereas reports from former prisoners in the Soviet Union, as recently as January, 1981, suggest that Raoul Wallenberg is still alive and remains a prisoner;

And whereas history has revealed that heroic acts of salvation were tragically rare during the massacre of millions of innocent human beings during World War II;

And whereas the significance of this symbol of humanity's concern for its fellows has been reduced by the wall of silence that surrounds the fate of Raoul Wallenberg;

Now therefore the House of Commons resolve that the said Raoul Wallenberg is hereby declared to be an honorary citizen of Canada;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House in the said Resolution by filling in the blank with the words, "Senate and the".—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marsden:

That the Senate do agree with the House of Commons in the said Resolution by filling in the blank space left therein with the words "Senate and the"; and,

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Honourable senators, I did not think that I would have the opportunity to speak to this matter today. I am indeed pleased and proud to move this motion, which has been indicated by others to be precedent setting in that never before in the history of our country has an honorary citizenship been granted. That has been done twice in the United States. In 1981, Mr. Raoul Wallenberg was made an honorary citizen of that country. Twenty-odd years prior to that, another great war hero, Sir Winston Churchill, was also made an honorary citizen of the United States. If this motion is passed, Raoul Wallenberg will be the first honorary citizen of our country.

In reading several works about Raoul Wallenberg in preparation for today, I was struck by two matters that had never fully come to my attention before. I think we have all heard the story of Wallenberg. Many have seen the television dramatization and have read newspaper accounts, magazine articles and so on. But having read an entire biography of the man, I realized more vividly these two facts. First, all of the heroic and unbelievable deeds of this young man in his early thirties took place within a six-month time period. I frankly confess that, in my own mind, I had pictured a much longer period of time—more like the duration of the war. Second, none of these events took place until well into 1944, when the war in Hungary was nearly over. In fact, the last very heroic deed of Mr. Wallenberg was in the early days of January, 1945, when the Red Army artillery was bombarding Budapest, where all of this happened. I suppose that I had assumed that these events took place much earlier, at the height of the war.

Wallenberg performed many acts of heroism in terms of saving five lives, ten lives and fifty lives at a time. However, one single act, the one in which he saved the most lives, occurred when there were some 80,000 to 100,000 Jews in a ghetto in Budapest. By this time, Mr. Eichmann had already left seeking safer ground, but there remained in that city a Nazi High Command as well as the Arrow Cross, their friends and collaborators. The decision was made to machine gun the entire ghetto. Wallenberg went in and convinced the Nazi High Command and the Arrow Cross to call off the machine gunning of all of those people—mainly women, children and elderly—in the ghetto, and this after the machine guns were put in place. One of Wallenberg's most convincing arguments was that he would be able to transmit to the outside world the names of those people who made the decision. At that time, there was already talk of a war crimes tribunal, and he threatened that those people responsible would be dealt with. That was the argument that stopped them.

Everyone knows by now that Raoul Wallenberg came from a privileged class and that he came from the comfort of neutral Sweden. I am sure that all honourable senators are aware that he was a young man at the time of these events. In fact, he was only 31 years of age when he arrived in Hungary in June or July of 1944. He was not a diplomat, as he is so often described. He was given that status so that he could, by whatever means possible—stunts, tricks, pressure, false passports—save as many lives as possible.

I should mention to honourable senators that it was not just Jews that he helped. Per Anger, the former Swedish Ambassador to Canada who served here until about 1980, wrote a book about Wallenberg. He had worked with Raoul Wallenberg in Budapest and often described that in Wallenberg's waiting room there were Social Democrats, people with trade union leanings, priests and nuns—all of the prime targets of that era. As I have said, it is sometimes difficult to understand how this wealthy and well educated young man, living in the comfort of Sweden, came to be involved in this way. As so many biographers have said, he did not have to go. I think it was his step-sister who said of him that Raoul Wallenberg was not going to be a spectator in life. He proved that one man can make a difference—and indeed he did to over 100,000 Hungarian citizens. There are many living examples in our country today—decent contributing members of the Canadian community—who are here thanks to the courage of Raoul Wallenberg. One reads the magazine articles listing name after name. Honourable senators, this is not mythology; these are real live people who stepped forward and said they were next in line, and if it had not been for this handsome Swedish man stepping up with these pieces of paper—God only knows what they were—they, too, would have gone.

Honourable senators, many men and, perhaps more importantly, many governments sat on their hands while trucks and cattle cars devoured whole towns and villages in that part of Europe. More humane immigration policies in many western countries and a little relaxation of the regulations could have saved the lives of, I guess, millions. I do not think the events of that time constitute a very proud chapter in our history.

I was most impressed with the biography written by Kati Marton, herself a child of Budapest survivors, and the wife of Peter Jennings, the now American television journalist and formerly a distinguished Canadian television journalist, when she said:

He proved that if the givers of life showed as much enthusiasm for their job as the merchants of death, humanity had an even chance.

The Raoul Wallenberg story is one that one rarely reads about except in fiction. As I have said, witness after witness, those who were saved and those who were his colleagues, all described an incredible story of courage, persistence and unselfishness in the face of an army of thugs and murderers.

Some two or three weeks ago, Senator Olson introduced a motion dealing with the tragic death of a Canadian mother and her child in Malta. It was during that discussion in this chamber that Senator Frith said that, regrettably, too often we dignify these bandits with romantic descriptions such as "terrorists, Red Army Brigades, Black September" or a wide range of such titles, when they are nothing more than criminals of the lowest order who prey on innocent men, women, children and the elderly. We ought to refer to them as "thugs."

Acting at the behest of government authorities, these thugs and murderers carried on assembly-line slaughter of the innocent in unbelievable proportions. It is amazing that, with the artillery guns of the Red Army pounding in their ears, these thugs continued their program of mass murder. The master thug in Hungary at that time, Carl Adolf Eichmann, in the full knowledge that the war was all but over, never let up on his program. In fact, as is often documented, he sought to improve the efficiency of his operation.

Raoul Wallenberg's good fortune ran out after he had witnessed the defeat of the Nazis. Following the destruction of one form of autocratic and inhuman government, he foolishly sought out the Soviets. It is incredible that he should do so, but the fact remains that he sought them out. Perhaps, honourable senators, if this matter were not so serious, we would say that he went from the frying pan into the fire.

The remainder of this story is sad history. Raoul Wallenberg was seen in Soviet prisons by many people. But the Soviet government first denied the existence of Raoul Wallenberg and then produced some feeble story of a heart attack suffered many years before. It certainly leaves one wondering. There have been confusing stories coming out of the Soviet Union, stories which leave people asking: Why? Indeed, why? Can there ever be a rationale when one considers the actions of people of that kind? The actions of the Nazis in the 1930s and 1940s, and of the kind of people who took and imprisoned Raoul Wallenberg and kept him there throughout the 1950s, 1960s, 1970s and into the 1980s, are beyond the understanding of reasonable and caring people.

Honourable senators, I am sure you all agree that today, December 10, recognized by free people throughout the world as International Human Rights Day, is an appropriate day for us to join with the House of Commons in adopting this motion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it is an honour to second the motion from this side of the chamber. I should like to congratulate Senator Nurgitz who has put so clearly, concisely and firmly the reasons why Raoul Wallenberg has been honoured all over the world, and why we should join in honouring him as we propose to do here this afternoon.

I am glad that we have returned in order to address this resolution on International Human Rights Day. My only regret stems from the circumstances that led to this extraordinary sitting, and is heightened by the fact that earlier this afternoon we had as a visitor in our gallery His Excellency Ola Ullsten, the ambassador from Sweden to our country.

For the majority of Canadians alive today and for some of us in this chamber, the Second World War and the tragic events in which Raoul Wallenberg played a role are not within memory, but they form a significant part of our history. Today we live in a world of terrorism where the vicious acts of violence perpetrated during the Second World War, and to prevent which Raoul Wallenberg intervened, are today carried out on civilian aircraft, ships and in otherwise peaceful settings all over the globe.

The model of Raoul Wallenberg is crucial because he reminds us of the best words and deeds of which we are capable as independent human beings in our actions towards one another. In one of the accounts of Raoul Wallenberg's activities, the authors say:

In carrying out his rescue operation, Wallenberg cared little for his own safety . . . He stood on top of a deportation train handing out Swedish papers to all the hands that could reach them, then insisted that the people holding them be allowed off the train. With his own hands, he pulled people out of death marches to the Austrian border or brought them bread, soup and medical supplies in the middle of the night when he had no more passports to give out.

Raoul Wallenberg is a contemporary model for Canadians, young and old. He is more than a brave man, although he is that; he is a person who acted on principles and beliefs directly and through all means available to him. He made the persecuted believe that they could save themselves and help themselves, and he gave everything he could to support them in doing so.

Human rights is not a matter only for the law and the courts, nor is it only for charitable giving or for speeches and goodwill; it can be a matter for direct action and personal involvement.

Canada has many brave and committed people. Canadians have shown during years of war and during years of peace that we are committed to the furtherance of human rights and to acting directly to help those who are victims of repression, war, famine and sickness.

In welcoming this motion, we honour both the courage and actions of Raoul Wallenberg and, at the same time, we honour the many brave Canadian men and women who shared his cause and the horror of those days 40 years ago.

In welcoming Raoul Wallenberg as a citizen of our country, we provide a living model of what it means to care about the human rights of all people. He is an inspiration to young Canadians and a symbol to older Canadians.

By making Raoul Wallenberg an honorary citizen of Canada on International Human Rights Day this year, we signify our intention to follow his model in the world in which we must live.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I suspect my colleague may move the adjournment if it meets with the approval of the Senate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order before the adjournment motion. I would have done so earlier had it not been for our desire on this side of the house to proceed with the motion which we have now unanimously adopted and which we were prepared to proceed with when we met at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

I would remind honourable senators that we did deal with this motion, which has now been passed, as the first item of our business this afternoon. Because Senator Macquarrie, for reasons we respect, wanted to have further time to study the motion, as is his right—a right confirmed in the rules—we did not proceed with the motion, but we adjourned about one hour later. We were called back to the Senate approximately one hour and 15 minutes after that.

Earlier I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he could explain the circumstances which brought about this emergency sitting of the Senate, which it is. He told us that he understood this sitting was necessary because of observances to be held outside the house. He added, and I hope that I repeat his words correctly, that he had but sketchy information.

I must say that it is not a normal thing to happen. I have been in and around Parliament for 30 years. The Speaker of the House of Commons has summoned Parliament back only when there was a clear issue of public interest, whether it be a work stoppage or the necessity of dealing with a matter of national security. It is not just a procedural matter. It is somewhat ironic that in moving in emergency sitting to celebrate the International Day of Human Rights we have removed a right from our colleague, Senator Macquarrie, who is entitled under our rules to have the right to postpone this debate until tomorrow. By the calling of an emergency sitting, that right has been removed from him.

I must say that I am quite alarmed at this development, and I would like an explanation. I am not alarmed that we have made a unanimous and deserved gesture to the person who has been so eloquently spoken about by our two colleagues, but that somehow we have found it necessary to resort to an extraordinary procedural device. We have received no explanation. I have not, and no one on this side of the house has received any explanation.

May I read our rule 14A. It is entitled "Emergency sittings", and says:

(1) If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

There may be other rules that cover the situation, but this is the only rule that I know of, and it is in the rule book. It permits the Speaker, if he is satisfied that the public interest requires that a meeting of the Senate should be held, to notify us in the way described.

I will not make a point of the notification, but I believe it is absolutely essential that this does not become a trivial device in the future. We should be told what happened, what information was received between 3 p.m. and 4 p.m. that brought about an emergency sitting of the Senate. We were here until approximately 3 p.m. We had been here for some considerable time following Senator Macquarrie's unwillingness to give unanimous consent. However, we adjourned, and about an hour later we were informed that an emergency sitting would be held.

I think we must know what the circumstances were. I am not going to press the matter further today, but I assure honourable senators that unless an explanation is offered, it will be pressed very hard, because I believe that we have willingly conferred today a right of honorary citizenship, but, at the same time, by this extraordinary sitting, ironically we have removed a right from one of our colleagues.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government replies, he may find at least a partial solution to the point of order raised by the Leader of the Opposition if the Senate could agree that the action taken today shall not be regarded as a precedent for any future occasion. If that can be agreed upon, it would help me quite a bit. I did not want to raise a question about it at the time because obviously, since unanimous consent was required, it appeared that it was there for the very worthy purpose for which it was used today. It is disturbing to me that it can be used as a means of circumventing a right that everyone agrees every individual senator has, namely, that the rules shall be followed unless there is unanimous consent. Therefore, if we can agree that this will not be a precedent, I would feel a good deal more comfortable regarding the situation.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, let me remind honourable senators that rule 14A has been used often in this house. It used to be the custom of this house to adjourn for longer periods than we do now. The Speaker would then retain the right to call the house back into session under rule 14A, and senators received a telegram saying "Under the emergency rights granted to me by section 14A of the Rules of the Senate, I call the Senate back into session on such and such a day at such and such a time." We are not creating a precedent here at all. It was used many times. Honourable senators can look back into the record and see that that is so.

The Leader of the Opposition raises the point that we have removed a right from Senator Macquarrie. That is hardly so. Senator Macquarrie has the right not to grant unanimous consent. He did that. The emergency sitting was called, as is the right of the Speaker to do so. It is in the public interest.

Senator Macquarrie could have appeared again and refused to give his unanimous consent, and the motion would not have gone forward. The fact of the matter is that the Leader of the Government has indicated that he informed Senator Macquarrie that the sitting was taking place, and the senator decided not to attend. So I hardly see how we have removed a right, because he could have come down and refused to give his consent once again.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, for the record, it seems to me that that is not so. There are two particulars in which this is not a precedent. First, there was no notice sent out, and in all previous cases emphasized by Senator Everett there have been. I can remember being called back by telegram, as the honourable senator said, but the notice was sent out. I do not know of any occasion when the particular procedure employed today has been used. So it is unprecedented in that sense.

Also, the right was removed, as the Leader of the Opposition has said, because had Senator Macquarrie come here, he could not have refused unanimous consent. This is a new sitting and unanimous consent was not necessary. Therefore I believe it is worthwhile underlining the fact that I do not believe that anyone supports this as a device to circumvent the withholding of consent. All we want to do is to underline the fact that this is unusual, because we could say, "All right, you are not going to give unanimous consent, so we will adjourn and we will come back in ten minutes. That will be the next sitting, and we will get the Speaker to say that it is an urgent matter of public importance," and thereby we will have got rid of the whole right to withhold unanimous consent. Senator Macquarrie could have come here and said, "I do not consent," to which anyone could have said, "Thank you, Senator Macquarrie, but this is a new sitting. There was notice given that this matter would come up at the next sitting, and this is the next sitting."

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, Senator Frith does not appear to have read rule 45, which says:

(1) One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

(a) to suspend any rule or any part thereof;

So it is not the next sitting.

● (1500)

Senator Frith: That is correct. However, in this case, when unanimous consent was not given, Senator Nurgitz moved that it be put over to the next sitting of the Senate and we agreed.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might have a minute or two to speak on behalf of those senators who are absent. I understand that this being a distinct sitting, the names of those present are being recorded, and those absent will be noted as being absent because they will not be on the list. I know of some colleagues who, on the presumption that this house would not sit again today, have gone on to meet other commitments and to deal with other business. I am sure that these senators would have deemed it their duty to be present here if they had been properly notified.

I can name one or two such senators who would have considered it their duty to be here for this auspicious occasion. However, because of the circumstances, they have been deprived of not only the privilege of speaking to the motion but the privilege of doing their duty, simply because they could not be reached.

I feel that the interests of those senators must be protected and I hope that in no way, shape or form would one be led to think that when we adjourn today this whole matter will be laid to rest. I rise on behalf of the absent senators to say that if they raise the matter tomorrow or at another time they ought to be heard and that debate must take place on the question. In that way their rights will be fully preserved.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the basic question which I have put before you is: What were the circumstances which demanded an emergency sitting? I have not received an explanation. As I said, I shall not press the matter today, but let me serve notice that there had better be an explanation or we will have a procedural debate every single day in the Senate until we get an explanation, whether it be a bogus one or not. We were called here for an emergency sitting. An emergency sitting must be in the public interest. We have been greeted with silence rather than an explanation. It is extraordinary. What has happened to our procedure that we cannot find out why we were called back for an emergency sitting? I am not going to debate now some of the points I raised earlier, but that is essentially the point. I have raised it as a point of order. We have received no communication from the Speaker, under whose authority, presumably, we are here under rule 14A. I would hope that he would provide us with an explanation of the circumstances which permitted him to call an emergency sitting of the Senate in the public interest.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I rise to support the position taken by the honourable Senator MacEachen. As most honourable senators who have been here for any length of time know, I have often cautioned the Senate and a number of its committees on establishing precedents that would later be regretted. The precedent established here is that the one purpose of this special sitting has been to overcome the refusal of one of the members of this body to give unanimous consent to the passing of a motion. There is no other purpose for this sitting at this point in time. That is a very serious precedent for us to have on our records and, possibly, to be referred to at a later time. Senator Olson has made a useful suggestion with which we should concur. It should become a matter of the record of this sitting of the Senate that we have formally stated that this exercise is not a precedent to be referred to in future. If it were to be considered a precedent or to remain as it now stands, it could become a device to get around the rules of the Senate and, as Senator MacEachen has very properly said, to permit the Senate to take away the right of a senator who refuses unanimous consent. I do not suggest that it will happen, but I can foresee a circumstance in which it could happen.

Once a precedent is established, the capability of its being used is always there. I think we must obviate that formally today, if necessary by a motion, but at least by unanimous agreement of the Senate that today's action is not to be considered as a precedent. I cannot accept the proposition put forward by Senator Everett that this notice is on all fours with the type of notice that we receive, and he referred to the period when our late and respected colleague, Senator John Connolly, was the Leader of the Government in the Senate. What has happened today does not correspond with what happened on those occasions. On those occasions the Speaker was satisfied that public business was to be conducted. Therefore, the public interest was served and the Speaker, very properly, relied on the advice that he had received and sent out notices. Today it appears to have been determined that there has been nothing said to support the argument that it is a matter of public interest. At least, we have heard nothing. Therefore, it is not on all fours with the precedent Senator Everett cited. Furthermore, when we came back on the occasions cited by Senator Everett, the Senate was immediately advised by the Leader of the Government of the business to be conducted and why it was necessary to call the Senate back in advance of the day the Senate was scheduled to resume.

I would make two suggestions. The first one follows upon what Senator Olson has suggested, that the Senate formally put on record today that this occurrence will not be considered a precedent to be resorted to at a later time in similar fashion. Second, since the hour is not that late, I suggest that before we leave this chamber today, we take a short recess to permit the Leader of the Government to inquire of those people who have urged upon him this emergency sitting, the specific answers and the reasons behind them to the questions put by the Leader of the Opposition. Surely, a ten-minute recess would provide to the Leader of the Government sufficient time—

Senator Lefebvre: They are all at the reception.

Senator McElman: —to inquire of those people who advised him, return to the Senate and apprise the Senate, as it has every right to expect, as to the reasons for the emergency debate and for the celebration, so that honourable senators who so wish may become part of those celebrations.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not know whether I will be the last senator to speak on the points of order raised, but I hope that I am.

I have listened with great attention to the points that have been raised and will try to give as much satisfaction as I can, because I think a number of them are well taken and are worthy of consideration.

I should like to deal first with the question of precedent and to say that, while it is true, as Senator Everett has said, that the Senate has been recalled by the Speaker on previous occasions, I must admit that I do not know of any situation that is absolutely the same as the one we faced today in that honourable senators were recalled by telephone, whereas in the past it has been by mail or telegram. While some honourable senators may say that that is the modern system of communication, it does leave the question open. I certainly hope that this will not be regarded as a precedent, no matter how one regards it in terms of what has been done in the past. I certainly do not recognize it as a precedent myself. It is an unusual situation and I hope we do not have to have recourse to this procedure again. I certainly would not try to justify any action in the future on the basis that this was a precedent. I should like to make that clear.

I am concerned about the suggestion that a senator has been deprived of his rights by what we have done this afternoon. I take the view—and I might well be wrong—that in spite of the fact that it is a separate sitting it could be argued that it requires unanimous consent for us to be here at all. So, if the senator concerned had been here he could have exercised his right. He may feel that his rights were prejudiced by what we have done—maybe that is the case. I am not trying to put too fine a gloss on it, but my position is that I hope his rights have not been abridged in any positive way. It certainly is not my intent that that should be so. As I have had some conversations with the gentleman, I can say that he is aware of what is transpiring, and if he is not here, that is his decision. I admit it would be difficult if he were here, but let's be frank about that, he is not.

The other point that needs to be commented on, I think, is the question of the rationale for the meeting. I quite appreciate the view of the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I have listened carefully to what he has said. I cannot do it today, I am afraid, but I will do my best to give him a statement tomorrow that I hope will give him all of the information that I can provide on the matter. I hope he will regard that as being satisfactory.

Those are the thoughts that have occurred to me as I listened to the debate this afternoon. I hope that the Senate will think that this is a reasonable approach to a difficult question.

I would not like to sit down without saying, once again, that I thank honourable senators for their co-operation, because the points that have been raised are legitimate ones. The Senate did co-operate in this matter, and the Leader of the Opposition led the co-operation. He did not press me on matters when he could have done so, and I appreciate that co-operation and want to say that I thank all concerned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1985-86

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-89, for granting to her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Tuesday next, December 17, 1985.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

RAOUL WALLENBERG—RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—POINT OF ORDER AND QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a point of order relating to the extraordinary events which occurred in this chamber yesterday when the Senate was summoned for an emergency sitting within an hour and a half after the Senate had adjourned in the normal way. The Leader of the Government in the Senate told us that because of celebrations which were to take place outside of the chamber, it was necessary to resort to the extraordinary measure of convening an emergency sitting of the Senate. The Honourable Leader of the Government could not provide any additional information with respect to what these celebrations or observances were, and admitted that his information was sketchy and that he would attempt to provide this information today.

We regard the events of yesterday as extremely serious. We hope to get to the bottom of the consultations that resulted in an emergency sitting of the Senate. Those reasons have not yet been disclosed to honourable senators.

I raise the matter at this time and advise the Leader of the Government in the Senate that we will be interested in knowing whether it was on the advice of himself, the Prime Minister or any member of the government that the Speaker invoked the rule which permits an emergency sitting of the Senate when the public interest is at stake.

I am initiating the point of order. My colleagues will want to pursue it, but I think we ought to give the Leader of the Government in the Senate an opportunity to see whether he can comply with his undertaking of yesterday to attempt to provide us with information.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will give the Senate as complete an account of the events that led up to the situation we were faced with yesterday as I can. I have to agree that that was unusual for the Senate. I hope that my explanation will be sufficiently satisfactory that honourable senators will see that I acted at that time within the bounds of the information available to me in a responsible way with respect to the traditions and privileges of this body, and with respect to the public interest, which is, of course, the reason that the second sitting was convoked yesterday.

I will start by saying that December 10, which was yesterday, and was the date on which we requested the Senate to complete the transaction under review, is the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights made by the United Nations in 1948. A short time before this anniversary came around two members of the House of Commons decided that it would be advisable and appropriate for that place to mark the anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights in a constructive way. Consequently, two private members' bills were introduced in the House of Commons, one by Mr. Guy Ricard and the other by the Reverend Roland de Corneille with respect to Raoul Wallenberg and the conferring of honorary Canadian citizenship.

I am told that when these two bills were considered in the House of Commons, it was thought that it would be more to the point if instead of proceeding by way of private bill, which may or may not get anywhere in the legislative process, these two private bills should be dropped and a private members' resolution should be prepared dealing with the substance of honorary Canadian citizenship for Raoul Wallenberg, that it should be a private members' resolution and that it should be sponsored by representatives of the three parties in the other place. That was done. Mr. de Corneille, Mr. Ricard and Mr. Deans from the NDP are the names associated with the introduction of this resolution in the other place. It was designed to be related to the United Nations Day of December 10.

Unfortunately for me, at any rate, I was not a party to these deliberations in the other place and when the resolution came to my notice it was as a private members' resolution. In reading it through I did not note any connection between the resolution, as set out, and December 10, which was the day on which it was proposed to link the resolution.

When it came to the Senate I did not automatically conclude that there might be a difficulty with the matter if it was postponed to another day. It was a private members' resolution and the reference to the December 10 aspect of it was not, as I recall, recorded in the resolution. Therefore, I saw no good reason to attempt to persuade my colleague behind me to allow us to proceed with it at that time. That was obvious because I sat in my place when the objection was raised and I said nothing about it. Anyone would be entitled to assume that I felt that there was not that urgency which would require that it be dealt with now.

I frankly tell the chamber that that was the situation in which I found myself at that time. I had no idea that the postponement of the resolution would raise problems.

When the deed was done and we decided to postpone the discussion for another occasion, I found out that there were, indeed, problems because I had a telephone call from the Leader of the Government in the other place. He told me that he had been bombarded by complaints from members on both sides of the house about the delay and suggested to me that there were important considerations not only of a private nature but also of a public nature which would indicate that we should do anything we could to resurrect the issue and have it dealt with on December 10.

Why December 10? Surely that must be the question which honourable senators would like some satisfaction on. Why did I not know enough about these things when I came to the house to ask for unanimous consent to provide a full explanation at that moment, which I am attempting to do now?

It is probably not satisfactory for honourable senators to know that, in the press of the business, it was decided to contact senators before they had departed. We were thinking originally of calling the Senate at 8 o'clock, but there was a question raised as to everyone's whereabouts at that time. We knew, thank goodness, that the Liberal Party has a caucus on Tuesday afternoon, so, in a sense, we had a tab on a good number of senators. It was decided to move fast.

In my conversations with the Leader of the House in the other place, I asked him for some information that I could give this chamber as to why the request was made of me. He mentioned the outside observances, which I will come to in a moment, and he also hinted that there was another matter of public importance which had arisen only on the occasion of the postponement. When the officials in the other place and the officials of the government thought, perhaps unwisely, that it would be dealt with on December 10, that was that. But when they found out that was not to be the case, that it was to be dealt with at a later date, they discovered the possibility that the nature of the resolution, if unrelated to December 10, the International Day of Human Rights, might raise complications which would not occur to the ordinary observer but certainly seemed to occur to some people in the Department of External Affairs.

The trouble was that, in my conversations with the leader in the other place, he, too, was acting on information which, not to put it too bluntly, was not complete and could not be furnished in time. It was a complicated matter for me to be advised in order to inform the chamber.

It was the necessity, particularly on this issue of public concern, for the resolution to be developed in a form that could be presented to a parliamentary body which caused me to ask the indulgence of the house—which I gratefully acknowledge—to allow me to proceed without the explanation which, quite frankly, it is fully entitled to have.

What is the problem? The problem has to do with the nature of the resolution and its relationship to the diplomatic processes in the world and, particularly as they relate to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It is a private resolution, and linking it with the International Declaration of Human Rights was thought to be a perfectly legitimate exercise of the Parliament of Canada, particularly as private members in both chambers were supporting it. It is not a government initiative. If it were done in any other way, it might be considered as a bilateral declaration or a governmental attack, if you like to put it in those terms, in respect to our relations with the Soviet Union. Linking a private member's bill to the Declaration of Human Rights of the United Nations on December 10—on that day precisely—was thought to be the best way of conveying the message without conveying what might be considered, in diplomatic terms, an insulting démarche. I do not know whether I am going too far in using that expression, but that is the kind of dilemma in which the government found itself. Here it had a private members' resolution for which it was not responsible; here it had the link which was not explicit on the first go-round with the Declaration on Human Rights of the United Nations on December 10, and which, if handled carelessly, might have complications or consequences which, perhaps, would not be desirable.

Therefore, in the interests of protecting the national interest against a problem of that kind, the very strong feeling was that the deed should be done as a private members' resolution on the day connected with the anniversary of the United Nations declaration and tied in with the respected name of Raoul Wallenberg who is the reason for the resolution in the first place. That was felt to be the most appropriate way of conveying our sense of repugnance at the activities in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in violation of human rights.

Honourable senators, I am not a diplomat and I really cannot give the Senate an informed opinion as to whether the diplomatic reasons are quite as compelling as they have been presented to me, but I would accept them as such. I realize that it is a subject for debate, but that is the general gist of our problem. That is why it happened in the way it did. That is why I felt reluctant yesterday afternoon to try to give further information, because, the first thing I knew, if I did not have the brief before me for study, I might make the matter worse by failing to explain exactly what was going on. So that was the first question that became an issue of public concern; namely, that the resolution should be handled in such a way as to be prudent in dealing with our relations with a foreign state.

The second one had to do with what I call observances. I have to tell my friends that I am aware of only one observance which comes under this heading, and that was a press conference that was to be attended by Mr. de Corneille of the other place and the Swedish ambassador to review the action of the two houses of Parliament in passing this resolution. In the event, when it became obvious that we were not going to give the resolution a quick passage, as had been expected, in this chamber, it turned out that this press conference did not take place. That is the observance that I had in mind when I spoke. I did not find that out until this morning, but that was to have been an event related to the passage of the resolution in the two houses.

Honourable senators, that completes what I have to say here. I say again that the initiative of this motion was a private one. It was not a government initiative. It was a resolution which was intended to be a gesture of humanitarian concern. Its history indicates that it was to be linked with the Human Rights Day. The passage on that day, December 10, afforded the most significant way in which we could express our view of the matter while limiting the susceptibility to any undue misconstruction of government attitudes in other places. The information that I gave the chamber was generally correct, but it was so general as to be of no use to anybody. That is why I am pleased to have this opportunity to explain myself in some more detail. While I could not be sufficiently precise yesterday to report to the Senate in a meaningful way, I have endeavoured now to give the whole story as far as it is known to me in connection with this matter so that there may be some justification for the proposal that I made the other day. I welcome, of course, any questions that might be raised about this statement. If I am able to answer, I will certainly do so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the explanation provided by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I must say that my concern has not been in any way abated. He himself must admit that his is a rather weak case which should never have caused him to seek an emergency sitting of the Senate by invoking an extraordinary measure such as we witnessed yesterday.

I take it from what he has said that the Speaker was advised by the government that the public interest would suffer, or that it would be endangered, if this second sitting did not take place. Before I go on to make a few other comments, I want to make it perfectly clear that we on this side of the house were prepared to pass the motion yesterday afternoon when it was first introduced. We exhibited that willingness by passing it immediately when it was introduced at the emergency sitting of the Senate. We gave consent that the necessary notice in the first distinct sitting be waived in order that that motion could come forward. So there was no difficulty on our side with the substance of the motion. The Leader of the Government has said that he had a call from the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons saying that he was bombarded with objections at the exercising of a right on the part of a senator in this chamber to delay these proceedings until today. Because he was bombarded with objections, the Leader of the Government swung into action and decided to have an emergency sitting of the Senate.

I do not put much stock in that. That argument falls to the ground. Then we are told that the only observance which the Leader of the Government had in mind, as he told us yesterday, is as follows:

The reason it is considered expeditious to deal with it now is that other people outside Parliament have made arrangements to observe this occasion this evening.

The only observance that has been mentioned by the Leader of the Government is a cancelled press conference.

Does that not trivialize this chamber, that we were called into an emergency sitting to accommodate a press conference which did not take place?

I must say that I am trying to deal, in my own mind, with the observation made by the Leader of the Government that this action was necessary so that we would not displease the Soviet Union; that we were called into an emergency sitting because of diplomatic considerations related to the possibility that our action, if not taken on the tenth anniversary of the Declaration of Human Rights, would displease the Soviet Union. Is that not what the Leader of the Government said?

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Olson: Yes, it was.

Senator MacEachen: That there were diplomatic implications related to the Soviet Union. I am putting it in plain, understandable language. If that is the reason, then I think the Leader of the Government should not have advanced it at all publicly. Does he think that passing this resolution yesterday rather than today would make any difference to the Soviet Union? The stricture against the Soviet Union in this resolution is as tough today as it was yesterday, and they will not say, "Well, because it was passed on a Tuesday, we will not take exception to it, whereas if it were passed on a Wednesday, we would take exception." Presumably what External Affairs had in mind, when it gave that advice to the government, were these phrases:

And whereas the Soviet Union, in violation of Raoul Wallenberg's Swedish diplomatic immunity and of international law, seized him on January 17, 1945, with no explanation ever given for his detention and subsequent imprisonment;

And the Leader of the Government apparently wants to lighten the view of the Canadian Parliament with respect to that action, because he wanted it done on Tuesday rather than on Wednesday. Then there are the following sentences:

And whereas Raoul Wallenberg has been a prisoner in the Soviet Union since 1945;

And whereas reports from former prisoners in the Soviet Union, as recently as January, 1981, suggest that Raoul Wallenberg is still alive and remains a prisoner;

Those are the references in the resolution with respect to the Soviet Union; and presumably, honourable senators, when we passed the resolution, we believed it was justified to make those comments, and we took responsibility for them as members of this chamber.

The substance of that declaration in support of Mr. Raoul Wallenberg has not changed because it was done on a Tuesday rather than on a Wednesday. Frankly, I think that is a spurious reason. If the reasoning came from the Department of External Affairs, then they ought to reconsider advising that the Parliament of Canada should not speak its mind on an important matter of this kind because of the possible diplomatic implications with respect to the Soviet Union. I think that the Leader of the Government has worsened the situation. He has made me somewhat embarrassed at the feeling that I was moved forward last night, as we all were, into the house, because the Leader of the Government in the House of Commons called the Leader of the Government in the Senate to advise him that there was a press conference, which was later cancelled, and that it would displease the Soviet Union if we did not make that statement yesterday. The Leader of the Government has worsened the situation.

I do not feel very proud of the Leader of the Government for resorting to an emergency sitting of the Senate so that we could, in some way, lighten the implied rebuke of the Soviet Union for its treatment of Raoul Wallenberg. I must say that while I have attempted to deal with this matter as a question of procedure, the Leader of the Government has introduced a matter of substance by raising the presence of the Soviet Union and the diplomatic implications in our proceedings and offering it as a reason why the government sought a special emergency sitting of the Senate of Canada. Presumably public interest was involved, but I cannot see it on the face of it. To express our view, I may seek leave later to move a motion.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to intervene in this debate for a somewhat different reason. I think it is sad that the resolution we passed yesterday—which, I believe, almost everyone wishes to support—has been handled so badly that it requires action by the Senate to repair the damage that has been done to the rights of individual members of this chamber. I would like to make it perfectly clear from the beginning that I am not singling out the one senator who rose to object to unanimous consent and to comment as to why; namely, Senator Macquarrie. However, I think the way in which it was handled, even in light of the explanation, makes it important that we ensure that we have not established a precedent to be used in the future. If there is any danger that we have established a precedent that may be cited, we must change the rules, particularly the one upon which we relied, rule 14A.

Honourable senators will know that unanimous consent does not require that a senator rise, identify himself and make a speech explaining why he or she is withholding unanimous consent. The Speaker is merely required to ask of the chamber if there is unanimous consent and if someone says no, then there is not unanimous consent, and that member, as I said, need not identify himself. There is a good reason for the procedure where unanimous consent is required every time the Senate departs from the rules it has agreed to follow.

For example, let us take a different set of circumstances that could easily take place if this procedure is to be regarded as a precedent, and I say this because of the circumstances that occurred yesterday. I know that I, personally, was never advised that there was to be a second sitting, except that I happened to be sitting in a meeting. The usual notification to every senator that there was to be an unusual sitting called by the Speaker because the public interest demanded it was never sent to me, or to my office. I have no disagreement with the resolution that was passed, but I certainly have disagreement with the process.

What if there were some budget bills that affected regions in my part of the country that were introduced in that special, Second Distinct Sitting of the Senate, and the members on this side, or the member from that region, were not present? I am sure you can see the implications if we leave this as an action that we are going to use as a precedent and, of course, if we do not disown it, it will be used as a precedent, or at least it could be used as a precedent.

Therefore, honourable senators, I am not advocating at this time that rule 14A ought to be changed because I think that somewhere the authority ought to be held by someone—in this case the Speaker—to call the Senate into a special sitting when there is justification for doing so. However, it should be explained to the senators what that national or public interest is. That was not done yesterday, either.

As the Leader of the Opposition has mentioned, he heard no explanation; I heard no explanation yesterday as to why this unusual action was taken, and indeed, the reasons that have been given today are not satisfactory. What would happen if the leaders on the government side wanted to play games, abridging the rights of senators that all of us have agreed to? If these kinds of circumstances are to be used to adjourn the Senate for an hour or so, then call it back into session without every senator knowing what is to happen, and bring in legislation that has not been introduced to the Senate in the required way, it is easy to understand or to imagine how serious the consequences could be.

Honourable senators, I am concerned about the way in which this matter was handled, and the process by which it was done. I know that the Leader of the Government said yesterday that he hoped it would not be considered as a precedent. That is not quite satisfactory to me, and I know that my leader has indicated that he will make a motion concerning this matter. I hope that such a motion will be passed unanimously by the members of this chamber so that we may eliminate the possibility that it can ever happen again under the circumstances that have been described here concerning what happened yesterday.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I might be allowed to make a comment. As we are dealing with what might be described as ministerial statements, I might be allowed a closing word.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: On a point of order, I do not think it should be a closing word.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to check the rule and I really am not attempting to foreclose any other senator from adding to the discussion if he wishes to do so. No doubt if we do receive a resolution, as has been suggested, we will have a thorough opportunity to continue the discussion.

I just want to make a couple of comments on what has been said, because I am the first one to admit that there is plenty of room for differences of opinion.

• (1430)

I am not going to say that all virtue rests in the statements that I have made, but I will say to the last speaker that I wonder whether his points are really as well taken as he suggests. For example, if anyone wishes to refuse consent now, it is possible for that to be done without an explanation. If senators want to give an explanation, they may do so, but there is nothing to prevent them from just saying "No"; that has been done before. So, I do not think that we have a problem.

Senator Olson: If that is the way it is going to be handled, we had better change the rules so that there is an explanation given.

Senator Roblin: I am not certain which side of the question my friend is on, but I will listen to his views on either side of the question.

With respect to the point raised about the government playing games by recalling the Senate from time to time in an improper way, it can only do so with consent; let's recognize that. We got consent yesterday, and if any senator had thought it advisable not to give consent the second time, he could have said so. I am not saying that by way of reproach, because I am grateful that the Senate agreed to sit on the basis of the information we did have yesterday. But I keep telling myself that if something happens of a nature that honourable senators cannot agree with in the future, it could certainly be put a stop to without any trouble whatsoever.

Where I am really in a difficult position personally is with respect to the objection raised by the Leader of the Opposition, because what he has really said to me is that it does not pay to be candid. He has really said to me that it does not pay to express oneself openly and completely on an issue. He has said that it was not helpful for me to have expressed my concerns with respect to the diplomatic situation, and perhaps he is right; perhaps I should have said nothing about that. But if I had not shared that with the Senate, I can imagine the coals that would be heaped upon my head for not coming clean or for not having a reason which had any validity whatsoever. So, I am caught; I either come clean, as I tried to do, and candidly say what the problem seems to be from this side of the house, recognizing it is not the only view in the world—because there are always two sides to a question. I tried to tell the Senate honestly what happened; that is what I tried to do. If I had been reticent about it or declined to state the facts as they came to me, then I would have some trouble myself with the matter and, I dare say, other senators would have had trouble as well. So, I cannot win in that situation, and I recognize that.

As to the cancelled press conference, I find that as hilarious as the Leader of the Opposition does. It is just a comedy of errors—is it not?—that this press conference was called, and after they heard we were not going to proceed they decided to cancel the press conference. We can talk about the cancelled press conference as if it were the hinge of the whole thing. I say that it is not the hinge of the whole thing, but it is ironic that we should be in that situation.

I have to tell honourable senators that when I was speaking about this on the first occasion with members of the other side I was under the impression that there were other matters on which I could have reported to the house, but I found, on examination, that that was not the case. Again, I have come clean; I told the Senate what I knew.

The question is whether the implied rebuke to the Soviet Union is any less severe in the way in which it was handled than it might be in some other case. I don't think it is an implied rebuke; I think it is a rebuke. I think there is some advantage from many points of view in unifying the opinion of the country to have that rebuke come from a private members' resolution passed by both houses of Parliament rather than through a government declaration in respect of the matter, which was the other alternative to be considered. But having decided to proceed by unanimous consent, as the House of Commons did, and by waiving the rules on the private members' resolution, I think that there is some merit—in fact, the government thinks there is considerable merit—in associating the rebuke with the United Nations celebration day, and doing it all on the one day.

You can make a perfectly sound argument on the other side of the question and say that it does not matter, that you could have done it next week. Well, maybe so, but in light of the circumstances at the time it was considered by those who advised me that it would be much better if it were done in the way in which I suggested.

I am the first one to admit that it is not a pleasant thing for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to expose himself or the Senate to the problems that are associated with the line of action that was taken. That is not a pleasant thing; that is not a thing I would like to do every day of the week, but when I considered the information policy views that were expressed to me it was probably the lesser of the two evils. It was better to ask the Senate to be accommodating and come back and do what it was quite willing to do—and I grant everyone in the chamber this fact—anyway. It was better to ask the Senate to come back in that unusual way—let's be frank about it—and deal with the matter yesterday in the circumstances prevailing.

If the Senate wants to have a resolution saying that I am a damn fool and I should not have done that, or that I should have done it in some other way, go ahead, that is up to the Senate. I will just have to simply defend myself as best I can. But looking back at the whole situation—

Senator Frith: That is not what we had in mind, but thanks for asking.

Senator Roblin:—and having regard to the circumstances which actually developed I am still of the opinion that, while it is open to all kinds of legitimate objections, and I minimize none of them, it was appropriate that we acted in the way we did. I am afraid I must maintain my position in that respect.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise on this point of order because I am concerned on a number of grounds about the events that took place yesterday, and about the explanation given to us today by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am concerned about the abuse of the Rules of the Senate, which I believe was the case yesterday. It is certainly a great danger if the Rules of the Senate are ever to be used in the future in the same way. I am concerned about the independence of senators and of the Senate itself, independence from the government and independence from the House of Commons. I think that these are two essential things that the Senate must preserve. We must be masters in our own house if we are to do the job that has been assigned to us by the people of Canada.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has given us some history of the events leading up to yesterday. He has indicated to us that there had been two private members' bills introduced in the other place. I should like to know when those bills were introduced. Subsequently, we have been told, those bills were withdrawn. When did that happen? When was the decision made to proceed with a resolution instead? I ask those questions because I gather that those were not events that all took place yesterday—they took place some time ago. So, the government must have known that this was coming forward. If the date of December 10 was a critical one, as the Leader of the Government has indicated to us, that must have been known some time ago. Yet, that only came to light at 4 o'clock in the afternoon. What exactly took place in the other place, and what exactly took place in the government?

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has told us that this is not a government resolution, that the government had nothing to do with this. Well, I find it very strange to hear from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that he had a phone call from none other than the Leader of the Government in the other place. It is most unusual, it seems to me, that the Leader of the Government in the other place, an extremely busy man, should be calling the Leader of the Government in the Senate on a private members' resolution. About government business, understood, but a private members' resolution! Since when does the Leader of the Government in the other place, the Prime Minister of this country, become involved with private members' resolutions, unless the government is backing the private members' resolution and is putting it through as a private members' resolution while it is really a government action? Short of that, I do not understand why the government leader, the Prime Minister of the country, gets involved in phoning the Leader of the Government in the Senate to urge him to circumvent the rules of the Senate to put through a private members' resolution. It just does not make any sense to me. I think there is a serious concern here about the independence of this place. If there are to be phone calls from the Prime Minister on the afternoon when this house has risen, and the government leader then calls an emergency sitting because the Prime Minister has said so, then I think it is high time that we have a good look at exactly what we are doing in this place.

An Hon. Senator: It was the government leader in the House, not the Prime Minister.

Senator Molgat: Oh, it was the government leader in the house and not the Prime Minister. Well, then, my argument is the same. The government leader in the House is the person responsible for getting government legislation through. That is his job. It is my recollection that with respect to private members' resolutions and private members' bills in the other place it is the job of the Leader of the Government to see that they never reach decision. That is the normal operation over there. They simply talk them out. The job of the government leader is to ensure that it does not happen. I have never known it to be his job to phone the Leader of the Government in the Senate and urge him to push forward a resolution and particularly in the circumstances of yesterday when an honourable senator exercising his rights had stated that he was not prepared to give consent and then half an hour later the government leader makes a decision and we are called back to the Senate.

What does that mean about the independence of this chamber? How can we possibly operate if that is going to be the practice in the future? I would like to know from the government leader when these various events took place in the other place, when these bills were introduced, and why he was not advised prior to yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock that this resolution had to be passed yesterday, in the view of the Leader of the Government in the other place.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I wish to associate myself with the views just expressed by Senator Molgat concerning the handling of this matter at two distinct sittings of the Senate yesterday. I associate myself particularly with his speculation—and in my view it is really more than a speculation and an inference that cannot be challenged—that the government must have known about the necessity of passing this resolution before December 10, that is, if you can agree with their views that it was necessary to do so, long before the resolution was introduced in the Senate at the last minute at yesterday's sitting, and that the government might very well have given both the House of Commons and this chamber more notice of their intentions. I realize that it was a private members' resolution, but it is quite obvious from what occurred subsequently that it had the support of the government and that the government was behind the passing of the resolution. Why then was the government so late in introducing the resolution or why was it introduced so late in this chamber?

I have two other observations to make arising out of yesterday's proceedings. The first was the calling of this special, distinct sitting. I am familiar with rule 14A.(1) which requires the Speaker to send a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate. I know of senators who received no such notice—not even a phone call. I suggest if one wanted to be technical about this one might say that yesterday's Second Distinct Sitting was a nullity because there was not a valid notice that came from the Speaker to all members of the Senate. It is true that a number of Liberal senators were gathered in caucus and that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, not through the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate but through the Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, pointed out that he planned to call a Second Distinct Sitting of the Senate. That notice was not universally given and there were senators who were not given an opportunity to attend that sitting. I am sure that that notice, if notice there was, was not received by many honourable senators of this chamber.

My final point has to do with the question of unanimous consent. I noted that Senator Macquarrie withheld his consent during the treatment of this matter at the First Distinct Sitting of the Senate. I wish that I had withheld my consent at that time, too.

Senator Flynn: Well put!

Senator Hicks: I was not in the chamber when unanimous consent was sought during the Second Distinct Sitting of the Senate and it is idle for me to speculate what I would have done had I been in the house.

Senator Walker: Who cares!

Senator Hicks: If this device is going to be resorted to in future to get around the position that a senator puts the house in by withholding his consent in a matter that requires unanimous consent, I, for one, am going to be much more careful in giving consent under these circumstances. I think that the Leader of the Government in the Senate ought to realize that and that he may find, as a result of having used this device, that he will fail to get unanimous consent in the future, at least insofar as I am concerned, on some other occasions—

Senator Walker: Oh! Oh!

Senator Hicks: —when he otherwise might have had it. I think that that is perhaps all that I have to say.

Senator Flynn: You have already said too much!

Senator Hicks: I am sorry that this unfortunate occurrence did occur and I hope it will not occur again. I welcome the fact that the Leader of the Government in the Senate has acknowledged that—because I have read the Debates of the Senate for the Second Distinct Sitting which I did not attend except for the first few minutes—and I am glad that he has given an assurance that this does not constitute a precedent. I hope that that will be the case, and if anything like this is ever tried again there will be much more difficulty in getting the concurrence of this house—

Senator Flynn: You'll be there to defend it.

Senator Hicks: —than there was yesterday.

Senator Flynn: Thank God for the rest of us.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have heard the arguments about the abuse of the privileges of this house and I fail to see how they were abused or how this action would set a precedent that would create abuse in the future. As I understand it, in the First Distinct Sitting Senator Macquarrie refused to give unanimous consent. The Speaker under rule 14A makes the decision as to whether the calling back of the Senate is a matter of public interest. Although the marginal note talks about an emergency debate, in fact the rule itself only requires that the Speaker be satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than previously set forth. Presumably, the Speaker did that in this case. This device has been used before to call back the Senate when legislation was ready to be enacted when the Senate was adjourned. It was never used for the purpose of an emergency as such. That is the marginal note. It was used when the Speaker determined there was a matter of public interest. That public interest, apparently, was satisfied when there was legislation to be passed while the Senate was adjourned. The implication of some of the speeches I have heard here today and yesterday is that Senator Macquarrie, by virtue of the second sitting, lost his right to object, which he could have exercised by refusing unanimous consent. However, the Rules of the Senate—and I would refer honourable senators to rule 45—require one day's notice.

Senator Macquarrie, had he wanted to come to this chamber on the second sitting, could, indeed, have refused to give his consent to the motion, and that would have been enough to stop the motion proceeding at that sitting.

It could have been that we would not have had a second sitting, in which case we would have come back today to consider the motion and there would be no necessity for unanimous consent because we would have had one day's notice of the motion.

There is no abuse here. We are not talking about a situation where senators' rights are going to be trampled upon. If this were to happen again, an individual senator would have the right to object and could exercise that right by refusal of unanimous consent. Where is the abuse? If we come back the following day, that senator has been given the required one day's notice.

What fascinates me is that we all agree with the substance of the resolution.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: We were prepared to come in here and vote on it. If there is an abuse, then it relates only to procedure, and I am suggesting to you, honourable senators, that no such abuse exists, nor will it exist in the future.

The only area I can see where we can really object is that it would appear that the notice was incorrectly given. If that is so, then I would have thought that, when the second sitting started yesterday, a senator objecting that the notice was incorrectly given would have had the ear of the Speaker and of this house, and that particular sitting should not have proceeded.

The fact of the matter is that nobody objected, and, when we came to the resolution, it was given unanimous consent. This does not and will never create a precedent that is a danger to or an abuse of senators' rights.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps Senator Everett would permit a question. Senator Everett has said that this has been done previously.

Senator Flynn: That was the last argument.

Senator Molgat: I am not asking Senator Flynn the question. He may not like the debate, but that is unfortunate and I can quite understand why he would not.

Senator Flynn: Just wait.

Senator Molgat: My question to Senator Everett is: Does he know of any precedent when the house has been called back on the same day for a second sitting, under this rule?

Senator Everett: No, I most certainly do not. I think what happened yesterday was unusual.

What I was referring to was the fact that this rule has been used in the past, not for emergency purposes, but in order to call the Senate back to deal with ordinary, everyday legislation which appeared on the order paper while the Senate was adjourned.

There is nothing of an emergency nature about this resolution, but that has been the implication of this side of the house—that there has to be a palpable emergency. I am telling honourable senators that the precedent of this chamber does not require it to be an emergency.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong the duel Senator Everett and I had yesterday, but I do want to get something straight. He seemed to base his point very clearly on the fact that unanimous consent would have been necessary on the second occasion yesterday.

I really think that is wrong, and I think the record shows it to be so. It says in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate:

The Honourable Senator Nurgitz moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, that the Message be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

It does not state that it be treated as notice for the next day, but that it be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate. The Second Distinct Sitting was the next sitting of the Senate and, when the matter came forward, we gave leave not to debate the motion; we gave leave to stand everything until that order was dealt with. You will remember that the clerk at the Table stood and did not read a motion; he read an Order of the Day. There was no need for unanimous consent to deal with that Order of the Day.

The consequence was that there was no right in any senator to object or to say that he was not giving leave because no leave needed to be asked for in order to deal with an Order of the Day that was on the order paper for the next sitting, that being the next sitting.

Senator Flynn: You are not serious.

Senator Frith: I certainly am. What is happening is that Senator Everett, my colleague, has made a point which is not supported by the record; it is that simple.

Senator Flynn: Your point is not supported.

Senator Corbin: There, it is in the record.

Senator Flynn: Whom did I hear in that corner? It would be much better if Senator Corbin were on his feet because I should like to have him behind me.

When it was moved that the motion be put on the Orders of the Day for the next sitting, what did it mean at that time? It meant today.

Senator Frith: No, it did not.

Senator Flynn: It is so obvious. The honourable senator is playing on words, and I think, in these circumstances, he should be the last one to intervene.

Senator Frith: Let us understand that I concede there are two versions. I concede that Senator Everett can certainly base his point on Senator Flynn's version of the record. I simply wanted to point out that Senator Nurgitz's motion was that it be placed on the Orders of the Day. That is a fact and that is what the record shows. It is not Senator Flynn's record; it is only, modestly, the official record of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: But Senator Frith is suggesting that we could use that device to get around procedure.

Senator Frith: I did not say that. In fact, I specifically said yesterday that I was not saying that.

Senator Flynn: I know what you are doing with your majority.

Senator Frith: I said I was not suggesting that.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I very much appreciate the discomfort of the Leader of the Government in the Senate in the circumstances in which he has been put. I have great sympathy for him. He has been placed on a sticky wicket, and that is unfortunate.

However, it is unfortunate not just for him; it is unfortunate for the Senate.

Yesterday, during our second sitting, I spoke of precedents and said that the precedent being established was that the one purpose of the special sitting had been to circumvent the refusal of one of the members of this body to give unanimous consent to the passing of a motion. That is a substantial and very serious precedent.

Senator Roblin: Your statement is incorrect.

Senator McElman: That had to be the one purpose—to circumvent the refusal to give unanimous consent.

Senator Frith: We could have put it on the Orders of the Day.

● (1500)

Senator McElman: If unanimous consent had not been refused, there would have been no second sitting yesterday. Therefore, the one purpose of the second sitting was to circumvent what an honourable colleague had done in all conscience, giving his reasons for his action—

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator McElman:—and the sitting concluded.

Senator Flynn: With respect, no.

Senator McElman: Therefore, a second sitting was convened and activated to circumvent that action by one honourable senator. That is a dreadful precedent. It is something that every senator should be concerned about.

If, after having received a call from the Leader of the Government in the other place—which, in my view, was an audacity—the government party in this place, in a minority position, proceeded to take the action that it did, what in God's name would it do with a majority in this house?

Senator Roblin: You could have stopped it any time you liked.

Senator McElman: That is part of my concern. Again, I think it should concern all of us.

Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government in the Senate was asked repeatedly by the Leader of the Opposition and by others to provide to the Senate an explanation for this urgent second sitting. He was asked why it had to be called and how the public interest was to be served by it. Repeatedly, in answer to those questions, he replied that he really did not have the information to give to the Senate. I think that it was very gracious of the Leader of the Opposition not to press that to the conclusions he might have done during the debate. I know that the Leader of the Government appreciated that. We have heard the proposition put forward by Senator Everett and others that there is no precedent-setting concern here. However, since the Leader of the Government told the Senate that he really did not know at that time the reasons for it but that he would endeavour to find out and advise the house today, I ask honourable senators to consider that he or someone at his behest and on his behalf had to have advised the Speaker in sufficient detail and substance that the Speaker would have been satisfied, in the words of our rule, that “the public interest” would be served by taking this extraordinary and unusual action. The Leader of the Government told us that he did not have that information, yet the extraordinary action was taken following advice to the Speaker of the Senate. We have not been told what that advice was—that advice of sufficient quality and urgency that the Honourable the Speaker felt that the provisions of rule 14A had been met. That is a second aspect of precedent. The Speaker is not here in a capacity to serve the government, but to serve the Senate.

Senator Flynn: What did you say? Did you say that the Speaker has erred?

Senator McElman: I said that the Speaker is “here”.

Senator Flynn: Oh; I did not hear that, but if it were pronounced correctly—

Senator McElman: Now we get lessons in elocution from Senator Flynn, in addition to his constant abuse not only of the rules of the Senate, necessarily, but of the privileges of the Senate and of the privileges of individual senators, which he daily and constantly abuses, not to mention the undercutting of his own leader, which he does day in and day out, and the embarrassment of his own leader, which he causes day in and day out. I have tremendous sympathy for Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: Keep your sympathy for yourself. I am satisfied with the conduct of my friend.

Senator McElman: I will extend my sympathy as I see fit. As I say, sir, for the Leader of the Government in the Senate I have, daily, great sympathy for what he has to put up with from the one who sits immediately across the aisle from him.

I believe that, on this point of order that we are debating, because of the situation of the Honourable the Speaker being involved, there is an obligation upon the Leader of the Government to tell the Senate what information he provided to the Speaker to satisfy him that this unusual and extraordinary sitting of the Senate should be held.

Returning, again, to the matter of the precedent that it is alleged exists for what happened yesterday, I will say that there is no precedent, certainly not in the memory of any honourable senator in this chamber. There were occasions when the Senate was adjourned and recessed, where it was clearly understood when the Senate took the adjournment that if and when government business in the form of legislation did arrive for the Senate to act upon, there would be no dissent on the part of the Speaker under the provisions of what is now rule 14A. Those notices were sent and they were sent properly. Does that create a precedent for the events of yesterday? Of course, it does not. In those instances it was the responsibility of the Leader of the Government in the Senate of that day to provide to the Speaker the information that showed that the public interest would be served by the recall of the Senate from its adjournment. Then, as I said yesterday, the Senate immediately re-assembled, whereupon the Leader of the Government in the Senate advised senators of the business that required them, in the public interest, to re-assemble. It was always done on the basis of legislation that had come forward. It had nothing to do with being a precedent for the events of yesterday.

Did the events of yesterday constitute an emergency or most unusual circumstance in the public interest? I suggest not necessarily, because certainly the Senate was not apprised nor convinced of the need for such a sitting in the public interest. Senator Everett kept referring to this rule as "this device". It was never used as a device. It was used as a proper rule of the Senate by which to conduct the proper procedure of the Senate to bring senators back to their activities. It was not a device; it was a rule and a properly used rule. Yesterday it was a misused rule.

Honourable senators, I come back to what I believe to be a fact. I know there is disagreement from the other side; but there was a dreadful precedent established yesterday which, in my view, has to be eradicated to prevent possible future use in this body. We had a special sitting to circumvent the action of a senator who simply exercised his right and privilege to do what he did, and there was no other purpose for that sitting to be held. It would not matter what he did at the next sitting had he been here. That would have had no bearing whatsoever. The second sitting would still have been called to nullify the right, the privilege, that that senator had exercised at the first sitting. That is one fact that cannot be changed, and it is the awful precedent that faces this chamber, and it must never be permitted to stand, or permitted to be used again, because of the possibility of its misuse in the worst way.

● (1510)

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise as a lawyer and not to get into the general debate. For the record, I do not agree with Senator Frith, and I do agree with Senator Everett on the interpretation of rule 45. Rule 45 is quite clear. It says:

One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions: . . .

(h) for the making of a substantive motion;

If we refer to the definition section, 5(i) is even clearer; it says:

"one day's notice" means a notice given on any sitting day for a motion or inquiry to be made on the next succeeding sitting day;

And the next sitting day would be the next day the Senate sat and not the next sitting. It is clear and unambiguous. What we had to do yesterday at the second sitting was to circumvent the Rules of the Senate, and that could be done under section 45, which says:

One day's notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

(a) to suspend any rule or any part thereof;

And that is what we did yesterday at the second sitting with unanimous consent. There is a question that I would like to ask, which I believe is rather important. It is on the matter of whether Senator Macquarrie was actually overruled against his wishes. Was the Speaker of the Senate, before he called us back, informed that Senator Macquarrie had changed his mind and would not object to considering the motion? I believe that to be very important, as to whether the Speaker was informed of that before he agreed to reconvene the Senate. I am asking that question because I do not want a precedent to be established. I do not want anyone to think that the situation can be repeated in future without the unanimous consent of the Senate and without the consent of the senator who originally refused unanimous consent.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to answer the question by saying that before any move of any kind was taken, Senator Macquarrie was apprised of the difficulty in which I found myself; and so he had a full opportunity to do whatever he saw fit. But he was consulted first.

Senator Godfrey: My question was whether the Speaker was advised of that fact when he was persuaded to call us back, because I want it established for the future that he should not do that without being informed that the member who had originally objected had withdrawn his objection. My question was whether the Speaker was informed.

Senator Roblin: To the best of my knowledge, he knew everything I knew.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, on the point raised by Senator Godfrey, he read the rule quite correctly. I regret that I do not have with me a copy of Bourinot or Beauchesne, but I believe that reference to those authorities will show that although the honourable senator read the rule correctly, he did not interpret it correctly. I believe that honourable senators will find that all of the precedents indicate that a session is considered a day, and a day is considered a session in parliamentary terms. Therefore yesterday we had two days of Parliament.

Senator Flynn: You are as bad as Senator Frith.

Senator McElman: You are at it again, senator.

Senator Flynn: You are.

Senator McElman: I am doing it properly, on my feet—

Senator Flynn: That's not what you are saying—

Senator McElman: —not insultingly from my seat. I am doing it on my feet. Why don't you stop yapping from your seat and act as a gentleman should in this chamber?

Senator Flynn: I can stand up. If you want to sit down, I will speak.

Senator McElman: I don't want to sit down.

Senator Flynn: Then be content with the situation.

Senator McElman: If you rise on a question of privilege, I will sit down, always; but until you do, I would appreciate it if you would just observe the rule.

Senator Flynn: But you are wrong.

Senator McElman: So, in parliamentary language, "session" is "day" and "day" is "session"; and yesterday we had two days of Parliament—and reference to the precedents will show that. When we talk about two days' notice, we talk about two sitting days, two days of Parliament. Yesterday we had two days, in parliamentary terms, and that is the only thing wrong with the proposition made by Senator Godfrey.

Senator Flynn: "Oh Lord, have mercy."

[Senator McElman.]

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, yesterday was my anniversary of being on Parliament Hill for twenty-eight and a half years—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Macquarrie:—and in all those years I never inspired, directly or indirectly, such debate as I have heard today; and I do not know whether to be glad or sorry that in some way I have become a catalyst. I was drawn into this debate because of a remark by Senator Godfrey. It is a little unusual to ferret into the reasons for one's vote in a legislative body, and even more unusual to speculate on how he would conceivably vote in a succeeding opportunity to cast it. That, I thought, was a bit unusual.

I feel that the debate, while interesting, is somewhat unfortunate in that much time has been spent today over what was done or not done yesterday; and there are times when I heard eloquent remarks from across the way that I would perhaps say, if I were given to slang: "Where were all of you yesterday?"

I can only say, since Senator Godfrey raised the question, that had I been here at the Second Distinct Sitting, I would have taken the same course of action as I did two hours earlier. But I advised my leader—who handled the matter, insofar as I am concerned, with impeccable good taste, consideration and a great deal of wisdom—that I thought, considering all of the alternatives, that I would not attend the session. In fact, I was in my office—and, if one can say anything off the record in a public place, I received a few phone calls from colleagues who told me that they thought I had done the right thing in reference to opposing such hasty action.

However, I wish to say that while I do not believe that the Second Distinct Sitting was one of the finest things that was ever done on Parliament Hill, I do not believe that really much is gained in fulminating over the past or deploring what was done—because obviously a great many people were involved in doing it. I read that a number of senators were here and the whole matter went through.

I thought that the main purpose for that meeting required more time. I would have made my speech on the matter today. In fact, I probably would have had views about the Soviet Union that would be a little different from some that have been put forward. But we are not having a debate and therefore I cannot give them. But I thank all those who are solicitous. I do not feel happy about what happened. I do not rejoice. But I do not feel that I am particularly circumvented. It has not been unusual for me, in my public life, to find myself in a minority, and it is not even unusual to be in a minority of one; and had even one colleague had the same view as I had in the first sitting and expressed it in the second, today's debate would not have taken place.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not intend to enter this debate in a substantive way. I rise merely to protest against the fact that I believe that my privileges as a senator were interfered with yesterday. I was not properly notified of the so-called Second Distinct Sitting. When I left the Centre Block via the Senate door yesterday at about 3.55 o'clock, after our caucus meeting, I was notified by the constable at the door that there would be a sitting of the Senate at 4.15 o'clock. I proceeded to a meeting that I had scheduled in the East Block for 4 o'clock, a briefing on the Lyell Island and South Moresby situation. At 4.20 o'clock, during the briefing, I was handed another note by one of the staff present to the effect that the 4.15 Senate sitting had been cancelled. I object on behalf of the some 23 other honourable senators who may not have been properly notified as well. I believe that that is the number of senators who were not present at the Second Distinct Sitting as opposed to the First Distinct Sitting.

Since being appointed to this chamber I have been rather, not proud, but happy with my attendance here. I have always prided myself on doing my job, taking part in the workings of this place and attending sittings on most occasions. If I am absent, it is for a very good reason. In most instances it is because I have public business in other parts of the country. I object most strenuously to not being recorded as being present for the so-called Second Distinct Sitting.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to inquire of someone—and I am sure that there is someone present who can give me an answer—whether or not the absence of senators from the Second Distinct Sitting has financial implications for them individually.

Senator Flynn: That's the most important question raised today.

Senator MacEachen: You are very venal.

Senator Corbin: As I understand it, a record is kept on the attendance of honourable senators. Honourable senators are allowed to be absent from a certain number of sittings for specific reasons other than attendance to public business, reasons of health or what-have-you. However, in this instance I am not quite sure of the implications of or the procedure that applies to the second sitting. If, indeed, as Senator Marchand has stated, improper, insufficient or incorrect notice has been given to some of our colleagues, a notation will be made on their record of attendance or record of absence, which ever way you choose to put it. Again, I would make the point that I made yesterday, that the basic privileges of senators who have not been properly notified are affected as a result of the second sitting, and I think that this matter ought to be resolved. Insofar as attendance is concerned, do we simply count the two sittings yesterday as one sitting or two sittings? The Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate refer to two distinct sittings. I would like some explanation from any quarter as to the implications of the problem I have just outlined.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, I would like to put on record my personal feelings on what happened yesterday. In my 20 years in Parliament—19 years in the other place and approximately one year here—I have never seen anything to match the fashion in which the sitting of this parliamentary body was convened as it was yesterday. I can think of only one phrase that describes the way in which senators were called back to sit yesterday and that phrase is, "bush league operation." It is simply not the fashion in which a constitutional body of the Parliament of Canada should be convened to sit on what I believe was an important matter, the matter of a resolution, which I supported and was quite happy and willing to support, in spite of the fact that I did not receive proper notice of that resolution. However, that can happen.

What I find rather odd—and it has not been fully explained insofar as I am concerned—is that we were informed that a decision was taken about one week ago by the other House to organize some kind of ceremony or reception for yesterday in which we would honour, for the first time in our history, a foreign national by conferring honorary Canadian citizenship. This, I believe, is an important precedent in our history, and there may be others in the future. Yet, the leaders of this chamber, insofar as I have heard, were unaware of the organization of this event in the other place. Knowing full well that the Parliament of Canada is composed of two bodies, the House of Commons was ready to put a resolution through, knowing full well that it would have to ask the Senate to adopt the resolution also to make it official on behalf of the Parliament of Canada. Yet, insofar as I know—and if somebody knows any different, I invite them to get up and explain—no communication was entered into between the other place and this chamber, between the Chair of the other place and the Chair of this chamber, between the Leader of the Government in the other chamber and the Leader of the Government in this chamber or with anybody else who is an official of this house. As one who has defended the rights of Parliament throughout my career and who has been involved in the reform of Parliament as much as, if not more than, any member in this house or the other one, I find it an aberration that in this day and age two chambers, three hundred to four hundred feet apart, cannot, even in an elementary fashion, communicate between themselves about a decision which I consider to be very important. I, for one, hope that this will never happen again, and I ask honourable senators to be ever vigilant to ensure that it does not happen again.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre de Bané: Honourable senators, should we or should we not honour a foreign citizen and, in the affirmative, how should we proceed? Naturally, several formulas have been suggested; according to tradition, cities, the provinces or the federal government honour Canadian or foreign citizens.

I would not want to join in this debate today. However I would like to say I was deeply saddened to learn that the Senate was called for a second distinct sitting yesterday without the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate being forewarned.

I did not take part in the debate yesterday for the simple reason that I was not in Ottawa. The principles advocated by the various speakers, particularly by my colleagues Senators Lefebvre, Marchand and Macquarrie, attest to the significance of the principles at stake here. I would suggest that this house can be convened only with due regard for the rules and regulations which govern all of us. For that reason, without being anxious to debate the basic issue, I sincerely deplore yesterday's incident. I hope the Leader of the Government in the Senate will never again convene a sitting under such irregular circumstances.

[English]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not intend to get into this debate, but I distinctly remember that yesterday, after we had debated for about ten minutes in the second sitting, asking for the doors to be opened. It seems to me that you then, Mr. Speaker, gave the order that the doors be opened. I think it was I who asked that that be done, and the record shows that it was I, but my friend down in the corner did not see me because, according to the records, I was not here at all. Therefore, just in case I get to my 21 or 22 days, I would like to have the record corrected to show that I, in fact, was here yesterday and that I did make those remarks.

Senator Flynn: We heard you.

Senator Bonnell: Yes, you heard me.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting today and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I could interrupt the debate for just a moment to call the attention of the Senate to a predicament in which the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs finds itself. They have a meeting scheduled for when the Senate rises, which they had anticipated, with good reason and judging from precedent, would occur around 4 o'clock or perhaps earlier. Witnesses have been called to appear before that committee and should be there at that time. I wonder if we could have the permission of the Senate, notwithstanding the appropriate rule, for that committee to sit while the Senate is sitting this afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

RAOUL WALLENBERG—RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not wish to add to the remarks which I have already made, and which other honourable senators have made, all of which express the gravity with which the events of yesterday are viewed, I believe, by most senators in this chamber. I suggested to honourable senators earlier that I would seek leave to move a motion to deal with this matter, and I would like to seek that leave, notwithstanding rule 45(1)(h), to move the following motion:

That the events of December 10, 1985, relating to the Second Distinct Sitting were irregular and unacceptable, and are not to be considered as a valid precedent.

If leave is not forthcoming to deal with the matter now, of course, I will give notice.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I do not intend to refuse leave, but I would suggest that your motion be put on the Orders of the Day to be dealt with later, if we have time, since I do not think there is any urgency about the matter.

Therefore, as far as I am concerned, it can be put on the Orders of the Day at the proper place and we can deal with it later today, if the Leader of the Opposition so wishes.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FINANCE

RESTRUCTURING OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—INTERIM REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Murray, who has gone to chair his Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee meeting, I have the honour to table the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

Honourable senators, I would also, at the same time, call the attention of the Senate to the fact that five honourable senators, who were directors of companies that come within the purview of the green paper, withdrew as members of the committee during consideration of this reference. They are Senators Buckwold, Balfour, Kelly, Kolber and Sinclair. A number of other committee members stated for the record at our first meeting on this reference that they have shareholdings in financial institutions. These statements are to be found in the verbatim proceedings of the committee for September 12, 1985.

The chairman and members of the committee felt it important that these facts should be placed on the record of this honourable chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that this report be printed as an appendix?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I would like to say something about that matter, honourable senators. During discussions in the Internal Economy Committee with respect to the estimates, we recalled that on previous occasions we had noted a significant difference between the expense of tabling of documents, which could be copied by photocopy in committees and in the Senate, and the expense of having them appear as an appendix. The committee felt that the Senate and its committees ought to consider having appendices tabled and copied, rather than having them appear as part of the Debates of the Senate, whenever possible.

In a moment, I intend to table a report of the Internal Economy Committee and, at that time, I will ask not that it be printed as an appendix to either the Debates of the Senate or the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate but that it be photocopied and circulated to all honourable senators. It might be that Senator Doody would consider recommending, on behalf of that committee, that we simply table this report rather than have it appear as part of the minutes, since it is a very thick report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): You will distribute it however?

Senator Frith: Yes, I will.

Senator Doody: I must agree with Senator Frith on this matter, honourable senators. It has been a matter of contention and concern in the Internal Economy Committee during its recent examination of the estimates. I am sure that Senator Murray will be only too happy to accede to the request of Senator Frith.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT INCOME TAX ACT

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-82 TABLED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I have the honour to table its eleventh report respecting the subject matter of Bill C-82 intitled: "An Act to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act."

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87 TABLED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on behalf of His Honour the Speaker, the chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I have the honour to table the estimates of the Senate for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by that committee.

Honourable senators, I move that the estimates be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

I ask that I be given leave to make a somewhat parenthetical comment at this time. Senator Doody and I were surprised to find that, although rule 67(g) provides that:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, composed of fifteen members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

apparently it has not been the custom in the case of estimates to table them and make them part of a report.

We have been talking a great deal today about precedents. Senator Doody and I came to the conclusion—and perhaps other senators will agree—that if that has not been a precedent it ought to be, and that honourable senators ought to have an opportunity to see the estimates for the following year. Honourable senators will recall that last year we did not get that opportunity, but the reason for that was that the Senate had not organized its committees in time to do so.

I make that comment because the document that I have tabled will be circulated. It is in that context that honourable senators will be asked to look at it, and, in due course, approve the report.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

FAMILY PLANNING PROMOTION—GOVERNMENT SUPPORT AND POLICY

Question No. 15 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Lorna Marsden:

18th September—1. With regard to the September 5, 1985, announcement by the Minister for External Relations of a contribution of $500,000 over a period of three years to the International Federation for Family Life

[Senator Doody.]

Promotion, what is the size of the contribution made by the Canadian government to other forms of family planning operations, including modern methods of family planning?

2. What links does the Minister of External Relations have with the newly announced United States policy exempting their agencies from explaining a variety of forms of family planning if they are promoting the rhythm method of family planning?

Reply from the Minister for External Affairs:

1. Canada, through CIDA, supports family planning and associated activities through multilateral, bilateral and special program (non-governmental organizations) channels. Major recipients of such funds are the United Nations Fund for Population Activities (UNFPA) at $10.4 million in 1985-86, and the International Planned Parenthood Federation (IPPF) at $7.2 million in 1985-86. Both organizations are involved in projects and programs which cover the full range of family planning methods, including natural family planning.

In addition, a number of prominent Canada NGO's, including church-based organizations, provide family planning services as an integral part of primary health care, maternal and child health, or community development projects. While it is difficult in such cases to establish a dollar figure for activities related to family planning alone, a total of $10.8 million was committed by CIDA to NGO's in fiscal year 1984-85 for their projects in the health and population sectors.

In terms of bilateral programs activities, Canada is supporting a number of projects such as women's cooperatives in the Bangladesh Population II/World Bank/Donor Consortium project ($6 million in 1980-85) and Dai (traditional midwife) training in Pakistan ($3.8 million in 1983-86). While these projects are associated with larger recipient-government family planning programs, they are not themselves directly involved in family planning service delivery. Recently, the government approved a project for Bangladesh (the family planning support project at $9.4 million over three years) which will supply Canadian-made oral contraceptives to the Government of Bangladesh Population Control Program, assist in strengthening the contraceptive distribution logistics system, and finance local research to monitor acceptability of the Canadian-made product.

2. None.

ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES

HIBERNIA DRILLING PLATFORMS—CONSTRUCTION SITE LOCATION CRITERIA

Question No. 14 on the Order Paper—By Hon. Jack Marshall:

17th September—1. What locations were considered as construction sites for Hibernia drilling platforms and what criteria were followed in the selection?

2. What advantages were considered favourable to the sites chosen?

Reply from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources:

1 and 2. In May 1985, Mobil Oil Canada Ltd., the proponent for the proposed Hibernia development, submitted an Environmental Impact Statement (EIS) to the joint federal/provincial Hibernia Environment Assessment Review Panel. The EIS details in general terms the site location requirements for the various construction-related activities associated with the proposed Hibernia development. To date, no specific site locations have been proposed by Mobil.

It should be noted that on August 20, 1985, Newfoundland's development minister, Hal Barrett, announced that the province had designated two Placentia Bay communities—Argentia and Adam's Head—as their preferred choice as construction sites of the concrete, gravity-based production platform for the Hibernia oilfield (the former for the steel fabrication of deck and topside assembly, and the latter for construction and mechanical outfitting of the concrete structure).

In September and October, 1985, the public hearings for the proposed Hibernia development were held in communities throughout Newfoundland. In December 1985, the panel will present its report to both the federal and provincial governments through the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board. Both governments will use the recommendations of the panel as part of the approval process for the proposed development, including decisions associated with site location for the various construction activities.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macdonald (Cape Breton), for the second reading of the Bill S-6, intituled: "An Act to implement an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a convention between Canada and the Cooperative Republic of Guyana and an agreement between Canada and India for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Leave having been given for the resumption of the debate by Senator Hicks:

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, my attention was first directed to these tax convention bills when I sponsored some of them in the Senate in April of 1980. It is rather interesting to note that at that time there were 16 conventions which Canada had negotiated with various countries of the world. Including the ones piloted through under my tutelage at that time, the number rose to 24. Now Senator Doody has told us that that number has risen to 36, and will rise to 42 when treaties currently under negotiation—and some signed but not ratified—have, in fact, been ratified.

Well, that shows a respectable progress, though I note that I was told at the time I made my speech in April of 1980 that the number which was then 24 was expected to rise by 40; that would make a total of 64. In the past five years it has risen to 42. So, one hopes that we will continue pressing for the implementation of these tax treaties which save double taxation of Canadian citizens and of foreign citizens who have income in Canada and in their own country, and who, under the current arrangements without a tax treaty, may pay unnecessarily high taxes on that income.

I have only a couple of observations to make, because Senator Doody's explanation of this bill, though it was in line with explanations which sponsors of these types of bills have given from time to time, was complete and gave all of the information that the Senate needed.

First of all—and I hope my friends opposite will appreciate this point in view of the atmosphere in relation to them which has pervaded this house over the past two days—I must commend the government because the U.S.S.R. treaty, which is one of the subjects of this legislation, was only signed in June of 1985, and will be ratified as soon as this bill becomes law. The treaty with Guyana was only signed on October 15, 1985, and will also become law as soon as this legislation is enacted. The treaty with India was only signed on October 30, 1985.

This is a very good record, and I commend the government for securing ratification of the treaties so promptly. This has not always been the case. Very often there has been substantial lag between the time the treaties were signed and the time they were ratified. That, of course, means that citizens of this country and of the other country with which the treaty is being made—or the arrangement or accommodation—do not get the benefit of the tax savings until the treaties have, in fact, been ratified.

I must point out, however—and I take this from Senator Doody's remarks—that there were treaties signed between Canada and Brazil, the Cameroons, the Ivory Coast, Kenya, Sri Lanka and Zambia in 1984, and some in 1985, which have not yet been submitted for ratification. Having commended the government on the prompt submission for ratification of the three treaties now before the Senate with the U.S.S.R., Guyana and India, may I urge the government to try to secure, as quickly as possible, the ratification of the treaties with the six countries which I have just named.

One other observation I would make is that in reading this bill one will see—and I will not go through the details of it again because, as I just pointed out, Senator Doody's explanation of the bill is totally adequate and will provide honourable senators with whatever information they require in order to understand the significance of the various treaties—that they vary significantly from country to country. It certainly would be desirable if Canada could seek to make these tax treaties more uniform.

Having said that, I suppose I must admit that it is not only Canada that can do that, because, in every case, Canada is dealing with another country which, itself, is probably seeking tax accommodations with various other countries of the world. It is a shame that there is so much variety in the arrangements which are made in these treaties. If one understands perfectly the treaty made with the United Kingdom, that does not mean one understands the significance of treaties with Barbados or the U.S.S.R. Perhaps that is a situation that cannot be remedied. I know some of the people in the Canadian government department responsible for negotiating these treaties and examining their ramifications. I believe them to be competent people and I say to them that if it is possible to design treaties that are more nearly consistent the one with the other, that would, in itself, be a benefit to Canadian taxpayers.

Honourable senators, this legislation is usual, not in any way out of the ordinary, and deserves the support of this house.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I appreciate the comments of the Honourable Senator Hicks. I realize that he has sponsored many bills similar to this one in this chamber on previous occasions.

I note that he calls to our attention the fact that there are treaties still waiting to be ratified and that it would be in the interest of all countries involved if the process were speeded up. I certainly could not agree more. I know that there are applications for agreements in the appropriate government department which have been waiting for a number of years even to be brought forward. One that was brought to my attention recently is the proposed one with the Republic of Malta. That country has had an application filed since 1981. That application is awaiting action. I will certainly do what I can to try to chase that one down because I agree with Senator Hicks when he says that these are very important, particularly to small countries such as the Republic of Malta, or developing countries such as Guyana.

Mentioning Guyana brings me to the second point Senator Hicks raised, and that is the desire to have the treaties as uniform as possible. I do not think there is any question that the Government of Canada, whatever its political stripe, will see the merit in that. I think the difficulty is on the other side. Guyana, obviously, has different problems in terms of interest rates and in terms of withholding taxes, and so forth, since it is a developing country.

So, within the limitations imposed by various countries with which Canada negotiates these arrangements, certainly the maximum amount of uniformity is desirable. I have no doubt that the officials responsible are aiming in that direction, or at least that is the impression I have received from speaking with them.

• (1550)

In any event, honourable senators, I have no hesitation in joining Senator Hicks in commending this bill to you for second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: We do not feel it necessary to refer these treaties to a committee. In the past, perhaps due to the dominant influence of the then chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, these bills were referred to that committee. I think they might, with equal propriety, be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance or even the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, although I agree that reference to the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee has been, more or less, the standard practice.

However, if it is the wish of the chamber to give this legislation third reading without reference to a committee, I have no objection.

Senator Doody: I have no hesitation in moving that the bill be referred to committee. The only reason I did not do so was because Senator Hicks agreed that there was nothing unusual or controversial about it.

I would point out, however, that two committees of the Senate at least—I do not know about the situation regarding the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs—are overloaded at the present time. Both the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance have full dockets.

Nevertheless, I spoke to Senator Murray, the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and he agreed that if it were the wish of the Senate that the bill be referred to his committee for examination, he would certainly see to it that that wish was accommodated and his committee would consider the bill.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I have put my observations on the record. I cannot even describe them as "reservations." I do not think it is necessary to refer this bill to committee.

However, I would like my observations to be on the record so that, when the next bill or bills of this type come along, which may contain some more unusual feature, we will not have established a precedent of never referring them to committee.

Senator Doody: I fully agree with Senator Hicks.

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ENVIRONMENT

AIR POLLUTION ON PARLIAMENT HILL AND PUBLIC EDUCATION CAMPAIGN—MOTION WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten:

That the Senate urge all Senators and drivers of other vehicles on Parliament Hill to abandon the practice of leaving vehicle engines running within the precincts of Parliament Hill as such practice adds to environmental damage and, further, the government should launch a public education campaign inviting all Canadians to do the same and to invite the provincial governments to take the same steps; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to confess that I made this motion a bit precipitately. We had received a message from the other place and I wanted to bring the matter before the Senate. However, I have had an opportunity to study the wording of the motion and I must say that I do not care much for it. I have had some help in attempting to re-word the motion. My objection to it is, essentially, grammatical.

I have also had an opportunity to consider the points raised by Senator Flynn and, perhaps, rather than simply pass this, we should look into what is involved in (a) complying with it and (b) whether we should make some regulations or suggest regulations be made, and then it would be properly the subject matter of a study by a Senate committee.

Therefore, honourable senators, I am asking for leave to withdraw the motion and, after some consultation, I will present another motion on the same subject in a form which those I consult with believe to be a more appropriate way to deal with it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (B) 1985-86), presented in the Senate on December 4, 1985.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), on behalf of Senator Kelly, moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, this order deals with the report on supplementary estimates (B) which were considered by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on December 4. The appropriation bill based on supplementary estimates (B) was introduced in this house today and the motion for its second reading will be put on Tuesday next. At that time, perhaps we can consider the report and the appropriation bill together.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As I remember, Senator Everett, as chairman of that committee, used to make a speech on the supplementary estimates, which saved us some time on debate when the supply bill came before us.

I take it that the suggestion is that we will speak on the report and the supply bill at the same time.

Senator Doody: As honourable senators have probably noticed, I have never been one to rush madly into debate. However, the supply bill is to be introduced on Tuesday, and if at that time honourable senators prefer to wait until the main estimates come in later on in the year to proceed with the debate, I would be only too happy to oblige.

In the meantime, I do have a page or so of comments which would explain the munificence and magnificence of the government spending program. Actually, it is not that at all; it is simply an explanation of the sub-headings contained in these particular supplementary estimates.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Could I ask the honourable deputy leader a question about this report? I have not read it recently, but I believe there are some recommendations in the report relating to what the honourable senator has described as the necessity of "sleuthing" in order to uncover information relating to certain matters respecting the supplementaries and the form of the estimates.

I am not asking about the substance. I am asking: When recommendations are made or conclusions are reached by some honourable senators on a committee of that kind, how are these conclusions communicated to the President of the Treasury Board? Does the chairman of the committee forward these recommendations, or is it customary for the President of the Treasury Board or his staff to keep their eyes on what is happening? Really, what I am asking is: Is there a formal way by which conclusions of these committees which affect government operations are communicated to members of the government?

Senator Doody: I welcome the presence of Senator Everett in the chamber at this particular point because he has far more experience with the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance than anyone else. During my brief tenure as chairman, we did, indeed, acquaint Treasury Board and the appropriate departments that were singled out for questioning or for examination of the questions raised by senators in committee. Quite often, action was taken to implement the suggestions made by members of the committee and by the committee itself.

I have tabled that particular report which is a very short report. Perhaps the clerk at the Table could find a copy which he could give to Senator MacEachen at their mutual convenience.

In the meantime, I am sure Senator Everett will be able to give you a much longer and more able dissertation on the workings of the committee than I can.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: I apologize, honourable senators. I was distracted for a moment and I would appreciate being brought up to date on what was being discussed.

Senator Frith: I said that I recalled that when Senator Everett was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and the committee reported on the subject of estimates, he usually gave us an explanation about the report and had a general discussion about certain aspects of government finance. Often, that was useful to us in our debate on the supply bill.

Senator Everett: Just to deal briefly with the history of the estimates, it was the first case, probably, in the history of the Senate of a pre-study. The bill, as honourable senators know, is the appropriation bill, and what used to happen was that the estimates would get tied up in the other place. There would be a deadline which had to be met for government expenditure purposes, and the estimates and the appropriation bill would arrive here at the same time; and, of course, the committees and the senators did not have ample time to deal with them.

So it was decided many years ago, before I was the chairman, that the estimates would be referred to the National Finance Committee for study. The motion always states—and this is true of both the main estimates and the supplementaries—that the report is to be returned to the Senate before the appropriation bill is received.

What happened was that the National Finance Committee studied the main estimates and the supplementary estimates, and they were brought back to this house; and at that time it was my custom to speak to them when we tabled the report of the Finance Committee. A debate usually ensued after that.

What this meant was that when the appropriation bill came—and there usually was a deadline on the appropriation bill—the Deputy Leader of the Government got up and made a short statement on the appropriation bill, its contents having been dealt with in the form of estimates. The Leader of the Opposition, or the financial critic for the opposition, would get up and say a few words, and the bill was then passed without further debate and without reference to the committee at that time. I know of one exception where that did not happen, but that is why the appropriation bill was never referred to committee.

So the whole matter was dealt with when the report on the estimates was tabled by the chairman of the National Finance Committee, and the debate took place at that time.

[Senator Everett.]

So I would recommend that the debate should take place on the report on the estimates and not at the time of the introduction of the appropriation bill.

Senator Frith: We can do that.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I would like to clarify one point—and this is to help the opposition. I agree with Senator Everett that we would not refer the bill to committee except when there was something unusual in the clauses of the bill that we wanted to discuss. Sometimes it was not in standard form and there was some advantage in having the committee look at the bill itself.

Senator Everett: My recollection of the one occasion that I can recall is rather hazy, but I believe that what the honourable senator has said is correct. The appropriation bill was somewhat different from the supplementary estimates that we were dealing with. In other words, there had been a change.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that the report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: In light of what Senator Everett has said, I wonder whether it might not be better to stand the two items together. I would like to move the adjournment of the debate on the motion for adoption. I believe that we should debate the report first, and that would save us a lot of time in dealing with the bill.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that further debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CAPTAIN RONALD G. MCBRIDE

UNVEILING OF MEMORIAL SCULPTURE—VISIT OF INDUSTRIAL MISSION FROM FRIULI, ITALY

Hon. Peter Bosa rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, December 5, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the unveiling ceremony, at Toronto Downsview Air Base on October 20, 1985, of a sculpture in memory of Captain Ronald G. McBride, who lost his life in active service on May 16, 1976, while surveying the earthquake area of Friuli, Italy, and to the visit to Canada of an industrial mission from Friuli headed by the Honourable Gioacchino Francescutti, Minister of Industry, and Mr. Gianni Bravo, President of the Udine Chamber of Commerce.

He said: Honourable senators, almost ten years ago on May 6, 1976, Friuli, a region in northeast Italy, sustained one of the worst tragedies of its history. A severe earthquake claimed the lives of some 1,100 people, injured 2,500 and left 40,000 homeless. Approximately 6,500 businesses were also destroyed at the same time.

The people of Canada were swift and generous in their response to the tragedy. They expressed their solidarity and sympathy with the victims by initiating a disaster fund which was to raise $4.5 million, largely from individual donations as well as contributions from federal, provincial and municipal governments. The fund, directed by Canadian volunteers, was used to house as many as 830 survivors in permanent, earthquake-proof dwellings. This major project—181 houses and two senior citizens' homes in the towns of Venzone, Pinzano, Forgaria, Taipana and Bordano—was completed in record time. It was inaugurated on April 28-29, 1978, less than two years after the earthquake had occurred.

In each of the five towns a street or a place has been named in recognition of Canada's contribution—for example, "Borgata Canada", which means "Canadian hamlet". In the centre of 92 dwellings built by Canada in Venzone, there is a square called "Piazza McBride". Here the local citizens have erected a stone monument on which an iron figure of Icarus symbolizes a fall from the sky.

On Sunday, October 20, 1985, an impressive and dignified ceremony took place at Toronto Downsview Air Base. In the presence of Mrs. Ella McBride and members of her family, and a large number of people, the Honourable Gioacchino Francescutti, Minister of Industry for the region of Friuli, presented a bas-relief to Lieutenant General Don McNaughton, who received it on behalf of the Canadian Armed Forces. In presenting the sculpture, the Honourable Gioacchino Francescutti said in part:

I am here today to express Friuli's gratitude to the people of Canada for their generous help at that time of tragedy. Especially, I wish to pay tribute to the memory of a Canadian helicopter pilot, Captain Ronald G. McBride, who lost his life on active service on May 16, 1976, while surveying the earthquake area.

Captain McBride's mission was part of the immediate response of the Canadian Armed Forces to the Friuli disaster. A contingent of troops from Canada's military base in Lahr, Germany, was at once despatched to Friuli where they went into action within hours, providing emergency assistance of various kinds to the earthquake victims. They also established a field kitchen near the Town of Venzone, from which they were able to provide food throughout the emergency period to a large number of survivors who were sheltering there in tents.

It is almost 10 years since the tragedy at Friuli occurred, but its people have not forgotten Canada's tangible help. In illustration of this the Chamber of Commerce of Udine, the region's cultural capital, donates this bas-relief in memory of Captain McBride's supreme sacrifice.

I now take pleasure, sir, on behalf of the people of Friuli, in presenting this to you as an expression of profound appreciation of Canada's support.

In accepting the sculpture, General McNaughton said:

I am deeply honoured to be here this morning as a representative of the Canadian Forces and as Commander of Air Command, to receive this magnificent memorial wooden carving presented by the people of Friuli to Canada in memory of Captain R.G. (Buck) McBride. I am also very pleased to recognize Mrs. McBride and her children, who, by their presence here today, are able to witness first hand the expression of gratitude of the region of Friuli.

We, who serve in the armed forces of our country, always recognize that we may have to make the ultimate sacrifice in the exercise of our profession. It is particularly gratifying to realize, on occasions such as this one, when a noble officer such as Captain McBride has died in the line of service, that the sacrifice is recognized by those that he was helping, so that his memory will live forever. Officially, I would like to thank the people of Friuli for their kind gesture. I want to assure them that this superb memorial will be mounted in a conspicuous area so that all of us in the armed forces are often reminded of the sacrifice of Capt. Buck McBride and the gratitude and friendship of the people of Friuli. Honourable Mr. Francescutti, I ask you to bring our greetings to the citizens of Friuli and convey our sincere appreciation for their thoughtful donation of this memorial.

General McNaughton ended his remarks with a sentence in Italian.

Tutti i membri delle Forze Canadesi apprezzano molto questo vostro significativo pensiero. Grazie.

The translation of this sentence is, "All member's of Canada's armed forces appreciate deeply your thoughtful gesture."

The benediction of the sculpture was given by the Most Reverend Bishop Robert B. Clune, Auxiliary Bishop of Toronto.

Present at the ceremony from Italy in addition to the Honourable G. Francescutti were Mr. Gianni Bravo, President of the Udine Chamber of Commerce and the driving force behind this event; Messrs. Sergio Lapo and Alberto Picotti, advisers to Mr. Bravo; Artist Roberto Milan, the sculptor of the bas-relief, as well as some delegates from the industrial mission. From the Italian diplomatic corp present were the Consul General of Italy, Dr. M. Macchia and the Italian Trade Commissioner, Dr. R. Scrocca. There were federal, provincial and municipal representatives, myself from the Senate; from Queen's Park, MPPs Joseph Cordiano and Caudio Polsinelli; Controller, Barbara Green from North York; the President of the National Congress of Italian Canadians, Mr. Roldano Della Rosa; the President of the FAMEE Furlane Club of Toronto, and Order of Canada recipient, Mr. Primo Di Luca, along with many community and regimental association representatives. From the armed forces, in addition to General McNaughton, there were Brigadier General P.J. Taggart; Col. J.A. Torck; Col. R. Robert; Major Raffael Glofcheski; Captain Raymond Massey and Sergeant Robert Abar. These latter two gentlemen were part of Captain McBride's crew at the time of the crash, and both sustained injuries in the fall. There were other high ranking officers and men present, some of whom were accompanied by their spouses.

I would like to pay tribute to Major Alex Home, Captain Celia Lazzarin and Captain Terry King with whom I worked very closely to co-ordinate this event. The organization was superb and I would like to express a word of thanks to them on behalf of all the participants. An Ottawa-based Air Force band was flown in for the occasion and, at the appropriate time, played the two national anthems. Following the ceremony, the participants were invited to attend a reception at the officers' mess as guests of Col. Torck, the air base commander, where the Cheminade High School Band, directed by the very talented Maestro Livio Leonardelli, played a number of Canadian and Italian tunes.

I would like to express my personal appreciation to the Canadian Armed Forces, the guests from Italy and all the participants who played a part in making this event such a memorable one.

I would now like to say a few words about the delegation of businessmen that visited Canada. This delegation was composed of a large number of representatives of private and public institutions of Friuli.

The visit to Canada by this delegation had a twofold purpose: One, to show to the 50,000 Canadians of Friulan origin, and to the people of Canada as a whole, appreciation and thanks for their help at the time of the earthquake that struck Friuli in May, 1976. The other reason was to establish closer commercial relations with Canada.

Their visit received extensive coverage in the written media, as well as on radio and television. The Globe and Mail published a full page in the business section about the history of Friuli and the participating companies comprising the mission.

Friuli is reaching out to expand its markets under the able and dynamic leadership of the President of the Udine Chamber of Commerce, Mr. Gianni Bravo. This was the fourth promotional campaign that had been launched, under the logo "made in Friuli", in different parts of the world in the recent past, the last one having taken place in New York.

The delegation had extensive meetings and exchanges with Canadian business people in Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal from October 15-22, 1985.

Friuli is the most eastern region of Italy, bordering with Austria, Yugoslavia and the Adriatic Sea. Situated on an area of 7,634 square kilometres, with a population of 1,267,000, Friuli's economy is made up of 14,441 industrial and artisan firms, employing 117,165 workers. The agricultural industry is comprised of 65,000 businesses, mainly family-owned and run by labourers who work both in small industries and in public services. The trade industry is made up of 21,187 companies employing 54,725 people and public services consist of 13,468 agencies with 81,015 employees.

Given its strategic geographic location, Friuli has been historically a meeting point of people of Latin, German and Slavic descent, and today is a place of encounter for trade and planned economies.

In the structure of Italy, a unitary state, Friuli is one of five regions that have been given special powers which favour, among others, private enterprises.

In the 1950s, Friuli had a large number of its people emigrate to North and South America, Australia and the EEC countries. In the past 20 years its economy had a striking change for the better. Present statistics show that there are more immigrants going back than are leaving Friuli. Consequently, Friuli no longer exports manpower. Today, Friuli exports technologies that have been developed by a new generation of aggressive entrepreneurs. The absence of large industries has favoured the spontaneous aggregation of small and medium-sized industrialists, craftsmen, merchants and farmers.

They have designed and manufactured furnishings and kitchens for the home. They have excelled in the production of precision and measuring instruments such as clocks and electronic signalling devices, machines for tanneries, sophisticated agricultural machinery and automated stations for the production of concrete. They have created family-run agricultural companies and have succeeded in rediscovering the art of working with gold, as did their Longobard masters.

This change has provided tremendous economic well-being which is reflected in the following statistics: Imports for 1984 totalled 1.5 billion lire, consisting of raw materials such as wood, iron and leather, whereas exports exceeded imports by more than two to one, totalling 3.5 billion lire, mainly in machinery, mechanical and electro-technical devices, furniture, steel and tanned leather.

However, Friuli is known not only for adapting and pioneering in the technological world. It is also known as the birthplace of world famous athletes like Primo Carnera, the 1933 heavy-weight boxing champion; Dino Zoff and Enzo Bearzot, respectively goalie and coach of the 1982 Soccer World Champions, Odorico da Pordenone, who repeated Marco Polo's travel to China and was one of the first railway builders in Europe, and Carlo Rubbia, the creator of the Collider of Geneva for which he received the Nobel Prize for Science in 1984.

Friuli has an ancient and tragic history which records many invasions, plagues, earthquakes and wars commencing with the Roman civilization of Aquileia, to the rule of the Longobards, a central European people of German origin; from the Aquilean Patriarchate to the Venetian Republic, from Napoleon to the Austrian Hapsburgs. As the gateway to the South, Friuli has been the unwilling host to some of the cruelest armies of the world; perhaps the most widely known is that of Attila the Hun who destroyed Friuli in 452 A.D.. History teaches us that Friuli has risen from the ashes nine times. Its emblem is the eagle of the alps, but it is better known as the Phoenix of Italy because of its ability to bounce back like it did after the 1976 earthquake. Friulani have been tempered by these events. This is why they are known as sturdy, hard-working people. This is why they have been able to overcome the tragedies that have struck their land.

I would like to conclude, honourable senators, by repeating what the President of the Chamber of Commerce of Udine, Mr. Gianni Bravo, said before he left Canada: "My hope is that the meetings in Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal will continue to nurture esteem and friendship between Friuli and Canada and that they will promote better human and trade relations between our two countries."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, as no other senator wishes to participate, this inquiry is considered to have been debated.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Thursday, December 12, 1985, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on Tuesday, October 8, 1985, to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", be authorized to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

Honourable senators, I am in a bit of a Catch-22 situation. The notice of motion relates to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology's Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, which is examining the National Film Board production with which all honourable senators are familiar. The committee feels that in order to prepare its report it will require professional help. Obviously, there will be historical data that will have to be checked, and so forth. That is quite understandable and there is no argument about that.

It has been indicated on previous occasions that some indication should be given to the Senate as to what the cost will be.

We cannot just write blank cheques to committees any more. We should have at least a ball-park figure of what the cost will be.

I discussed this with the chairman of the Subcommittee on Budgets and he has told me that he does not think it would be right to discuss a budget for the subcommittee unless the subcommittee has the authorization from the Senate to do what has to be done, that there is no sense in approving a budget if they have no authority to act.

I have been told by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs that the ball-park figure is $15,000. I will be asking that the Senate approve that amount.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

RAOUL WALLENBERG—RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I thought we had agreed that the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition be put on the Orders of the Day for later this day. My understanding is that the Leader of the Opposition wants to stand that motion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I see the point. It should be on the Orders of the Day so that we can stand it for tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I should like to give notice that when the order is called I intend to raise a point of order on the basis that the motion is irregular for containing a criticism of a decision of the Senate, and may also contravene rule 47 and rule 48 of the Rules of the Senate.

I am just giving notice that I will raise that matter when the order is called.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As a matter of courtesy, since you do not have to give notice.

Senator Flynn: I do not want to take anybody by surprise. I want the Senate to merely note that.

Senator Doody: That is a tremendous spirit of civility being introduced in the Senate.

Having witnessed this new Yuletide spirit, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 12, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING ACT

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-83

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

THURSDAY, December 12, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-83, intituled: "An Act to amend the Tax Rebate Discounting Act", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 28, 1985, examined the said subject-matter.

Your Committee heard evidence from the Honourable Michel Côté, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and from Mr. Mark R. Daniels, Deputy Minister. Mr. Frederick Woyiwada, Chief, Government Programs and Liaison, Consumer Services Branch, Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs also gave testimony.

Bill C-83 was given first reading on November 21, 1985. The main features of the Bill, as explained by the minister, are as follows. First, it will lower the maximum rate discounters can charge. Second, measures in the Bill will provide for tougher enforcement and better administration.

Your Committee agrees with the intended purpose of Bill C-83 and recommends that, when examined by the Senate, it be favourably considered.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY
Chairman

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, December 17, 1985, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Honourable senators, I should like to take a moment to bring to your attention the status of the legislative program. We have been informed that, in addition to those bills that are currently before us, on Monday we should receive from the other place Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, and Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973. In the other place there was reported today Bill C-82, to amend the Gas Revenue Tax Act. It is our hope that that bill will be before the Senate later next week. We also hope to get Bill C-79, the CCB-Northland bill.

We have been informed that the bills on the list we received prior to this—namely, Bill C-83, the Tax Rebate Discounting bill which has just been reported at the pre-study stage; Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act; Bill C-46, Bill C-47 and Bill C-48, the divorce bills; Bill C-55, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, and Bill C-80, respecting the Excise Tax Act—are all on the government list. I cannot say definitely that we will have that entire rush of business before us next week; I simply report to honourable senators what has been reported to me. I am almost certain that we will get those bills that I mentioned earlier. We have been told to expect the others, but I cannot say for sure that they will arrive.

With that in mind, it is very likely that we shall have to sit on Friday of next week. I cannot say that for sure, but we can deal with that situation when we have a better idea later next week.

Those bills that are listed as "not certain" but are with us have either been pre-studied or are in the process of being pre-studied.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I could not hear clearly. Would you please repeat that?

Senator Doody: The bills listed as being on the government's urgent list, but which I am not certain we shall get, are either in the pre-study stage or have been pre-studied. So they have all been handled in the best possible way at this point in the program.

I want to thank honourable senators for their co-operation today, particularly those on the various committees who have been working at a tremendous rate trying to facilitate the program—and I refer particularly to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce; National Finance; Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and Social Affairs, Science and Technology. They have put in a tremendous amount of time and work in trying to keep up with the schedule.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, did I misunderstand the motion? I thought that the motion was to reconvene on Tuesday next, but, then, Senator Doody referred to bills that would be coming to us on Monday. Until when are we adjourning?

Senator Doody: Until Tuesday. I said that the bills would probably come over to us late Monday afternoon. I do not believe that we could handle them any more expeditiously if we returned on Monday; hence the adjournment motion for Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

L'ACADÉMIE FRANÇAISE

THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF FOUNDING

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to speak to a subject that may not be covered under the heading "Motions", but with your consent, I will do so immediately.

Three hundred and fifty years ago, Cardinal Richelieu founded the Académie française. It was created to propagate the use of the French language, which happens to be one of the official languages of our country. I believe we also consider protecting the French language as one of our responsibilities.

I therefore feel it would be appropriate to say a few words about this distinguished anniversary. In France there will probably be a number of celebrations marking this event today. President Mitterand will be at the Académie and is expected to make a speech in the presence of its members, if I am not mistaken. I think it is appropriate to emphasize this important event and its role in our lives here in Canada since French is one of the official languages of our country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to extend many thanks to my colleague, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, for this information on the celebration of this very distinguished anniversary of the Académie française. I am sure that all senators and all Canadians rejoice in this occasion and it is a pleasure for me to join in the rejoicing.

AVIATION DISASTER

GANDER, NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before Question Period is called, I should give notice to the house that the Minister of Transport in the other place had a rather sad and tragic announcement to make about the crash of an American military aircraft in Gander, Newfoundland. The accident took place early this morning on takeoff, apparently in good weather and with no discernible cause. Yet it has resulted most tragically in the loss of many lives. I am told that there were about 250 service personnel on that plane, and a large number of them—I am not sure whether it was all of them—perished in the accident.

The Prime Minister has been in touch with the President; the Associate Minister of National Defence has been in touch with Mr. Weinberger; and the Secretary of State for External Affairs has been in touch with Mr. Shultz. We have offered the full co-operation of the Government of Canada in trying to alleviate, as far as we can, the consequences of this unfortunate event and to try to determine what caused the accident. Aviation experts from both countries are on the scene now, I believe, endeavouring to define the circumstances which gave rise to this event.

I am sure we all wish to join with our colleagues in the other place in expressing to the Government of the United States and particularly to the families of those men and women who lost their lives in this tragedy a very sincere expression of condolence and regret.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: May I ask the Leader of the Government, is it not the case that an American aircraft chartered by the military, as opposed to an American military aircraft, is involved? At least, that is the news that was conveyed to us this morning.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his query. He is quite right: it is an aircraft that was chartered by the United States military for the purpose of conveying troops from the Near East.

INCOME TAX CONVENTIONS BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the third reading of Bill S-6, to implement an agreement between Canada and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, a convention between Canada and the Cooperative Republic of Guyana and an agreement between Canada and India for the avoidance of double taxation with respect to income tax.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CUSTOMS BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the order:

Consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the Bill C-59, intituled: "An Act respecting Customs", presented in the Senate on 10th December 1985—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, before we give this bill third reading, on behalf of the government I wish to ask for your indulgence in accepting a further amendment to the bill.

[Translation]

It has to do with the omission of important words in the French version of the bill. These words appear in the English version. I am told that my friends opposite have already been consulted about this amendment.

So that the French version be the same as the English version, I move that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

Page 80, Subclause 142(1): In the French version, strike out line 2 and substitute the following:

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it the pleasure of honourable senators that the bill be now read the third time?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, as amended.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not ready to proceed on this order today, because I do not know whether the documentation has yet been circulated. Honourable senators will receive a copy of the estimates and a copy of a covering letter from the chairman of the committee to the Treasury Board. When they do, I would ask them to retain those copies in order to deal with this matter in debate since, as they will remember, the report did not form part of the permanent records of this house. If they keep their copy handy then it will be unnecessary for me to continue making copies of those documents. It is my understanding that each senator will be provided with a copy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): May I inquire of my honourable friend when he intends to introduce this matter for discussion?

Senator Frith: I will be prepared to do so as soon as there has been proper distribution of the material. I will certainly be ready to do this next week or, if the material is available, I am prepared to do it now.

Senator Roblin: I have the material, although I do not know if all honourable senators have received it.

My interest in the matter is this: After my friend speaks, I expect to say something myself, which may give rise to a general debate. The time element begins to become important here, and I hope that we can proceed with the debate on Tuesday afternoon without fail. If my honourable friend could give me that assurance, I would be much obliged.

Senator Frith: If the material is distributed today, I will deal with it later today.

Senator Roblin: That would be most obliging. Then I would adjourn the matter until Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the order stand until later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands.

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Simard calling the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's Fifteenth Anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the other day, Senator Simard painted a, to my mind, far too rosy picture of the current situation in the province of New Brunswick.

By his own admission, his speech was meant as a political creed and testament. But it was more than that, as I remarked when the debate was adjourned.

To me and to many other senators, but especially to thousands of Canadians in New Brunswick, what the previous speaker said was no more and no less than an elegy for a political regime that has lasted beyond the limit acceptable to today's democratic societies.

Senator Simard, in fact, sounded the death knell of the Hatfield administration, to which I will refer in greater detail later on.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

I also said that his speech could be called the starting shot for an eventual by-election in the city of Edmundston, where a vacancy was created by the much applauded departure of the new senator from New Brunswick who has just joined us.

The city of Edmundston has been without a provincial member since last June. It is not a very desirable situation and reflects the stagnating political situation in my province.

Senator Simard's analysis of his leader and their years in power is, of course, distorted as a result of his obvious admiration for the individual and his achievements. This is understandable.

I am not criticizing Senator Simard's choice of topic. I recognize his right to parade the emperor and his new clothes in a public forum, even if, to my infinite regret, he is talking about the Premier of my province. In all fairness, I must admit that very definite progress has been made in the area of equal rights and equal status for linguistic and cultural communities in New Brunswick.

In fact, I have applauded many of the Premier's achievements, as did many of my fellow parliamentarians.

I will even admit that the presentation of the constitutional clauses committing New Brunswick to recognizing the linguistic equality of French and English was for me a very emotional and satisfying moment.

It is only fair to recognize that Canadians and Acadians in New Brunswick, thanks to their stubborn defence of their demands, have achieved a tolerable level of cultural autonomy in a number of areas. By that I mean that more still remains to be done.

I took part in some of these battles when I was younger, as my parents did before me. I made a modest contribution as a provincial public employee under the Honourable Louis-J. Robichaud. I have fought for the rights of my fellow citizens as part of my political involvement for 17 years, at all levels of the official languages legislation, in the debate on the Constitution and on a day-to-day basis in the course of my work in the federal capital.

Therefore, I would not only be a blind but a deaf partisan if I did not give some credit to the Hatfield government for tangible progress, and other deeds which are purely symbolic.

In fact, along with some of my colleagues at the time—Herb Breau, Maurice Dionne, Michael Landers, Maurice Harquail and, of course, Roméo LeBlanc—I supported and voted in favour of federal appropriations which made it possible to build French community centres in Fredericton, in the city of Saint John, and in the Miramichi area.

We too at the federal level had put our shoulder to the wheel, for otherwise the progress which has been achieved would probably still be in expectation.

I also know that the Liberal Party of the New Brunswick Legislature and its caucus have often played the role of catalysts and moderators in the preparation of policies, projects and programs which were carried out under the previous administration, or newly announced or established under the Hatfield government.

Success did depend on that kind of general consensus on the floor of the legislature; otherwise the efforts could have been premature, probably ill-conceived or, worse still, badly orchestrated.

The point where I begin to disagree with the previous speaker has to be his narrow perception of the evolution of the rights of New Brunswick's linguistic communities. I would like to think that I am in a much better position than he is to grasp the finer points of the evolution of those cultural circles, because I was born and raised there, I lived there and, I would think, I got to know them better than he did.

Indeed I was born in a bilingual locality, not in a privileged and exclusively French-speaking community, as is the case in many regions of New Brunswick. I feel all the richer for it, and I certainly have no intention of apologizing for this cultural endowment.

Do not be mistaken, honourable senators, should I or Senator Simard laud our respective parties, we obviously do so to score political points. That is fair enough and quite acceptable.

Unfortunately I blame certain national media—and I would single out Francophone journalists, those of Quebec in particular—for failing miserably to understand what is now happening in New Brunswick. They want to explain the debate in its simplest common denominators. They would have us believe that the fierce debate taking place now in New Brunswick is another conflict between Francophones and Anglophones.

I think that is a distorted interpretation of what is going on. They project a false image and irresponsibly fuel the debate. I think that Quebec, which lived through such miseries over the last 15 or 20 years, and especially Quebec editorialists, should let New Brunswickers fend for themselves, totally capable as they are of solving their own problems at home. They do not need an infusion of separatist notions to solve them.

Senator Simard described some of my fellow citizens from New Brunswick who object to the proposals for a reform of our cultural communities as bigots and dinosaurs. I do not want to associate myself with these comments as I am well aware of the events which brought English-speaking settlers to New Brunswick. Honourable senators, we must not forget that, just like the Acadians, the Loyalists had been forced to leave the country of their choice. It is true that there may have been conflicts when the Loyalists came. However, when we compare the history of New Brunswick with that of other so-called civilized countries, I believe that our two communities have been able to find better grounds for agreement and accommodation than many other groups elsewhere.

In any case, I would not like to live under a political system and be subject to laws motivated by reactions or ideas which do not recognize the right of others to live as they choose.

In New Brunswick, a so-called bilingual community is wedged between the French- and English-speaking majorities. This community has reached this stage of evolution because of quite natural circumstances, such as alliances, marriages, business or trade partnerships, or simply because someone was born and raised in such or such a village. It is in fact in this so-called bilingual community that the debate has become embittered in New Brunswick. The present government tried to impose a system which had the effect of causing profound divisions in these communities, to such an extent that these issues are still unresolved and still before the courts.

This is what happens when policies which do not take the facts of a situation into account are developed or implemented too quickly. When it is a question of the human or the cultural factor, people must not be rushed. I am not one of those who believe that the French-speaking have made sufficient progress. As I said earlier in my remarks, there is still room for improvement. This will be achieved whatever party is in power because the changing factors behind those thrusts are so strong that no political system could resist them. The process will only stop when full equality has been achieved.

However, I deplore the strange situation that the next administration in New Brunswick will inherit. Those who will succeed the Hatfield government unfortunately will have to spend plenty of time repairing damaged bridges, tearing down fake fences that were set up as a result of irresponsible debates over the last few years, the last few months. That succession will be quite a burden for the new administration in New Brunswick. Still, the problem will have to be faced with a lot of courage. It is no longer possible to fall back in New Brunswick. The new government will have to take for granted the progress made under Louis Robichaud and his predecessors, and also under Richard Hatfield. There is no going back.

It does not make sense for the English-speaking community to think that a new government will coldbloodedly apply the brakes on that change or the carpet will be pulled back under recorded history. That cannot be.

Honourable senators, I know that time is pressing today and other senators wish to rise on other matters. I therefore ask for your indulgence and leave to move that the debate be adjourned in my name. I wish to pursue the subject further next week, and I thank you.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 5:

Consideration of the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I mentioned yesterday, we are establishing a bit of a precedent in the consideration of this report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Is it a precedent according to the rules?

Senator Frith: It is strange that that is so, but the only basis upon which it could be said that we have not followed the rules—

Senator Roblin: Is that you have not followed them!

Senator Frith: —is that this is not “a report.” Of course, this is a report. It is not termed a “report”, but it should certainly be considered a report under rule 67(f), I agree.

If honourable senators have before them the documentation from the Internal Economy Committee to which I referred yesterday, they will see the draft of a letter that is to be sent by the chairman of the committee to the President of the Treasury Board. The quickest way to proceed would be to quote from that letter. In doing so, I will have some comments to make.

The draft letter is addressed to the Honourable René Robert de Cotret, President of the Treasury Board. It reads:

Dear Mr. Minister:

Enclosed are “Manuscript 2” and “Standard Object of Expenditure” reporting form, with regard to the Senate of Canada 1986-87 Main Estimates, which supersede—and I underline the word “supersede”, —the draft manuscripts of the program planning elements for 1986-87, in the amount of $30,267,595, forwarded to your Secretariat earlier.

There are two or three points that I should like to make on that paragraph. Honourable senators will note that attached to that letter are the forms that are used by all departments to report to Treasury Board, and they contain the necessary modifications so as to apply to the Senate. Those are the Manuscript 2 and the Standard Object of Expenditure reporting forms that are referred to in the first and second lines of the first paragraph. I asked honourable senators to underline the word “supersede”, which appears in the third line of the first paragraph. I understand that the Treasury Board normally asks all departments or spending agencies to send forward a rough idea of what has become known in what, I suppose, is not too attractive a “joul,” as a ballpark figure as to what they think the estimates will be. That figure was $30,267,595, and it was not simply taken out of the air.

During the year there has been a number of proposals brought forward, such as renovations to the Victoria Building, for example, or the possibility of OASIS services for senators. Our financial officer, Mr. Bourgeau, was asked by the committee to put forward the high figure in all cases and to return with a set of figures on which we could begin to work in order to try to reduce or change it in an appropriate way. That is how that figure was arrived at, and, if I may use this expression, it can appropriately be called the ballpark or starting figure.

The next paragraph begins:

The Main Estimates of the Senate for 1985-86 amounted to $26,984,400.

I will explain how that figure was arrived at. In 1984, when considering the 1985-86 estimates, having just gone through an election and with the formation of a new government, we had not organized the Internal Economy Committee. The exigencies of time for the submission of estimates required that some estimates of the Senate be submitted before the Internal Economy Committee had a chance to deal with them. Last year, therefore, not only did the Senate not deal with the estimates, but the Internal Economy Committee did so in a pro forma way because of those special circumstances. That is how the figure of $26,984,400 came about, without any senators being aware of it until after it had been submitted.

Continuing on in reading that paragraph:

Those—

that is, the estimates,

—for 1986-87 total $28,374,373, an increase over last year's figures of $1,390,173, representing 5.15%.

Honourable senators will notice that the ballpark figure was $30,267,595, which was reduced to $28,374,373, the latter figure being the estimates for 1986-87. That represents an increase over last year of 5.15 per cent, but I will have something further to say about that figure because, for reasons which I will explain, the real net increase is something like 1.6 per cent.

The next paragraph begins:

Non-operating costs total $21,694,363.

That $21 million figure will be taken from the $28 million figure. Continuing with paragraph 3 of the letter:

Under this heading, Salaries and Wages total $16,535,495, which figure includes statutory increases at the rate of 3.8% amounting to $577,458.

In other words, there was more than half a million dollars that the committee had no control over at all. That was a statutory matter. The increase takes place whether we say yea or nay.

Funds have not been provided for nine (9) person-years.

• (1440)

I will not get into the question of person-years, except to say that that was consistent with the request of the Treasury Board, as I recall. The following is important if one is to understand what the real increase is over last year:

The increase in the 1986-87 Main Estimates' overall total, over the figure for 1985-86, is due in part to the inclusion of the following extraordinary items, representing 69.7% of the total increase:

In other words, if you go back to the second paragraph, the increase is 5.15 per cent, but almost 70 per cent of that 5.15 per cent consists of “the following extraordinary items.” I make 70 per cent of 5.15 per cent to be 3.589 per cent. So, if we subtract that from the 5.15 per cent, we will get a figure that will show up on the next page:

The increase in the 1986-87 Main Estimates' overall total, over the figure for 1985-86, is due in part to the inclusion of the following extraordinary items—

Upgrading of Information systems to provide compatibility with the House of Commons OASIS system $350,200

Honourable senators, the figure that was first proposed for OASIS was substantially larger than that. Senator Doody or Senator Phillips may correct me on these figures, but the OASIS consists of two units. One unit is the screen that gives one access to all of the software and the information that comes through OASIS. That is a comparatively inexpensive item. It is something like $600 or $700. But, as part of OASIS, there is a word processing system, and that is a five-figure cost: $14,000. Therefore the whole unit costs approximately $20,000, or a little more.

The committee was concerned with such a large figure, when it might well be that some senators did not want the word processing equipment. Therefore we arranged for a questionnaire to be sent around, asking honourable senators what they wanted. Did they want the television monitor and the processing, or did they want the television monitor alone? I do not think you can get the word processing alone. It is an extension of the monitor. Therefore the figure of $350,200 provides for the word processing—that is, the full range, the $20,000 ticket—for those who wanted it, and the OASIS for all those who wanted it. That figure is substantially less than the figure it would cost if we were to be totally equal with the House of Commons and were to have both the word processor and the monitor.

The next item is "Research assistance." Honourable senators will remember that, from time to time, senators have made comparisons of the research facilities and research support which they receive compared with that given to members of the other place. It has been discussed in the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee for as long as I can remember, indeed, ever since I have been on the committee. This year a proposal was made that instead of having individual research assistants for each senator, we would try to come up with a panel of ten research assistants who would be available to the caucuses and to the senators. It meant that we had to come up with a figure, and the figure produced by our staff for ten people was approximately $320,000, which is $32,000 per head for the ten.

That evolved into an improved suggestion, that we would set aside this amount and, rather than set up an establishment of ten research assistants, we would consider having the funds available for some contract work, for example, and for other ways of furnishing that research assistance.

So, honourable senators will understand that this is very much a pilot project. It is an attempt to start down the road to improve research assistance for senators. It is quite a modest amount, when compared with the amount that is available to the House of Commons—a very modest amount. Its form is not engraved in stone. The only thing that is firm about it, as I understand the will of the committee, is that we want it as a start along the road to better research assistance for senators. That is the explanation for that amount.

The next amount is:

Renovations to accommodate full complement of Senators and relocate Senators from the Victoria Building to the Centre and East Blocks	200,000

The reason for that was that we had a much fuller complement of senators than we have had for some time. You will recall that many of our new senators were located in the Victoria Building, where the facilities were found to be quite unsatisfactory in several respects. There was the problem of furnishing, which I think was more or less solved. There was the problem of security, of other services, and of sharing the building—and that, in turn, had an effect on security. Therefore the plan was to try to upgrade the Victoria Building, and the estimate was $600,000.

In the meantime the chairman of the committee, Senator Charbonneau, had been in touch with Public Works, and with other ministers in the government, with the objective of getting space for senators in the East Block. Between the time that we received the estimate of $600,000 to improve the Victoria Building, and the time that we finished our work, Senator Charbonneau was able to get a firm undertaking that when, in due course, the 1910 wing of the East Block becomes available—that will probably start soon, but it will not be completely available until next fall—senators would then occupy the East Block. All senators who wish to leave the Victoria Building will then be able to get space either in the East Block or, by rearrangement, in the Centre Block.

Those senators who are in the Victoria Building were prepared to say, "There is no point in going to elaborate changes here, to the amount of $600,000. We will put up with what we have." There will be moving costs, and the committee accepted a figure of $200,000. We therefore cut $400,000 off that $600,000 and left $200,000, which may be more than we shall need. However, in the opinion of several experienced members of the Internal Economy Committee, that was felt to be an adequate amount in order to make that move.

I believe that is a good news item, because it means that all those senators who would like to be closer to the Hill will be able to be relocated and will no longer feel alienated, as they sometimes do in the Victoria Building.

The change will mean moving senators to the Centre Block and the additional space in the East Block, and moving some staff into the Victoria Building. The objective is to have those senators, who so wish, located in office space close to the Centre Block, and for support staff who do not need to be close to the Centre Block, to be located in the Victoria Building.

Honourable senators, if you turn the page you will see the last item of the extraordinary items. Honourable senators will remember that the three extraordinary items that we have dealt with are the OASIS system, research assistance, and the move from the Victoria Building to the East Block and Centre Block. The fourth item is described as, "contingency funds to provide for additional Senate Committee work, as well as Joint Committees," and that is also a reduced figure. The total figure for committees is $1,390,173. The figure of $100,000 for contingencies amounts to less than 10 per cent of the total figure. It is very hard for committees to judge exactly what their work will be for the fiscal year 1986-87. We asked the committees to draw up their estimates and they did so. We discussed the figures with them, and some alterations and cuts were made to their proposals. The members of the committees involved did their best, and they were very helpful as it turned out. However, we do not know what additional committee work there might be. We do not know whether there might be agreement on the formulation of joint committees, for which we would have to pay our share. Therefore, that $100,000 is there almost as a nominal figure in the event if we get a lot of additional work. It is there to take into account the possibility of unforeseen work by the committees. The next paragraph reads:

As you will notice, the figure to provide for these items plus the $577,458 provided for statutory increases for Salaries and Wages, amount to $1,547,658, representing more than the total increase in the 1986-87 Budget ($1,390,173).

The next paragraph will explain something I mentioned earlier. It reads:

If the four extraordinary items above are excluded,—

That is, OASIS, research assistance, renovations to accommodate senators and the contingency funds for committees.

—the increase reflected in the Senate's Main Estimates for 1986-87, over the Estimates for 1985-86, becomes 1.6 per cent.

It seems to me that that is a very responsible and prudent figure. In fact, it is almost a stingy figure. However, there it is. The last paragraph is important also, and it reads:

At this time, I wish to bring to your attention that the Senate is awaiting the detailed study of its Master Plan on Security which should be available by March 31, 1986. This Master Plan involves elements of compatibility with the security measures implemented in the House of Commons, which are yet to be determined. The plan may entail the provision of further funds which would be submitted to you as supplementary estimates at that time.

The first ballpark figure included a figure for the security changes.

When the committee began its work, the Leader of the Government in the Senate sent a letter to the chairman of the committee and to the members of the committee pointing out that the estimates for the Senate would be due some time in December and asking it to consider restraint in budgeting for any increases. He pointed out that guidelines had been laid down for the line departments and requested that, although the Senate as such is not a line department, the committee take into account the government's wish for restraint and asked that it do its best to keep the figures within the guideline or, at least, to keep in mind the guidelines the government had set out when coming up with its estimates. The committee set to work and, it seems to me, agreed to his request. It worked long hours. There were many meetings, many adjourned meetings, many requests for further information and much debate. There was discussion back and forth with committee chairmen. Senator Doody came to each committee meeting wearing an old hat that he had worn when he was, I believe, President of the Treasury Board or Minister of Finance or the equivalent in Newfoundland.

Senator MacEachen: It is not a hat, it is a crown.

Senator Doody: A crown of thorns.

Senator Frith: I must say that he wore it like a crown of thorns. Certainly he played the devil's advocate, if that is an appropriate metaphor, and so did others. My impression and recollection of the work of the committee is that it was essentially non-partisan. If there was any partisanship at all it was understandable that from time to time government members felt a greater urgency to follow their leader's requests for restraint.

However, generally speaking, the meetings were not partisan and quite frequently there would be as strong a pitch from the Liberal side for an increase or for not making a cut as from the government side. Certainly the positions taken crossed party lines on many occasions. I am sure that the Leader of the Government is pleased to hear that the committee did this work and reduced what started out as approximately a 14 per cent increase.

Senator Doody: A 14.88 per cent increase.

Senator Frith: An almost 15 per cent increase. The reduction is to a gross of 5.15 per cent, including statutory items over which there was no control, and cuts were made to all the added items such as OASIS and so on, to come up with a net figure, if you exclude the extraordinary items and the statutory items, of only 1.6 per cent increase.

I would be pleased to answer any questions either today or, in the event that I adjourn the debate for questions, next week. However, I understand that the Leader of the Government wishes to speak. Considering the background as I see it, I am sure that we are going to enjoy receiving his thanks for the good work that we have done.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government speaks, may I make one very minor observation? I am afraid that I have the inveterate habit of checking figures in a letter such as this. If the honourable Senator Frith will address his attention to paragraph 2 of our Speaker's letter, he will find that the figures do not add up correctly. If the amount for 1985-86 is $26,984,400, and if the increase is $1,390,173, then the total for 1986-87 should be $28,374,573, not $28,374,373. Alternatively, if the $28,374,373 figure is correct, then the increase should be $1,389,973. I thought it would be a shame if the Senate should lose $200 in its address to the Treasury Board.

Senator Frith: Whatever.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Honourable Senator Frith. In his remarks concerning the conduct of the committee, he referred to those who wished to make cuts in certain items as being devil's advocates. I ask him how he arrived at that decision because in my viewpoint the devil's advocates were the ones who were advocating increases.

Senator Frith: Nothing is new. As usual, Senator Phillips and I disagree as to whether our client is an angel or a devil.

● (1500)

Senator Roblin: I do not know about the client but I am certain that Senator Phillips is on the side of the angels. With that opinion in mind, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE COMMITTEE TO ENGAGE SERVICES— ORDER STANDS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Wednesday, December 11, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on Tuesday, October 8, 1985, to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", be authorized to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, in giving notice of this motion yesterday I mentioned the dilemma that we found ourselves faced with with regard to attempts to get committees and subcommittees to prepare budgets for their work. Senator Marshall, the chairman of that committee, was mindful of that and had prepared a ballpark budget of $15,000. That was submitted to the Subcommittee on Budgets this morning and approved but it has not gone to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

I wanted to acquaint the Senate with the fact that we have received a budget from the subcommittee for this and it will be dealt with by the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee at its next meeting. I understand that it has been recommended by the subcommittee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps we should stand this order until we get the report of the committee.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.40 p.m., the sitting of the Senate was resumed.
The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gérard La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act to amend the Seeds Act and the Canada Grain Act (Bill C-64, Chapter 47)

An Act to amend the Governor General's Act, the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act, the Salaries Act and the Judges Act (Bill C-78, Chapter 48)

An Act to provide for the creation by amalgamation of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada (Bill S-5)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, December 17, 1985, at 2 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED ACTS

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT-MATTER OF BILL C-84 TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, tabled the committee's twelfth report, on the subject matter of Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION REORGANIZATION BILL

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

Hon. William M. Kelly, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-66, intituled: "An Act respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 5, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations and recommendations:

CLAUSE 5(1)(a) of the Bill requires the articles of continuance of the Canada Development Corporation (CDC) to prevent any one resident, either alone or together with associates, from owning more than 25 percent of the voting rights of CDC.

CLAUSE 5(6)(h) provides that persons are associated if, in the opinion of the Board of Directors, they are parties to an agreement or an arrangement which requires them to act in concert with respect to their interests in CDC. The Committee was assured that under the provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act the Board would have to act honestly and in good faith with the view to the best interests of the Corporation in forming its opinion. The Committee concluded that Clause 5(6)(h), which is indetical to a section of the Canada Development Corporation Act, 1971, could have been worded more precisely.

The Committee, cognizant of the government's stated concern that if any change was made to Clause 5(6)(h), a person could apply to the courts for rescission, claiming that the change made was substantive, decided to report the Bill without amendment and to bring this situation to the attention of the Senate.

The Committee recommends that in drafting government bills, great care be taken to ensure that the provisions of the bills fully embody the intent of the government.

Respectfully submitted,

WILLIAM M. KELLY
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the committee has reported the bill without amendment. Therefore, by our rules, the report stands adopted. We have dispensed with the reading of the report, so either now or later this day I would like the chairman to read it. If not, I would like honourable senators on this side to have a chance to read it, because when we give the bill third reading we will be doing so on the basis of the report which, apparently, continues some comments. I would like some separation between the time we learn about what the report says and the time that we give the bill third reading.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): If honourable senators would like the report to be read now, it is perfectly all right with us. We have no intention of trying to submerge it.

Senator Frith: No, I was not suggesting that you were.

Senator Doody: If it is honourable senators' preference to have it read later this day, that is fine with us as well, or the report can be read before third reading of the bill tomorrow.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should have it read later this day or we can review it overnight and have third reading tomorrow.

Senator Doody: That would be perfectly satisfactory with us.

Senator Frith: Perhaps, so that we do not have to wait for Hansard, the Table could have photocopies made of the report and distributed to us either here or at our offices.

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

AUTHORIZED TO EXAMINE SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-68

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-68, intituled: "An Act to amend the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Criminal Code", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I take it that the chairman of this committee has been consulted.

Senator Doody: This motion is at the request of the chairperson. The Minister of Justice and his associates in the other place have such high regard for the chairperson of that particular committee that I understand they have requested her to pre-study this bill, together with the next one on my list. The chairperson of this committee, therefore, has asked that this matter be brought forward.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT AND OTHER CONDITIONS
GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Based on some information that came to my attention this past weekend, I understand that very little, if any, of the money that has been promised in the various programs announced by both the federal government and the provincial governments to deal with the serious situation in agriculture resulting from the drought and other conditions has, in fact, found its way, as yet, into the hands of the producers. In fact, there are several farmers to whom I spoke on the weekend who have not, to date, received one cent from any program. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can give us some assurance and some encouragement that the administration of these programs will be accelerated, at least to some extent, in order that the people who have been promised assistance will, in fact, receive the money into their hands. Some of these programs were announced as long ago as three months, but, as yet, the money has not filtered through the administrative system.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will take my honourable friend's question as notice, insofar as it relates to the federal administration.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is a little more complicated than that. To take notice of the question is not good enough, because there are two things that seem to be happening: one is that they have to work out some kind of arrangement with the provinces for the distribution of this money; the other is that in Saskatchewan, according to reports I have heard, the money simply went to the provincial treasury to partially pay for a program that had already been announced.

It is again being raised as a possibility that the $150 million that was announced by the Minister of Agriculture a few days ago will, in fact, be used for crop insurance programs in future years rather than as a payment to be received by farmers in 1985 or early 1986.

Another concern is that it seems that the two levels of government are taking a great deal of time to work out the administration so that they will maximize political credit. That means that farmers have to wait longer and longer.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could take those concerns into account when he is seeking further information.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is on the wrong track; if the farmers have to wait longer and longer, there will be precious little political credit to be gained.

With respect to the first part of his question—namely, whether or not the $150 million will be used in connection with future crop insurance programs—the answer is no, it will go to the farmers.

THE ENVIRONMENT

TOXICOLOGY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he could tell us whether the government has any long-term plans for research and development relating to toxicology.

Last November, in the economic statement, the government cancelled support of a number of science issues, including support for what was planned to be the joint Guelph University-University of Toronto Toxicology Centre. It is not that particular centre I wish to ask about, but now we have the Minister of the Environment alarmed by reports of toxic problems in the Great Lakes and elsewhere and saying that large sums of money may have to be put into research in that area. That centre, by this time, could have trained a number of qualified people, and could have been available to answer many of the minister's questions.

I am now puzzled as to whether the government is responding in a short-term way to the current crisis, or whether there are, in fact, any long-term plans to establish research and development in this area, an area of greater and greater importance in this country and in the minds of Canadians.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think I would be exaggerating if I were to tell my honourable friend that in my opinion the current Minister of the Environment is very active and dedicated to his job. From everything one can see from the announcements he has made to date, he is taking practical steps.

My friend has asked a question that has to do with a great many factors which certainly do not lend themselves to answers during Question Period. So, I will take the questions as notice and provide the answers in due course.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION—OFF-THE-RECORD PRIVATE BRIEFINGS—JOB SECURITY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, on December 3 of this year I asked the Leader of the Government a question concerning the sale of de Havilland Aircraft of Canada to the Boeing Corporation. This sale has been the subject of a great deal of interest. I understand that members of the Prime Minister's Office and senior government officials have held private briefings—off-the-record private briefings—concerning this sale. Could the leader give us any information on that?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no information on that topic.

Senator Sinclair: I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate will make inquiries to see if such private briefings have been held between members of the Prime Minister's Office, senior government officials and selective groups?

Senator Roblin: I really must be careful in my answer so as not to undertake to deliver more than is possible. I will take my honourable friend's question as notice, and to the extent that I can answer it, I will.

● (1410)

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I, too, have a question concerning briefings on the de Havilland issue. Was the Leader of the Conservative Party in Ontario briefed on the question of jobs with respect to the de Havilland sale to Boeing?

Senator Roblin: I have no information concerning any consultations with the Leader of the Conservative Party in Ontario.

Senator Grafstein: I should like to follow up on that. The Leader of the Conservative Party in Ontario moved a motion in the Ontario legislature recently because of his apparent concern about the fact that there was no guarantee of jobs following from the sale of de Havilland. Mr. de Cotret on CTV "Question Period" indicated that there is some form of guarantee that the technology developed by the de Havilland corporation will be utilized only for manufacturing jobs in Canada. This issue is of great concern in Ontario, and perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate might give us more information on this question because of the unrest caused by the de Havilland sale.

Senator Roblin: It seems that whenever you sell a crown corporation you run into this problem. I believe the Government of Ontario is struggling with the same problem with respect to the sale that they are contemplating of Urban Transit and where there is also a question of job security at issue. The best thing I can do is to inform myself as to what precisely my colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, said on television and then I can report to my honourable friend.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Could the leader give an undertaking to find out whether or not briefing sessions were held for the various caucuses at Queen's Park and were not held for caucus members in Ottawa?

Senator Roblin: I do not know what caucuses my honourable friend refers to. I presume he is talking about the caucuses of the Progressive Conservative Party. I can take no responsibility whatever for what went on in the caucus of the Progressive Conservative Party in Ontario, and what went on in the Progressive Conservative caucus in this place is a matter of confidentiality.

Senator Olson: Let us be clear what the question was. The question was whether senior officers of the federal government, particularly from DRIE, did provide senior officers to brief the caucuses at Queen's Park—the Progressive Conservative, the Liberal and the NDP caucuses there—while such briefing was denied the caucuses in Ottawa. That is the question. I am not asking what went on in the caucus. Did they provide senior personnel to have these briefing sessions?

Senator Roblin: I think that that is an expansion of the question already asked by Senator Sinclair and I give the same answer.

PARLIAMENT HILL

"FAIRYLAND OF BEAUTY AND EXCITEMENT"

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I should like to direct the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate to something which we have all noticed outside of this building, namely, that there has been a distinct and profound change in the Christmas decorations. Obviously, someone is responsible for this and I presume it might be our genial Minister of Public Works and that most excellent and innovative chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mrs. Jean Piggott. Whoever is involved, I think that they have created a fairyland of beauty and excitement that even certain aging senators like myself can rejoice in at this season of advent. Since we are all here on behalf of the people of Canada, and I have heard them gasp with delight at the beauty that has been created, I would like him to relay to those involved with the idea and the execution that they have wrought something very rare in that it is not often that the creativity of man can improve upon the creation of God, and in this case I think they have done so.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Macquarrie, as usual, is the master of understatement.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will convey Senator Macquarrie's remarks to the Chairman of the National Capital Commission, Jean Piggott. I will read in Hansard what my honourable friend has just said to see what he really means by it, and if it is an item that should be brought to their attention I will see that that is done.

Senator Guay: The Leader of the Government might ask at the same time what the cost was.

An Hon. Senator: Scrooge!

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would not want to sound like Scrooge but I think it is a waste of money in most respects.

Some Hon. Senators: Boo! Boo!

POVERTY

REPORTED STATEMENT OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS ON "ELEMENTARY CONDITIONS"

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have in my hand a copy of an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen today with the dateline "Jagudan, India." It is a Canadian Press story, and the four-column title reads: "Clark pleased with 'self-help' outcome of aid to India."

I have little to say about the body of the story, but I am somewhat flabbergasted and puzzled by the quotation attributed to Mr. Clark in the last paragraph, which reads as follows:

"It's very much an eye-opener for a Canadian to go into a rural village in a country like India and see the very elementary conditions," said Clark.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: When was the Secretary of State for External Affairs last subjected to an eye-opener in some of our native communities here in Canada? Who is he trying to kid? Why is he so patronizing of other people's misery when we have our own fundamentally unresolved "elementary conditions" in Canada with which to deal?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not know whether the honourable gentleman has been quoted correctly, but let us assume that he has.

Senator Corbin: I am.

Senator Roblin: I do not question what Senator Corbin has said; it is the press report which I think requires verification.

The point is, I think it is quite a natural reaction for anyone to express concern when they meet situations which are less than desirable. That, however, in no way means that the same person is ignoring problems in his own country. If you look deeply enough, every country in the world can produce evidence of poverty which would concern all of us.

I think it is not unreasonable that the minister should express his concern in India, as he has expressed it in connection with Canadian situations.

HUMAN RIGHTS

AFGHANISTAN AND IRAN—UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTIONS—CANADA'S POSITION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

On the weekend we were informed by most papers that the General Assembly of the United Nations, for the first time, adopted resolutions on Friday expressing deep concern over the human rights situations in Afghanistan and Iran. Unfortunately, the story did not spell out which way Canada voted or whether we abstained on these resolutions.

The Afghanistan resolution was carried by a vote of 80 to 22, with 40 abstentions. The draft on Iran was endorsed by 53 votes to 30, with 45 abstentions.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be good enough to inform us today or at the next sitting which position Canada took on these resolutions?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, honourable senators, I will get that information.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—NOTIFICATION OF U.S.S.R.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question respecting the after-effects of the resolution which we debated last week conferring honorary Canadian citizenship on Raoul Wallenberg, a resolution adopted by the House of Commons and concurred in fully by the Senate of Canada.

The resolution, among other things, states that Raoul Wallenberg has been a prisoner in the Soviet Union since 1945. I want to ask the Leader of the Government whether the government has been in touch with the Soviet authorities, advising the Soviet government that Raoul Wallenberg is now an honorary citizen of Canada; that the appropriate action has been taken by both houses of Parliament; and ascertaining whether the Soviet government will undertake to advise Mr. Wallenberg of his new status as an honorary Canadian citizen.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will take that question as notice.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MANAGEMENT OF REAL PROPERTY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I refer to a communiqué published last week by Public Works Canada entitled, "Improved Management of Federal Real Property."

The communiqué, on page 2, states:

Another major change announced today is the consolidation under the President of the Treasury Board of ownership of federal real property. All real property—with some exceptions—

And some exceptions are listed. However, nothing is said about National Defence property. Properties exempted are national parks, native lands, lands held by crown corporations and so on.

● (1420)

Is it the intention of the government to put all National Defence property under the ownership of the Treasury Board?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I believe that the word "management" is used, so that that property would be under the management of the Treasury Board. My honourable friend could check that for me, but I believe that "management" is what is referred to.

Senator Molgat: The press release states "ownership".

Senator Roblin: I see; if the National Defence property is not excepted, one would expect that it is under the control of the Treasury Board.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

SEIZURE OF EGYPTIAN AIRCRAFT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 26 last by the Honourable Senator Sinclair respecting International Terrorism—seizure of Egyptian aircraft.

(The answer follows:)

Following the Air India disaster, special audits and penetration tests were completed at several International Airports and programs for remedial action are under way.

All checked baggage on International Flights (except U.S.A. destinations) is being examined. Air carriers are trying new systems for matching passengers and checked baggage and they are required to do passenger counts on International Flights. Air Carrier and Airport Security Regulations are both being studied and changes will be submitted for approval in the near future.

Additional baggage x-ray units (50 total) and explosives vapour detectors (EVD-1's, 26 total) are being placed at International Airports. All EVD-1's will be in place and operating by December 20, 1985.

An additional $6M has been added to the $36M already allocated for airport security in 1985-86.

Canadian Airport staff are exercising a high degree of vigilance using established security measures and a security awareness/attitude change program is currently being developed to assist these people.

Transport Canada and U.S. F.A.A. have agreed to co-operate on research and development for explosives vapour detection, passenger/baggage security systems and enhancement of search areas and x-ray pattern recognition. Improved security measures for aircrew, passengers, service staff, cargo and airports are being studied, as are special detectors for cargo handling areas, more sensitive detectors for flammable items and substances such as gasoline bombs.

The implementation of the recommendations of the Interdepartmental Committee for Security and Intelligence (ICSI) is being done on an ongoing basis.

NATIONAL PAROLE BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 26 last by the Honourable Senator Hastings respecting the National Parole Board—Appointment of Members.

(The answer follows:)

The increase to the membership of the National Parole Board from 26 to 36 is required in order for the Board to handle the additional workload created by the modification in the voting structure. The court ruled in the case of O'Brien that all Members voting on an inmate's case file had to be present at the hearing. The National Parole Board's estimation was that in order for it to abide by the Court ruling, it required 12.5 additional person/years, 10 of which were Board Members. The Treasury Board granted the Parole Board these additional person/years but because of the limitations imposed by the parole Act, these positions had to be filled with temporary members.

These members are appointed for periods of one year and a minimum of two to three months is required for the appointees to learn the legal requirements contained in the Parole Act, and to familiarize themselves with the policies and procedures as well as the procedural safeguards related to the parole process. The National Parole Board has estimated at $4,000 to $5,000 the cost of training of each temporary member.

The appointment of a greater number of permanent members would reduce the number of temporary members required while, at the same time, allowing for greater continuity and efficiency from an administrative standpoint.

With respect to the current vacancies in the National Parole Board membership, one permanent member was appointed on November 22, 1985 for the Pacific Division of the Board, and the remaining vacancies are expected to be filled in the very near future.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—USER FEES ON GREAT LAKES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 27 last by the Honourable Senator Grafstein respecting Canada-United States Relations—Bilateral Trade Negotiations User Fees on Great Lakes.

(The answer follows:)

The proposed legislation is seeking authority to levy a nominal charge to defray part of the costs of providing aids to navigation, icebreaking, and dredging services.

The introduction of such charges would only proceed after full consultation with interested parties in the public and private sectors.

In so doing, account shall be taken of all other charges currently being levied on marine stakeholders.

At the present time, the Coast Guard recovers only approximately 2.5 per cent of their expenditures which are for 1985/86 in the region of $863M.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

REMOVAL OF IMPORT QUOTAS ON FOOTWEAR

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on November 27 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen respecting International Trade—Removal of Import Quotas on Footwear.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government read the answer to the question respecting import quotas on footwear? It may inspire us to further inquiries.

Senator Roblin: I rather expect that it will. I am looking forward to continued exchanges on this topic; I am sure that I have not heard the last of it. I shall be glad to read it.

The government had no reason to conduct a separate study on the state of the footwear industry or on employment levels in particular since the Canadian Import Tribunal Report, which became public in June, 1985, was the most comprehensive review ever undertaken of our footwear industry.

In pursuit of this assessment, the Tribunal received a vast amount of evidence and testimony from the various firms in the industry as well as from the Shoe Manufacturers' Association of Canada. The Tribunal heard over 70 witnesses and received dozens of written submissions. In addition, the Tribunal itself commissioned a number of independent studies, including one on the industry's financial performance by Clarkson Gordon and another on "The Costs and Benefits of the Footwear Quota" undertaken by the Institute for Research on Public Policy. The Government had no reason to question the objectivity of these reports.

Accordingly, the Government concurs with the Tribunal report that the Canadian industry has, by and large, restructured substantially and is now ready, with the limited exception of the women's and girls' sector, to meet import competition. Labour dislocations should, therefore, be minimal.

The sensitive women's and girls' sector will continue to receive three years of protection in order to complete the restructuring program. There might be some limited labour adjustment occurring in this sector.

To the extent that there will be some human and social costs associated with the phasing out of the quotas, these will be mitigated by such various adjustment programs as the Industrial Adjustment Service program, the Skill Investment and Skill Shortage programs, the Labour Adjustment Benefits program and the Community Futures component of the Canadian Job Strategy.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that answer. I wonder whether he can tell me, either now or later, whether any of our trading partners have made comments to Canadian officials, abroad or here in Ottawa, with respect to this policy of the Government of Canada? Has there been praise, criticism or objection taken by any of our trading partners in this regard?

Senator Roblin: Praise is hard to come by in our business; probably there is more criticism than praise. My impression is that there has been some public comment which I have read and which has been reported in the newspapers on this matter, but I am not sufficiently certain to give a positive answer. I will request of the department a report so that I can tell my friend what has happened.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like leave of the Senate to proceed to order No. 7, resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly for the adoption of the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, respecting supplementary estimates (B). I suggest that we deal first with this order and then logically we can deal with the first order of the day, which is the appropriation bill. I believe that will make it a great deal simpler for everyone.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would suggest that this order stand until later today. It must be dealt with before we deal with the bill.

Senator Doody: Order of the Day No. 7 refers to the tenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, respecting supplementary estimates (B), which deals with the supply bill. I was under the impression that the Senate would prefer to consider order No. 7 before the supply bill is dealt with. The report could first be dealt with, so that many of the questions would be answered before we get to the bill. However, I have no objection to proceeding in the other direction. I was simply following the order paper as it has been prepared.

Senator Frith: I think we are pretty close on this. As the honourable senator has said, we want to be sure that the Senate has focused on the committee's report on supplementary estimates (B) before we deal with the bill. We have now stood third reading of the bill until tomorrow. Is that not correct?

Senator Doody: No. It was Bill C-66 that we stood until tomorrow.

Senator Frith: So the bill itself is on the order paper for debate in my name, is that correct?

Senator Doody: No. The scroll says as follows:

ORDERS OF THE DAY:

With leave, Senator Doody asks that the Senate proceed to Order No. 7.—

If leave is granted:

No. 7. Resuming debate on the motion for the adoption of the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting Supplementary Estimates "B"—(Senator Frith)—

If Senator Frith deals with that, the next order relates to Bill C-89, the appropriation bill. That has nothing to do with anything that we stood earlier today. That was Bill C-66. Therefore, if Senator Frith or the deputy chairman of the committee wishes to speak on the committee's report, then, in my opinion, that would be a logical way of proceeding. If that is not the desire of honourable senators, I will deal with the second reading of Bill C-89 and we can deal with Order of the Day No. 7 when we get to it. But that will mean that we will have dealt with the same subject matter twice in one day.

Senator Frith: I am sorry, as I am sure everyone is, that my attention was otherwise engaged when we were talking about the order paper. Now that I understand the situation, I should explain that I adjourned order No. 7 because we wanted to deal with it before we dealt with the supply bill. Therefore, I yield to the Deputy Chairman of the National Finance Committee to deal with the tenth report, and we can then deal with the supply bill. I may have something to say afterwards, but I believe he should speak first.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B) ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to order No. 7:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the adoption of the Tenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (B) 1985-86), presented in the Senate on 4th December, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I am certainly pleased that the matter is finally resolved.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Kelly: I was waiting for someone to suggest that I did not have to say anything at all on this order; however, I will proceed. Honourable senators, you have already seen the Tenth Report. I should like to draw your attention to the central element in that report. The committee heard from witnesses from the Treasury Board, and the Department of Finance; but, in examining supplementary estimates (B), the committee took care to compare the information contained in those estimates with estimates found in Part III of the main estimates. That was in response to a strong recommendation by the Auditor General that parliamentarians should treat Part III with considerable importance and attention. It became clear, as we proceeded to examine parts of the estimates, that given the present information flow, it was very difficult to find reasons for discrepancies without a great deal of examination and questioning. This led the committee to suggest that the Treasury Board might look into the feasibility of making available to Parliament, perhaps on a monthly basis, Treasury Board decisions affecting funding allocations along with some brief explanation. In the absence of that kind of information, parliamentarians either have to go through this investigative process or wait for Part III. Mr. Manion, who appeared before the committee, acknowledged that this was one of the weaknesses of a process that is really in a state of evolution. The parts numbered as Part III are relatively new and are part of an ongoing process of refining the whole system of getting information. In addition to looking at various Parts of the estimates, this is really the message that the committee wants to get across.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I recall reading the report with respect to the new Parts III of the main estimates. I believe that report expresses some concern about the fact that members of Parliament, including senators, have to do private sleuthing in order to get a true picture of the expenditure flow because the Parts III do not necessarily reflect the actual situation at the moment at which they are presented. That is how I recall the report, having read it some time ago. I support entirely the thrust of the recommendation.

Several days ago I inquired as to the procedure and monitoring which exists with respect to the implementation of such a recommendation which is now coming forth from a Senate committee. Can Senator Kelly tell me whether there is a procedure by which the Senate, through the committee chairman or through the Leader of the Government, will transmit this recommendation formally to the President of the Treasury Board and whether there is a way by which we can monitor future events to see whether that recommendation has been implemented? I would hope that there is some procedure and that it is not left to some enterprising bureaucrat to, on behalf of the minister, pick up the Senate report and say, "Minister, there is an idea here and maybe we should look at it." Is there some procedure by which we can ensure that this valuable comment is brought to the attention of the minister formally and by which we can monitor developments to see whether any attention has been paid to the work of the Senate committee?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, as the honourable Senator MacEachen knows, I am relatively new to this process. However, I share with him this same concern. My plan, as deputy chairman of the committee, is to raise that question with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to ask precisely where we go from here. I for one am not comfortable with simply being part of recording what I consider to be a very good idea and assuming that the ritual has been satisfying and accepting that nothing will happen from here on! I would like, to the extent that I am capable, to assure honourable senators that what I have described is the intention of this committee. For my part, subject to the approval of Senator Leblanc, our chairman, I would like to proceed and see what happens, if this suggestion continues to be a good idea in the opinion of the committee and of the Senate.

[Senator Kelly.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I could add a comment, since my honourable friend referred to me in his remarks. I am sympathetic to the position he has taken. In fact, there is currently before the Senate a motion with respect to the ways and means by which we should question the government as to its attitude concerning reports made by the Senate. That debate is adjourned in my name and I intend to speak to it. At that time, I hope that I will be able to satisfy members as to a suitable way of making sure that the Senate's comments are duly noted and responded to by the administration.

Senator MacEachen: Thank you.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1985-86

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved second reading of Bill C-89, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-89 is Appropriation Act No. 3 of 1985-86 and it provides for the release of the whole of the supplementary estimates (B) for 1985-86, amounting to some $1.676 billion. The total spending authority requested by the bill is just over $1.055 billion, the difference representing statutory items. The majority of the request for authority, some $553 million, relates to the implementation of the Canadian Jobs Strategy. The balance is distributed throughout a number of government programs, as demonstrated in supplementary estimates (B), which were tabled in the Senate on November 7, 1985 and immediately referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, whose report you have just heard discussed. These estimates were discussed by the National Finance Committee with Treasury Board officials on November 20, 1985, and the committee presented its report on December 4, 1985. If honourable senators would like a breakdown of the various sub-headings in the supplementary estimates (B), I have them. However, I am sure that honourable senators have already studied them very carefully.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would ask Senator Doody whether he has the comparisons and break downs of items into statutory and non-statutory items and so on.

Senator Doody: I have two pages here.

Senator Frith: Then I suggest that they be made a schedule or at least be appended to the Debates of the Senate of this day. In that way, I will have the benefit of those figures, plus the report, plus the comments made today, when I deal with the matter tomorrow. If I have an undertaking or if it is understood that we are going to do that, then I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of document see appendix, p. 1731.)

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is the first occasion on which I have been able to debate on the floor of the chamber the budget of the Senate, because, for reasons which are not too clear, we have not been in the habit of having the Internal Economy Committee requesting a debate in the Senate with respect to the budgets of this institution. I think it is a good thing that we have decided to do so now. I hope we will do so in the future, because I think there are a number of important issues which senators ought to consider with respect to their own affairs.

The Internal Economy Committee had many prolonged meetings in order to deal with its budget. The subcommittee that first considered the matter proposed an expenditure of $30.2 million, which represented an increase of 14.8 per cent over the current year. After much debate, hard work and reconsideration, the full committee were able to bring about a significant reduction in that total, and they eventually recommended the amount that was referred to on the last occasion when this subject was spoken to by the Honourable Senator Frith. This, in effect, proposes a total expenditure in the next fiscal year of $28.4 million, which is an increase of 5.1 per cent over last year and represents an increase in total expenditures of $1,390,000.00. I think it fair to say that some members of the committee, even then, were asking for further reductions, but that was not agreed to by the majority.

If one accepts the rather interesting, innovative accounting calculations in terms of percentage that were presented to us by Senator Frith the other day, the increase could be said to be further reduced to a total of 1.6 per cent, which at first hearing sounds rather interesting. However, no matter how ingenious that percentage calculation happens to be, the plain fact is, unfortunately, that, for the taxpayers who must foot the bill, the actual extra sum that we are asking them to provide next year is not 1.6 per cent over what we are spending now but really 5.1 per cent, or $1,390,000.00 more.

My thesis today is that, despite the efforts of the Internal Economy Committee, I think we can run a tighter ship, and I think we can economize further, both in dollars spent and in staff employed, and that we ought to try to do so. This budget proposes an increase of $1.39 million, or 5.1 per cent. I think we can do better. I think it can be reduced by a total of some $700,000 to give us an increase over this current year of 2.5 per cent. That is approximately half of what the proposal asks for now. That gives us an over-all expenditure of $27.7 million. I suggest that next year the Senate can get by and that it can operate, and operate well, on a budget of $27.7 million, which will enable us to limit our increased request for next year to $700,000. We can also do this with a slightly reduced number of people working in the Senate, particularly if we achieve that reduction by way of attrition, rather than by reducing the number of people who work here in other ways. I suggest to you that we can do this without short-changing our committees, without scrimping on our sessions or without detracting from the usefulness or the efficiency of the Senate. In fact, I believe that, with another $700,000 over what we have this year, we can not only keep up our standards but, by making better use of the resources of money and of people that are available to us, we may even be able to improve on what we are doing in this chamber.

I think it is important to ask oneself the question: Why? Why should we be concerned about economy to the extent that I indicate? Is there any special obligation on the Senate that we should use what I think is unusual care in deciding the burden that we should ask the taxpayers of the country to accept, and the burden that we will impose on the taxpaying public? I suggest that there is. I think there is a special obligation on this body, on this second chamber of our parliamentary system, to take great care in the calculation of its budget.

We are subject to no financial controls. We are subject only to self-control. Neither the House of Commons, the Minister of Finance, the Treasury Board or all of these put together, nor any other authority that I am aware of has any control over the budget that is put forward by the Senate. By convention, and some would even say by right, there is no authority that can cut our budget but ourselves. We are sovereign. The taxpayers, who have had no part whatsoever in putting us here and to whom we are not responsible in any parliamentary sense, and whom we do not represent in any except a democratic sense, are the people who must foot the bill which we ourselves decide they should pay. We are the masters of our fate; no one can tell us what our budget can be. We are the only authority that can deal with this matter and yet we are able to impose that request on the treasury of the country and have it fully met, regardless of what we ask for.

When one considers our position in that light, I think there are good reasons why we must be self-disciplined in this matter. There are good reasons why we must be prudent and why we must be sensitive to the financial problems of this country today. We must be sensitive to our contribution to the public debt because, just as sure as we sit here, any increase that we ask for cannot be found out of surplus funds of the government. There just aren't any. It will inevitably put pressure on the deficit and therefore on the public debt. Even though one might say that, in terms of the vast amounts of money that are involved in those calculations, our additional burden may not be a large one—nor is it—yet I think there is a very important symbolic factor that cannot be overlooked.

Therefore, I submit to the chamber that there is a need; there is a need for a self-governing body with power to demand the taxpayers' money to exercise self-discipline and to offer a prudent example. It seems to me that that is a need which we should face squarely.

Having said that, I would also maintain as vigorously as any that we have a constitutional duty to discharge; that we have a legislative and investigative function to which we must pay attention and that, when we consider our responsibilities under the Constitution, we are duty bound—and I put it that way—to seek sufficient funds from the public purse to enable us to discharge those responsibilities well. Therefore, any comments that I make about the budget of the Senate recognize not only the need for us to be self-disciplined and prudent in what we ask for, but also that we should be realistic in asking for what we need to carry out the job that has been given to us. I do not propose any economies that, in my view, would interfere with our discharging our responsibilities, and doing this well. However, I think we can meet that test while, at the same time, limiting our increased requirement for cash in the coming year to 2.5 per cent of what we are asking for now.

How, then, is it to be done? You want a decrease in the estimates of expenditures; what items should be examined? One thing I am sure: Every item of the original $28.4 million, if taken individually, can be supported in one way or another by someone or other. I have taken part in sufficient budget sessions in the course of my experience to know that experts and interested parties can always justify what they want to spend. That is a given that I think we must all accept—that interested parties and experts with information at their fingertips can always justify what they want to spend. In a sense, we are really subjected to what has been described in an air force term that will be familiar to some veterans here. There is always the danger, in budgetary considerations, that those who want to spend money can blind with science those who think that economies could be made. By that, I mean, of course, that those who have a specialized requirement for money can always overwhelm and overcome any reasons that are put forward with respect to the reduction of expenditures. It is just a given fact that anyone who has had anything to do with government, or indeed bureaucratic government expenditures, will, I am sure, vouch for. I was a provincial treasurer for some time, as was my friend Senator Doody, and when we got to the table at budget time, we found that the departments concerned and all of the people who wanted to spend were well supplied with reasons—and good ones—as to why the money should be spent. It took a real effort of will to decide that certain things should go and certain things should stay, so that the result would come within the bounds that were set before us. That, I think, is part of our function as members of the Senate.

While accepting good faith and accepting the well-intended judgment of those who appeared before the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration on the preparation of this report, we have to subject it to the kind of scrutiny and examination that I have been talking about. What I am saying is that the spender can always out-argue the budget cutter, and usually does. We see this sort of thing all around us, and the dilemma of the United States Congress seeking to cut its expenditures is the classic example these days. Congressmen know they should cut and will cut as long as the cuts do not affect them; cuts yesterday, cuts tomorrow, but never cuts today.

So, I am very conscious that if I deal with any particular item in this budget I expose my flank, because I know there are many honourable senators who have a sufficient grasp of the situation that it enables them to present important arguments as to why any economies I suggest might be unreasonable. So, I understand that I run the risk of being blinded by science from those who have a special interest in the items of expenditure that I am talking about, and that I am exposing my flank, but I will do so anyway because I am doing it for illustrative purposes, and when I come to the end, honourable senators will see that I have a method of reconciling these problems.

When we look at our budget there are some fortunate things to be noted. First of all, we do not have to worry about statutory increases. There are statutory increases over which we have no control respecting the salaries and wages of the people who work here—indeed, I think there are increases for honourable senators as well—but fortunately it is a situation that we can handle. The additional amount required for increases in salaries and wages is $577,000. Most of that can be offset; it can be offset because we are saving $538,000 in grants to parliamentary institutions. While the two sums do not exactly match, they do put us in a position where we can pay almost all of the increase of $577,000 for salaries and wages by virtue of this economy of $538,000 in respect of parliamentary institutions. That is an important consideration, and we are obliged to take that into account.

What about the rest? Let us look at some of the other items mentioned in the statement given by the deputy chairman of the committee the other day. I take, for example, research assistance. There is a new item in here for $320,000 for ten more people to provide research assistance to senators. On the face of it, that sounds like a wise expenditure of public funds because it may help us to do a better job. It is true that we have gotten along without that kind of help for so these many years, and it is true that we have the Library of Parliament which provides a great deal of assistance in this respect. But let us leave that aside. If we really need research assistance, as is suggested, I think there is a way to get that without its costing more or without hiring more staff.

In this year of grace there are 387 people working in the Senate; 93 of those work directly for senators as stenographers, research assistants or clerical assistants. There are 93 people engaged in that work, and the salaries for those 93 people total $2,524,000. I know from my own experience—and I would not be surprised if other honourable senators say the same—that some of these worthy people are not fully employed. That is not any fault of theirs; they have been given a particular job to do, but under the system they are not fully employed. It seems to me that this is an area in which we could consider some redeployment. We have 93 people working for senators directly, to say nothing of the other 294 Senate employees. I suggest they be redeployed to a better purpose, and it would not be difficult to free up ten of those people for research work, if we think that that should be done. At the same time, we will find that if people are more fully employed they will not only be happier in their jobs, but we will get all of the services we require to carry out our duties. So, if each caucus pools its staff and reassigns these people to take on a research function—and I think we can find ten willing to take on that job—then I think we will do well. In other words, there would be better use made of the people we already employ so that they can provide a service which some senators think is necessary in terms of this research function.

So, without wishing to be pedantic about it, it seems to me that this is a way in which we can meet the wish for more research assistance to senators without costing the public any more money—that is, redeploy the people we have, make better use of the people we have. I think we will find that that fits the bill.

I wish to say a word about committees and the expenses of committees. Committees are the pride of the Senate. There is no place for foolish economies in what Senate committees do. Committee work is at the heart of our senatorial activities, and is a function of the Senate which is certainly dear to me, and which I think redounds to the credit of the Senate. Insofar as the general public are aware of what we do at all, they are aware of what we do in committee. I think the public generally approves of that work.

Our committees have never been more active than in the past year. They have worked harder, held more meetings and conducted more business. I pay my respects to committee members of the Senate, particularly those in the opposition, who I think have been co-operative and helpful in our committee work. I take this opportunity to pay my respects to them. So, I am high on committees. The sum we request for committees next year raises some questions, however.

The bill for the current year for committee work is expected to be a little over $1 million. The new budget calls for some $1,286,000, which is an increase of 26 per cent. In addition to that, there is a new item called “contingency respecting committee work” of $100,000. So, total committee allocation is up considerably. If one adds in the $100,000—and it is arguable whether one should or should not—that comes to a 36 per cent increase.

Our committees have never worked harder than they have on the $1 million budget they now have. I think the kind of increase called for here, of 26 per cent or 36 per cent, depending how one looks at it, in connection with committee work may well be ambitious. It may well be that we do not need to spend that money in order to have committees do what they ought to do, and that we would be well advised to cut our cloth a little closer to our measure in this particular aspect.

Another item specifically referred to relates to the appropriation of $350,000 for the OASIS system. The OASIS system has many desirable characteristics to it. It provides a very important information retrieval facility on a television screen that has much merit and is of reasonably low cost, but there is an expensive part of the OASIS allotment which I think should be looked at, and that is in connection with word processors, which surely can only be needed in a few instances. They cost $14,000 each.

My office—and I say without reservation that it is the busiest office in the Senate—manages quite well without a word processor. My staff use significantly less costly electronic memory typewriters. A very good one with a 64 page memory can be purchased for $2,800. It seems to me that that is the way we ought to go in trying to improve services for senators.

I am also concerned that we have not sufficiently explored room for economies in our printing needs. I know there have been a number of discussions with the staff of the Senate and members of the committees about room for economy in printing needs. I think there is a good possibility that significant additional savings can still be made in this area, yet I see no evidence in the budget that we really intend to do this. It seems to me that we are missing an opportunity.

I also noticed in the information provided by Senator Frith that we are going to spend $200,000 to move senators. On inquiry I find it is intended that we move 15 senators from the Victoria Building to the East Block and Centre Block. That works out to approximately $13,000 per senator. As the offices currently occupied by senators are well furnished, it certainly raises a question in my mind as to whether this sum of money is absolutely required in the coming year.

If one wants to look at some of the smaller items not mentioned in the report, one could look at the figure of $25,000 for coffee at committee meetings. I think senators would be prepared to pay for their own coffee if asked to do so.

● (1500)

Our entertainment and hospitality budget goes up from $28,640 to $66,000 which is about an increase of two-and-a-half times.

Senator Frith: Whose hospitality?

Senator Roblin: The general hospitality. I have added all the figures together under the item of hospitality.

Senator Argue: What hospitality are you talking about? I have never heard of such a thing. Coffee in the Reading Room is all I ever got.

Senator Roblin: Senator Argue could not have attended many committee meetings because every committee serves coffee until it is running out of your ears.

Senator Argue: I thought it referred to other things.

Senator Roblin: If you read through the figures presented to us you will see that that is a separate item. The figure is $25,000 for coffee. That is chicken feed, I suppose, but it is something that we could well afford to pay for, ourselves, if we wanted to.

Senator Argue: Do I understand that we will charge our guests as well?

Senator Roblin: If I have a guest in the Parliamentary Restaurant or some place like that I am pleased to pay for my guest and I know that my friend is too.

Senator Argue: I am not talking about guests in the Parliamentary Restaurant but witnesses who appear at the committee meetings.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend thinks that I am unreasonable in this matter, that is open to debate. I simply raise the issue because it is illustrative of the kind of things that we might consider.

Computer software is going up from $5,000 to $30,000. It may be unavoidable but it certainly does raise a question in itself.

I am not going to go any further in dealing with individual items, because I am satisfied that all individual proposals can be supported by argument. The argument will convince some, and we can give increases for any item we like, but the fact is that when you get to the bottom line the increase has to be paid for and that is really what concerns me.

Perhaps it is instructive to make some comparisons with the House of Commons. I do this because in discussions on other occasions with members of the Senate I found that some of my colleagues think we are substantially better managed than the House of Commons and that we have a better record, and that may be true, but there are some comparisons that do not bear out that comforting assertion.

I go back to the time when I was appointed to the Senate and in the budget for 1979-80 the estimates of the Senate were $13.4 million. Eight or nine years later they are $28.375 million with the approved figures that are before us, and that is more than double. There has been a cumulative increase in those few years of 111.9 per cent. Some people say that times have changed and we have had a lot of inflation, we do more work and there are all kinds of good reasons. No doubt, that is true, but I think that the same argument could be made in the House of Commons. During the same period their expenses went from $83.8 million to $167.5 million which is a cumulative rate of increase of 99 per cent. If those figures interest you and if percentage increases are of any value as a source of information, the Senate costs are rising considerably faster than those of the House of Commons. It is particularly noteworthy that this year, when we are asking for 5.1 per cent more, the House of Commons has come down to 2.5 per cent more. So, one can see there an interesting comparison of trends.

Let us take another way of looking at the same thing, namely, the number of people who work for the Senate, on the basis of person years. When I came here eight or nine years ago the number of people who worked for the Senate was 264. We are proposing 406 in the coming year, including ten for research, including nine in the parliamentary relations office, but not including the ten person years which are established but not being funded. I am really talking about the number of people we intend to pay for in this budget, which is 406. In the period since I came here the number of people working has gone up by 142, which is a 53 per cent increase. During the same period the number of people working in the House of Commons has gone down, which is an extraordinary fact. I did not think that that was so until I called for the figures.

In the new year the Senate proposes an increase of ten more people and the House of Commons achieves a reduction of 70. The House of Commons is not the Senate, and I do not present these comparisons in any absolute sense that they are conclusive in every particular, but I think comparative trends cannot be without some significance.

The House of Commons is increasing its expenses by 2.5 per cent and we want an increase of 5.2 per cent. The House of Commons is decreasing its staff by 70 and we want ten more. Over the ten-year period I do not think our record has been conspicuously better than the House of Commons if anyone goes by these figures.

The Senate is not the House of Commons. We are an independent legislature. We have our own responsibilities. We have the power to set our own expenditures and we have a judgment to make; whether the figures we present are defensible and should be supported. But we also have to remember the fact, as I mentioned when I started, that as a body that is self-controlled we have a special duty to ensure that we are doing what is absolutely right, particularly as any increase we require will add to the problem of public finance and to the pressure that the taxpayers will have to bear.

I think we all agree that sober second thought is a good idea around here. It includes prudence with regard to our responsibilities and prudence with respect to our image and to our example. In this matter, I want to make it clear that I do not rest my case on any of the specific items of expenditure that I mentioned previously, because I am certain that when I sit down a number of senators could zero in on those particular items and present a sound justification for them, one which would certainly convince some that they are correct. But I am resting my case on the fact that the overall amount that we are asking for, all things considered, is more than we need to ask for. We do not need to ask for 5.2 per cent or $1.3 million more than we got last year. We can make a reasonable and acceptable request which involves increasing our budget next year by only 2.5 per cent which, in turn, translates into $700,000. We can limit the increase over last year to 2.5 per cent and at the same time we can easily reduce the number of person years we have here by some 2 per cent, which represents eight people. I would not suggest that that should be done by discharging anybody, because I do not think it is necessary. It certainly can be done by attrition over the coming period and that is what I would suggest we do.

I think our committees have worked conscientiously. They have laboured long and effectively. I suggest they have one last good push in them, and if we ask them to restrain their expenditures within the reasonable parameters I have mentioned so as to render our call on the Consolidated Revenue Fund as reasonable and as economic as we can make it, I think we can safely count upon them to do the job. While doing that, we can, at the same time, by making the best use of the people we have and the best use of our money, do an even better and more useful job as senators for the people of Canada.

I have a resolution to propose in amendment and I will read it in a moment. But there is one final thought I should like to leave with my colleagues. I hope that, regardless of what your views are on the amendment that I propose, we would deal with it as expeditiously as possible. We are approaching the time when figures have to be presented to the Treasury Board. I think that if we were to accept my resolution and report back to the Senate before the Christmas recess that would be time enough. I am even persuaded that if we could not do it within that time, it would still be worth doing if it were done at the beginning of the new year, but I hope that it would be done before we rise for the recess.

Therefore I move, seconded by Senator Doody, the following amendment to the motion proposed about the estimates for the Senate:

That the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985, be not considered at this time but referred back to the Committee with instructions that it:

- (1) reduce, by attrition, the number of persons presently on staff by 2 per cent, from 387 to 379;
- (2) conform to the guideline that the increase in the total budgetary Estimates of the Senate for 1986-87 not exceed the Estimates for the current year by more than 2.5 per cent; and
- (3) report back to the Senate before it adjourns for the Christmas recess or as soon as possible.

● (1510)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The motion Senator Roblin was speaking to is an order for the consideration of the estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87. That was brought forward pursuant to rule 67(f) which states:

The Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration . . . which is empowered on its own initiative to consider any matter relating to the internal economy of the Senate, including budgetary matters and administration generally, and to report the result of such consideration to the Senate.

This is in the same category as the report on budgets of committees and other items that are reported. It was not a motion for the adoption of the report.

That does not mean, however, that Senator Roblin's proposal is out of order, but I do not think that it is, strictly speaking, an amendment; I think it is a resolution dealing with the estimates which were before us for consideration, not for adoption.

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether the point of order is a critical one, but my wording is "that it not be considered now."

Senator Frith: That is fine. It is not just an amendment; it is a resolution dealing with the matter before us for consideration.

Senator Doody: It is separate.

Senator Frith: It can be attached to it, but it is not an amendment as such.

Honourable senators, with reference to that resolution, I suppose it is separate enough that we can now consider it as a substantive matter before us for debate and as a matter to which no one else has spoken except the mover of the resolution.

As far as the timing of the motion is concerned, I would be prepared to speak to it immediately and, speaking personally, would be prepared to vote on it if we want to proceed expeditiously. However, a number of other senators may want to speak to it; so, I do not want to, nor can I, insist that it be brought to a vote immediately even if I speak to it today.

If no one else wishes to speak to the motion today, I am quite prepared to do so.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wonder if I may be allowed to put a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We moved so quickly through the process of having the proposal read from the Chair, and I had anticipated asking him a question for clarification before that was done.

At one point, towards the end of his speech, Senator Roblin drew a comparison between the relative increase in the Senate's budget and that of the House of Commons. From an argumentative point of view, that may well be an important consideration, but could I ask him to tell us again what he is comparing and for what period? I did not quite catch what he was attempting to do when he established the difference between the operating budgets of the two houses of Parliament. Could he clarify that matter for me, please?

Senator Roblin: I do not think I was trying to make an absolute cut-and-dried argument, because the two houses are quite different, and any comparison between them has to be carefully modified so as not to give an incorrect impression. I believe I said that in my speech, but, if I did not say it then, I certainly say it now.

I was trying to show the relative trend of expenditures in the two houses in terms of dollars—that is all, dollars. The other comparison related to people employed in the two institutions. That is all I was attempting to do.

I believe I said in my speech that, while it would be wrong to draw concrete conclusions from these sets of figures—which is usually the case in most comparisons—they did indicate the trends that we were seeing in both houses. The trend in the Senate, in terms of money, was not substantially more economical than that of the House of Commons over that eight- or nine-year period. The same held true in terms of person years.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate have any idea as to where these increases in personnel arose? Has there been an increase in the number of secretaries, messengers or other personnel? Those of us who are not on the committee have very little idea as to where this increase has occurred. Where did this great increase in bodies take place?

Senator Roblin: I am really not attempting to do that because that leads to a discussion as to whether these increases were justified in the past. I am not entering into that argument. They may well have been justified. If they were not justified, I would hope that they did not happen. I am merely saying that this is the result we see before us.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

REGISTER OF SENATORS' INTERESTS

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONSIDER RELATED MATTERS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips:

That the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders consider matters related to the establishment of a Register of Senators' Interests, and report on these and any other matters relating to registration of Senators' interests, including the form and content of such a Register, considering among other matters relating to the registration of Senators' interests, the following:

- (a) remunerated directorships of companies, public or private;
- (b) other remunerated positions or offices;
- (c) remunerated trades, professions or vocations;
- (d) the names of clients when the interests referred to above include personal services by the Senator which arise out of or are related in any manner to his or her membership in the Senate;
- (e) any payments or any material benefits or advantages received from or on behalf of foreign Governments, organizations or persons;
- (f) land and property of substantial value or from which a substantial income is derived; and
- (g) the names of companies or other bodies in which the Senator has, to his or her knowledge, either himself or herself or with or on behalf of his or her spouse or dependents, any beneficial interest including—among others, shareholdings—of a nominal value greater than one-hundredth of the total capital assets of the company or other body.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if any senator feels that there is anything wrong with the suggestion in principle. I have asked honourable senators to consider order No. 8 which is, in effect, a motion to authorize the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to examine the proposed establishment of a register of senators' interests and report; in other words, that we consider the establishment in the Senate of something that is under study in the House of Commons at the same time.

I have no objection to this motion and do not intend to oppose it on principle. I think it is appropriate that it go to a committee. If, however, some senator thinks we should not be studying this at the same time as the House of Commons is doing so and considering the application of this House of Commons proposal to the Senate, then he or she might wish to intervene in the debate. Otherwise, I think we should refer this matter to the committee.

• (1520)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, might I ask a question? What is the meaning of paragraph (g)? It reads:

the names of companies or other bodies in which the Senator has, to his or her knowledge, either himself or herself or with or on behalf of his or her spouse or dependents, any beneficial interest including—among others, shareholdings—of a nominal value greater than one-hundredth of the total capital assets of the company or other body.

Does that include private companies?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not know what that paragraph means in full. That is one of the questions about which I have further questions. That is why I think that it would be a good idea to refer this matter to committee. We could then consider that question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I might be able to throw some light on the origin of this set of references. The wording here has been taken from a resolution that is in force in the House of Commons in London. This is the set of rules under which it operates with respect to this subject. The Canadian House of Commons, as we know, has thought it advisable to consider the same topics. We are being asked to do the same.

As to the advisability or definition of the terms, those are things which I had hoped the committee would look into. Because this is on the order paper by no means indicates to me that we must approve it as it stands. We may have substantial objections to what we see, or we may have means by which to improve it considerably. I hope that honourable senators will feel that this represents merely the beginning of a discussion on this topic and that the field is wide open for changes, requests for information or improvements. It is by no means a cut-and-dried proposition.

Motion agreed to.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish- Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I note that Senator Marsden is not here. I was going to ask whether she had secured the documents to which she had made reference. For the time being, however, I suppose that the order might as well stand.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we can debate the matter further but the intention, as I understand it from Senator Marsden, is that the committee, rather than Senator Marsden, will try to obtain all of the standing rules or governmental orders that apply.

Order stands.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

VISIT OF CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Wood calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a group of Canadian Parliamentarians to the Federal Republic of Germany at the invitation of the President of the Bundesrat, from May 17 to 24, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Macquarrie).

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: I have learned, honourable senators, that it is quite often more popular for a senator to shout "Stand" than it is to actually stand. I have yelled "Stand" for a long time, but I know that my colleagues are all waiting for my views on this visit that was made to West Germany in, if not the merry, at least the beautiful month of May under the chaperonage or leadership of our distinguished Speaker. I am, as the late John Diefenbaker used to say, one of those who, through the years, have believed that parliamentarians should not come back in either concealment or in apology because they have taken part in a visit to some other part of the world. Isolation would be as foolish for members of the Canadian Parliament as it was for members of the American Congress in the inter-war period. I think that even the worst of us learn something and that, perhaps occasionally, we might impart something to justify the exchange between parliamentarians.

I congratulate Senator Wood and I am ad idem with her on her findings and her value judgments. I may say that she and all of the members of the delegation were, in my view, excellent representatives of our country abroad. Our Speaker, with his suave geniality, was an exceptional ambassador of goodwill. He was the one who had to make all of the "speechettes", and speechettes are difficult. He always made them with aplomb. I thought that he held high the image of our country and our Parliament, and I commend him for that.

Honourable senators, it is fascinating to see, in an historic and beautiful country, certain things which can startle or at least impress even those who have travelled a little and lived a long time. I was charmed by the natural beauty of western Germany, of its wonderful rivers—most of them polluted, of course—its great growth and its greenness, which reminded me of Prince Edward Island. I am always impressed when I go to certain parts of Europe and see their wonderful horse-chestnut trees. Over there, perhaps one out of three has pink blossoms, whereas in Canada we have only those which are adorned by white blossoms. When I returned, of course, being as serious a research student in the natural sciences as in the political sciences, I wrote to the leading silviculturalists in Canada and learned, to my surprise, that even the white horse-chestnuts precariously wintered in this country. That came as a surprise to me. In Prince Edward Island, you ain't nobody unless you have a horse-chestnut tree on your lawn, but I am told that in most parts of Canada our climate is a little too tough for the species, and that the chances of developing some of the beautiful pink blossomers would not be very good.

Honourable senators, I thought that it was most important that we spend some time in Berlin. Although I had been to Germany more than once, I had never travelled to Berlin. While you can read to find out precisely how far the Wall is from the Reichstag building and to know all about the obscene devices, if I may use that expression, the East German authorities employ for keeping their own people in—putting it bluntly—you have to see it to get the full impact of it. When you look across a distance which is probably not much farther than that separating me from my good friend Senator Côtteau to see an armed young man from somewhere in eastern Europe who sits in a cramped observation post and who, with binoculars, looks to the west, you wonder what in the world is wrong with these people who find it necessary to literally imprison their own. The whole of East Germany has a protective wall, although it is not as elaborate as that which contains East Berlin. As we stood in the Reichstag, I thought of the time of John Kennedy, which is full of many memories, some terrible. He came back from Berlin to say:

It is our adversaries who must build walls to contain their people . . . All the world knows that no successful system builds a wall to keep its people in and freedom out—and that the wall of shame dividing Berlin is a symbol of Communist failure.

I think it is, honourable senators. I believe that if that obscene obstruction were obliterated, their state would not disappear. It would not crumble. It would not pass into nothingness. Yet there is that terrible insecurity, that awful uncertainty, as to the fate not only of their own people but of their own system. Also, honourable senators, it was interesting—to one who gives even a passing thought to history—to be in a great nation called West Germany and have no Prussia there. It seems that historically we had been brought up to think that Prussia was the epicentre of the whole thing and that the empire, as it was, was built around the great ambitions of Prussian leaders and Prussian ambitions generally. But here we were in West Germany, and Prussians are not there.

I also have to confess that I am not one of those members of the Progressive Conservative Party who extoll every day their devotion to big business, to free enterprise, and all of those things. I am way over on the progressive side. But as I looked at this great country, and while I have some idea that it has problems, I realized that one would not have to be there or have to read a great encyclopaedia to know that it is a prosperous country. It is not, by any means, a socialist country. It is a right-wing country. So even I have to admit that someone has to be doing something right; and it is so encouraging to reflect on the state of the Germany that came out of the Second World War and the Germany that came out of the First World War. Sometimes in history, as in life, we are blessed—and the world is blessed—to have the right people in the right place.

Our leaders, after 1918, never gave the German democracy a chance. There were good men in the Weimar Republic, and as they structured their democracy, it was a fine institution in faith. But our world was always closing in upon them. However, in the 1940s we had a Marshall, a Roosevelt, a Truman, a Churchill, and, difficult though he was—although he was perceptive—a De Gaulle. So things happened whereby that country was not only allowed to come forward and regain its feet economically, and develop itself democratically, but it was positively encouraged to do that. I believe that of all of the examples of western statecraft and diplomacy, their handling of the German situation was truly magnificent: strong and firm where necessary, as in the Berlin Airlift, but forward looking in reference to the Marshall Plan.

So we Canadians walked in freedom in that country. We saw its great institutions. We saw its prosperity—although we were not so naive as to be unaware of the problems which they have in their society and in their economy. But no one today is in fear and trembling about the strength of the economy of West Germany, or about its contribution.

It is often said that these are “la-la” gatherings, where “sweet nothings” are murmured. But I can recall some very useful conversations. The leader of our group was our own distinguished Speaker of the Senate. But, as one of the members, we had a member from the House of Commons in the person of Mr. Oberle, now the Honourable Frank Oberle. I recall his speaking with great candour to some of our German counterparts about things that, as it says in the old Anglican Prayer Book, they might have left undone, but yet they turned about and did—and vice versa. There are certain very serious irritations, or irritants, and I was impressed by his candour; and if an alliance is worth anything, there must be a place for candour and plain speaking. I was impressed by all of that.

Lest it be said that I am a mere Pollyanna, praising everything, I was, in fact, rather disappointed that on our last night there, when I had geared myself spiritually to go to the opera, lo and behold, the opera was taken off our agenda, and even though I wished to go alone, I had no chance. So my cultural deprivation I protest about.

Senator Doody: Maybe you should go back again.

Senator Macquarrie: Our deputy leader says that maybe we should go back again. I think I should go over there and see another play, because I am told it was in one of the great music halls in the whole world, in terms of acoustic purity. But, alas, I shall never know, since I was cut off from that flowering of my own cultural development.

But, honourable senators, our Speaker led us well. Once in a while I thought he led us to too many industrial plants. Honourable senators may be thinking that I was going to say something else; but, of course, I wouldn't. But, as one who is not terribly well-versed on industry, and less on big business, there were some that I could have done without.

But it was a highly and well organized opportunity to meet all sorts of people in many walks of life in that great republic. When one goes abroad, one should always try to learn something, and I did learn something. One of the German officials told me something that everyone else knew but which I had never heard before—that the great Dr. Kreisky, the long-time Chancellor of the Republic of Austria, was such a world salesman that he had convinced the world that Hitler was a German and Beethoven was an Austrian—and I thought that was real diplomacy and real salesmanship.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been stimulated by the comments of Senator Macquarrie to make a few observations about the parliamentary delegation to the Federal Republic of Germany, led by His Honour the Speaker. I can only join enthusiastically with Senator Macquarrie in expressing my admiration at the conduct of the Speaker of the Senate who, as the honourable senator said, conducted himself with great credit to this country and to the Parliament of Canada.

I was pleased to join the delegation because it was led by the Speaker of the Senate, and because I wanted to support him in any way I could as a member of the delegation. I have not been an avid or frequent member of parliamentary delegations. In all my years in Parliament I believe I have been a member of only three parliamentary delegations.

Senator Roblin: That was because of your being in the cabinet.

Senator MacEachen: Two of them have been led by Speakers: One to China, led by the former Speaker of the House of Commons, presently the Associate Chief Justice of the Federal Court; the second was to the Federal Republic of Germany, led by our Speaker; and the third delegation was to the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association in London some years ago, in which I had the honour of leading the Canadian delegation, and at which meeting the Honourable Gerald Regan was selected as head of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association—which, I believe was a surprise to the British incumbent and a delight to Mr. Regan, who contested what was, shall I say, a very brisk election in order to get the job. If there is anything that Mr. Regan was good at—and he was good at a lot of things—it was running elections.

Senator MacDonald: I know the feeling.

Senator MacEachen: I never thought that I would be at the corner of the Parliament Building with Mr. Regan canvassing delegates in order to help him become head of the Commonwealth Association. In fact, of the delegates at that time, one other member who comes to mind is the late John Connolly who among others was also a member of Mr. Regan's campaign team.

I have some very distinct impressions about the visit to the Federal Republic of Germany. One impression is, of course, the existence of the Berlin Wall. As Senator Macquarrie stated, it is an historic fact that the experience is quite different. A visitation to the Wall and to Berlin itself underlines very graphically the deep divisions which still exist between East and West and underlines the dilemma faced by the German people in attempting to reconcile their existence in two separate countries and in two separate power blocs. I was surprised to discover that the occupying powers still control the airways into Berlin. Air France, British Airways and the American airlines fly into Berlin and continue to exercise the air rights. In fact, I had some spare time in the airport in Berlin and I thought I would find out whether there is a flight from Glasgow to Benbecula, which is located on the island of South Uist. I approached the clerk behind the British Airways counter in Berlin airport and asked him about flights from Glasgow to Benbecula. He said, "Sure, I can find you that," and reported to me the flight from Glasgow to that small island, which illustrates the presence of the occupying powers in that country.

I want to say something about a disappointment which I have with the visit. As Senator Macquarrie has said, we had many dinners, luncheons, ceremonies and visits to plants. I believe that all this becomes tiresome, particularly when it has to be done in a disciplined group on schedule. That kind of activity can be done much better by individuals travelling alone. I felt that the most rewarding part of the visit was the opportunity we had to have some substantive discussions with the political leaders, including Mr. Strauss, the political leader in Bavaria, and members of the German Parliament. However, even those discussions with German parliamentarians were skimpy. Those who were part of the delegation may recall that we met with certain members of the foreign affairs committee of the German Parliament. The scene reminded me of Ottawa itself and how busy members of Parliament and senators are and how little time they have, usually, to be the attentive host to visitors, something we all like to experience when we travel abroad. Certainly, I could not complain because I know how frequently visitors to Canada have not been able to see ministers, members and senators in an organized way because of the busy schedule these people live under and work under. I do not know how to overcome this shortcoming, but I believe the benefit of these parliamentary delegations lies basically in substantive discussions with parliamentarians, political leaders and officials, rather than in touristic ceremonial events. I understand the necessity of the latter, having participated in them so frequently as a minister while travelling abroad, but they are not of the essence. They are marginal, and I think that in the future if I were to make any recommendations, one would be to heighten the substantive aspects of the visit.

I have one final point. It is not a point that I heard Senator Macquarrie underline today. It is with regard to what we learned about the second chamber in the Federal Republic of Germany. I was greatly impressed with what I heard about the operation of the second chamber in that country. The second chamber is fully integrated into the legislative process in a way that the Senate of Canada is not. It is an essential part of the legislative process in a dynamic sense. What the members of the second chamber there think, say and do, is of consequence. It was interesting to learn from those who talked to us about the system that when a majority of the same party existed in both houses there was no visible sign of disagreement or, at least, rarely a sign of disagreement between the two chambers, because their differences were reconciled within the party councils. When a different majority has existed in each chamber they have a systematic mechanism by which their difficulties are resolved in public or, if not in public, at least in a formal way. The second chamber had a significant impact upon the legislative process, which was, I think, to the benefit of the country. Despite the difficulties of these consultations, nobody would say that it was damaging. On the contrary, it was held out to be of benefit to the country and to the regions or states represented in the second chamber.

As I recollect, leaders of state governments are included as ex officio members of the second chamber. I was really impressed with that demonstration of federalism and with the knowledge that there, at least, is one country that has been able to integrate a second chamber within the federal system; a chamber which has an impact on the legislative process and which, when it expresses its opinion, is not regarded as a disruptive and troublesome body. We also know that if there is a difference in the majorities as between both houses, it is expected that clashes will occur because of political and ideological differences, but there is a way in which these clashes can be accommodated.

Senator Macquarrie, I did not think that I would participate in your inquiry; I thought that I would supplement—inadequately, as it turned out—what you have so ably stated.

Hon. Renaude Lapointe: Honourable senators, after listening to the speech on the importance of the Senate, I would like to point out that it was not only Mr. Jerome who led the delegation to China. Mr. Jerome and I jointly led the delegation to China, and Senators Flynn and Perrault also took part in the trip.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ENGAGE SERVICES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of December 11, 1985, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 8, 1985, to examine and report upon the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", be authorized to engage the services of such professional, clerical and other personnel as may be required for the purpose of the said examination.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion stands in my name and deals with a funding request from the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, which is a subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. Senator Marshall, the chairman of that subcommittee, needed funding to provide the expertise necessary to bring to a conclusion his report on the study of the Billy Bishop film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

Subsequently, Senator Marshall submitted a budget request to the Internal Economy Committee, which was then referred to the Subcommittee on Budgets and subsequently referred back to the Internal Economy Committee, where it was approved this morning.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move that this motion be approved.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

APPENDIX

(See p. 1721)

Highlights of Supplementary Estimates (B), 1985-86

This Supplementary Estimate, totalling 1.676 billion dollars, is the first "regular" Supplementary for fiscal year 1985-86 and brings the net total 1985-86 Estimates tabled to date to 105.3 billion dollars. This amount includes the "limited" Supplementary Estimates (A), totalling 351 million dollars which was tabled on May 28, 1985. Of the net total of 105.3 billion dollars, budgetary Estimates tabled to date total 103.6 billion dollars. This is within the expenditure framework of 105 billion dollars announced by the Minister of Finance in the May Budget.

Of the total of $1.676 billion contained in this Supplementary, $621 million or 37.1 percent is for statutory items. Parliament, therefore, is being asked to approve $1,055 million of new spending authority.

Major items included in these Supplementary Estimates are:

- (a) A $965 million statutory loan to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation (CDIC), pursuant to the CDIC Act. These funds will allow CDIC to make payments to insured depositors of the following insolvent institutions: Pioneer Trust, Western Capital Trust, London Loan, Continental Trust, Canadian Commercial Bank (CCB), Canadian Commercial Bank Mortgage Investment Corporation (if this company cannot resolve its liquidity and other problems resulting from the failure of the CCB), and the Northland Bank.

In addition, the funds provide for a $75 million payment to the CCB as the CDIC's contribution to the assistance provided to that institution last spring.

This CDIC loan is repayable with interest from funding by member institutions. In this respect, the government will be tabling a Bill shortly which will increase the premiums paid by member institutions to the CDIC.

- (b) A $73 million statutory item included in the Estimates of the Department of Finance for a payment to the Canadian Commercial Bank, pursuant to the CCB Financial Assistance Act. Again, this sum formed part of the government assistance package provided this past spring.
- (c) $553 million for implementation of the Canada Jobs strategy, including $23 million for the Indian Labour Market Strategy.
- (d) $64.4 million for drought assistance to Western Canadian farmers.

- (e) A $50 million statutory item for the Canada-Nova Scotia development fund.

- (f) $46.5 million for federal-provincial forest renewal agreements.

- (g) A reduction of $338 million in anticipated statutory expenditures for petroleum compensation charges, reflecting the wind-down of Petroleum Incentive Administration program which is scheduled to terminate March 31, 1988.

There are two additional points that might be of interest:

- (a) These Supplementary Estimates contain six, one-dollar votes of which four are entirely financial in nature in that they seek authority to transfer funds between votes and to establish or adjust grants within the same vote. In each of these cases, an explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in the Supplementary Estimates. Of the remaining two one-dollar votes, the first seeks authority to issue a loan guarantee, as authorized by Section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, which the second seeks authority to transfer funds between votes and, in addition, to amend the terms of loan insurance provided for in a previous Appropriation Act. A detailed listing of these votes along with additional explanations has been provided to the Clerk of the Committee for distribution to the members.
- (b) Supplementary Estimates have traditionally informed Parliament of the person-year requirements associated with the items included. These Supplementary Estimates contain 756 person-years for 1985-86, of which 664 or 88 per cent relate to the current fiscal year only. Of the 756 person-years, 563 or 74 per cent are for job creation initiatives of the government. An additional 98 person-years, or 13 per cent of the total, are being sought by the Department of Veterans Affairs and associated agencies for implementation of changes to the Pensions Act. This will allow for a significant reduction in, or elimination of, the existing backlog of pension applications now awaiting review.

It should be noted that Treasury Board will ensure that person-years included in Supplementary Estimates throughout this year are offset by a lapse of person-year authorities elsewhere in the government and in no way, therefore, will they jeopardize the government's plans to reduce the size of the Public Service. Total Treasury Board-controlled person-years as set out each year in Main Estimates will be reduced by approximately two per cent in 1986-87, and by a further one per cent each year thereafter for a period of four years. This equates to a reduction of some 5,000 person-years in 1986-87 and a total of 15,000 by 1990-91.

Details of the person-year reductions targeted for 1986-87 will be provided when the 1986-87 Main Estimates are tabled later this fiscal year.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

PRIVATE BILL

PINE HILL DIVINITY HALL—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—FIRST READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks presented Bill S-7, to amend the Act of Incorporation of Pine Hill Divinity Hall.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

[English]

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Friday, December 20, 1985.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, speaking on the motion, does Senator Hicks know something that we do not know? Is it settled that we are sitting on Friday, December 20?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not settled with me. I assume Senator Hicks has been in touch with other authorities.

Senator Hicks: I have no special knowledge but the bill could be read for the second time on Friday, December 20, in compliance with rule 44(1)(f). If we are not here to read it then, it will stay on the order paper and be read a second time on January 21, 1986.

Senator Frith: Perhaps we would be prepared to give Senator Hicks leave to have the bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate and if he is not ready to proceed then it can be placed on the Orders of the Day for the day we return after the recess.

Senator Hicks: I considered asking for leave but it is a private bill and I did not know how much work we would have before us. I am certainly prepared if there is time, and if leave is granted, to move second reading on Thursday, December 19. Do I have leave to make that motion?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, then I amend my motion and move, notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

INTERIM REPORT ON CHILD AND ELDERLY BENEFITS TABLED

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the third report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. It is an interim report on the Consultation Paper on Child and Elderly Benefits, issued by the Department of National Health and Welfare, tabled in the Senate on February 5, 1985 and entitled: "Analysis of Child and Family Benefits in Canada: A working document".

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROSTITUTION)—REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs presented the following report:

Wednesday, December 18, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

ELEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-49, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution)", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, December 3, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations and recommendations:

The Committee has considered Bill C-49, the Proposed Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to prostitution. In doing so, we have reviewed the submissions made to, and the deliberations of, the Legislative Committee of the House of Commons which dealt with the Bill.

We recognize that street prostitution has caused serious problems in some Canadian cities. Clearly, there is a need for action to be taken to deal with these problems. We also acknowledge that Bill C-49 would give to law enforcement authorities the power to combat the use of public places for the purpose of sexual dealing, and thus put an end to many of the activities which blight parts of our cities.

The Committee is concerned, however, with the breadth of the new offence embodied in the Bill. It seeks to criminalize a broad range of conduct not necessarily connected with the immediate evil of prostitution in public places - nuisance and the disruption of public order. Paragraph (c) of proposed section 195.1, in particular, is very widely drawn, prohibiting the act of stopping or attempting to stop any person, or of communicating or attempting to communicate with any person "for the purpose of engaging in prostitution or of obtaining the sexual services of a prostitute". This provision will potentially criminalize activity falling considerably short of nuisance. It also confers on peace officers and prosecutors a large degree of discretion to lay charges and thereby invoke attendant publicity, particularly when read in the context of the definition of "public place" in proposed subsection (2): "any place to which the public have access as of right or by invitation, express or implied, and any motor vehicle located in a public place or in any place open to public view".

By virtue of this definition it would be possible for the police to pursue persons who communicate, discreetly, for the purpose of prostitution, or what appears to be prostitution, in a bar, a club, or in a public park. Apparently, the police take the position that it is not their intention to do so, but rather to concentrate on the use of the streets for prostitution purposes. The Committee is troubled that such broad powers are being given to the police, and that an identical standard is to be applied to all public places.

While the Bill will no doubt effectively suppress the worst aspects of public prostitution, it will also have other consequences. For example, it will affect a large number of people, giving them criminal records, thereby making it that much harder for prostitutes to remove themselves from the business. One matter which it may be appropriate for the review committee established under clause 2 of the Bill to consider is whether the criminal law is the best method of handling the problem. The Committee is not convinced that the nuisance caused by street prostitution is beyond the legislative power of the provinces and municipal governments to deal with. It may require a degree of delegation of power from the federal government and creative initiatives within their own legislative competence by the provinces, but this should not deter a thorough reconsideration of whether the use of the criminal sanction (at least in the harsh terms of Bill C-49) can be abandoned in this area. We would thus hope that the new offence could be considered as an interim measure, to give our governments - federal, provincial and municipal - a period free of public pressure to consider whether the issue of public prostitution can be dealt with just as effectively and in a less punitive way, and in a way most suited to the nature of the problem in a particular area.

The Committee commends the intention of the government, expressed in this Bill, that the customers of prostitutes should be equally culpable for activities which are proscribed by the new offence. This would end the present situation with respect to the existing solicitation offence, whereby courts of appeal have differed as to whether or not a prostitute's customer can be charged with solicitation. It is clear that a considerable amount of the nuisance and disruption caused by public prostitution is attributable to the actions of customers. In fairness, they should risk the same punishment as the prostitutes themselves.

This being said, we share the concern of several of the witnesses who appeared before the Legislative Committee of the House of Commons that, in practice, there may be few prosecutions of customers (who are, for the most part, men) because the investigative techniques used, such as undercover police, will be directed principally against female prostitutes. We realize that investigation and prosecution of criminal offences are matters beyond federal jurisdiction. There would seem to be little more the federal government can do to ensure that both customers and prostitutes are prosecuted with the same vigour. Thus, we would urge the provinces to make efforts to see that the new offence in Bill C-49 is brought to bear equally against those who violate its terms.

In presenting this Bill, the Minister of Justice has made frequent reference to the fact that the Special Committee on Pornography and Prostitution (the "Fraser Committee") had recommended the enactment of a similar offence in its report of April 1985. But that Committee also made a series of other recommendations, dealing with modification of other areas of the criminal law (such as the bawdy house provisions and the procuring offences in the Criminal Code) which would go a considerable way to decriminalizing certain aspects of prostitution. The Fraser Committee also stressed that its recommendations should be considered as a unified whole, and should not be dealt with on a piecemeal basis. However, the Minister has indicated that Bill C-49 is a first step to deal with an urgent problem, and that further amendments concerning prostitution will be forthcoming in the new year. We welcome this pledge by the Minister, and would urge that the other amendments be brought forward as soon as is practically possible.

A matter of particular concern to this Committee is the plight of juvenile prostitutes. Bill C-49 would have a considerable impact on them. Whereas adult prostitutes have some degree of flexibility in adapting to the changes in the law, in that they can move to bars and clubs from the streets where chances of prosecution may be lessened, it is possible that the juvenile prostitute market may be driven "underground", and that these children may be forced even further into the control of pimps. While one would hope that the view expressed in the House Committee is accurate—that the new offence will make street prostitution less attractive to the young and thus deter them from taking it up—we doubt that it will have a deterrent effect for a number of juveniles. As both the Fraser Committee and the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youths (the "Badgley Committee") have found, the causes of juvenile prostitution are both various and complex. It is unlikely that the existence of a criminal sanction will have much of a deterrent effect.

If the criminalizing of juvenile prostitutes is to have any salutary effect, it must be done in conjunction with measures which will attempt to assist these children and provide positive alternatives to life on the street. If the only legacy left to a juvenile of a conviction under Bill C-49 is a record, it is likely to do more harm than good. This Committee would urge both the federal and provincial governments to take immediate action to implement some of the recommendations of the Fraser and Badgley Committees which would try to provide protection, counselling, education and job training to young prostitutes. One matter which could be quickly dealt with, and which both Committees recommended, would be the introduction of a new offence, punishable by severe sanctions, directed against adults who engage in acts of prostitution with young persons. If any act of prostitution alone merits criminalization and punishment, surely that is the one.

The final element of Bill C-49 upon which we wish to comment is the provision for review of the amendment by a committee of the House of Commons, to be undertaken within three years of its coming into force, and to be completed within a year (or such further time as the House may authorize). In light of our concerns about certain elements of the Bill, we view this review process as a positive element of it, particularly in relation to monitoring its application to young persons. Some members of the Committee would go so far as to recommend that the time period for commencement of the review be abridged to eighteen months, and that it be completed within six months of its being undertaken. On the other hand, we realize that the collection and analysis of data on prosecutions under the Bill may take some time, and that a comprehensive review may not be feasible in so short a period, given the uncertainties and vagaries of the Parliamentary calendar. Clause 2(1) of the Bill may be so broadly worded, however, that it would be possible for the review committee to be designated or established immediately upon the coming into force of the Bill, and it would be possible for that committee to begin an immediate interim analysis of the operation of the legislation far in advance of its ultimate report date four years (or more) hence. Even if this is not possible, we would urge that consideration be given by the Department of Justice to an early and continuous release of information and statistics on the operation of the Bill to Parliamentarians, or to committees such as our own, or the House of Commons Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

The Committee does have serious concerns about Bill C-49. However, we are prepared, on balance, to approve it without amendment in view of the provisions for review which are included, and having regard to the assurances of the Minister of Justice that further legislation dealing with other aspects of prostitution will be forthcoming.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I would simply point out that this report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, as submitted by the chairman, was not unanimously agreed to.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

TWENTIETH AND TWENTY FIRST REPORTS TABLED

Hon. Guy Charbonneau, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled two reports of the committee approving the budgets of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT AND OTHER CONDITIONS— GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question following from that asked by Senator Olson yesterday and the reply given to him by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, namely, that he would look into the possibility of getting a report on the need for, the desire for or the fact that there might be an acceleration in the payments under the crop disaster plan.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if it is clear to the government that Saskatchewan and Alberta will not be participating directly in this plan? In other words, they will not be adding money to this plan. Is that still, perhaps, being negotiated?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I believe I advised the Senate some time ago that the two provinces my friend mentions were proceeding with relief projects of their own which were not necessarily the same as the one the federal government is about to embark upon.

Senator Argue: Although I do not like to interpret the answer, do I take it that the answer is that they are not adding money to this plan?

I should like to know the stage the administration is now at. Have the application forms been printed? Are they in the hands of the producers? Or are they still unprinted and is it still the situation that there is no public document available to the producers?

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for the question, because I intended to refer to that this afternoon in reply to the urgings of Senator Olson who has also been most concerned about this matter.

I can say that, because the provinces are not involved in it directly, as my honourable friend has stated, the PFRA is the organization responsible for administering this program, and the application forms should be out in the next few days, before Christmas. They will be distributed not only to PFRA offices but to municipal offices and any other offices where it is thought it would be convenient for producers to pick them up in order to get to work on them.

Senator Argue: I hope the answer is correct. From such information as I have been able to derive, it seems to me that things will not move so quickly.

Is it a fact that many of the grain farmers in the disaster area who had a disastrous failure in 1985, will not be eligible for any payments because they have to have suffered three crop failures in a row and not just the 1985 crop failure even though it was a full disaster?

Senator Roblin: I am not sure that my honourable friend is correct. I think that the plan provides for those who have suffered disaster this year to benefit from the scheme, but I am not going to rely on guesswork in this matter. I am going to obtain copies of the application forms as soon as I possibly can and I will share them with my friend so that he will be able to see exactly what the rules are.

Senator Argue: The answer of the Leader of the Government is somewhat reassuring, except that I doubt that it is based on a fact. I ask him this: Can he assure the Senate that farmers with two crop failures will receive a payment? Does a farmer have to have three crop failures in order to receive assistance? I have had experience with a number of those people who will be administering this act. I will tell honourable senators what I am afraid they will do—I am afraid that they will be acting as agents of the Department of Finance so as to save as much of the $150 million as possible.

Senator Roblin: I think that the government fully intends to live up to its undertakings to provide a substantial amount of relief to those concerned. I will share with my honourable friend the details of this program as soon as they are known to me.

Senator Argue: I will ask another question; I will ask it directly and precisely, and I hope that I will get a precise answer in return. Is it a fact that the maximum payment per acre will be $15 or might it be less?

Senator Roblin: I have to tell my honourable friend that I do not have the rules in front of me. If I had, I would be giving him more precise answers to the questions he asks. I do not really think that he would expect me to have those precise answers. I will have to take that question as notice.

Senator Argue: The Minister of Agriculture has stated that the payment will be $15; the information I have is that it is likely to be less than $15. I ask whether this program has been designed around a chunk of money that the federal government has said will be available and from which a decision will be made as to how much will be paid per acre, or is this program specifically designed in such a way as to provide a precise amount of benefit per acre to the producers, and for which the money has been made available? I am afraid that the government has simply decided to provide $95 million in this fiscal year and another $55 million in the next fiscal year, which the farmers will share. I am afraid that this program will not provide for a $15 per acre maximum payment. I sincerely hope that I am in error, because I think that if that is the way the program has been designed it will result in a travesty of justice.

Senator Roblin: The program has been designed to meet that area of need that the government deems to be necessary so as to receive the consideration that has been provided.

Senator Argue: But the payments may be less than $15 per acre and may not be paid as of right to the grain farmers in the disaster area of 1985—this program will fiddle and chisel and bar a great many farmers from any payment whatsoever.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has been determined, ever since this program was announced, to find fault with it; I do not think that I can stop him from finding fault with it. If he will be content to wait until I can provide him with the details, perhaps he can give me his opinion of it at that time.

Senator Argue: I hope that I am wrong but I am afraid that the Leader of the Government will be proven wrong.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, it seems to me that the Leader of the Government has an option that is viable, and that is to come clean. Can he not tell us what the program is? It seems to me that he is now trying to tell us that we have to wait until we see the application forms. Surely, before those forms are printed, the government must have in place some kind of program based on factors that, as the government leader has pointed out, are designed to be helpful. Surely the producers have a right to know the basis of the program so that they will know whether they qualify for the payment. Surely the producers have a right to know the geographical areas that are involved and the disaster factors related to them so that they can determine who qualifies for this program. I reiterate that the minister has an easy way out—all he has to do is say what the plan is based on.

Senator Roblin: I think that my honourable friend is quite right. Not only do the producers have a right to know, but the chamber has a right to know. However, he also understands that I am not the Minister of Agriculture and that it is quite unlikely that I will have the details in front of me at the present time. Indeed, I do not have them. I will therefore have to take all of these questions as notice, and that is what I will do.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is fairly exasperating. We have been asking these questions not for weeks but for months now. I have been here long enough to know that the government has to work out some sort of plan on which to base a program. I hope that this government has applied some common sense and logic to the plans that it works out. If we knew what that approach was, and if we knew which of the farmers they are trying to help, and what the qualifications will be, then we could go to the next step within the administration, which is setting up the application form and the administrative details associated with that. All I am asking at this point in time is: What is the plan based on? What is the logic behind it? People can then more or less figure out whether or not they are going to qualify.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will get the information just as soon as I am able to provide it.

Senator Argue: Try it for tomorrow.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government on a related matter. I have a telegram from the British Columbia Cattlemen's Association, signed by the President, Mr. Grant Huffman. The association made representations previously to the Minister of Agriculture concerning providing assistance to those ranchers who were hit by the drought. Previously there was a designated region wherein a number of people were assisted. But that left out a number of others, particularly in the Cariboo, the Okanagan and the Kootenays. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would take a look at this, to see if those ranchers who were previously left out for assistance are now being considered.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will be kind enough to give me a copy of the telegram, I will be pleased to look into it for him.

Senator Marchand: Right away, sir!

CROWN CORPORATIONS

QUALIFICATIONS OF OFFICIALS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. If he does not have the answer, I will well understand.

Senator Olson: If he doesn't have the answer, I would not be surprised.

Senator Muir: I am sure that this Leader of the Government will have more answers, and more intelligent answers, than did Senator Olson when he was Leader of the Government and sat over here. He never responded to anything.

Senator Argue: Cheap shot!

Senator Muir: I shall ignore that, when I consider its source. In any event, may I ask the Leader of the Government if this government, or previous governments, provided leaders of crown corporations with any courses in industrial relations, or public relations, while they are on the job, or inquire if they know anything about it before they take the job?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must say that I do not know the answer to that question. If my honourable friend has a particular crown corporation in mind, I will be pleased to—

Senator Muir: Guess where it is!

Senator Roblin: I am only allowed one guess as to what it is. If he gives me the name of the crown corporation, I will be pleased to investigate it.

Senator Muir: I shall be only too happy to oblige. The crown corporation is the Cape Breton Development Corporation. Surprise, surprise!

Senator Frith: You just happened to have your music, as you used to say.

Senator Muir: The senior officer of that corporation is one Derek Rance. In light of statements he has been making to all and sundry recently, would it be possible for the government to provide him with a book written by Carnegie How to Win Friends and Influence People?

An Hon. Senator: He can't read.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend that if he has not got a copy, he should be asked to obtain one.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether or not he can tell us if the Minister of Agriculture will be in a position to announce the 1983 stabilization payment on sugar-beet prior to our adjournment?

Senator Perrault: Sweeten this up a little.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would not feel happy leaving this place, as I hope to do sometime in the not too distant future, without being able to provide the latest information to my honourable friend. The only problem is that I do not have any comfort for her. The matter is still bound up in policy discussions that are going on, some with the sugar-beet industries, and they have not yet reached a conclusion. So I am afraid I cannot tell my honourable friend anything more about this problem than I have done on previous occasions, which is not very much.

Senator Perrault: They will all be bankrupt by the time you make a decision.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Has the government decided that it does not intend to make a payment for that year? You might as well come clean on this matter, too.

Senator Doody: It is getting close to Christmas.

Senator Roblin: I have already explained that the question of the moneys available here is bound up with the general question of the sugar policy of the government, and until that policy—

Senator Argue: What policy?

Senator Roblin: —is decided upon, no determination will be made with respect to the 1983 payment.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government explain to us why a subsidy payment going back to 1983 under a policy that had been carried on for some years is tied to the long-term policy on sugar?

Senator Roblin: The answer is money.

Senator Guay: No doubt.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, yesterday we asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to the sale of de Havilland. Apparently, the government's rationale for the sale of de Havilland is the drain on taxpayers' money due to the projected losses. It was projected by the Honourable Robert de Cotret, President of the Treasury Board, that the losses to the taxpayer for next year would be some $200 million. It now appears that the reputable investment firms of Burns Fry of Toronto, Merrill Lynch of Toronto and New York and S. G. Warburg of London, England presented a prospectus which estimates that the losses for 1986 would be $14 million, rather than the $200 million estimated.

Senator Perrault: What's going on?

Senator Grafstein: Indeed, it is estimated that in 1987 the company will turn a profit of $14 million and in 1988 the profit would be some $26 million. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain the differences?

[Senator Roblin.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that the government does not agree with those figures. We believe that they are not accurate and that they do not reflect the actual situation in which the company will find itself.

Senator Grafstein: Could the Leader of the Government explain which figures are not correct? Because we apparently have a prospectus setting forth the figures I just mentioned as prepared by the firms I just mentioned, which was presented to prospective purchasers. Was the minister not correct in terms of assessing the losses or were these reputable firms, retained by his department or the government, not correct? Would the leader explain which information the citizens of Metropolitan Toronto, who are vastly and materially affected by this decision, should accept?

Senator Roblin: I would say that the figures offered by the government are a closer approximation of what we may expect than those that appear in the prospectus.

Senator Grafstein: In light of the discrepancy and in light of the fact that the public tender process which the government has embarked upon is now in serious question, that public trust and credibility is being undermined and that the government intends to proceed with the accelerated privatization of other corporations, would the Leader of the Government be prepared to refer the tender documents to a committee of the Senate so that we can examine those documents and decide, in the public's interest, which are correct?

Senator Argue: Introduce a motion, Gerry.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have to say the premise of my honourable friend's statement is one with which I am in complete disagreement. I do not think that the representation that he has made of this sale of de Havilland is accurate, correct, or reflects the facts the public needs to know. The minister has given in the other place a wide variety of information on this matter. If my honourable friend has read House of Commons Debates, and I see that he has, he will know that reference was made to these matters yesterday.

● (1420)

I simply tell my honourable friend that when this transaction is completed around the first of the year, the documents will be available and if he wishes the Senate to make an examination of that kind, he may then have the opportunity to do so. In the meantime, the government must take the responsibility of carrying through an agreement which we believe to be decidedly in the public interest.

Senator Grafstein: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the documents will disclose the amount of land that is being sold by de Havilland. Apparently there is some discrepancy in the sense that the minister previously suggested that 54 acres were being sold and now it appears that there are 96 acres involved. Will the documents disclose that, so that the public will know exactly what is being sold on the taxpayers' behalf?

Senator Roblin: The answer is "certainly".

Hon. Ian Sinclair: I have a supplementary question on that, if I may. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could inform us whether the prospectus, before it was issued, was subject to due diligence.

Senator Roblin: I think I understand the meaning of the phrase my honourable friend has used. It is a technical one with respect to prospectuses. However, I am not going to answer that question off the cuff. If he wishes me to make further inquiries about that matter, I shall be glad to do so.

Senator Sinclair: I would like to know the answer to that question.

Senator Grafstein: One final supplementary, if I may—

Senator Frith: Never say “final”.

Senator Grafstein: Never say final? In that case, honourable senators, one infinite question: Did the directors of de Havilland make representations to prospective purchasers through the processes of that prospectus which obviously did or did not happen? In other words, were the directors of de Havilland called upon to make written representations to prospective purchasers about the business plan which would set out the projected profits?

Senator Roblin: I think that question is encompassed in the inquiry about due diligence which I have received from the Honourable Senator Sinclair, and I answer it in the same way.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POLL—AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, the last time I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the proposed Tory omnibus public opinion poll was on December 3. The next day, December 4, the press reported that the Cabinet Committee on Communications would be making a decision that day with respect to the contract. Following that Cabinet Committee on Communications meeting, Canadian Press quoted Supply and Services Minister McInnes as saying that it is still possible that the idea will be scrapped. The exact quote of what the minister said at that time is:

We have not made a final decision on anything—the omnibus poll. Who is going to do it or anything.

The minister then added that there might not even be a decision made until the New Year.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate has been good enough to inform me that he will let me know when a contract is awarded, and to whom. My question, however, is; why the unconscionable delay? Bidding closed 110 days ago.

Also, I would like to ask whether the lead on the Canadian Press story is accurate. That lead is:

Ottawa may abandon centralizing of polling.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is not my practice, nor is it the practice in Parliament to comment on press reports, so I make no comment on that.

My undertaking to my honourable friend was to tell him what the decision was when it was made, and that stands.

Senator Davey: The Leader of the Government in the Senate has much more experience in government than I do. However, I am asking for information. Is it not curious that there is a 110-day delay after bidding? Is that not unusual?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is entitled to his own opinion on that matter.

Senator Davey: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Supply and Services spokesman, Douglas Drever, has said that all polling information acquired through such a monthly omnibus poll will, in fact, be made public. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can confirm that statement.

Senator Roblin: When the decision is made by the cabinet in respect of the matter, then I will be able to deal with any question of that kind. I certainly cannot deal with it now.

HUMAN RIGHTS

AFGHANISTAN AND IRAN—UNITED NATIONS RESOLUTIONS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a follow-up question to that which I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate yesterday and inquire whether he has obtained an answer on the United Nations resolutions on Afghanistan and Iran, the votes on which resolutions took place last Friday.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I follow my usual practice of obtaining answers as quickly as I can, and as soon as I have received the answers I report them to the chamber. It therefore follows that if I have not answered my honourable friend's question of yesterday, it is because no answer has been made available to me.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I rather anticipated that kind of response from the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: Of course!

Senator Corbin: So, during my lunch break today, I called the Department of External Affairs and was told by the receptionist that no one was available to give me information on those resolutions because the department was holding its Christmas party.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Corbin: I do not fault them for that because they were holding it during their lunch hour. However, one employee was kind enough to call me back and say: “Senator Corbin, if you would like to call Ambassador Stephen Lewis at the United Nations he will have that information.”

Senator Guay: He will make the decision!

Senator Corbin: So I called Ambassador Lewis for that information, and he was very co-operative and very pleasant. I found out that the resolutions—and this is news—on Afghanistan and Iran were co-sponsored by Canada and carried. I hope that the Leader of the Government notes that.

Senator Roblin: Not only will I note it, but I will send a copy of Hansard to the ambassador so that he may appreciate my honourable friend's interest.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I will go further than that; the information does not appear to be available in Ottawa. Ambassador Lewis was kind enough to ask one of our parliamentarians attending the United Nations—who will be returning to Ottawa tomorrow—to bring with him copies of the speeches which were given and copies of the texts of the resolutions. I will have them in my office some time tomorrow. I would be most pleased to pass copies of those on to the Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: I hope that when my honourable friend receives his package from New York he will pay special attention to the speech Ambassador Lewis made in connection with Afghanistan, because I doubt that any nation in the western world has made a more emphatic repudiation of the activities of the U.S.S.R. in Afghanistan than Canada made through Ambassador Lewis. So, I hope that my honourable friend will read that speech as well.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I am already familiar with the contents of that speech and concur entirely with the words of the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: It's about time!

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

REFUGEES FROM AFGHANISTAN—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It relates to the refugees from Afghanistan who have been collected in astronomical numbers in Pakistan.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): And Iran.

Senator MacEachen: I have in mind Pakistan. Afghanistan has produced the largest refugee movement in the world. I noted the other day that the United Church of Canada had deplored Canada's refusal to take in but a handful of those Afghan refugees now in Pakistan. I was not aware that our effort had been so niggardly.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell us, if not now, then at some future time, whether the government has taken into account the representations which have been made, and whether Canada cannot do better to ease what is obviously the greatest refugee problem in the world.

No other group of people has been displaced in similar numbers, and no other country has done as much as Pakistan on this matter. I wonder if Canada is prepared to help.

Senator Roblin: My friend has referred to a very serious problem. Over three million Afghans—and I think that that is approximately one-quarter of the country's population—live on the Pakistani border. As far as my information goes, what most of those people really want to do is go home. I think that—I hope, at any rate—Ambassador Lewis' initiatives at the United Nations may advance to some degree, however small, the prospects that they may return home.

Respecting the reception of these refugees in Canada, my honourable friend knows that our record in that respect is fairly good, all things considered, but I will inquire to see whether there is any movement afoot to accommodate any of those people.

I think it may present difficulties, but nevertheless I will make the inquiry.

● (1430)

AFGHANISTAN—POSSIBILITY OF POLITICAL SETTLEMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while we are on the subject of Afghanistan, it was reported in the press following the summit between President Reagan and Mr. Gorbachev that there was a promising prospect that a political settlement in Afghanistan might take place. Is the Leader of the Government in a position to tell us whether the Prime Minister of Canada, when briefed following the summit, was able to glean any information as to the real possibility of a political settlement based upon the conversations that the President of the United States had with the Soviet leader?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I agree that that news item caught my attention, as well, because it was the first hopeful sign that we have seen that there might be some accommodation with respect to the Afghanistan problem. I am not aware of the conversation between the Prime Minister and the President but I will inquire as to whether it was among the subjects discussed.

THE HONOURABLE DAVID A. CROLL

TRIBUTE

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege which falls under rule 34 respecting complaints against the news media, although my point of order is not a complaint against the media despite the fact that the Senate and the press are sometimes known to be critical of each other.

I would like to draw your attention this morning's Globe and Mail where columnist June Callwood made reference to the work of our colleague, Senator David Croll, in a most appreciative manner. In her column she calls him a "national treasure."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

THE SENATE

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. There were two hot water radiators in my office. Last winter one of them burst and it was never replaced. The one remaining radiator seems to be very much overworked—in fact, I came to this chamber with frozen feet a few moments ago. Yesterday I noted how the Leader of the Government in the Senate varnished the comfort of our offices in the Victoria Building and I do not quite appreciate that kind of language in the current circumstances.

I wonder if someone in the Senate would look at my one remaining radiator which is turned up full blast and yet does not emit sufficient heat. Before we make any drastic changes to the budget today, I would appreciate that being taken into consideration.

CANADA DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION
REORGANIZATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William M. Kelly, moved the third reading of Bill C-66, respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation.

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, Bill C-66 was pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and reported back to this chamber without amendment but with certain observations and recommendations. I would like to take a moment to try to explain what those reservations and concerns were all about.

The committee shared with the government—there were indications in the bill that the government also was concerned—reservations about the risk of undue concentration in the ownership of CDC. I believe that was demonstrated in clause 5(1)(a) where restriction was placed on ownership at 25 per cent in the hands of one corporation, individual and associates. One of our first concerns had to do with the definition of “associate.” The shareholding level was described in clause 5(6)(f) as being in excess of 50 per cent.

Looking further into the bill we came to clause 5(6)(h). The intent of that clause in our opinion, and in the government’s plan, was to provide some protection against undue concentration. Our major concern had to do not with the intent so much as with the drafting of that clause. We examined how that clause might be redrafted in some detail but against a background of an awareness of the prospectus through which the shares were originally marketed very clearly, and I am paraphrasing from the prospectus: that if Bill C-66 does not become law in substantially its present form, then holders of installment receipts would be entitled to cancel their obligation to buy the balance—in other words, to exercise the right—remembering that they would have to prove that any alteration to the bill was substantial, and the courts, of course, would decide that. The concern we had, and I believe I mentioned this earlier when I introduced the bill for second reading, is that these rights were offered on the basis of the share price being $11.50. I think the shares are currently still down around $9. There would be every reason and incentive for right’s holders to attempt to gain the approval of the courts to rescind and to receive their money back. In other words, we did not want to offend the transaction, because it is a good one.

Accordingly, we asked for and received advice from Fraser and Beatty and representatives from the Department of Justice on whether clause 5(6)(h) could be interpreted the way it was intended to be interpreted. We were advised that it would be interpreted that way. I must confess that the counsel who gave us such advice acknowledged that it might have been drafted a little more clearly, but they felt that in its present form it was satisfactory and provided the protection that was intended when it was originally drafted.

The committee decided to accept that advice and to report the bill without amendment. I hope that we can carry on the goodwill that we all experienced in the committee and agree in this chamber to pass the bill without further delay.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I want to speak on the report, not that I disagree with the final conclusion of it, which is that it might allow rescission by the purchasers of the shares if you change the definition of “associate”. When I read the report I thought it was a lot of gobbledegook. First of all, the main argument about this bill from the start has been the definition of the word “associate”. There is no mention of that in the report although Senator Kelly has brought up the point in his speech. Then Senator Kelly went on to refer to clause 5(6)(h) in relation to the opinion of Fraser and Beatty. If the committee had paid the attention to my speech on second reading that I think it deserved, you would have noticed reference to an opinion by Fasken and Calvin, which was a much more thorough opinion. As far as I am concerned, I do not think clause 5(6)(h) helps at all. The Fasken and Calvin opinion states:

In summary, it is our opinion that paragraph 5(6)(h) of Bill C-66 will likely be of little practical assistance to the board in determining, in a hypothetical fact situation, that corporation A and corporation B were associates within the meaning of the articles authorized by Bill C-66.

The report refers to the fact that that clause appeared in identical form in the Canada Corporations Act 1971. I looked up that act and it was rather interesting to note that subclause 4(2), paragraph (c), of Schedule I of the act states:

—a shareholder is... deemed to be associated with another shareholder if—

(a) one shareholder is a corporation that is controlled directly or indirectly by the other shareholder;

The schedule, in subsection 4(4), goes on to say:

For the purposes of these statutory provisions, a corporation shall be deemed to be controlled by another corporation, individual, trust or government, if at any time in the opinion of the Board of Directors it is at that time in fact effectively controlled by such other corporation, individual, trust or government either directly or indirectly and either through the holding of shares of the corporation or any other corporation or through the holding of a significant portion of the outstanding debt of a corporation, trust or individual or by any other means whether of a like or different nature.

Both those subsections have been dropped from the present act. That could not have been sloppiness; it must have been intentional. The government did not want the definition of "associates" to be effective, because, if they had wanted it to be effective, they would have retained those two clauses.

The report of the committee states:

The Committee recommends that in drafting government bills, great care be taken to ensure that the provisions of the bills fully embody the intent of the government.

I don't agree with that, because it is obvious they took great care by dropping from the present bill the two clauses that I have just read, and which appeared in the 1971 act, that the definition of "associates" should be for all practical purposes ineffective.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think I should draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that we did have available to the committee and, particularly, to Senator Godfrey a partner of Fraser and Beatty; a member of the Department of Justice; and, subsequently, a legislative draftsman from the Department of Justice. For reasons that it is not necessary to disclose here, Senator Godfrey was unable to take part in those meetings of the committee. The committee did have a detailed explanation from a competent legislative draftsman.

The committee also discussed the fact that the clauses of the Canada Development Corporation Act, to which Senator Godfrey referred, had been deleted. The points he raised were considered by the committee.

Honourable senators, I rise on a somewhat different point. As I said earlier, I believe this chamber should applaud the government for introducing this bill and for getting out of businesses where no demonstrable public purpose is evident. It is clear that the CDC is now in a position to operate as a normal corporation. I applaud the government for that step.

My concern goes to concentration. I believe that is a matter which we all should be watching carefully. I point out to this chamber that allowing one shareholder to hold 25 per cent of the shares, by definition under CICA, enables that company to use single-line consolidation or "equity consolidation," as it is called. It is only allowed where, in the opinion of auditors and management, the holder of that group of shares is able to have significant influence. The definition of "significant influence" in the CICA Handbook is 20 per cent or more. By specifying 25 per cent, it looks as though we are attempting to restrict concentration, but, at the same time, this goes to an area where we may be placing in the hands of significant groups, indeed, family groups, a significant influence over a large number of Canadian corporations.

As we move forward in these attitudes of the government—and I hope we will see more of them—I hope that people on the other side whom the government looks to for advice on these matters of concentration, will bear that in mind.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I am prompted to rise by what Senator Godfrey has said. Early this fall the government issued a prospectus offering rights to buy stocks at a specified price in the Canada Development Corporation. As Senator Kelly has said, the prospectus indicated that the bill giving effect to the sale would not be substantially different from the terms and conditions set forth in the prospectus.

What Senator Godfrey has focused on is certain clauses or sections—whether we are talking about the present bill or the original act—that do not appear here, but that really does not affect the committee's problem. We were focusing specifically on the definition of an "associate" as set forth in clause 5(6)(h) which, in effect, prohibits a situation where—and I quote:

both are parties to an agreement or arrangement, a purpose of which, in the opinion of the Board of Directors of the Corporation, is to require the parties to act in concert with respect to their interests in the Corporation.

What we were concerned with was that those words seem to describe a legal requirement, whereas, in fact, the concentration or the effect of concentration might be achieved without a formal agreement or arrangement requiring action in concert. That is the particular part of the bill which attracted our concern.

Counsel conceded that different language might have been used in that clause, language which might have satisfied some of us better than the language now in the bill.

What was held over the committee and certainly impressed me was the argument that, if a change were made in the wording of 6(5)(h), it might very well lead to some one of the purchasers of the rights applying for a rescission; in other words, they might apply to get their money back, prompted perhaps by the fact that the price of the shares has declined since they purchased them. To put it another way, if the sections that attract Senator Godfrey's attention were in this bill, as they have been in the original statute, or if the wording of clause of 5(6)(h) were to be improved, there was the possibility of originating a claim for a rescission of the rights. Therefore, some of us in the committee felt that we were bound—not legally but practically—to accept the bill as drafted. That is the reason for the rather curious paragraph at the end of the committee's report. Read in isolation, it sounds strange that a committee recommends that in drafting government bills great care be taken to ensure that the provisions of the bills fully embody the intent of the government. I should have thought that, in the abstract, that maxim is fairly obvious, but I wanted to explain the reason behind that paragraph.

The government has said that it does not want to increase the chance of concentration beyond the situation that prevailed under the old statute. That is fine, but they found that they were in a position where they could not take a chance by attempting to make their intent clearer. Some members of the committee, including myself, felt that since the government had clearly stated its intent and its responsibility, we were, in a sense, bound in that situation.

I am not entirely happy; yet I agree that the bill should be given third reading.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, might I ask a question? This bill has been explained to my satisfaction; I had found it very ambiguous reading. I wondered, however, whether the committee considered that there is often a description at the beginning of a bill that is almost a directive to the courts, in the event of litigation, to make Parliament's intent very clear. Was that considered at all by the committee?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, the simple answer is no.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps I could make a comment by way of a reply. If I understood the question correctly, the extent to which courts can look at the debates or proceedings of Parliament to assist them in interpreting legislative intent is, at present, a rather murky area in the law. Although this procedure was allowed in the United States, there was a time when it was not at all admissible in Canada. I believe the door is opening a little now, however.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1985-86

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-89, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I shall not make a speech suggesting that this chamber deny the government supply. I suppose it would then be natural to ask, "Why say anything?" But Senator Philips will understand why we take the occasion to say something when we are debating a supply bill. I take it that I can ask the usual question as to whether it is in its usual form. If so, I can proceed without looking at the individual sections.

Senator Doody: The assurance has been given.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will recall the procedure we have followed for many years: When the main estimates or any supplementary estimates are tabled in the Senate, they are referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which then studies those estimates and reports. That is the background for our debate on the supply bill relating to the particular estimates that are the subject matter of the committee's report. I support that practice. I think that it is a very useful and traditional one which enables honourable senators to know where to look should they have any concern about supply bills. The first place that senators normally look is the report.

I have some comments to make about this report. I do not make them in criticism of it in the sense that it constitutes any departure from tradition, but I want to make some suggestions as to how the report could be more useful to the Senate and to individual senators when considering supply bills. In particular I would ask that in future the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, when dealing with estimates, at least touch on each item, even to the extent of a word or two. For example, it could routinely say that a certain item is statutory and raises no particular question of policy, because statutory items seldom do. The committee could say that a certain item is budgetary but that it does not raise any particular policy issues. Then it might single out items in the estimates that do raise certain policy issues. Of course, before the committee reports and during its hearings, it could deal with those policy issues. It seems to me that that would enable the report to play an even more useful role in the debate on supply.

When examining the bill itself—and I am not referring to the clauses of the bill, because they are in the traditional and long-standing form—it is natural to turn to the schedules. As honourable senators will remember, the schedules of a supply bill are usually organized department by department in alphabetical order. Therefore, if one is interested in any particular estimate or in any particular department, one can find either in the schedules and can do so quickly. I find that the report does not guide me through those schedules as usefully as it might, in my view. The main subject dealt with in the report is the matter of Part III of the main estimates. We have already had an exchange on that subject by way of comments made by the chairman of the committee and some questions and comments made by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate. I will not add to that exchange, except to point out that the only way a parliamentarian could know about the amounts in Part III is, as one senator put it, by "sleuthing it out." Incidentally, there were a few typographical or grammatical errors in the report, but I will not dwell on those.

● (1500)

After dealing with the question of Part III, the committee really says nothing more about these estimates, not even to the extent of saying to honourable senators, as I believe it would be useful to do: "The reason why the government resorted to supplementary estimates was principally as follows:"—and the policy issues would follow; secondly, for the purpose of certain grants or statutory items; and, thirdly, for certain budgetary items.

So, without complaining about the way this report is organized, I urge the committee in future to organize its report in that way, to make it easier for honourable senators to follow the reasons, and to trace, or, if necessary, sleuth out, estimates that relate to particular departments and are of particular interest to honourable senators.

In the appendix to Debates of the Senate for yesterday, at page 1732, there is set out the split between the budgetary and non-budgetary items. Honourable senators will note that there is a heading "Supply To Date For 1985-86" and "Estimates Tabled To Date for 1985-86". Under the heading in the second column, dealing with "Supplementary Estimates (B)", we see that the budgetary items amount to some $976 million to be voted, both budgetary and non-budgetary; and the statutory figure for non-budgetary is $899 million, with the totals shown.

But, as I pointed out, that does not answer my question arising from the committee's report, because it does not break it down in terms of big items, policy items, budgetary and non-budgetary items, and specific explanations for the individual departments.

So, honourable senators, I hope that in future the committee will organize its report in that way, and thus improve its work, and also its report, from the aspect of its usefulness to us in debating the supply motion.

Because I was unable to sleuth out any major policy items that were the subject matter of these supplementary estimates, I take it that the Deputy Leader of the Government, in closing the debate, will tell me if I have overlooked something. Because he is supporting the bill, if there is something in it that raises a major policy issue, and not simply routine issues, I hope he will tell us. If I am correct that in these supplementary estimates there are no such policy issues, then I recommend that, in the usual way, without in any way supporting the need for these funds, but, rather, taking the government at its word—we, in this chamber, should not refuse government supply but should vote in favour of the motion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith for his helpful comments, particularly as they relate to the report of the committee, of which I am a member. I shall take care that Senator Leblanc, the chairman, and Senator Kelly, the deputy chairman, are made aware of his comments. I am a little concerned with regard to having each of the items brought to the attention of the committee. I think of the blue book that comes out once a year. It daunts me a little, but I believe we can work that out. It may be a small technical problem. Although I gave the honourable senator a full total, I am not sure that is what he had in mind. Regarding the honourable senator's concern about not finding a department that starts with "Z", I will tell him to relax, since it seems to me that successive governments, as they come to power in Canada, are hell bent in getting at least one department for each letter of the alphabet; and probably we will succeed in getting several from time to time.

Senator Frith: "Zeppelins", perhaps.

Senator Doody: Yes. They may come back.

Senator Frith: Hot air zeppelins!

Senator Doody: With reference to items of policy, I hesitate to say that there are none in the highlights of the supplementary estimates appended to yesterday's proceedings. Note is taken of the $965 million statutory loan to the Canada Deposit Insurance Act and the intention of the government to introduce legislation to change the premium rate on the members of that group, which, if it is not a departure in policy, is certainly a large item that is brought to the attention of Parliament. The $73 million statutory item for payment to the Canadian Commercial Bank is part of those supplementary estimates, as well as the $553 million vote for the implementation of the Canada Jobs strategy. Although those items are certainly of significance, they have been brought to the attention of honourable senators before, and I really believe that there is nothing surprising or new in these estimates.

So, honourable senators, with those few words, I commend second reading of Bill C-89.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-2, to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, which was presented on Tuesday, November 26, 1985.

Hon. Joan Neiman moved that the report be adopted.

She said: Honourable senators, in speaking to the report on Bill S-2, which the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs tabled in the chamber on November 26, I shall impose on your patience to remind you of why the Senate embarked almost two years ago on the project of studying and proposing amendments, where it deems appropriate, to the present federal law with respect to capacity to marry. I shall then spend a little more time reviewing what the committee has learned during its hearings, and why it has decided to recommend Bill S-2 in the amended form, as reported.

Honourable senators will be aware that section 91.26. of the Constitution Act of 1867 gives the federal government exclusive jurisdiction to legislate with respect to marriage and, more specifically, the capacity of persons to marry one another. That authority encompasses questions of consanguinity, affinity and other types of relationships which the federal government deems appropriate to include. The provinces, on the other hand, were given exclusive jurisdiction under another head of the act to legislate with respect to the solemnization of marriage.

However, with one exception, the federal government has not legislated in its assigned field. It merely adopted the law on capacity to marry in force in England which was observed at the time of Confederation by the pre-Confederation provinces, with the exception of Quebec. Fortunately, the marriage prohibitions then found in the Civil Code of Quebec were similar to those observed in the other provinces. So there were no substantive differences in legal doctrine with respect to capacity to marry which needed to be reconciled.

The practice of barring marriages between persons having certain relationships, whether by blood or otherwise, to one another is part of ancient Judaic religious law, and Christians in turn adopted and adapted similar prohibitions. Over the centuries, the list of prohibitions was expanded and contracted from time to time. Some time after King Henry VIII split England from the Holy Roman Church, he ordered the prohibitions to marriage which were then decreed by the ecclesiastical court, to be written in the statutes. They eventually were included in the Anglican Book of Common Prayer and became the foundation on which the common law that Canada acquired at Confederation was based.

That common law then was, and now is, that no person may marry another person of the opposite sex who is within three degrees of blood relationship or affinity. That means it extends literally to grandparents and grandchildren. It does not include great grandparents and great grandchildren. It also extends to aunts and uncles as well as to siblings.

There is one other common law prohibition, and that is between step-parents and step-children. However, there is no prohibition against step-siblings marrying one another. The law remains in a somewhat confused and uncertain state in that regard. As I mentioned earlier, Canada made its first and only statutory amendment to the common law about 1970 in order to permit a person to marry a sibling of his or her deceased spouse—that is, a former brother-in-law or sister-in-law or the child of such deceased spouse. The courts of at least three provinces have ruled that the same law is applicable in the case of divorce. On the other hand, the Province of Quebec has attempted to prohibit marriage where a previous marriage has been dissolved by divorce by enacting such a provision in its Civil Code. However, the legislation purports to deal with capacity to marry, so, if the federal government were to legislate a contrary or differing provision, its legislation would naturally have paramountcy. The other provinces have not dealt with the question of the effect of divorce on subsequent capacity to marry, so that area of the law remains in doubt.

The other question which remains in doubt and which needed to be addressed by the committee is with respect to the effect of legal adoption. There is no reference to such a relationship in the common law, because adoption is a relatively modern statutory concept which falls generally within the jurisdiction of the provinces. Today all the provinces of Canada have adoption legislation which provides, in effect, that an adopted child acquires the status of a natural child and shall be so treated in all respects. However, since again the federal government has not legislated on the matter, the common law prevails in the federal field. This means that persons related by adoption are legally free to marry. This situation was considered by the Senate in 1978 when there was an application by adoptive siblings to be granted an exception to what they had been advised was the general law. The Senate advised the applicants that there was no such prohibition to marriage. We understand the applicants in fact were married shortly after receiving the advice of the Senate. On the other hand, the committee learned during the course of its hearings, that the Office of the Registrar General in Ontario refused to grant a marriage licence to applicants who have an adoptive relationship toward one another as uncle and niece. Again, while it is likely that that decision could be challenged on the basis that the Registrar General exceeded his powers in attempting to impose a provincial concept of adoption on a federal law, particularly in view of Parliament's decision in 1978 which I just mentioned, the incident does illustrate the confusion that remains in this area.

Parliament has not had to deal with many applications for exception to the general law regarding capacity to marry. There were three in 1975, all second-degree relationships—one by consanguinity and two by affinity. At that time Senators Flynn, Asselin and myself all questioned the propriety, although they unquestionably had the right, of Members of Parliament making the types of legal and social decisions inherent in judging such applications. We recommended then, and again in 1978 when the application of the adoptive siblings was before us, that the Department of Justice examine the present marriage law in Canada with a view to clarifying and amending it where necessary. No action appeared to have been taken on our recommendations, and when the Senate was faced with eight additional applications about two years ago, it decided to look into the matter itself. It referred the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The committee began hearing witnesses on the reference more or less concurrently with its consideration of the eight marriage bills, during the months of February and March 1984.

The first witness to appear on the reference was the then Minister of Justice, the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, P.C. He simply confirmed that the law of marriage needed to be clarified and he encouraged us to recommend appropriate changes. The committee then heard from Professor H.A. Hubbard, Q.C., who was acting Dean of the Common Law Section of the University of Ottawa. Professor Hubbard had published an article in the McGill Law Journal in 1983 entitled, "Marriage Prohibitions, Adoption and Private Acts of Parliament: The Need for Reform". The professor's article was inspired to a certain extent, so I understand, by the applications to Parliament for exceptions to the marriage law made in 1975 and 1978. In his article and again in his evidence before us, Professor Hubbard recommended that the scope of the present prohibitions be narrowed to exclude prohibitions against the marriage of an uncle and niece, an aunt and nephew and a step-parent and step-child. His view was that the eugenic and social justifications for retaining certain prohibitions are no longer persuasive or appropriate by today's medical and ethical standards.

As the committee was then considering having one of its members introduce a bill in the Senate to amend the marriage law rather than continuing its study by way of the reference, Professor Hubbard reminded us of the Australian experience which had been quite similar to ours. As a result, their Parliament had passed the Marriage Law Reform Act in 1975 which had since proved quite acceptable to the public at large. That bill simply did away with all dispensations, or exceptions, as we call them, as well as all prohibitions arising out of affinity, including step-relationships, and those prohibitions in the area of consanguinity between aunt and nephew or uncle and niece.

Of importance to our consideration of Bill S-2 as amended is that Australia retained in its law the prohibition against the marriage of persons related by adoption, either lineally or as siblings, which had been in force there for some time. However, Professor Hubbard's opinion was that that prohibition did not exist at common law and so we ought not to introduce a new prohibition into our law. He reiterated this view more forcefully when he appeared again before the committee a couple of months later while we were studying Bill S-13.

The committee then heard from Dr. Abby Lippman, Professor at McGill University and a medical geneticist, who was highly recommended to us and whose views, so we were told, coincided with those of other leading geneticists. Her evidence was carefully detailed and very informative as she had been involved in genetic research and counselling for some years to such persons as first cousins contemplating marriage. Because the risk of gene disorders in aunt-nephew and uncle-niece matings is quite small—she cited 2 per cent as compared to 1 per cent for non-related parents—Dr. Lippman was prepared to support the removal of prohibitions in those particular areas.

As a result of the evidence that the committee had heard, it was recommended that a bill be introduced in the Senate in the terms suggested by our legal and medical witnesses. Bill S-13, which was introduced in May 1984, simply provided that persons related lineally by consanguinity or as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half blood, were prohibited from marrying. That bill provided specifically that marriage between other persons related by consanguinity, affinity or adoption was not invalid by reason of their relationship. That bill thus confirmed the common law with respect to adoptive relationships and removed the present uncertainty in the law with respect to the right of certain other persons to be able to marry; for example, between persons who had a lineal step-relationship to one another, where that relationship had been dissolved by either death or divorce. The other area which was clarified was to permit the marriage of persons whose relationship arises out of a previous marriage which had been dissolved by divorce.

The committee was aware that, while endorsing the introduction of a bill in those precise terms, it had not yet fully explored the social and ethical concerns of families, religious groups and society in general. I, as chairman, was therefore instructed to get in touch with representative groups and organizations to solicit their views. A very detailed résumé of this history and the present state of the law was prepared, as well as a questionnaire on various matters which the committee felt needed to be addressed. That communication was sent to all major religious denominations in Canada having a membership of more than 100,000. There were 13 of these groups in all, and they all eventually responded, some at great length. Because many of the denominations wished to consult their members, or at least those charged with enunciating policy and religious doctrine in the areas we were considering, most of the replies were not received until well into the summer of 1984, after Bill S-13 had been introduced. You will recall that in June 1984, Parliament was dissolved and Bill S-13 died on the order paper.

I should say, however, that in the interval copies of Bill S-13 were sent to the Attorneys General of all the provinces and of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories requesting their comments on the proposed changes in the marriage law.

Let me now give you as brief a summary as I can of the replies and opinions which the committee received. As I mentioned, there were responses from 13 churches and other religious bodies. Of these, only two, the Greek Orthodox and the Canadian Jewish Congress, were opposed to all of the proposed changes to marriage prohibitions. Their objections were essentially doctrinal in nature. They feared a conflict between their religiously based prohibitions and the much less restrictive scope of civil prohibitions as proposed in the legislation.

The Presbyterian Church's objections were of a somewhat different nature. The Church was of the opinion that there was still justification for retention of a considerable number of marriage prohibitions beyond lineal consanguinity and siblings, in order to protect the integrity of the family unit and neighbourhood relationships. They said they would countenance a delegation to family courts of the power to make exceptions, if necessary, to the general law.

There was something approaching a consensus amongst the respondents on the bill with regard to social and familial concerns, principally having to do with the marriage capacity of persons related by adoption. The Roman Catholic Church stated that adopted children are in all regards considered as the natural children of the adopting parents, therefore it was only normal for the same consequences to apply to them. The Anglican Church opposed the lack of such prohibitions regarding adoption in the present law for reasons of family structure and solidarity. The United Church was also initially opposed to all such marriages within what it wished to be regarded as the prohibited adoptive degrees. However, that Church later wrote to the committee again and said it might not object to a relaxation of the proposed blanket prohibition of adoptive marriages where "adoptive" siblings, for example, had been adopted into a family in their immediate pre-teens when they already had a high degree of development of identity apart from the adoptive family.

The Lutheran Church also opposed marriages between persons related lineally or as siblings by adoption. Some churches—the Anglican and the Lutheran—opposed any change in the prohibition of persons related as step-parents and step-children.

I might say here that after studying the replies from all the churches and religious organizations, the committee concluded that, with respect to the doctrinal views, no matter how profoundly those views were held, they should not necessarily influence formulation of the general law of marriage. Those religions which wish to maintain a large number of prohibitions are free to do so, and are free not to give their sanction to adherents who do not comply.

In a pluralistic society like Canada the general law should not be constrained by any particular religious views. The committee also felt that if there had been a consensus against the proposals amongst the religious organizations, its conclusion in this regard might be re-examined. The other churches and religious organizations did not express any opinions on the proposed legislation, and some of them merely said that they had no particular objection to it at all.

We did hear from all of the provincial governments and the two territorial governments, and every reply addressed the issue, and nine of them were clearly, and even strongly, opposed to omitting a prohibition to adoptive relationships in the Marriage Act. The other three—which were Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Ontario—chose not to comment on the issue, although each did express the desire that the committee look into the question when considering the bill.

When the new Parliament convened, the committee resumed its task of updating the marriage law by preparing a new bill for introduction in the Senate. Because the weight of opinion which had been received from religious organizations and from the provinces and territories favoured adoptive relationships being treated on the same basis as natural relationships, the committee considered reversing its stand and introducing a prohibition for adoptive relationships within the same degree as those being prohibited for natural relationships. However, the committee was aware that it had still not heard from certain other important elements of our society, such as social agencies which were intimately concerned with family matters, so that it was not yet ready to recommend such a significant change to the current law. Bill S-2 was, therefore, introduced in substantially and substantively the same form as the previous Bill S-13, with the important exception that all reference to adoption was omitted. The committee recognized that Bill S-2 left the law with respect to adoption in the same uncertain state that it actually is in today, but preferred to proceed by amendments in committee which would finally define and clarify the law only after it had heard further evidence.

The committee also solicited input and advice from various social agencies, five in all. They were the following: Family Services of Canada; the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies; the Children's Aid Society of Ottawa-Carleton; the Vanier Institute of the Family and the Canadian Council on Social Development. Those agencies were sent copies of Bill S-13, and, later, copies of Bill S-2 with an explanation of the changes. Similar communications were sent to the provincial and territorial adoption agencies. Unfortunately, very few replies were received.

The agencies concerned with adoption in Manitoba and New Brunswick were strongly opposed to the concept that persons related by adoption, either lineally or as siblings, should be permitted to marry. The only other agency which replied, that of the Province of Ontario, approved the other aspects of the bill, as did the first two respondents, and also expressed its opinion to the effect that leaving the question of adoption unlegislated would not, as it said, "adversely affect the institution of adoption." There were two replies from non-governmental agencies, the Canadian Council on Social Development and the Children's Aid Society of Ottawa-Carleton, neither of which expressed an opinion on the adoption issue.

The committee invited Professor Alastair Bissett-Johnson of the University of Dalhousie to appear before it. He has studied, taught and written extensively in all areas of family law—marriage, divorce, adoption, et cetera—in England, the United States, Canada and, for some years, in Australia. So, he is very familiar with the Australian experience. Professor Bissett-Johnson's opinion was generally in support of the current Australian law which contains the same prohibitions as Bill S-2, plus the amendment regarding adoption, as proposed by the committee. He did take issue with Professor Hubbard's position that adoptive relationships should not be included in the list of prohibitions, because Professor Bissett-Johnson felt that there was sufficient constitutional law to put into question the right of the federal government to legislate in the field of adoption so as to attempt to overrule existing provincial legislation in that area. As he said:

So, if it were thought that the federal government was going to pass legislation which had the effect of undermining provincial adoption laws, I think there is at least a case for saying in some circumstances there could be a constitutional objection from the provinces, and I do not regard Professor Hubbard's point, as I understand it, that just because there is a question of the federal government having occupied the field it automatically wins in all circumstances.

The final witness before the committee was a member of the Institute of Family Living, a group of professional marriage and family therapists in Toronto. The committee heard that as a group the members of the Institute tended to agree with the views expressed by the Presbyterian Church, particularly with respect to extended family structures in today's society. The second area of its concern was with respect to blended families which are occurring more frequently these days because of the increase in divorces and subsequent remarriages. The Institute would not change the current law prohibiting the marriage of a step-parent and a step-child. The Institute supported the many religious organizations which had written to the committee indicating their strong opposition to the omission of adoptive relationships in the prohibitions to be included in an amended federal law. It did suggest, as had one or two other respondents, that it might be amenable to the idea of a provincial court being authorized to make exceptions to the general law regarding step and adoptive relationships in exceptional circumstances for the purpose of marriage.

At the conclusion of its hearings the committee had therefore to decide, with respect to both step and adoptive relationships, whether it would opt for no prohibition, absolute prohibition or some kind of qualified prohibition. After careful study of the evidence it had heard over the past almost two years, honourable senators can see in Bill S-2, as amended, that the committee recommended there should be no prohibition in the area of step relationships but that there should be absolute prohibition in the area of adoptive relationships as specified in the amendment. The committee decided against any kind of a qualified prohibition that might entail the courts having to grant exemptions on the basis of certain social criteria which would have to be formulated by the federal government in order to ensure uniformity of application from province to province.

Honourable senators, I have submitted to you this lengthy review so that you will have in one copy of Hansard a comprehensive analysis not only of what the current law is regarding capacity to marry, but the reasons the committee is recommending Bill S-2 in its amended form. I should add that all members of the committee who were present at its final session on Bill S-2—and there were several who had attended most of the sessions faithfully and had carefully weighed the evidence—voted in favour of the bill as amended. However, Senator Flynn who was the sponsor of Bill S-2 and who was, unfortunately, unable to be present at that meeting has made known to some members of the committee his opposition to the amendment. I know he intends to give an explanation for that opposition, and I am aware that at least two other honourable senators have reservations with respect to the amendment. I have not heard any other objections to other provisions in the bill which have the effect of removing certain prohibitions and clarifying the status of our marriage law in other areas.

• (1540)

Before I conclude, I should tell you that the eight applications for exception to the present marriage law, which were considered in committee at the same time as the reference and Bill S-13 in 1984, were approved in committee. The cases involved the following types of applications: There were three cases of uncle and niece related by consanguinity; one case of an aunt and nephew related by consanguinity; there were two applications with respect to persons formerly related as in-laws; and there were two cases of an aunt-nephew relationship where the relationships had been dissolved, if we accept our proposed version of the law, by divorce. Those eight marriage bills were eventually approved in the Senate and then by the House of Commons with very little debate prior to the dissolution of Parliament last year.

After honourable senators have had an opportunity to hear the arguments and expressions of opinion of our colleagues who wish to participate in the debate on this report, we shall be in a better position to vote on the form of Bill S-2 which we wish to send to the House of Commons for consideration.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, as Senator Neiman mentioned, I am the sponsor of this bill but I do not claim necessarily that it belongs to me.

Senator Frith: Only in the adopted sense.

Senator Flynn: I am an adopted sponsor of the bill.

The first initiative was taken by Senator Stanbury when we had Bill S-13 before the Senate and in committee previously. It is a joint venture by some members of the committee.

Honourable senators should be thankful to Senator Neiman for having reviewed the whole history of this bill and of this problem of prohibition to marriages. However, as the bill is in my name, I have to say that I am in complete disagreement with the report. My purpose was to clarify the situation, to do away with prohibitions that were no longer justified and not to add prohibitions to the situation, which is what we are doing with this reference to adoption. Presently, there are no prohibitions, and I am not sure if Senator Neiman mentioned this, but some years ago we had the problem of two children adopted by the same family who came before us and asked for a bill to allow them to marry. We came to the conclusion that there was no prohibition and, therefore, we told them there was no problem with getting married, and they did so. Now we are going to prohibit this kind of marriage. If a similar case exists in the future, they will have to come before Parliament for a special bill.

At this point the report is before us for consideration. By adopting the report we simply agree that the report is before us, but when third reading is moved I intend to move an amendment to delete all the references in that bill to "adoption." If there were any agreement that adoption should remain a reason for prohibition lineally, I would not object to that, because I do not see any difficulty in such a prohibition. The question of marriage between a father and child by adoption is not one that would come up often.

I certainly object very strenuously to creating a prohibition between brother and sister by adoption. As I am not in favour of this report, I do not know who is going to move third reading but it certainly will not be me. If someone moves third reading, I will move the amendment as I have indicated and I will explain my position further.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, it is not necessary for me to elaborate very much on what has already been said. I appreciated hearing Senator Neiman's comprehensive exposition of the bill and the evidence that her committee had received from various agencies throughout Canada and so on. I have some sympathy and understanding with them, but I hold firmly to the view that this legislation prohibits marriage between related persons because of consanguinity. I know the argument is used by some of our social workers and some of our social welfare institutions that there are undesirable results that may accrue to a marriage between persons related only by adoption or by a step-relationship. I suggest that there are socially undesirable marriages that take place for many, many reasons and we cannot and do not attempt to legislate to prevent those marriages. I do not think that because there may be a socially undesirable marriage that will take place by virtue of an adoptive relationship or by a so-called step-relationship, that that is an appropriate subject for legislation. If Senator Flynn pursues the course which he has described to us this afternoon, I will be voting with him.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Neiman a question. How many of the churches recommended or had no objections to the marriage of adopted children if they had been adopted at what you referred to as a developmental age or in their teens? Was that a commonly held view or do only a few churches hold that view?

Senator Neiman: That view was held by the United Church. Initially that Church was opposed to the idea of permitting marriage where there were adoptive relationships either lineally or as siblings. They later indicated that their advisory group on marriage, family and sexuality might not object to a relaxation of the proposed blanket prohibition of adoptive marriages in Bill S-2.

● (1550)

Unfortunately, there was some confusion in people's minds at that time as to what the actual import of the bill was. We could tell from the responses we were receiving that some thought the bill, or at least the law at that point, contained some kind of prohibition, while others did not.

The United Church and the Roman Catholic Church—the two largest religious groups in Canada, with several million members each—were both opposed. The United Church had a qualified objection.

Senator Flynn: Did you say that the Roman Catholic Church was opposed?

Senator Neiman: The Roman Catholic Church was opposed to the prohibition being removed. They had, somehow, assumed that it had been retained, as did some other churches.

The Anglican Church and the Lutheran Church opposed removal of the prohibition for adoptive relationships. Four churches had no major objections to the proposal: the Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada; the Mennonite Central Committee; the Jehovah's Witnesses, and the Salvation Army. Two others simply did not give us any kind of opinion on the legislation at all, and those were the Council of Moslem Communities of Canada and the Canadian Baptist Federation.

Therefore, six really did not comment on it; six were opposed to the marriage of adoptive siblings and lineal relationships, and one had a qualified opposition that would permit exceptions in certain cases.

Senator Flynn: The Roman Catholic Church agreed to marriage between adoptive brothers and sisters some years ago.

Senator Neiman: That is true. Senator Flynn will note that I was merely quoting from the communications. We received long letters from each of the churches, which I have in my hand.

Senator Flynn: I do not agree with that.

Senator Neiman: In essence, of the 13 respondents, six supported the idea that there should be a prohibition between adoptive relationships—

Senator Flynn: When we submitted the bill, they said that they agreed with the bill. They did not suggest adding to the bill.

Senator Neiman: Six respondents supported the idea of prohibition regarding adoptive relationships, and one other, the United Church, indicated a qualified support. It would allow exceptions to the prohibition. The remaining six respondents made no comment, and by that we can assume they had no objection to the idea of adoptive persons being allowed to marry one another.

Since this is a confusing question, I think it would be useful, if any honourable senator so wishes, to look at the questionnaire and the answers from all the organizations which are appended to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs of May 10, 1984. The responses are printed in some detail and are available for honourable senators' perusal if they want to look at them.

Honourable senators may also wish to refer to the evidence of Professor Hubbard who supports Senator Flynn's view. Professor Bissett-Johnson, whom we heard from just recently, took a different view. Honourable senators who have further questions about this matter may wish to refer to those minutes of proceedings.

Motion agreed to, on division, and report adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): This is an interesting dilemma. This is a private member's bill, not a government bill; therefore, having in mind the objections of the sponsor of the bill, I hesitate to move third reading.

Senator MacEachen: Be hesitant.

Senator Doody: For the first time in my life, I am taking the advice of Senator MacEachen and I am being hesitant.

Senator MacEachen: Remain reluctant.

Senator Doody: I am remaining reluctant. As it stands right now, the report has been adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: The bill is reported after second reading, but when shall we have third reading? Now?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I suggest that this item stand on the order paper while we give the matter some thought.

Senator Doody: It is not exactly a six-month hoist; it is, sort of, in limbo.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed that the motion remain on the order paper with no senator's name following it?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved that Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census, be read the second time.

He said: Honourable senators, the purpose of Bill C-74 is to revise the formula for determining the number of electoral districts, and to amend the relevant legislation. Under the formula in effect since 1974, based on the population of Quebec divided by 75, the number of seats in the House of Commons, as adjusted according to the 1981 census and therefore applicable in an election to be held around 1988 or 89, would be increased from the present 282 to 310.

In 1991, the census would increase the number of members to 343, and in 2001 to 369. Considering this very substantial increase, there was unanimous support for the concept of limiting the increase in the number of members. The proposal now is to change the formula so as to limit the total number of members to 295 for the next election on the basis of the 1981 census. The population increase projected for the 1991 census would then give us 296 members, and for the year 2001, 298. As you see, by adopting the formula proposed in this bill, we would have 71 fewer members than under the present formula. The bill would change section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1967, to provide the following formula under sub-section 51(1):

1. There shall be assigned to each of the provinces a number of members equal to population of the provinces by two hundred and seventy-nine and by dividing the population of each province by the quotient so obtained, counting any remainder in excess of 0.50 as one after the said process of division.

2. If the total number of members that would be assigned to a province by the application of rule 1 is less than the total number assigned to that province by the last preceding readjustment of the representation of that province made in accordance with this Act, there shall be added to the number of members so assigned such number of members as will result in the province having the same number of members as were assigned by the last preceding readjustment.

So, first we establish a round figure. We divide the population of the provinces by 279, which is the present number of members representing the provinces, excluding the Northwest Territories and Yukon. The result is, I believe, 97,000, which is the number required for an electoral district.

However, clause 2 provides that none of the provinces will have fewer seats than it now has. For example, Quebec will keep its 75 members, Nova Scotia 11, and the smaller provinces will still have the same number of seats so that only Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia will gain seats under this formula. These seats will not necessarily be acquired for ever. Should those provinces have a proportional decline in population, that number might be reduced.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The population figure?

Senator Flynn: But it could not be less than the current number.

Senator Frith: A decline in population?

Senator Flynn: Yes. It is unlikely. In any event, that is the general formula proposed under the amendment to Section 51 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

In that respect, I wanted to draw the attention of honourable senators to a point which they might be interested in examining if the bill is referred to a committee. Perhaps we might put some questions to the officials about it.

According to section 42 of the Canadian Constitution of 1981, an amendment of the Constitution of Canada may be made in accordance with subsection 38(1) concerning the principle of proportionate representation of the provinces in the House of Commons prescribed by the Constitution of Canada.

Section 38(1) provides that:

An amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by

(a) resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons;

Therefore, to change that provision of section 51, which is a provision of the Constitution under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada, we need only resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons. Before the Constitution Act, 1982, section 91.1 had already given that power exclusively to the Parliament of Canada. What I want to emphasize is that it says here "by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons", whereas when the Senate considers a bill we go through three readings. Normally, a resolution necessitates only one decision of the House of Commons and the Senate. I would simply say we cannot overdo it. If we adopt a bill, it is at least as good as a resolution. In any case, the law will come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation, as required under section 38(1).

Be that as it may, I find this amendment interesting because I think it is the first time since 1982 that we have an amendment to a provision of the so-called "federal" Constitution of Canada. That being said, Part II of the bill contains certain amendments to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment

Act so that this legislation will take into account the formula provided under section 51.

In addition, there is a consequential amendment to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act in Part III concerning the authority and mandate of the commission responsible for redistribution, and it sets forth the principles which the commission must follow. All those provisions are of a rather technical nature and have been the subject of debates in the House of Commons, particularly in committee. According to my information, the bill we have before us—there are amendments—substantially represents the views of all parties in the House of Commons.

So, a provision, for example—

Senator Frith: Excuse me Senator Flynn, what did you just say?

Senator Flynn: I said amendments were presented and that the rules for drawing the boundaries of electoral districts substantially reflect the views of all parties. There were some differences of opinion, but according to my information, nothing substantial. In fact, in some cases amendments originally proposed by opposition members were finally adopted. It may not be appropriate to comment on what transpired in the other place yesterday, but I know there was a motion to return the bill to committee. It seems, however, this was merely a manoeuvre and not an objection of any substance.

In any event, I would say this is an area that almost exclusively concerns the House of Commons, and I think that we as a non-elected chamber and as appointed legislators are hardly in a position to tell the members of the House of Commons how they should proceed to draw the boundaries of their electoral districts.

Nevertheless, if there were some major questions of principle, the Senate would certainly have a contribution to make. And as I said earlier, if some honourable senators would prefer to see the bill referred to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, I will move the appropriate motion.

Once again, we must remember that the new formula will prevent the number of members in the House of Commons from increasing to 379 on the basis of the 2001 census. So according to the present forecast, we will have 298 instead of 369 members in the House of Commons. That is the immediate and practical purpose of this bill.

I don't know whether it would be useful to have them read into the record, but I have here a number of tables indicating the distribution that will result from this bill after the census of 1981, 1991 and 2001. If honourable senators feel it is proper, I will ask that these tables be appended to today's Senate Debates and not to my speech, because this would not be very useful.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For tables see appendix, p. 1764.)

Senator Flynn: With those few explanations to help us, I ask the Senate to approve this bill. As I said, if it is the wish of the senators, I will suggest that it be referred to a committee after second reading.

On behalf of Senator Stanbury, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE ESTIMATES FOR 1986-87

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985,

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled on 11th December, 1985, be not considered at this time but referred back to that Committee with instructions that it:

- (1) reduce, by attrition, the number of persons presently on staff by 2%, from 387 to 379;
- (2) conform to the guideline that the increase in the total budgetary Estimates of the Senate for 1986-87 not exceed the Estimates for the current year by more than 2.5%; and
- (3) report back to the Senate before it adjourns for the Christmas recess or as soon as possible.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I consider this motion to be ill advised and, as I will endeavour to show, unfortunate for the Senate and its committee. For that reason I will be voting against it. I will start by saying that I am sorry to have to do so, because I prefer that we do not find, as does the Leader of the Government, that the result of the long work of the Internal Economy Committee is unacceptable.

The mover of the motion points out quite rightly that this is the first time that the Senate has debated on the floor the report of the committee on Internal Economy on the subject of the Senate's own estimates. That underlines why I am sorry that the first time such a debate ever took place it has resulted in the kind of motion that is now before us.

The mover of the motion pointed out, and was aware of the fact—he was not ignorant of the fact—that the committee had spent a long time on the Senate's estimates. Any of us who have been in the Senate for the past seven or eight years—which is the length of time that I have been here—will agree that never during that period did the committee spend as much time, as much careful time, as it did on this occasion. I recall previous occasions when the Subcommittee on Budgets spent a good deal of time, but the main committee essentially accepted the recommendations of that subcommittee. In this case, the Subcommittee on Budgets, under the chairmanship of Senator Barrow, spent long hours going through the estimates, having before it—as did the main committee—a letter from the Leader of the Government pointing out his wishes and the guidelines that he hoped the committee would follow. So both the main committee and the subcommittee had, well in advance—I accept that—the views of the Leader of the Government regarding the lines the committee should follow.

After giving the committee credit for the extensive work it had done—and I am sure that the mover of the motion also intended to give the subcommittee credit for the time it had spent going through the estimates item by item—he then pointed out that taxpayers would have to foot the bill for $1.3 million more than last year, and suggested that we in the Senate should run a tighter ship and reduce by $700,000 or more the results of the committee's work.

He suggested that it could all be done by attrition. He then asked the rhetorical question as to why the Senate should not accept the report of the Internal Economy Committee. Was there any special obligation on the Senate, he said—and, I take it, on its committee—to reduce further the reductions already made by the committee? He said yes, because we are subject to no controls, because no one can cut our budget. The taxpayers must pay, but they have no role in putting us here. Therefore there is need for self-discipline. He said that we, as a Senate, would not be carrying out our responsibilities if we did not impose the self-discipline that he is asking the Senate to impose.

The difficulty with that is that I cannot see how this motion can escape the implication that the committee was not aware of those factors.

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator Frith: The innuendo that the committee was not aware that the taxpayers must pay the bill, was not aware that there was need for self-discipline, was not aware that it should carry out its responsibilities accordingly, is inescapable. I would not for a moment suggest that every senator, including the Leader of the Government, is not free to criticize any report of any committee, but in this case it has been done in such a way as to imply that the committee was not aware of the considerations that influenced the mover of the motion. That is the first position that he took.

Senator Roblin's second position was that as a result of his experience over the years he realized that each item could be justified and said that he recalled experiences when he had been "blinded by science." I do not understand that metaphor, but I am going to try. I take it that it means that those who wish to cut the proposed budgets—among whom he includes himself and, I assume, on the evidence, that he realizes that it includes the Internal Economy Committee—can be blinded by science. That is, the cutters of budgets are not scientific and those who wish budgets to be large are scientific. I do not quite follow that.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Roblin: You sure don't.

Senator Frith: However, those are the words. Senator Roblin said that he knows that he is exposing his flank if he wants further cuts because he assumes that someone—and I assume that he means the Internal Economy Committee—will be attempting to blind him by scientific or other methods. What can one say to that?

Senator Barootes: I am sure you will find something.

Senator Frith: Yes, I will, and I will take any aid I can get from Senator Barootes. He places those who propose to support the report of the Internal Economy Committee in the position of people who are not prepared to accept the discipline they ought to, and if they say anything in support of the items in the report, they are trying to blind somebody by science. I do not know how else it can be put. I will say this: Well played, sir, because that is a nifty gambit. In your speech, you are placing those who want to support the committee's work in the category of somebody who is trying to pull some trickery to blind anyone who wants to support the motion criticizing the committee.

The next thing the sponsor of the motion says—and this is a corollary to what we might call the "blinded by science" proposition—is that because of that blinding effect he will not expose his flank by dealing with particular items that he thinks should be cut, because he feels that someone will come forward to support them—as if someone should not come forward to support them. Anyway, these scientific blinders will come forward on any particular item because, as he said, every item can be supported. Therefore, he was not about to deal with individual items. The next thing Senator Roblin did, according to my notes, was to deal with individual items. For example, he accepts the fact that there are certain statutory items over which we have no control. He says that they are paid for or washed out anyway by the saving on the Parliamentary Association. Therefore, that is not an item that he thinks should be changed. I must say that he took a bit of joy out of having pointed out that we had no control over those items by saying, "Oh, yes, you had no control, but it doesn't matter. So you didn't achieve anything because they were washed out by the Parliamentary Association savings."

The next item is research assistance. Honourable senators understood that the sponsor of the motion did not want to focus on any particular item, but he did focus on this one, and he said that we can achieve the objective of research assistance for senators by re-deploying. What does that mean? First, it means that he agrees that we need more research assistance, otherwise he would not be proposing the re-deployment. Then he says that there are 93 people working for 102 senators, that they are not fully employed and that by re-deploying them we could free up ten people, which is the number mentioned in the report as a base figure for research assistance. So if the caucuses were to re-deploy, we could save some $300,000. That is the item that was in there for research assistance, and assistance is spelled "assistance" not "assistants," which gives the sense that it was not necessarily for ten research assistants. However, that was the base they used in order to come up with a budget figure. I had someone check into this suggestion of re-deployment. Honourable senators will notice that 93 people are working for 102 senators. That is not even one per senator, which is something to keep in mind when we start examining the comparisons with the House of Commons.

Senator Perrault: And the Prime Minister's Office.

Senator Frith: Yes, and others, but more of that later.

Senator MacEachen: We look forward to it.

Senator Frith: For the moment, let us focus on the 93 employees. Of the 22 senators—and I know that some will think that I am making an accusation of some venality here, but I am not—it just comes out that way and I am sure that it was not the proposer's intention—who now share secretaries, 18 are Liberals, two are Independents and only two are Conservatives. It means that while 25 per cent of Liberal senators and 50 per cent of independent senators already share secretaries, only 7.6 per cent of cost-conscious Conservative senators have to take the same step.

Senator Perrault: Those were the cuts.

Senator Frith: I assure honourable senators that I am not being a smart alec—

Senator Perrault: Never!

Senator Frith: I mean it when I say that I do not think that Senator Roblin figured that out and came up with a plan in order that it would have that result. I am sure that he was not aware that it would have that result.

Senator Perrault: He is an honourable man.

Senator Frith: However, knowing that the plan has had that result, I am sure that he will reconsider the suggestion. That takes care of that whole item. The only suggestion that was made on that item was not that we do not need the assistance—and we are talking about ten people helping 104 possible senators—but that we need those ten assistants and that, in fact, we should cut down on what we have and re-deploy. Let us give the Leader of the Government his due. He was, I assume, in favour of having some further help; it is just that he did not like the way we were going to go about getting it and thought that it would be better that we re-deploy, with the corollary I just mentioned and of which, I am sure, he was totally ignorant.

I come now to the next item that the honourable senator did not want to deal with but did, the question of committees. Senator Roblin complimented the Senate for the excellent work that the committees were doing.

Senator Perrault: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I suppose that could perhaps be rhetorically called the principal jewel in the Senate's crown. He then felt that, taking into account the contingency, which I do not feel anyone could justify saying was excessive since it is $100,000—an amount less than 10 per cent of the total amount—perhaps the increase indicated that the committees, which had, he admitted, done such great work this year and which are so important to the Senate, were getting a bit ambitious to be anticipating more work than they had done this year. I suppose he was clearly not saying to the committees: "Good for you; upward and onward", and I admit he was not saying, "Good for you, backward and downward"—although I think he was saying that to the Senate generally, but not to the committees; what he was saying is "Good for you; onward, but no more; you are being too ambitious."

I want to assure the Senate on behalf of the committee—and I mention parenthetically again that this committee was made up of members of the government side and the opposition side—that not a single vote was taken on any item, no matter how small, no matter how big. Consistent with its tradition, this committee worked by consensus. That is not to say that there was not disagreement. There was, in fact, vigorous disagreement, but while I speak of that vigorous disagreement, it is apropos to underline again that that disagreement crossed party lines. There were times when opposition senators were opposing increases and supporting cuts and there were times when supporters of the government were suggesting increases or suggesting added amounts for certain purposes in order to enable senators to do their job. If I had to identify one unanimous theme throughout the long hours of deliberation—and when I say "unanimous theme", I am not speaking of consensus here—whether a senator was proposing a cut or whether he was proposing an increase; whether he was supporting an addition or whatever it was, the one element that was common and unanimous was that every senator said he or she was taking their position because they felt it would be better for the Senate and would enable senators better to discharge their constitutional duty. That was unanimous and that unanimity on that principle permeates every single element down to every dime, every nickel and every penny. That is what is in this report that is the subject of this resolution.

Let us look now at OASIS. As far as I am aware, every single member of the House of Commons who wants OASIS now has it—the works. Not just the screen but the works, including, as Senator Roblin quite rightly said, a very expensive item of some $14,000 for the word processor. I agree with Senator Roblin that that is a very expensive item, but I tell him and I tell any members of the Senate who are not members of the Internal Economy Committee, or who did not participate in the committee's work, that the committee was very much aware of the difference between the cost of the two components, that is, the OASIS screen and the word processor.

After this matter had been studied and sent to the Subcommittee on Budgets, together with a recommendation from the Subcommittee on Accommodation and Facilities, which had studied the whole OASIS system, a proposal was made, and I say to you, honourable senators, that this resolution before us now criticizes the committee's decision on OASIS. Therefore it is important, when you decide how you want to vote on this resolution, to know what happened in the committee on that item.

This is what happened. There was a feeling amongst senators that, in order for individual senators to do their work, they needed many of the facilities that the House of Commons now has, and this was one of them. Therefore the Committee on Internal Economy, whose job it is to look into these things, did look into it and referred a proposal for detailed study to the Subcommittee on Accommodation and Facilities. That subcommittee made the study, came up with the costs and reported back to the main committee. The main committee showed the same concern that Senator Roblin and other senators have shown in terms of the very expensive addition that is called the word processor. Indeed, the amount necessary was a big, six-figure amount and the committee said: "We should not do this. We would like to think that all senators are entitled to the same basic facilities of this kind as are the members of the House of Commons, but we are going to exercise some self-discipline," as Senator Roblin had urged us to do. We are not ignorant of the fact that Senator Roblin wanted that. As an aside, I say to honourable senators, can you imagine this happening in the House of Commons? Did the House of Commons say, as we did: "This is an expensive item." The taxpayers that Senator Roblin is concerned about are the same taxpayers who are concerned with what is spent by the House of Commons, I assume. Did the House of Commons say to themselves: "Wait a minute, we had better not go for this because the taxpayers are paying for it." They just did it. If a member in the House of Commons did not get "the works," it was because he slammed the door and said, "I do not want it."

Did we, in the Senate, do that? The answer is no. Did this committee fail to discipline itself in that way? The answer is no, it did not. It decided to send around a questionnaire to all of the senators which explained that the service was available; that the House of Commons already had this service and pointed out that the committee was not saying to senators that they were not entitled to the same service; that they were not as good as members of the House of Commons or that we did not, as senators, need the basic help that the House of Commons gets. What we said to senators was: "Would you use it? Do you need it? Do you want it?" We then received the returns from senators, and we on the committee took what is apparently, according to the notes I have of Senator Roblin's speech, the unreasonable position of accepting a senator's word that he or she wanted it, or that he or she needed it. It is again, I suppose, an inescapable corollary of the criticism of what we did on this matter, namely ask the senators whether they would use it and decide to give the senators what they asked for. At that moment, says Senator Roblin, all of our moral fibre and self-discipline crumbled and we accepted the word of senators.

● (1640)

What we should have done, I assume, is gone back to them and said: "What do you mean you want this? What do you mean you need this? You don't need what we asked you to tell us you needed." We should have gone back and cut the amount more, having cut it already from a substantial six-figure item, which would have only equalized us with the House of Commons. We should have gone back to them and said: "Look, we asked you whether you needed it, but you don't really need it, do you?"

Well, if I had known how Senator Roblin felt I might have said: "Maybe we should do that. Maybe we should go back to all those senators and say, 'you said you needed this but you don't.' " Maybe we should have, but I would not have done that; I would have asked Senator Roblin to do that, as it turned out he eventually did anyway—that is, he told senators that they don't need what they said they needed.

Then there was the question of the move. Well, honourable senators might as well know what happened on that, too. We, the Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration—and I think Senator Roblin may have been there occasionally when this came up—were reminded very frequently that the accommodation in the Victoria Building for senators was not satisfactory for two basic reasons; services and location.

Senator Turner: And cold feet!

Senator Frith: Cold feet can be found under the subheading "services". Those were the two main reasons. Senators in the Victoria Building, not all of them but many of them, described themselves as second-rate senators because they were not close to the legislative chamber.

An Hon. Senator: Second class.

Senator Frith: Second class. Did I say second rate? Well, they were certainly all first-rate senators but were being relegated to second-class status.

The plan was to upgrade the Victoria Building with the hope, always, that we would not have to have senators located in the Victoria Building. In order to do that the figure put forward was $600,000. It looked as if that was just enough to get the one year's work done to try to get the place upgraded, not, of course, to solve the second problem—and the more important one in some cases—of the location. So, the installation problem was one problem dealt with by the $600,000, but that did not address the distance problem.

We had just about given up, after years of negotiations, trying to get all senators either in the Centre Block or the East Block and we were saying: "Okay. We have to spend money on the Victoria Building; there is no other way." The chairman of the committee, who is also the Speaker of the Senate, had never given up in his attempts to solve this geographic problem. He kept talking to the Department of Public Works, and during the consideration of the $600,000 item, he brought off a coup for which he is genuinely entitled to great credit and thanks from every single senator.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: He is entitled to that not just from senators located in the Victoria Building, but from all of us, because none of us likes the idea of some of our colleagues not being happy over there. So, he is entitled to thanks from every single senator.

The coup he brought off was what? He persuaded the Department of Public Works that when the 1910 wing is vacated in the East Block that space will be made available for senators. Now the question is, when will it be vacated? It probably will not be fully available until next summer or perhaps next spring. So, you can imagine that some senators might have said: "Well, that would be nice, and we thank you, Mr. Chairman of the committee, for doing that, but we are still going to want that $600,000 item until the move is made. We will believe it when we see it. Not that we disagree with you, Mr. Chairman, but that is still a bit of a pig in a poke. We are not sure we will ever get over there although you have done everything you possibly could do."

Is that what we did? That would not have shown the desired level of self-discipline, but still would have been understandable and reasonable. But that is not what we did, and is not what the senators in the Victoria Building did, either. They said: "We will put up with what we have; this $600,000 is too much money. We want to cut this amount. We are prepared to put up with cold feet all winter and put up with a radiator that is liable to burst, because we have put faith in the committee. We have put faith in the committee that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not. We will chop the budget. We will suffer and we will take money out of the budget. Will we reduce it by a third? No. What we will do is take it all out and ask how much will still be necessary for the fiscal year 1987 to enable the move to be made." Senators have said that they will put up with cold feet all winter because they want to know that there will be enough money to make the move. That is the next item we apparently did not exercise enough self-discipline on.

The last item that the proposer of the motion did not want to expose his flank on—and therefore was not going to deal with as a specific item but did deal with—was what he called the general category of some smaller items. I thought he said $25,000 for coffee. That is great news for the banking creditors of Brazil, I would think. It is great news to know that even the Senate modestly spends $25,000 a year on coffee, and perhaps that is true.

Senator Perrault: That's a lot of coffee!

Senator Frith: If that is so, I wonder whether anyone can see a lot of waste on coffee. Do we waste a lot of coffee here? I do not drink it often enough to know that, but I would be interested in finding that out. I do not think that the coffee item is sufficient reason to warrant not accepting the report of the committee, because it was considered by the committee.

Then he mentioned hospitality. He said that we should cut down on hospitality. I think I know what that figure is, but the implication was that senators should cut down on their hospitality. I did not know that we had a hospitality budget or allowance.

An Hon. Senator: Do we?

Senator Frith: If we do, I have never heard of it. The only senator who has a hospitality budget is the Speaker of the Senate, and I think perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate, but I do not know for certain. Obviously he is prepared to simply not use it if he has one. Anyway, if it is the Speaker we are talking about, I do remember an item in the estimates for the Speaker's hospitality. I am sorry to say that I do not know what we did with that item—I have forgotten—but as far as I am concerned, I do not think that the Speaker is extravagant with his hospitality.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I must admit that while I would say without any hesitation that the Speaker is very generous in his hospitality, I do not use that term in the financial sense. He is generous of spirit with his hospitality.

An Hon. Senator: Of spirits.

Senator Frith: Generous of spirits and generous of nutrition. I do not think it is extravagant and, therefore, I do not think there is any reason to criticize the committee's report and send it back as a result of that.

● (1650)

He then dealt with the problem of computer software and I can understand why the Leader of the Government would be critical of that when we remember that he felt we had lacked moral fibre and spine when it came to the question of OASIS and had not disciplined ourselves sufficiently there.

The last main heading of items in the proposer's speech was the question of comparisons with the House of Commons. Apparently, we came off very badly in this comparison. The self-discipline that we ought to have been exercising has been exercised to the bone on the other side. You will remember that the two major recipients of congratulations and commendations from the proposer of the motion—the two main recipients of his beneficence—were the committees, and he was unstinting in his praise of the committees, but the other main beneficiary in his speech was the House of Commons, the House of Commons that is just living in absolutely Spartan misery in order to bring their budget down and beat the Senate when it comes to reductions.

I have had some checks made on that. In real dollar terms expenditures by the House of Commons have increased by $83.7 million since 1979-80 while Senate expenditures have increased by $15 million. In addition, the difference between the Senate and House of Commons expenditures has almost doubled from $70.4 million in 1979-80 to $139.1 million. That is based on Senator Roblin's own figures. You can see how important it is—and perhaps see the point that I want to make—because when we make comparisons between the Senate and the House of Commons for fiscal 1986-87, we have to know what base we are starting with.

Under this present government, expenditures for the House of Commons—and remember what the spokesman for that government wants this chamber to do—for 1985-86 fiscal year up to the end of September 1985 have increased at a far greater pace than expenditures for the Senate.

In September 1984, for example, the Senate spent $2,005,000. In September 1985 it spent $2,509,000—an increase of $504,000 or 25 per cent. In September 1984 the House of Commons spent $9,202,000 and exactly one year after the general election the present government spent $12,242,000 which is an increase of $3 million or 33 per cent.

Senator Perrault: Tory restraint!

Senator Frith: I am not even going to get into that because I would like this to remain a question of comparison as between the Senate and the House of Commons. Senator Roblin did not make any comparisons between this government and the past government. He made comparisons between the House of Commons and the Senate and said that the Senate came off second best when it came to disciplining itself in its expenditures. These figures do not really show the true extent of the difference in the rates of growth as between the two houses of Parliament.

For the 1984-85 fiscal year up to the end of September 1984 the House of Commons spent $64,113,000. For the same period 1985-86, it spent $69,982,000 for an increase of $5,869,000 or 9 per cent.

What are the figures for the Senate, that body that we are told is just indulging itself and not restraining itself as is the House of Commons? For the Senate $12.4 million was spent for 1984-85 fiscal year up to the end of September 1984. For the same period in 1985-86, the Senate spent $12.559 million for an increase of $159,000. How does this compare to the House of Commons which, apparently, is setting the example for us? It was a 9 per cent increase for them, as I said. Do you know what it was for the Senate? One per cent. If we are losing on that kind of comparison, it is not a bad way to lose!

These figures show what the present government has done since taking control of the House. There are some other comments here in the notes I made, but I think they are unnecessarily inflammatory. I just leave honourable senators to think what they might be and to remember that, at least in this case, although allegedly not for all the work that I and other senators spent in committee, I exercised some self-discipline.

That really is the last main heading for the reasons given as to why we ought to not accept the report and not accept all the work that was done by this committee but ought to send it back. In effect what we are hearing from the Leader of the Government in the Senate after all this work is, "Nice try, boys and girls, but just go back and do a little better." That is why I think this is an unacceptable motion and it is unfortunate because it ends up, the very first time that we got to a debate, pitting this bipartisan committee and the Leader of the Government in the Senate against each other.

I am sure that this is not deliberate, either, but if you stop and think about what we are facing—and it is too late to turn it back now because the Leader of the Government has made his speech and his motion—he really cannot lose. No matter what happens to this resolution, he wins, and no matter what happens to the resolution the committee loses, because if the resolution is accepted he has rebuked the committee. He has stood there and rebuked this committee for its work by telling it, "Nice try but not good enough." I pictured the Leader of the Government in the Senate, as I said at the end of my observations when we discussed the report, as certainly an adversary in the Senate, but as far as the public is concerned, I like to think of him as a champion of the Senate. I had hoped that he would say, "Well done. I am going to take your work, honourable senators, on both sides of the house, the work of your subcommittee on both sides of the house and the work of the chairman and I am going to go to my cabinet colleagues and say with pride, 'look what we did in the Senate.' " I will say, "This is what we have reduced it to and I want you to know, cabinet colleagues, that I think senators are entitled to more research assistance. They are entitled to some mechanical services equal to that provided to members of the House of Commons, such as OASIS. They are entitled to many of these aids in order to do their jobs better.

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has worked hard to see that senators are provided with this service, and it has reduced the original figures from almost 15 per cent to some 5 per cent. If you include statutory and extraordinary items—the ones I think we are entitled to, which are minimum additions to help them do their work—the figure is reduced to something in the order of 1 per cent or 2 per cent."

I was hoping that in the speech I would hear something along these lines: "Treasury Board, you are up against a tough opponent if you give us any trouble because I am a champion of the Senate." Instead, no matter what happens, the mover of the motion looks good. If he wins, he has succeeded and people will say that he has taken the committee's work seriously and has cut down even more; if he loses the resolution, he can always say that he tried.

How does the committee stand as a result of this proposal? It cannot win. If we vote against this resolution, we will look like that new breed of person that I had never heard of before, "scientific blinders." We will look like people who have blinded the genuine efforts of the leader. It will appear as though we have blinded him because we have justified our figures. He has said that we will justify our figures and, of course, we will, because that was what our work was all about.

If I succeed in having this resolution defeated, I do not, in effect, win, because I, along with my colleagues on the committee will appear to be people who have not disciplined ourselves. If the resolution is defeated, the committee loses and, I think, the Senate loses. If the resolution carries, the committee and the Senate lose. The only person who will win will be Senator Roblin, and that is why, at the outset, I used the word "unfortunate" in describing this resolution. I am sorry it was ever made; I am sorry it was ever proposed; and I am going to vote against it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that, if the Honourable Senator Roblin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this motion.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not intend to retain the chamber long because the Senate was kind enough to afford me the opportunity to express my views at some length yesterday, and I appreciate that; and we have just heard a very careful and, from his point of view, I am sure, well-reasoned statement in opposition to the proposition that I put before this house.

The proposition I put before this house, when you cut through all the argument and the detail which has caused the debate—and perhaps that is necessarily so—was that we can get along next year on 2.5 per cent more than we had this year. That is the fundamental proposition. That is the proposition that I am asking the Senate to consider.

It is perfectly true that I have made certain comments on various items of expenditure as examples of areas where we might consider saving some money, but I knew at the time that, if I were to do so, there would probably be a strenuous defence of every item mentioned. Heaven knows I was not deceived on that point, because I think Senator Frith has convinced himself and his cheering section that everything is perfect in this committee; that there is really no room at all for any further economies; that they have done the best job that human beings could reasonably be expected to do; and that any suggestion that that is not the case comes either from some malign motive on my part to create trouble or is unreasonable in all its aspects. That is exactly the proposition that has been put forward by Senator Frith. He said that the committee is a bipartisan committee which has laboured long and has produced this result; so, we ought to accept it without demur. I am afraid I do not accept that proposition for one second.

I have to say that Senator Doody and Senator Phillips on many occasions in committee opposed proposed expenditures.

Senator Frith: So did many Liberals.

Senator Roblin: That is good. I am glad to hear it. I only wish there were some who would support this motion this afternoon, but I doubt that is the case. My two colleagues, on more occasions than one, struggled manfully to bring this committee to a position where it would agree to reduce its expenditures to less than the 5.1 per cent that is now being requested. There was vigorous dissent in the committee. Everyone knows that we do not often take votes in committees, and if we cannot secure unanimous consent, we simply say that some senators disagree, and we have seen that that is the case.

I want to say to this house that my colleagues performed their duty manfully in trying to produce to this house a figure that is lower than the one we are discussing this afternoon.

If ever I saw my point proved, it was proved this afternoon by Senator Frith. I was foresighted enough and, I think, probably experienced enough to know that if this report were challenged in any particular, someone would stand up and say,

“No reductions can be made.” He would produce reasons which would be convincing to some, if certainly not to me, as to why that position should be sustained. That is blinding with science. That is an air force expression which I have used many times because I have been experienced with the type of argument presented by Senator Frith on more than one occasion, namely, “This is the figure; I have a thousand reasons why it cannot be changed; it is unalterable; it is the committee’s report to this house and we would be a little bit off base if we were to challenge it. It is an insult to the committee.” I doubt that the committee really can be insulted that easily. The committee can be asked to reconsider what it has done without feeling insulted. It may not agree and it may not want to do it, but I do not think the committee would challenge my good faith or the propriety of my asking it to reconsider what it is doing to reduce the costs that it brings before us.

The fundamental point I am making, namely, that our expenditures are to be increased by 5.1 per cent or so, and that there is a good possibility that we can do better than that and cut it in half and get it down to what is a more reasonable figure, with respect, was not dealt with. The fundamental point that I am making that these costs can be reduced was not considered in a way which I thought it deserved to be considered, but, rather, we have a stonewalling, an absolute defence; everything is all right.

Then what happens? Then I am accused of some moral lapse because I am going to suggest, in public, if you please, that the Senate ought to consider a matter of this sort; that we should present a common front to “outsiders”—that is the word; that the Senate should not consider matters of this kind as matters of public interest, but something that belongs in the cozy, charmed circle of those 102 men and women who sit here. I do not agree with that. I do not think it indicates disloyalty to this body to say that we can deal with these matters in another way and that we do not have to close ranks and make sure that we do not let “outsiders” know what is going on here or express our views in that way.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: He goes on to say that I am the winner no matter what happens. He says that if the motion is turned down, I win, and that if the motion is agreed to, I win.

Colleagues, I am not interested in winners and losers in this debate. I am interested in what I consider to be the public interest.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: That is the issue; it is not a matter of winners and losers in our closed little cozy circle; it is a question of what we think the public interest is and how that public interest can best be served.

Honourable senators, I promised you that I would not speak at any length, nor will I. I conclude what I have to say simply by saying that I believe we can reduce our expenses and that it would not harm the operation of this body or the discharge of its duties if we did so; and that we ought to consider it in the serious and responsible way I have suggested. To suggest that this is an insult to the Senate, that it is a betrayal of this institution, that it lets "outsiders" in, that it fails to provide a common front against "outsiders" or that there are winners and losers in the sense that was expressed this afternoon are concepts which I utterly reject. I say that if we were to perform our duty properly, we would agree to this motion and give to our committee another chance to look at the matters which are before it. That is what I propose this body should do and, on that basis, I rest my case.

● (1710)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would the Honourable Senator Roblin permit a question? Did the committee not make substantial reductions in the initial budgetary requests?

Senator Roblin: Am I not the one who told the Senate exactly what it did do? Indeed I did.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Estimates of the Senate of Canada for the financial year 1986-87, as approved by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled in the Senate on 11th December, 1985, be not considered at this time but referred back to that Committee with instructions that it:

- (1) reduce, by attrition, the number of persons presently on staff by 2%, from 387 to 379;
- (2) conform to the guideline that the increase in the total budgetary Estimates of the Senate for Senator for 1986-87 not exceed the Estimates for the current year by more than 2.5%; and
- (3) report back to the Senate before it adjourns for the Christmas recess or as soon as possible.

Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.
Motion negated, on division.

[Later]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this order is considered debated.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks, for the adoption of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Committee Reports), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will be sending to my friend, Senator Molgat, a copy of an amendment that I intend to move so that he may have a chance to look at it right away, if a page will oblige me. I have another for Senator Godfrey, who I know is also much interested in this issue.

Honourable senators have before them a proposal to amend the rules of the Senate. This proposal suggests that we add to our rules the following clause:

78.(3.1) Within 120 days of the presentation of a report from any committee of the Senate, the government shall, upon the request of the committee, table a comprehensive response thereto.

It purports to add a rule to the rules of the Senate, nothing else. It purports to be an instruction that the Senate itself is to observe in the conduct of its proceedings with respect to committee reports. I think it is based on the quite reasonable idea that, when a committee of the Senate reports and in that report there is some matter to which response is required or desired from the government, there should be some means by which we could formalize our request for a statement of government policy with respect to that matter. That idea I by no means disregard as being unreasonable. I think there is a good deal of merit in it. I recognize that the mover of the motion, Senator Molgat, when he introduced the resolution, said that we have got along without this in the past because we have always been able to succeed in having ministers appear before the committees to answer questions or to give statements of policy in respect of issues of this kind. I think that that was an important point. On the other hand, however, he went on to say that he would like to formalize the matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Could the Leader of the Government indicate where in the Debates of the Senate this report is to be found?

Senator Roblin: It is to be found in the Debates of the Senate of November 6, attached as Appendix C.

Where was I? That is one of the hazards of being interrupted—you get thrown off your pace a little bit. I would not accuse Senator Frith of doing this deliberately; I think he is motivated by a genuine search for knowledge, so I forgive him.

Senator Frith: I have to admit that, on occasion, I would do such a thing deliberately, but I did not in this case.

Senator Roblin: My colleague reminds me that I was finding some merit in the concept. But it is perfectly clear from a casual reading of this resolution that it contains a difficulty; that is, that it purports to instruct the government, because it says, "the government shall" do such-and-such if requested by the Senate. It has been pointed out by the Law Clerk of the Senate that the difficulties of this particular wording are really quite insuperable because, in the way it is written now, it is clearly unconstitutional. The Senate cannot, by resolution or rule or standing order, bind a government to do anything.

[Senator Roblin.]

Therefore, that word "shall", which purports to bind the government because of its imperative nature, is obviously not the right word to be used. Only an act of Parliament, not a resolution of the Senate, can bind the government.

The Law Clerk, I believe, also informed the committee that not only is it unconstitutional in that sense, but it is ultra vires, because rules of procedure only govern the Senate and cannot bind other persons, institutions or third parties. By the very nature of the rules of the Senate it cannot be otherwise.

The Law Clerk made the third point, with which I agree, that not only is it certainly questionable on those two points, but it is unenforceable and that it would be inadvisable for the Senate to draft a rule which is unenforceable and which, if not complied with by the party that it is supposed to govern, certainly would bring no credit to the Senate or to its rules. It will be argued, I am sure, that since the House of Commons did it and the wording proposed by the committee is very similar to theirs, if not identical, why should we not do it? That is a debating point, but I would not accept it, because it seems to me that this is not the House of Commons, this is the Senate. If the House of Commons decides to do something and the government in that chamber accepts it, that is their business. But I do not really see that it means that we should attempt the same thing simply because it was done someplace else.

There is an additional reason, which is that the constitutional position of this body and that of the House of Commons are not the same. This is not a confidence body. We can defeat the government any day of the week that we choose to do so, and it would not make any difference as to who is Prime Minister. That can only be changed by the other place. If the other place, consisting of elected members, decided to use the word "shall" and the government accepted it there, that is their affair. But it seems to me that we should be a little more careful in this house of not attempting to extend our prerogative further than reason and common sense would dictate. Therefore, I have some reason to question the wording of the resolution. I am not questioning what it is trying to do, because I think it is rather good.

I have prepared an amendment which I think expresses the intent of the motions before us but in words that are clearly constitutional; in words that are intra vires; in words that are clearly enforceable and which protect the reputation of the Senate with respect to the outreach of its powers and, at the same time, will give us what we want in respect of this response of the government to recommendations which are made in this chamber. The rules of the Senate have, for their purpose, the direction of senators, and not the direction of anyone else. So I have phrased this amendment in language that would clearly involve only the direction of senators, and, at the same time, will help us with our problem. It is as follows—

● (1720)

Senator Frith: Read it slowly.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps the honourable senator could have Senator Godfrey's copy. It reads as follows:

That the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders be not now adopted but that it be amended by striking out all the words after 78(3.1) and substituting therefor the following:

Where a report from a committee makes recommendations that require implementation by the government, the committee may ask the government to respond to such recommendations within 120 days from the date of the request.

That is quite clear. The committee has authority, if it wishes, to request an answer from the government within 120 days. The second clause that I propose shows how it is to be done:

(3.2) A request by a committee pursuant to subsection (3.1) shall be made in writing to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, shall specify the recommendations to which a response is requested, and shall be tabled in the Senate by the Chairman of the committee.

So that clearly puts the request for information in the hands of whoever happens to be occupying this particular seat in the Senate chamber. But there is a third clause, to make sure that we get some results:

(3.3) The Leader of the Government in the Senate shall table in the Senate the response of the government.

So there we have all the imperative clauses that bear on the Senate, which is as it should be. But, at the same time, we are placing a moral obligation on the government, through its leader in the Senate, to provide the answer that the Senate requires, and to make sure that the thing is done in a proper senatorial and parliamentary fashion, so that it appears in our records.

It seems to me that it would meet the point that Senator Molgat and Senator Godfrey are trying to promote, and, at the same time, would provide a more traditional and appropriate wording in order to achieve the results they want.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask the Leader of the Government a question? I understood him to say that the Law Clerk had advised that a resolution of the Senate would not bind the government. Did the Law Clerk make any judgment as to whether a resolution of the House of Commons would bind the government? I personally would take the view that a resolution of the House of Commons, in circumstances similar to this, does not bind the government in any way. Perhaps the Law Clerk has a different view. Having rendered that advice, I presume that the Law Clerk went on to advise that it would be appropriate to bind the Leader of the Government in the Senate to take certain actions. I would take the view that if we cannot bind the government, we cannot bind the Leader of the Government in the Senate to take any action of that kind; that it is a recommendation.

I go back to what the Law Clerk has said, that, in his view, a resolution of the Senate does not bind the government. What would his view be about the resolution we passed the other day creating an honorary citizen? Was that a superfluous act that has no possible impact on the government? I find that it opens up many questions.

I presume we could take the view that the resolution jointly passed by the House of Commons and the Senate with respect to the honorary citizen could not bind the government either, because it was a resolution and not an amendment to a bill. I find it an interesting area and wonder whether anything has been achieved in changing the motion, which is not binding, in any event; and if we cannot bind the government to do anything, how can we bind the Leader of the Government in the Senate, who is a member of the government and shares the collective responsibility?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has raised a set of issues which leads us into a very murky area—and I am the first to admit it. With respect to a resolution by private members—and here my opinion is worth precisely what my honourable friend is going to pay for it, and that is nothing—it would not, technically speaking, bind the government; but, as my honourable friend knows, I have undertaken to find out for him what attitude the government is taking toward it. So that point will be covered in due course. But as to the legal situation, I regard it, as does my friend, as a murky one. It may very well be that the resolution I have proposed is not satisfactory in all respects. I would not really like to say that I have acquired such a grip of legal knowledge that I would like to defend it à outrance. I would not. But I think that the whole question of the use of “shall” in connection with Senate resolutions is not satisfactorily resolved in the original motion. It may not be satisfactorily resolved in the amendment; but I would like it to be reconsidered in that light to see whether it is satisfactory, and, if not, whether we can improve it. I have no pride of authorship in this whatsoever.

As for the position of the Law Clerk of the Senate, he gave his opinion to the committee. They evidently did not think that much of it, because they did not adopt it—and they may have had a good reason. But it seems to me that the subject is well worth pursuing in depth to see whether we can clarify it. If my particular wording is not satisfactory—it may have defects in it—I am quite willing to consider any reasonable changes that might be made. But I would really like the committee to take another look at this question, to see what the best wording would be. Theirs may not be acceptable to me and mine may not be acceptable to them; but maybe there is some common ground we could reach and from which we can formulate a wording that is more suitable.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: May I rise on a point of order? The motion as proposed would simply amend the report of the committee. As we can see from the discussion so far there are different points of view and there are some other aspects to be considered. It might suit the purposes of the Senate if this motion were amended by the mover to suggest that the report be referred back to committee. The amendment could be debated here to obtain the views of honourable senators, and, when that debate is concluded, the report would go back to committee and the committee could discuss it further.

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Roblin: I believe my honourable friend has made a good suggestion. That is really what I want done. If I had the consent of the chamber to do so, I would adopt it.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will the Leader of the Government then withdraw his motion?

Senator Roblin: Your Honour, I believe I have leave to substitute for it different wording, which, in conjunction with Senator Molgat, I will be glad to give to the Clerk.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Why not stand it until tomorrow and come in with a new version?

Senator Molgat: As I understand it, the matter will now stand until tomorrow. If not, I was going to suggest that it might be adjourned in the name of Senator Godfrey, so that he may have an opportunity to speak, and it would not, at this stage, be concluded.

● (1730)

Senator Roblin: What I would prefer is to have honourable senators agree to standing the order, and then Senator Molgat and I could work out the proper wording. Then, if I have leave, I could substitute that wording.

Senator Frith: And then Senator Godfrey could speak to it.

Senator Roblin: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.).

Hon. David Walker: Honourable senators, I withdraw.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Then perhaps the order should stand in the name of Senator Hicks.

Order stands in name of Senator Hicks.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, OTTAWA, AND SPRING CONFERENCE, LOMÉ, TOGO—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-fourth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union which was hosted by Canada in Ottawa from 2nd to 7th September, 1985, as well as to the spring Conference which took place in Lomé, Togo, from 25th to 30th March, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise at this time on a point of order. I am prepared to proceed, but having regard to the clock, I suspect that I will not have time to deliver the comments that I wish to deliver in one sustained breath with your undivided attention, so I would ask that we stand the order until the next sitting of the Senate.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

RAOUL WALLENBERG—RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—MOTION RE SECOND DISTINCT SITTING STANDS

On the calling of Senator MacEachen's motion:

That the events of December 10, 1985, relating to the Second Distinct Sitting were irregular and unacceptable and are not to be considered as a valid precedent.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to proceed with this motion today. I understand that Senator Flynn has a point of order, and we might, at least, attempt to understand the point of order and possibly deal with it before 6 o'clock.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Frith and I have had discussions about the possibility of changing the wording of the motion in a way that would alleviate the objections that I have, which I would raise by way of a point of order. If there is agreement to what I am about to suggest, I would withdraw my objection. I think that what Senator MacEachen had in mind was to say that the recall of the Senate on December 10 should not be considered as a valid precedent, or something to that effect. I do not know what the Leader of the Government thinks, but it seems to me that we would have no objection to a motion of that type, if we say that that which occurred on December 10 could not be repeated, on the basis that it is not a valid precedent. If that is agreeable to Senator MacEachen, perhaps we could amend the motion to read in this fashion: "That the recall of the Senate on December 10 should not be considered as a valid precedent." If we use that wording or a similar wording, I would withdraw my objection.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, Senator Frith has kept me informed about the discussions held with Senator Flynn. I understand the suggestion; namely, that we would agree not to regard the events of December 10 as a valid precedent. The wording of this motion is quite general in that it refers to the events relating to the Second Distinct Sitting. It is a general statement and not focused on any particular point. For example, if one put in the motion that the recall of the Senate does not constitute a valid precedent, it would focus and pinpoint the source of the difficulty and, in a sense, constitute a criticism of possibly one or several persons, which I wish to avoid in the motion for reasons which will be evident. However, I wanted to put on the record that the events surrounding that sitting were irregular and that, therefore, it should not be considered a valid precedent.

I am prepared, because of the reasons which Senator Flynn indicated through Senator Frith, to withdraw the word "unacceptable". If that is agreeable, we could say that the events leading up were irregular and, therefore, it does not constitute a valid precedent. I would like to dispose of the matter quickly and, therefore, I would like Senator Flynn to consider my proposal, that having dropped the word "unacceptable" and not focusing on any precise element of flawed procedure, it becomes a general statement and does not constitute a criticism. If we said that the recall of the Senate does not constitute a valid precedent, it is a criticism and it pinpoints the criticism in a direction in which I do not wish it to go at the moment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend would consider the use of the word "unusual" rather than "irregular" we may have a meeting of minds.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I hate to infuse what might be a personal matter, but if the events preceeding what we are now discussing are adverting to my not granting unanimous consent, I would have to take considerable umbrage at either the expression "irregular" or "unacceptable".

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would like to clarify the situation for the benefit of my friend, Senator Macquarrie. The action taken by the honourable senator was never intended to be referred to, either directly or indirectly, in the motion.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): It was not an event leading to the recall. It was perfectly legitimate to refuse unanimous consent.

● (1740)

Senator Flynn: If I read the motion correctly, I thought that you had added enough for it not to be considered as a valid precedent. Of course, it is a criticism of the way that the Senate was recalled, but it merely says that you do not wish this to be taken as a way of doing it again. That is merely what you are saying when you say, "... and are not to be considered as a valid precedent."

However, if you use the word "unacceptable", there is an implied criticism not only of certain persons but a criticism of the decision of the Senate itself on that very occasion. It could apply to the resolution passed on that occasion; it could apply to the unanimous consent that was given to proceed. In other words, this is really a criticism, not only of certain persons but the Senate itself, whereas if you say:

The recall of the Senate for the second sitting on December 10 should not be considered as a valid precedent . . .

It means only that you are not invoking this occasion as a precedent to recall the Senate again in similar circumstances.

In that case, I think nobody would really have any problem with it, and I think it would meet the purpose that the Leader of the Opposition has in mind.

Senator MacEachen: I understand what Senator Flynn is saying, but if we do state that it should not be considered as a valid precedent, surely we should give at least a slight clue as to why the Senate has come to that conclusion, and that is why the word "irregular" should be retained. You can word it whichever way you wish, but really the substance is that the Senate is stating that it is not a valid precedent, because the events leading up to the Second Distinct Session were irregular. I put it generally and vaguely, and I think that is reasonable, having withdrawn the word "unacceptable", which is somewhat pejorative. "Irregular" is a procedural statement which illuminates the reason why we do not regard this as a valid precedent.

Senator Flynn: In any event, by using the word "irregular", you are blaming the Senate itself for agreeing to proceed on that very occasion. I think what the Leader of the Opposition does not want is for someone to say: "We did it this way on a given occasion, so we can do it again." That is the only real problem you have, and therefore once you have said: "This way of recalling the Senate should not be used in the future to do it again," you should leave it at that. You really win your point with respect to the only part that is valid for the future by this modification.

However, the moment you use the word "irregular" and/or "unacceptable", there is formal criticism of the Senate and of the person who was responsible under the circumstances. In other words, you say, "You did it on that occasion; fine, but please tell me that you will not use this method to do it again." That is what you are saying.

Senator MacEachen: We are not reflecting on a decision of the Senate itself—

Senator Flynn: We are, in a way, because of the words you have used.

Senator MacEachen: We are not reflecting on the motion which was adopted; we are not reflecting upon the fact that the Senate moved to a particular Order of the Day by unanimous consent. We are saying that the events leading up to the Second Distinct Sitting were irregular and therefore should not constitute a valid precedent. However, I am not prepared to say, as Senator Flynn has just suggested, that it was all right. That is what he has just said; that we should say, "This is all right, but we will not do it again." It was not all right and we must state it was not all right.

Senator Frith: It seems to me, listening to the exchange, that where we stand is the way Senator MacEachen just put it. Obviously we have a lot in common on this motion. It is quite clear from the exchange that we have a common objective. However, where we differ is in the way in which we word it, and that is what we are talking about. It seems to me that the area of difference between us is that we want the motion to say that there was something wrong about it; that it was not right; that it was irregular. We are not saying that it was contemptible or any word of that kind. We have taken out the word "unacceptable" which serves two purposes: First, it does take some of the rhetoric out of it, and, second, it partly meets Senator Flynn's point that it seems contradictory to say that something that you accepted to do is unacceptable. However, that does not touch on the point of saying that that method of recall—and most of the interventions made this point—was irregular under rule 14A.

Therefore if we are going to word it in any way that says it is all right but never do it again, or any form of that kind, that is where we differ. However, we feel that we must make the point that, if it is not to be a valid precedent, we should also make the point that it was irregular.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I draw the attention of the Senate to rule 12:

If, at six o'clock in the afternoon, the business be not concluded, the Speaker or the chairman of the committee leaves the Chair until eight o'clock—

Is it your wish, honourable senators, to ignore the clock?

Senator Frith: Perhaps we should ignore it until we have disposed of this item.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think we could ignore the clock for a few minutes, Mr. Speaker and honourable senators, provided that, after we finish this discussion, that will be the end of the day and we need not come back at 8 o'clock.

The word "irregular" causes a problem. I think that I support Senator Flynn's contention that that necessarily has to be a reflection that may be out of order. I think the word "unusual" is not, because I am quite prepared to admit that it was an unusual activity that we indulged in. I would not consider that any action of mine was condoned by the Leader of the Opposition if he uses the word "unusual", instead of "irregular". I think that the tone of the word "unusual" is not offensive to the Senate as such—and it is certainly not offensive to me. I do not think it would give rise to a point of order.

However, the other word "irregular" is frankly difficult to accept. If my honourable friend wishes to say that he did not like what happened, he may have more company than he expects, but the word "unusual", I think, does adequately describe the situation, and if that word could be placed in the resolution, it would ease things a great deal.

Senator Frith: An additional aspect of the problem is that we are assuming that we cannot reflect on any procedure that a senator might feel is irregular. For example, if we worded it in a way that dealt directly with the question of recall, namely that the recall was irregular, that does not amount to a criticism of the Senate; that reflects on the decision of the Speaker, and of course in the Senate there is nothing to prevent the Senate reflecting on a decision of the Speaker. In fact, when the Speaker makes a decision on a ruling, it is sometimes appealed.

The point is that if we are going to insist on focusing our criticism on the recall, then it amounts to a reflection on the Speaker's decision to issue the recall. That is a reflection we do not want to make, but it is quite acceptable in terms of a regular proceeding because we do that if we appeal the Speaker's decisions. We do not want to do that, but if we can say that "the events were irregular," then we will not focus on that.

Senator Flynn: That is worse.

Senator Frith: It depends on what you mean by the word "worse"; it may reflect on something that was done in the Senate as distinct from a decision of the Senate. The events leading to the recall were not a decision of the Senate. They simply were not a decision of the Senate. The Senate did not decide on the recall; the fact is that the government and the Speaker decided on the recall, and there is nothing unacceptable about that reflection.

If we can find a word between "irregular" and "unusual", obviously we are home.

Senator Roblin: What about "abnormal"? Would that make you feel any better?

Senator MacEachen: The words "abnormal" and "unusual" have no procedural significance. We are talking about a procedural matter. To say it is "unusual" or "abnormal"—unusual things happen regularly. We are talking about an irregularity.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, since there is an invitation for more precision in the motion, I submit with all due respect that, as I see it, there are worse troubles than what we are talking about. The motion states:

That the events of December 10, 1985, relating to the Second Distinct Sitting—

That is an enormously broad sweep. I am convinced that this matter of the "Second Distinct Sitting", while it may be lost in the memory of some of us here—and already lost, if it ever was important, to the press—will, for those who care for parliamentary procedure, become very important. I think we should be precise and careful.

You could not possibly, in rational dialogue, exculpate what went on during the First Distinct Sitting from those events which led to the Second Distinct Sitting. You are embracing many things that might not easily be contained in a short debate, certainly not before it becomes really six o'clock.

Senator Frith: We are still on the point of order.

Senator Flynn: Yes. We are discussing the possibility of finding acceptable wording.

Senator Frith: The item we are dealing with now is the point of order, and we are trying to find a solution to the point of order. I just want to know where we are so that we know what we are adjourning. I am not arguing the point. I want to know what it is we will be adjourning, unless Senator MacEachen does not agree to an adjournment, since it is his motion. I suggest that we adjourn.

Senator Flynn: We can postpone making a decision on this until tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: We now have a procedural argument as to the admissibility of the motion. Presumably Senator Flynn is arguing that this motion is not admissible under the rules of the Senate. I would argue vigorously against that.

Senator Flynn: I know you will.

Senator MacEachen: But at a certain point any member of the Senate is permitted to have a decision taken on an admissible motion. I suggest that this is an admissible motion under the rules of the Senate and cannot be ruled out of order.

I am quite prepared to find a solution, but not a solution which attempts to whitewash a very acutely embarrassing incident that we would all like to forget, but which, unfortunately, happened.

We had a very vigorous debate on that, and anyone who reads the debate will know why this motion makes sense.

If you want to hold off the procedural point until tomorrow, I am quite prepared to agree to that. I am ready to try to find a common solution, if possible, but at a certain point we may differ and then we will have to deal with the motion.

Senator Flynn: Fine.

Motion stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, December 19, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.

Prayers.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS DEPOSITORS COMPENSATION

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE & COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-79—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the thirteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce respecting the subject matter of Bill C-79, an act respecting the provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits.

With leave of the Senate, I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted, it is not my intention to make an opening statement, but rather to yield to Senator Sinclair who has some observations to make and who is under some time constraints.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we agree to deal with this report now—which, generally speaking, I think is a good idea—I wish to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to tell us about this and other legislation.

Bill C-79, as I understand it, is now of some importance to the government's agenda. I also understand that it was reported back to the House of Commons on November 7, but has not received much debate over there. In fact, it was brought forward for 15 minutes' debate on a Friday afternoon approximately three weeks ago. Since then there has been no debate on this legislation in the House of Commons.

Could we have some idea when we will receive Bill C-79, and while answering that, perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could tell us what chance there is of receiving any other legislation today, tomorrow, next—well, let's leave it at today or tomorrow.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can only say that the House of Commons, like this body, decides its own schedule. I am sure that the members of the government side of the House of Commons would have been delighted to see Bill C-79 passed some time ago. That has not happened. Just how much time the House of Commons debated the bill may very well be the amount of time my honourable friend has alleged, but certainly it was before a committee of the House of Commons for a substantial period of time. I, like all other senators, would have liked to see the bill before the Senate earlier than today.

I cannot say that it will be referred to the Senate this evening or tomorrow. I know the government would like the Senate to have the bill before it this evening or tomorrow—preferably yesterday. That has not happened. I can only say that it well behooves us to be here. The bill is on the way. The government has announced its intention to get the bill out as quickly as it can. I suppose that if the members of the opposition in the other place want to keep it in the House of Commons, they can. That is the way the system works; they will use every ploy they can to exercise their rights in the House of Commons.

I can only say that it will be before the Senate as quickly as the government can get it here. Whether that will be today or tomorrow I cannot guarantee at all.

Senator Frith: In the course of his remarks the Deputy Leader of the Government said that "it well behooves us to be here." Do I understand that he thinks it behooves the members of the Senate to be here so long as there exists a possibility no greater than the one he has just described? Does he think that we should be here waiting for Bill C-79, bearing in mind his words, "that the House of Commons decides its own schedule"? Is there nothing more concrete than that? Has he been given any indication from his colleagues in the other place that it will be referred to the Senate? It is not under debate.

The House of Commons is, I believe, debating time allocation on Bill C-70, respecting family allowances. Is there time allocation on this bill? Does it behoove us to be here if there is only a possibility that the bill might come?

Senator Doody: The only mistake I made in my earlier remarks was the use of the word "behooves"; I had not realized how archaic it is until I heard it bouncing back. That was a terrible choice, and I apologize for using it. It is archaic and should not have been used.

I think that as a legislative body appointed to attain a holding pattern, as it were, for some legislation, to be a body of sober second thought, it is our duty to be present to look at the legislation that is passed by the elected body.

Senator Frith: Agreed, as passed by the other place.

Senator Doody: That is right. As long as we have been told by the government that they want the House of Commons to pass legislation, I believe that is our duty to be here to look at it and do what we can for it. If that legislation is on its way, and we are told that it is, then I think we should be here. Obviously, some honourable senators disagree with that and I am not surprised.

Senator Frith: I just want to understand what the government leader's view is respecting our duty.

Senator Doody: Whose view?

Senator Frith: Yours.

Senator Doody: My view is—

Senator Frith: Just to make it clear—

Senator Doody: I yield the floor to you.

Senator Frith: I will yield the floor to you immediately.

Senator Doody: That is fine. I will sit down. I know the rules.

Senator Frith: I want to clarify what we are asking. We have heard from the Deputy Leader of the Government that we have some duty that is archaically expressed as something that “behooves” us, and I am getting the impression that he sees the Senate, to use his expression, in a “holding pattern,” or to use another archaic expression that we are sort of ladies and gentlemen in waiting and it is our duty to be here waiting respectfully, or to bring it more up to date, flying around the airport in some holding pattern waiting for advice that something is on the way. Of course, all legislation once it gets first reading is, in a sense, on the way—it is launched. The minute it gets first reading in the other place it is launched. So long as there is legislation in the other place that has been given first reading and is “on its way,” are we meant to be ladies and gentlemen in waiting waiting respectfully for the House of Commons to get on with its job of passing the legislation? Would it not be more reasonable to say, “I, as Deputy Leader of the Government, am able to say that there is legislation that by all indications will receive third reading tomorrow or Monday or Friday or whenever”? It seems to me there is a big gap between legislation that “is on its way” and legislation that we are realistically anticipating receiving.

Senator Doody: There are several areas that Senator Frith mentioned which are worthy of comment. One of them is the display of humility from Senator Frith which none of us has seen before—the hand and the bow and so on—and I am very appreciative of that.

Senator Frith: I did not think that was our role; I thought that was what you were saying our role is.

Senator Doody: I certainly hope that the national press gets a look at that because it is a first and is very welcome, and I thank the honourable gentleman.

Senator Petten: What national press?

Senator Frith: They are up there.

Senator Doody: Do you want me to have another run at that because it just might happen—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: —and don't tell me you wouldn't like it.

[Senator Doody.]

The other side of that coin is the role of the Senate. I can only tell you what I think we should be doing at this point. We should be prepared to receive this legislation which we have been told by the government will be here within the next day or so. Beyond that I cannot say. I would love to be able to tell honourable senators that it will be here within the next 15 minutes and we can all look at it very assiduously, apply all the sober second thoughts that we can focus on it at this point and perhaps pass most of it, or some of it, and be on our way. But I cannot do that because I do not have that much control over what goes on in the other place. Perhaps it is a pity that I don't because we could speed things up considerably.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: The situation is as it is and I can only describe it. I thank honourable senators for their attention.

Senator Frith: I understand that the position of the government is that the Senate should be here for legislation that we can be assured is on its way within the next day or so. If “day or so” means day or two, then I agree with him.

Senator Doody: How the honourable senator wants to interpret the words “day or so” is his business. I have listened to debates about the word “soon” in this place and there have been some difficulties with it. I can only say that we are doing our best to speed the other place along its appointed course. It is to be hoped that their schedule will fall in with ours and, if so, then all of us will go home speedily and happily. Let us just hope that things proceed. We are pretty open at this point, and I thank honourable senators once again for their tolerance.

Senator Frith: We really believe you are doing your best, and that is what worries us.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear,

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I gather this is an unusual day. Before we talk about the report, honourable senators, I should like to draw your attention to the fact that I observed the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce for the many hours that he presided over the consideration of the subject matter of Bill C-79 and I would like you to know that I have seen chairmen operate in many instances and that, in my opinion, he did an absolutely first-class job.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Some Hon. Senators: But—?

Senator Frith: Enjoy it while you can.

Senator Sinclair: However, he had a difficult task because he had to deal with something that was most unusual. Indeed, how unusual it is is easily ascertained when we see that the short title of this bill states:

This Act may be cited as the Financial Institutions Depositors Compensation Act.

A similar bill is not to be found in the index of Canadian statutes.

Furthermore, if you turn to clause 16 of the bill, you will get another shock because there it states:

There is hereby appropriated, for the purposes of this Act eight hundred and seventy-five million dollars to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund from time to time as required.

Honourable senators, why would the subject matter of such an unusual bill require the attention of this chamber? Someone said that it was caused by a unique situation. What was unique about it? The uniqueness of it was that in the middle of March a situation arose which resulted in a tragic mistake being made; a mistake that is going to cost $1 billion. Few people are ever in the position of making a mistake of that magnitude.

What caused that ill-fated decision to be made in March? It was made after consultation with people in the highest offices of our government. According to the evidence, we have been told that the Prime Minister was consulted. Of course, since this matter deals with banks, the Department of Finance was fully involved. These people reached a conclusion, and that conclusion was that the CCB should not be allowed to go under but that a rescue package would have to be put together to make the continued operation of the CCB possible. As this report on the subject matter indicates, the Minister of State (Finance) said that the decision was made, and I quote, "on the best information available at the time."

Honourable senators, I do not think that anyone would claim that the government did not have the right to make that decision. That is what the government is there for. It had the right to make the decision either to liquidate the bank or to rescue it. I think we must turn our minds to the consequences of the decision that was taken and the reason why it was taken. I do not accept the view that, on the best information available, the decision to rescue the bank was the proper one. Contrary to the position adopted by the Minister of State (Finance), I do not think that the only person who can come to that conclusion—that is, that it was not the right decision—is exercising hindsight. I think, honourable senators, that all Canadians have the right to expect that the ministers should be capable of prudent foresight, based on their knowledge, experience and ability to determine economic flows within Canada.

The decision was made in the light of the largest and deepest recession that the country had experienced in some 50 years, a recession that had particular impact in western Canada. The Minister of State (Finance) has often reminded all who will listen of her great familiarity with that part of the country because of the years she has lived there and worked there. She also likes to remind all who will listen of her experience in financial markets. So she was particularly attuned to the problems of western Canada, especially those of British Columbia and Alberta, where the CCB and the Northland were, for the most part, operating. After a little get-together on the weekend, the major banks were called in. I was somewhat amused, while reading the testimony of the governor, when he said that he asked the representatives of these major banks whether they thought the bank should be saved. He did so, not telling them what it was going to cost—not telling them anything except that the bank was in trouble. He asked them whether they, as bankers, thought it should be saved. Any response other than a "yes" would be startling.

In any event, the governor took that to mean that they were in agreement to working out a package. However, all experienced people—particularly those in the Department of Finance and their advisers—must have known that, once a rescue package or support package was announced, a domino effect was bound to take place. All regional banks, all small banks, would immediately become suspect. They must have known that. So, knowing that—and that being easily ascertained and available—they had to be certain that the rescue package was adequate, complete, and one that had a very high likelihood of being successful. Of course, it was not successful. It was not successful many times over. It was not successful because warning signals which had been flown were ignored, because the government did not exercise the authority vested in it under the existing legislation. It ignored its own knowledge of the situation in western Canada. It should have been warned, particularly when bankers said, "We want, as a condition precedent to our putting up the money, an assurance in writing, signed by the Inspector General, that this rescue package will make the bank solvent." That was the condition, and they asked for it—and, of course, that was given. The Inspector General gave that letter, which was part of the undertaking. Of course, the bank was not solvent.

As the report states, the rescue package was doomed to failure from the time it was put in place. Having put the rescue package in place, the government, the Minister of State (Finance), said to depositors, "You can be assured that this bank is all right. It is sound in body and limb. It is sound. Put your money in;" and depositors who had time deposits, redeposited, and so on. Indeed, within a few weeks of the bank's moving into liquidation in August the government instructed the bank to continue to take deposits in excess of $60,000. That is the evidence given by the chairman of the CCB. Having done that, honourable senators, I hope it is clear that the government has a moral obligation to pay uninsured depositors. In my judgment, when senior ministers of the Crown say, "You can put your money in a bank," and then that bank fails, they have a moral obligation to make sure that the people who followed their advice are held harmless.

I suppose there could be those who would say, "You are free and you do not really have to follow advice," but I say that if one cannot follow the advice, and accept at face value statements made by senior finance ministers, by the governor of the central bank and the Inspector General of Banks, then this country is in a pretty awful state. So insofar as this bill is making funds available to pay uninsured depositors, I think it is good legislation.

That raises another question and that is, who are these people? We who have had the advantage of living under the common law system know that it is a part of our tradition that relationships of individuals with their bankers are confidential. These uninsured depositors, reacting to the views of senior government people, maintained a banking relationship with the knowledge and with the expectation that, as they were dealing with the bank in accordance with common law tradition, their confidentiality would be respected. There are those who would say, "Oh, yes, but they are not being paid as if they were depositors; they are being paid by a bankrupt estate." That is not so. The depositors put their money in the bank at the request of the government and the government, in my opinion, has a right and a public duty to respect the confidentiality that that relationship brings with it. According to the records there is one fellow who had $1 million cash to play around with on time deposits. I would like to know who he is, but I think he has every right to remain unidentified, and I should not be able to find out who he is.

Honourable senators, once you go to the effect of moral responsibility and the effect of relationships and understandings, Bill C-79 overlooks one very material group with claims, and that is the group of major banks who advanced the $60 million. You will recall that they reacted at the request of the government to come to a meeting and that they reacted to putting together a rescue package. They reacted after the government had paid the debenture holders, and they reacted only after they had an assurance in writing that the rescue package would make the bank solvent. Yet, the bill does not provide that they receive compensation. That, I think, is a flaw in this legislation. It makes it unjustly discriminatory. That flaw makes the legislation inequitable and it makes it unfortunate because on the one hand the government is saying, "I have a moral responsibility to certain groups", and, on the other hand, it says, "I do not recognize that responsibility to another group." What caused this tragic mistake? First, let us all agree that the primary responsibility for getting this bank into trouble lies with the management, its board of directors and its audit committee. Also, the external auditors had a responsibility that they did not properly carry out.

However, in the final analysis, one must look to the government to make sure that a system that had worked for 60 years was still going to work under the stresses and strains of economic conditions such as existed in western Canada as a result of the 1981-82 depression, and the government did not react. When the bill comes before us, honourable senators, I am sure that we will take a close look at the various clauses and decide at that time what our position will be.

Hon. Michael Kirby: Honourable senators, I rise to make a few remarks on the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of Bill C-79, because the bill deals with an extremely important issue from the point of view of the Canadian taxpayer. It is, after all, a bill to spend $875 million of taxpayers' money. I also rise to speak on the issue because it seems to me that the report and much of the information it contains is information which I think members of this chamber should take the time to read and understand. I thought it might be useful, therefore, if I highlighted for you some of the key points in the report, not by quoting from it, but rather by way of giving you what is essentially a summary of some of the main points. When you read the report, you will discover that there are three major issues on which the committee was divided, and I think it is important for you to understand what those three issues are before the bill comes to this chamber for debate on second reading.

Before I make my remarks on the report, let me echo what Senator Sinclair said about the outstanding job which the chairman of the committee, Senator Murray, did in chairing our hearings. I think that all of you should know that the committee met on Bill C-79 for more than 30 hours of hearings, not counting our in camera sessions. It would be putting it mildly to say that some aspects of the bill and some aspects of the evidence which we heard during our hearings were quite controversial and I, for one, think that Senator Murray did a very good job of steering through what could have been quite a political minefield. I say that in particular because, since we are both Nova Scotians, neither of us is known for being particularly non-partisan, and so the non-partisan way in which he chaired the committee deserves real commendation. The manner in which he carried out his duties as chairman of this committee, it seems to me, is an important role model for all Senate committee chairmen to follow.

Having said that, let me now turn to the report which was placed on your desks a few moments ago and let me just give you the highlights of that report. In order to understand why the report has so much background material, I refer you to the fact that when the committee began hearings on this bill, the Senate reference said specifically that the committee should look at the bill, "or any matter relating thereto." Those words are important because, in fact, a substantial amount of the evidence presented before the committee was essentially background to the events that led to the necessity for the bill, and I think that some of that background is quite important for us to understand.

Senator Sinclair a few moments ago talked about a decision which was made last March. He said that decision was a "tragic mistake." He went on to talk about that tragic mistake being caused by the lack of "prudent foresight on the part of the government."

This is one of the three issues which, when you read the report, you will see the committee members were substantially divided on. The committee was divided because much of the evidence presented to the committee made it very clear that there were, in fact, over a period of many weeks and months signals that the CCB could be in serious trouble.

The minister herself told us on the first of her two appearances before the committee that as long ago as October 4, 1984—shortly after she assumed her office, and shortly after she was given responsibility for, among other things, banking issues—she was briefed by her officials on the problems of CCB. She went on to point out that starting in January of 1985 she received almost weekly briefings on the CCB.

The fact of the matter is that senior officials reporting to her, specifically the Inspector General of Banks, were monitoring this issue regularly, and apparently felt that this issue was of sufficient concern that the minister ought to be briefed on it on a very regular basis. Yet the fact of the matter is that neither the minister nor the Inspector General of Banks used their power—power available to them under the Bank Act—to order any special audit or any special investigation of the CCB; that while they knew there was a potential problem, they continued to rely exclusively for their information on the bank's external auditors and on the bank's management.

Clearly the bank's management is hardly an unbiased source of information on the nature of the problems of the bank, and as evidence before the committee by the external auditors made clear, there is serious question as to the total degree of objectivity that the external auditors exhibited. More importantly, the external auditors did not understand that they were not only the primary sources of information, but virtually the only sources of information which the government had on the problems at CCB. Government officials said that they relied exclusively on the external auditors, but the external auditors did not understand that this was really their role.

It seems to me that the prudent foresight which Senator Sinclair referred to meant the government—when the bank had its problems in mid March—had a substantial lack of adequate information with which to deal with the problem. To that extent, I echo Senator Sinclair's views that the government, and indeed the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State (Finance) erred. Their error was not in not understanding the problem, but in not having used the powers available to them under the Bank Act to obtain the information that would be required in order for them to be able to deal with the situation adequately in mid March.

Honourable senators will find if they read page 42 of the committee report that the committee was, as one might expect, divided—in this case largely along partisan lines—on the issue of whether or not the minister should have used the Bank Act powers, whether or not the Inspector General of Banks should have used his Bank Act powers and whether or not the government was negligent in not understanding the situation adequately before March 14.

The significance of the date of March 14 is that that is the day on which the management of CCB came to Ottawa and informed the Inspector General of Banks and the Governor of the Bank of Canada that the bank was no longer solvent, or that it was in danger of becoming insolvent. That issue of insolvency, I might add almost parenthetically, is an important issue because the issue was not a liquidity problem; it was not a cash flow problem for the bank. The bank management recognized that their loan portfolio was in sufficiently bad shape that on March 14 they came to Ottawa and said: "This bank is in very serious trouble and, indeed, is virtually insolvent."

Despite the fact that the government was told on March 14 that this problem existed, it is interesting to note that it took four days before the Inspector General of Banks sent anyone to actually look at what was going on in the CCB head office, that from March 14 to March 18 nothing in effect happened in terms of increasing the information that the government would need in order to respond adequately to the CCB problem.

Clearly, honourable senators, that indicates to me that they obviously did not regard it as a crisis situation. The government did not appear to be in a panic about it. The government felt that it could take its time in reaching a solution to this problem, and there did not appear, at least in terms of the government's response from March 14 to March 18, to be any particular rush for solving the problem. Only four days later did officials from the Inspector General's office go to the CCB.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada on March 22, on a Friday, called in representatives of the country's major chartered banks to outline the CCB problem and seek their solution to it. It is an interesting point to note, however, that even before the bankers arrived in Ottawa, even before they came to the meeting convened by the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Minister of Finance had already signed an order appointing a curator for the CCB, that order to go into effect on Monday, March 25, if a support package was not available. That is an important point to note simply because many of the government witnesses and the minister herself stressed to the committee that everyone they discussed the issue with over the weekend of March 23 and March 24 agreed that something had to be done by March 25. The implication of the way those statements were put to the committee was that it was a consensus decision on that weekend that something had to happen. I think it is important to note that the government itself had decided before it even consulted with the other banks that the critical deadline was whether or not the bank would open on March 25 because it had already signed a curator's order before the other bankers arrived in town.

Therefore, an important point in this chronology is: Did the government have to move as quickly as it did by March 25, or could it have taken another two days or three days or a week to obtain the information that would have enabled the government to understand fully the seriousness of the situation at CCB? Could it have taken the time, as it was urged to by the bankers it consulted with on that weekend, to send in extra inspectors to analyze the loan portfolio of the CCB, and to understand the seriousness and how deep the trouble was with that bank?

The fact of the matter is that the government did not do that. The government concluded that, for some reason—and at this point nobody really understands that reason—the critical deadline was March 25, and a decision had to be made by the time the bank was scheduled to open at 9 o'clock on the morning of March 25. This from a government that did not bother to collect any additional information in all of the weeks and months from October 4 to March 25, that did not bother particularly to rush to deal with the problem during the period from March 14, when the CCB management came to town, to March 18, when the government started to gather additional information at a fairly lackadaisical pace.

So one of the things the committee was sharply divided on was the issue of whether or not the government should have attempted to get additional information, or whether it rushed into the situation so quickly that it did not take the time it should have and, as a result—again to use Senator Sinclair's phrase—led to a tragic mistake being made on the weekend of March 23 and 24 when a decision was made to put $255 million into the bank, the $255 million being an amount which our report says in a couple of places was clearly woefully inadequate with the result that the exercise was clearly doomed to failure from the start.

Senator Flynn: What would you have done?

Senator Perrault: You are in the government; so you tell us.

Senator Flynn: He says that the package was inadequate.

Senator Kirby: I am quite happy to respond to Senator Flynn's question because it seems to me, as I think he knows, although he was in and out of the committee so often that it was difficult to tell which part of the committee sessions he attended and which he did not—

Senator Flynn: I can read; I do not need you to read the evidence.

Senator Kirby: When the witnesses before the committee were asked what else could have been done, other options were in fact discussed, and discussed in some detail. The basic issue, as it became abundantly clear, was that nobody in the government really understood the situation of the CCB. Nobody in the government knew what the loan portfolio was worth and nobody in the government even bothered to make any effort to find out with any great urgency when they found out there was a serious problem.

● (1440)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Flynn: Rubbish!

Senator Perrault: You let us take over and we will show you.

Senator Frith: Not only "hear, hear" but "listen, listen."

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Kirby: The second point we need to understand, because it relates to why the decision was made to move so quickly on that weekend of March 24-25, is, as most of you realize, that the national Economic Summit was taking place that weekend at the National Arts Centre.

Senator Frith: Now we hear about it.

Senator Perrault: Now we are getting to the nub of the problem.

Senator Kirby: It is very clear that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance were far more concerned about appearing on national television sitting next to the Prime Minister than they were about participating in the negotiations involving—

Senator Frith: Here it comes!

Senator Kirby: Some of us, of course, would question their judgment about wanting to appear on television next to the Prime Minister but we are not responsible for those kinds of judgments. The fact of the matter is that the negotiations with the support group, with the banks, were all carried on by officials and not by ministers. Ministers found time to meet with officials, it turned out, on a Saturday morning before 10 o'clock, 10 o'clock being the time that national television started again, in case any of you wonder about the significance of that particular time. The result is that all of these discussions were carried on by officials. As someone who has had the privilege of working for leaders of a government both provincially and federally, I know of no issue in which responsibility for negotiations of this magnitude was left completely in the hands of officials. I think it is an interesting comment on priorities that national television results in ministers of this government deciding that they would leave an issue as important as this to be handled exclusively by officials.

Senator Perrault: Shocking!

Senator Argue: Let's have the Senate televised.

Senator Flynn: We should have Senator Kirby on television.

Senator Kirby: An interesting point worth noting as another contributing factor to the decision of not letting the bank go under but to have a support package of some kind implemented was that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who chaired this negotiating session, indicated that he thought that since it would be the first bank failure in more than 60 years if the bank was allowed to fail, it was important that there be a period of public conditioning so that the public would not react too adversely to a bank failure. There seemed to be a view on the part of the governor of the bank that Canadians should be educated slowly to the possibility of a bank collapse. This public attitude toward bank failures in general was clearly an underlying factor in the consideration.

What we had was a situation where there was a meeting called to try to decide how to save the CCB on the weekend March 23 and March 24. There were no ministers present. The government had very little information. We had the government feeling that for its own political purposes the collapse of a bank the day after the national Economic Summit was something they could not tolerate. For all those reasons members of the support group were forced into making a decision which, as hindsight makes very clear, was a decision which turned out to be a serious mistake. Knowing Senator Flynn's view of the wisdom of the decision, let me just tell other members of this chamber—

Senator Flynn: I didn't say that.

Senator Kirby: —how the $255 million was arrived at. If you want a really good example of the quality of analysis that goes into decision-making by this government there is no better example than understanding how the figure of $255 million was arrived at. They calculated that if the CCB failed it would cost the CDIC $75 million. Therefore, that $75 million was gone whether the bank was saved or not. They knew they needed some figure between $200 million and $300 million, which is what you call really good accounting—fine accurate, data.

Senator Thériault: What's $100 million!

Senator Kirby: My colleague, Senator Thériault, says, "What's $100 million," and I think it just shows how times have changed. That is the way this government looks at issues like that.

Senator Perrault: They have been in power too long.

Senator Kirby: Having decided that $75 million was required, they found that the members of the support group, the banks, would be prepared to contribute up to $60 million to the support package. Then what the government did—this is really sophisticated analysis—is they said, "We will match that and get the western provincial governments of Alberta and British Columbia to match that," and that is how you get to the figure of $255 million.

It seems to me that if a company is in trouble one ought to undertake a substantially more sophisticated approach to understanding what the company really needs rather than picking a number out of the air like that, although if you do not mind whether the number is plus or minus $100 million, I suppose a figure like $255 million is as good a figure as any.

I think it indicates pretty clearly the lack of analysis that ministers put into this kind of a package. As Senator Sinclair said, the real reason for Bill C-79 was the decision in March to put up $255 million and then to go public with all kinds of pronouncements that the bank was solvent, which created a moral responsibility on the part of the government to bail out unsecured depositors. That is why it is important in considering this bill that honourable senators focus on the events up to March 25 rather than worrying specifically about the details of the events thereafter.

The other point that seems to me important for honourable senators to understand is the performance of officials reporting to the Minister of State for Finance and in particular the Inspector General of Banks. I realize that there was a tendency on the part of some members of our committee to take the view that ministers are not responsible when their officials do not perform in an adequate manner. In my opinion, that is misunderstanding the notion of ministerial responsibility unless we are to take the view that ministerial responsibility is not an issue that this government is particularly concerned about. The fact of the matter is that even though the members of the support group had, after all, put up $60 million in private sector money—and God knows how much the Conservative members of this chamber like private sector money—they had demanded, as Senator Sinclair said, in return a letter from the Inspector General of Banks saying that this $255 million package would make the CCB solvent. That was a condition precedent. It was a requirement, to use the words of the negotiators for the government, that the members of the support group insisted upon prior to their committing $60 million.

Nothing happened following the agreement on March 25. The Inspector General of Banks did not bother to send in additional staff and did not bother to conduct a detailed review prior to the signing of the final agreement. A month later, on April 26, the Inspector General signed a letter to the members of the support group saying that the bank was solvent when, in fact, he had no more information on April 26 than he had had on March 25. One of the glaring inadequacies in this entire series of events has been the failure of officials and, therefore, the failure of ministers to instruct officials, because let us be clear that the Inspector General, had he been instructed by his ministers to send in teams right away, would have done so. One cannot help but, at least, suspect that the government did not want to know how bad the situation was prior to the signing of the formal agreement.

It is precisely because of the performance of the Inspector General in carrying out his duties and his failure to understand the situation of the CCB that the committee unanimously, in its recommendation on page 43, recommends that both the resources and the power of the Office of the Inspector General of Banks be increased.

One of the other two recommendations of the report deals with the CDIC, the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. I will not comment on this because the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce reported separately on this matter about two weeks ago, and a bill dealing with CDIC reforms will be coming to us shortly.

The third recommendation, which is on page 44 of the report, deals with the role of the auditors in this event. The committee was unanimous, as it was in all three recommendations, in its view that the auditors should, perhaps, have done a more thorough job and should certainly have made information available in a more timely fashion to the Inspector General of Banks. The committee had real doubts about how it had been possible for the auditors to issue an unqualified report for the fiscal year ending October 31, 1984, when, six months later, it turned out that the loan portfolio of the bank had been substantially over-estimated by many millions of dollars.

The concern of all members of the committee about the performance of the auditors arose because the auditors had bent over backwards to adopt the positions that management wanted them to adopt and they had not been as truly independent as the committee thought they should have been. It is precisely for that reason that the committee recommended, on page 45, that, in order to enhance the independence of external auditors from the management of client banks, one of the two outside auditors be appointed by the Inspector General and not by the management of the bank. All the members of the committee were very concerned about the performance of the auditors in this whole affair.

We have a situation where a support package was introduced in March; a support package which turned out to be woefully inadequate; and a support package that subsequent testimony before the Estey Commission shows was more than doomed from the beginning. In fact, it was clearly throwing good money after bad.

As a result of that and as a result of all the statements by the government about how solid and how solvent the bank was, and here I agree with Senator Sinclair, the government had no choice. It had a moral responsibility to bail out the uninsured depositors who, after all, had left their money in the bank at the request of the government. Uninsured depositors who left their money in the bank were doing so in response to an appeal by the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance and senior finance officials of the government, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

In that regard, it is interesting to note that the one group which assisted the government in this endeavour by putting up new, hard cash, namely, the members of the support group, are the only people in this whole affair who are not being bailed out, paid off, or otherwise getting their money back as a result of this bill.

Honourable senators, I think, will find it rather interesting to note that the debenture-holders of the CCB were bailed out initially in mid-March because they would not co-operate in the support package and, consequently, the federal government and two provincial governments agreed to take them out. They were paid off.

This bill pays off all uninsured depositors including, incidentally, the payment of a not insignificant amount of more than $200 million to foreign banks because they left their money in, and the government feels it has a moral commitment to thank them for their support by giving them taxpayers' money.

Interestingly enough, however, the government feels no such moral commitment to the individuals whom it drew into the support package and to the institutions who helped the government by putting up new money in March. Even when they were involved in negotiations on the weekend of March 23 and 24, it would appear that not all the information, however meagre, which was available to the government was given to the banks so that they fully understood the situation, at least to the level of understanding of the government during those negotiations.

If one accepts the premise that there is a moral responsibility to pay off people who helped the government and who followed government advice, surely that moral responsibility must extend to the members of the support group. That is the second of the three issues on which members of the committee were divided, and I think it is important to note that, while no formal votes were taken, a number of members of both parties understood that problem and felt that that moral commitment should extend to the members of the support group.

There is a danger I see in this case and there is an interesting lesson to be learned. The lesson is: If you co-operate with the government, as they did, you are likely to be the one group who will not be helped out or who will not be paid off or bailed out when everyone else, including debenture-holders, who refused to support the government's proposals in the first instance, get all their money back. It seems to me that if I were likely to be someone who would be approached in the future about a proposal to help this government solve a particular policy problem, I would ask them to look at this example and tell them to be very careful.

I suspect the real reason that the members of the support group are not being paid off is a straight political one. My guess would be that public opinion polls show very clearly that the Canadian public would not like the idea of taxpayers' money being used to reimburse the major banks. I suspect that the reality is that Allan Gregg of Decima Research Ltd. took some form of a poll before the decision was made as to whether or not the banks would be included and, on the basis of that poll—and goodness knows, we know how this government likes taking polls—this particular decision was made.

I, for one, find it somewhat more than a little offensive that foreign banks, particularly American banks—and we all know how anxious this government, and particularly the Prime Minister, is to please the Americans—will be bailed out, but that Canadian banks will not be. I have great difficulty with that both from a justice standpoint and as a matter of principle.

The third of the issues on which the committee disagreed dealt with the question of whether or not the names of those who are to be bailed out under this bill should be made public. As Senator Sinclair has said, he feels that the relationship between a banker and a depositor is sacrosanct. The fact of the matter is that there are two important principles of public policy at stake in this issue. One is the relationship of confidentiality between an individual who deposits in a deposit-taking financial institution, which has been an important principle in Canadian banking for many years; and there is another important principle which one finds in the Financial Administration Act, which essentially says that the public has a right to know who is receiving public funds. What we have under this bill is a very clear conflict between two opposing principles.

The committee was divided on this issue. Both sides of the argument are given in the report, and I draw your attention to them. The committee was divided on the question of which one of those principles should take paramountcy over the other. That was the third of the issues on which the committee was divided.

Finally, I might just summarize the essential argument of the report as it outlines the reasons for the spending of nearly $1 billion of taxpayers' money. It falls roughly into categories covered by the following six points.

- (1500)

The first point notes that, because of the inadequate monitoring of the CCB by both ministers and officials, there was a substantial lack of information available at the time the decision was taken in March to put together a bail-out package.

The second important point to note is that the result of this inadequate monitoring also led to a support package which was too small to do any good or, at least, to ultimately solve the problem.

The third and perhaps most important point, in my view, in terms of the government's performance on the issue, is that there appears to be no justification, other than the political one to which I have made reference, for the imposition of a deadline of March 25, the deadline by which the government had to make a decision. It seems clear that, had the government taken more time, as members of the private sector banks urged, and had the government gone in with a proper team of inspectors, it would certainly have understood the situation well enough to know that the support package was doomed and, therefore, should not be given.

The fourth point is that, having proceeded with the support package on March 25, ministers and officials told the Canadian public that the bank was solvent. As a result of that, the government, in my view, incurred a strong moral obligation to pay off the unsecured depositors.

The fifth point is that, in spite of this moral obligation, and for reasons that I think are largely political, the result has been quite a discriminatory piece of legislation, in that the government has refused to extend that moral obligation to the group with which it had negotiated the support package in the first place, and which helped them out by actually putting up $60 million in cash. Of course, I am talking about the members of the support group.

Finally, there is the issue of whether or not the names of the people who are to receive the money under this bill should be made public. As I have said, that comes down to a choice between two conflicting public policy principles. I take the view that, in the light of the important principle of confidentiality between a depositor and a banker, it is not necessary to make public the names of those people who are to receive money under this bill. Nevertheless, one must recognize that there is an equally strong public policy principle which argues that, under the Fiscal Arrangements Act, the names of those people who receive money from the government should be made public.

Honourable senators, I have outlined the major arguments with respect to this bill. What I find most surprising is that we are involved in a situation where, beyond any shadow of a doubt, a decision was made last March on the basis of inadequate information. The government had all of the power it needed, months in advance, to get that information.

Senator Flynn: Months and months, you can say that again.

Senator Kirby: It failed to do so; it rushed into a decision on March 25, and the result of that is that we are now out $1 billion in taxpayers' money. Yet the fact remains that all of those people who had the power to do something about the problem—in particular, the Minister of State for Finance, whose responsibility it was—remain in office.

It seems to me that the real losers under this bill are the Canadian taxpayers and that the real problem with the bill is that it does not attempt to recognize—as the government has not recognized—the true principle of ministerial responsibility. Quite frankly, when a mistake costing $1 billion is made, somebody in the ministry ought to stand up and take responsibility for it and should no longer be in office.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the debate on this report be postponed until the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I certainly do not like to refuse a senator's motion to adjourn a debate. By way of explanation, Senator Murray asked yesterday whether we would consent to debating this report at the time the report was tabled. He knew that some speakers wished to speak but he did not wish to speak at the beginning. I appreciate that it is quite unusual to have three consecutive speakers from one side of the chamber. I sent a note to Senator Doody asking whether that was still a satisfactory way to proceed. We are not trying to dominate the debate; it was simply the result of an agreement that we reached yesterday. I appreciate that in the normal course speakers from the two sides of the chamber would alternate. We have heard from two speakers on this side and are suggesting a third. Senator Argue was then about to adjourn the debate, although Senator Flynn could do so. We are not trying to ram something along; we are trying to comply with an undertaking we gave.

Senator Flynn: I was not part of that agreement, but if it will satisfy senators who want to speak on this report, I will move the adjournment to later today. This item is taking priority over all of the other items of business. Other honourable senators who have items on the order paper should not be asked to wait until the debate on this matter has been completed. That could take a long time. That is my point. I move that the debate be adjourned to later today. It will take its place at the end of the Orders of the Day and we can continue tonight, if necessary.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion for adjournment of the debate until later this day?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned until later this day.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY
COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-70 TABLED

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have the honour of tabling the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, on the subject matter of Bill C-70, an Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

With your leave, honourable senators, I would ask that we proceed with consideration of this report later today.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1985-86

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the third reading of Bill C-89, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury moved the third reading of Bill S-2, to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons.

He said: Honourable senators, you will recall that yesterday Senator Neiman presented the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs with respect to Bill S-2. In that report she pointed out that the bill had been amended since it was originally sponsored. In the circumstances, Senator Flynn, the sponsor of the bill, was unable to move third reading.

After discussion with the committee and with Senator Flynn, I have agreed to move third reading so that Senator Flynn can move an amendment, which I believe he will do when I resume my seat.

The question at issue posed a serious problem for the committee. The final meeting of the committee dealing with this bill was not attended by all members of the committee. Those present felt that the evidence presented to the committee indicated that there was a desire on the part of important elements of society to resolve the issue in favour of a prohibition against marriage between adopted siblings. There was also a feeling that the amendment to so provide would clarify the law.

There is, however, considerable merit to Senator Flynn's desire to avoid adding further prohibitions when our original purpose was to reduce the number of prohibitions by bringing the sanctions against marriage between people related by consanguinity or affinity up to date.

In an effort to resolve the issue in the manner most acceptable to honourable senators, it has been agreed that we should move third reading, as I am now doing, ask Senator Flynn to move his amendment, allow the matter to stand through the parliamentary recess, and then, after full debate, exercise our collective judgment as to the solution which best serves the needs of Canadian society.

I might mention that there are 17 new applications awaiting consideration by the Senate. So it is hoped that the matter can be resolved early in the new year. I therefore move third reading of Bill S-2.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this bill be now read the third time.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, Senator Stanbury has explained the situation very well, and it would therefore be a redundancy for me to pursue the debate on this subject.

There is a consensus to the effect that if the bill were amended so as to eliminate the prohibition on marriage between adopted brothers and sisters and maintain the lineal prohibition, that is, a man may not marry his adopted daughter, etc., the situation would be satisfactory.

In any event, this would be a new prohibition. In exceptional cases where it would constitute an obstacle, Parliament could always pass a special bill, but that would be extremely rare.

I therefore move, seconded by Senator Bélisle, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1. Strike out paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 2(2) and substitute the following:

"(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption, or

(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood."

2. Strike out subclauses 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void."

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (PROSTITUTION)—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-49, to amend the Criminal Code (Prostitution).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator

Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, yesterday Senator Flynn, in his usual logical fashion, moved second reading of Bill C-74. All honourable senators will appreciate his explanation of the bill. It is not a simple bill, however. It has two purposes; first, to amend the Constitution Act, and, second, to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act. As Senator Flynn pointed out, this is probably the first time that we have amended the Constitution Act since it was patriated in 1982. It is, therefore, clearly a matter of some consequence, not just because it involves an amendment of the Constitution Act, but also because it affects the representation of the people of Canada in their own federally elected chamber of our Parliament, the House of Commons.

The redistribution aspect of the bill is of great consequence and it is most unfortunate that this bill, for the first time in our parliamentary history, purports not only to change our Constitution, but also to change our electoral boundaries without the benefit of all-party support. Over the years a system of redistribution has been developed, a formula called the amalgam formula, invented by the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker and the Honourable Allan MacEachen, and that system has been working for many years on the basis of all-party support. The process was begun again after the 1981 census in the normal fashion. The House of Commons prepared and debated the legislation. The commissioners were appointed, hearings were held, maps of the various constituencies across Canada were redrawn, and the proposals were being brought back for final agreement in the house. The short debate required to bring all this work to fruition was just a matter of giving individual MPs who had concerns about the effect on their ridings an opportunity to register those concerns. After that debate, the representation order giving legal effect to the commission report would have been proclaimed. The new boundaries would then have been in force, and any general election called after one year following the proclamation of the order would have been effective.

Parliament was dissolved in July 1984 without these last two steps having been taken. Then in September 1984 the Conservatives came into power. They completely ignored the well-accepted redistribution system which had been developed over the years on an all-party basis. They decided to fly their own kite. Like so many of the other kites they have flown, this one had no tail, no string, lots of wind but no direction or control. Of course, because of its substance and the manner in which it was launched, it failed to get all-party support. I am not sure where Senator Flynn got the idea that there were no significant differences among the parties. It is true that they all agree that the west must have more representation, but that would have been provided by the previous all-party bill. They were willing to see some restriction on the growth of the numbers in the House of Commons, but they never agreed to the rape of the rural areas or to the sapping of the voting strength of the individual urban voter.

The purpose claimed for this bill is to save the taxpayers money by having them elect fewer members to the House of Commons over the next 15 to 20 years. It would be easy for the members of the Senate to say that this is a laudable purpose. After all, we are in favour of saving the taxpayers money. Some would say that it is of small interest to us how many people sit in the green chamber at the other end of the hall. However, I am afraid that that is not all there is to it. Senator Flynn said, and I think I am quoting him correctly, that this matter of representation in the House of Commons is almost wholly within the jurisdiction of the House of Commons and that the Senate as a non-elected house should question it only on the matter of principle. I realize that that is the perception of the people in the House of Commons. However, if we think of ourselves as having responsibility for equity among regions of this country and if we recognize the special interest harboured by the members of the House of Commons in the subject matter of the bill, then we certainly must not abdicate our duty to examine the matter with care. As Senator Flynn has so rightly pointed out, this amendment of the Constitution is a serious matter, particularly when it affects the rights of the electorate of Canada. It could normally be accomplished only by a resolution of both the House of Commons and the Senate. On this occasion it is being accomplished through the device of a bill, but that does not change the responsibility of the Senate.

As to the saving of money, the amount saved is hardly worth mentioning in the context of what is adequate representation of the electorate in Parliament. I find it instructive to see the matters on which the Conservative Government acts to save money—the de-indexing of pensions, the de-indexing of family allowances, the reduction of parliamentary representation of the people of Canada, the purloining of the payments to the unemployed. It is also instructive to see what they spend money on—a 59 per cent increase in the budget of the Prime Minister's Office, amounting to $7 million; $1 billion on a tax deal for Gulf Oil; $1 billion or $2 billion to unknown depositors of problem banks; tens of thousands for super-mandarins for each of the ministers and so on. By throwing out all the work that had been done by members of all parties, by the electoral commissions, by the Chief Electoral Officer's organization, they have already thrown away $6 million and will spend another $6 million before this proposed bill, if it becomes law, can be implemented.

As I have said, many years ago Parliament worked out with great care a formula for the distribution of electoral constituencies across the country. It acted so deliberately that the process took several years and resulted in the adoption of a principle which deserved to be honoured far into the future. A fair basis for the representation of the population was worked out and provision was made for growth and for representation to match that growth in the population over the years. Now, this government has meddled with that carefully devised formula, has distorted through its ad hockery the representation across the country, has chosen to ignore the results of the census of 1991—whatever those might be—and to leap-frog past the census of 2001 before there will be any further adjustment, all this in favour of creating 295 seats instead of 310 seats, a difference of .5 per cent—that is half of one per cent—in the House of Commons and a negligible difference in the cost of running it when compared with costs as they would have existed for the next election under the legitimate and settled formula for the distribution of seats.

Why did they do it? My suspicion is that the administration wanted nothing to do with the expansion of the number of backbenchers who might harass them and who might strengthen the committee system so that the committees might challenge the supremacy of the executive. There is also the suspicion that some elements of the Tory party saw an opportunity for gerrymandering the riding boundaries, and it may be that some elements of the party saw an opportunity to add to the multitude of Tory appointments by appointing the new electoral redistribution commissions and 295 new returning officers and their deputies. We do not know what all of the motivations were which led the government to take this drastic and useless step, but it is apparent now that economy was not a very important part of their reasoning.

Unfortunately, because of the government's delay, the timing of implementation is fraught with difficulties for our members of the House of Commons and for the machinery of election. If this bill is passed now, it will come into effect in the middle of the summer of 1988, which will most probably be an election year. No one will know until the last moment whether the election is to be run on the old boundaries or the new boundaries. If the election is called in the spring of 1988, it will be on the old boundaries; if it is called in the fall, it will be on the new boundaries.

All honourable senators who have had great experience with our electoral machinery will know the scramble to re-organize election boundaries, to elect the new executives of the new riding associations—who, after all, have the responsibility for calling the conventions to nominate the candidates—the re-organization and adjustment of the financial affairs of the ridings. Goodness knows, nobody wants a repeat of the fiasco of the management of election expenses that we had in the last election. There will be a tremendous strain put on the Chief Electoral Officer, on all his returning officers and deputy returning officers, the re-organization of enumerators, polling places, the printing of electoral lists, and so on and so forth. These are just some of the difficulties that will be caused by the ridiculous and unnecessary timing of the passage of this bill.

When I am speaking of timing, perhaps I should also mention the timespan of the effect of the legislation. If this bill passes in its present form, it will freeze the opportunities for redistribution of the electoral boundaries in Canada for a generation. It will be 20 years before an election can be run on any other basis. The same government that wants to freeze our electoral representation is, at the same time, proposing legislation and regulations which will increase our immigration from 80,000 or 90,000 people each year to 250,000 each year. They will be encouraging people to come to Canada, and then giving them no opportunity for proper electoral representation. We know where the immigration will go. It will go the large cities of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver and to the intermediate cities of St. John's and Halifax for oil and gas development; to Quebec City, Winnipeg, Saskatoon and Regina, Calgary and Edmonton for industrial and service industry expansion, and there will be no provision for an increase in the representation of those centres until more than 20 years from now.

This is the government which proposes to lead us into a free-trade arrangement with the United States. The promise is that this will cause expansion of Canadian industry, more jobs, access to a huge market and availability of new technology. This vision of the future is one of dynamism and change. Yet, this same government asks us to freeze, to restrict, to make impossible any extension of the rights of the people to deal with that change in an electoral fashion.

Perhaps the saddest thing of all is that the government is not only stultifying the electoral rights of the people in the growth areas in Canada, it is failing to protect the rights of those great citizens of Canada who occupy the more sparsely populated regions of the country; Canadians who provide the food, the energy, the raw materials and the recreation for the rest of us and who also provide much of the spirit of Canada and the glue which holds us together as a nation. The population quotient to be used in the redistribution formula has gone up from 80,000 people to 87,000 people. There is no protection for the people of northern Ontario who occupy 88 per cent of the land mass of Ontario. They will lose at least one seat, and probably two seats. You can imagine the size that the ridings will need to be to cover that geographic mass.

Manitoba goes down from the 15 seats proposed by the all-party bill of the Liberal government to 14; Nova Scotia goes back down to 11; Newfoundland goes back down to 7. Those honourable senators who have represented some of these huge ridings in the past will have a complete understanding of both the impossibility of representing such areas and of the difficulty the individual people and businesses of those areas have in making their representations felt in the government in Ottawa.

Because my own province is Ontario, which now has 95 seats, and which was to have 105 seats under the Liberal proposal, I must express my deep concern that, under this bill, Ontario will have only 99 seats and there will be no opportunity for readjustment beyond the provisions of this bill for over 20 years. When I think of the changes that are likely to take place in Ontario as a result of immigration, free trade, changes in technology, reorganization of financial institutions and many other factors, I can hardly imagine a government suggesting that the electoral boundaries should not change in that period of time.

There may be others among honourable senators who would like to speak at greater length about the invidious position in which Quebec has been placed by this bill. Quebec now has 75 members of the House of Commons. The proposed Liberal bill would have increased that representation to 79. The first Conservative proposal was to reduce Quebec back to 77. That was justified on the basis that the total number of seats was to be increased by only six, and that it was only fair that the west should have the greater proportion of those new seats and that Ontario should get some increase in recognition of its growth. The Quebec members swallowed that justification, painful as it must have been, recognizing that the western provinces certainly were entitled to increased representation. Now, however, the government has changed its mind. Instead of increasing the total number of seats by six, it is now increasing the total number by 13 and still insisting that Quebec have no increase in representation but remain at its constitutionally basic number of 75. When the number was 75 out of 282, it was a very different thing from what it is now with 75 out of 295 as proposed in this bill. The proportions are getting out of whack. Wait till the electorate of Quebec gets wind of that.

Honourable senators, I suspect that we may end up passing this bill into law because some of us will say that it is none of our business; that the House of Commons should govern its own affairs. Some of us will be cowed by the knowledge that any expression of doubt on our part will be met by an avalanche of vituperation against the Senate by the Prime Minister, unfortunately accompanied by some of the media, and the expectation that another resolution will be introduced by the Prime Minister calling for the emasculation or the abolition of the Senate.

However, for the first time in history without all-party support, time and money are being wasted in the name of illusory savings to erode the parliamentary representation of the people of Canada in both rural and growth areas in such a fashion as to freeze the electoral map of Canada for more than a generation, and I submit to honourable senators who believe that we have some responsibility for regional equity that we have a duty to exercise considerable care before taking the final step of bringing this bill into law.

There is, after all, a practical alternative to passing this legislation. If this legislation were not passed, the House of Commons could decide to resume and complete the debate on the previous bill which is still outstanding. In that event, the representation order giving legal effect to the commission reports could be proclaimed within two months following the completion of that debate, which would be, perhaps, toward the end of February 1986. The new boundaries would then be in force for any general election called one year following the proclamation of the order. The new electoral boundaries would then be effective by April 1987, well in advance of any normal election date.

The result would be that a process which has received all-party support would be implemented, rather than one which has not received such support. There would be 310 constituencies, rather than 295, but the result would bear some relationship to fairness and regional equity. Quebec would have 79 seats instead of 75; Nova Scotia would have 12 seats instead of 11; Manitoba would have 15 seats instead of 14; British Columbia would have 33 seats instead of 32; Ontario would have 105 seats instead of 95; Alberta would have 27 seats, instead of 26; Newfoundland would have 8 seats instead of 7.

• (1540)

Why should we create so much regional inequity and injustice to both rural and urban voters just to reduce the number of members of the House of Commons by .5 per cent?

This is a serious question and, as a result, I agree with Senator Flynn that the bill should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study, consideration and report.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I feel the same as Senator Frith does, that we do not really like to argue about adjournments because that is a courtesy we are willing to extend to members of the Senate at all times. I can say to my honourable friend, Senator Stewart, that this is a bill which the government wishes to refer to the appropriate committee tomorrow morning at 9 o'clock, and if my honourable friend could see his way clear to speak now, with Senator Flynn ultimately closing the debate, we could then arrange to have the bill referred to the appropriate committee tomorrow morning so that that committee will have a reasonable chance to look at the details of the bill.

I realize my friend has a right—and I do not dispute that—to adjourn the debate, but I ask whether he could participate now in order to facilitate that program.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the idea of the bill being referred to committee before the Senate adjourns for the Christmas recess is quite satisfactory. In fact, I thought that was the understanding I had with Senator Doody. That can certainly include a committee starting to deal with it—in fact, maybe dealing fully with it—before we adjourn for the Christmas recess.

I had not understood that 9 o'clock tomorrow morning was the kind of time constraint we were under, and I told Senator Stewart, because I knew he was preparing a speech on this order, that there would be no difficulty in giving that speech tomorrow. As far as I know, Senator Stewart will be the only person speaking on this order from this side of the house. Then I assume it will be referred to committee, as Senators Flynn and Stanbury have suggested.

Senator Stewart has told me that he wants to speak on this order tomorrow, so I think we should allow him to do so. We can arrange to hold a committee meeting at some time tomorrow. Someone told me—in fact, someone in a position of authority—that we will be sitting Monday, Tuesday and probably Thursday and Friday. So no doubt we will have time to deal with it next week if that is the case.

Senator Roblin: I am an optimist, and I suppose it is a mistake to be an optimist in my current position, but I always live in hope that some accommodation will be reached in the other place to enable that House to deal with the business it has before it by the end of tomorrow. I know that the house leaders of the other place are meeting in order to consider that possibility.

If it seems reasonable to honourable senators for my friend Senator Stewart to speak tomorrow, that we can hold a committee meeting after that, and there will be sufficient time to deal with the bill in the manner considered suitable by all concerned, that would meet my point. I should like to give the committee reasonable time to take a look at the bill.

Let us assume that Senator Stewart adjourns the debate and speaks tomorrow. Then the committee can meet immediately after Senator Flynn has closed the debate and can report back to the Senate Friday evening in order to give us its views as to whether or not the bill should be proceeded with.

Senator Frith: I have no difficulty with that except it is imposing on the committee the need to report. Certainly if it feels after it has considered the bill that it can report, then it ought to report. I do not want it understood that we agree that the committee must report.

If Senator Roblin is saying that the government would like the committee to report before we adjourn for the Christmas recess, I think the committee has to be left free to decide whether it can or cannot report before we adjourn.

Senator Roblin: I have no objection to that as a matter of principle.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not know what topic we are on, but let us assume we are on something and that I am in order—

Senator Doody: We are not debating the bill.

Senator Stewart: That is what I understood, so I was wondering what was going on.

As Senator Flynn has said, this bill would make an amendment to the Constitution.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Stewart, are you withdrawing your motion to adjourn the debate?

Senator Stewart: No, I am simply engaging in the same sort of discourse that other senators were engaging in.

Senator Roblin: On a point of order.

Senator Molgat: On a point of order raised by the Honourable Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: This is an informal discussion; we frequently indulge in these things, and I welcome Senator Stewart's contribution.

Senator Frith: If we want it sanctified, we can call it a point of order and talk to our heart's content.

Senator Stewart: As I said, honourable senators, yesterday Senator Flynn pointed out that this bill would make an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, an amendment which affects the representation of the several provinces. I think, therefore, that we have a special obligation to consider this bill carefully.

I just saw the table which Senator Flynn gave us yesterday, a most interesting table. I have just had an opportunity to listen to Senator Stanbury's careful examination of the implications of the bill. So I really do not think I am being unreasonable in suggesting that I should like to say what I have to say at a later sitting.

Senator Roblin is suggesting—I do not think he went further than that—that there is some great urgency to this bill. I fail to see that. Our ultimate disposition of this bill will not affect the timing of an election, or anything like that. There is no great consequence that would follow from having this bill dealt with in a serene and serious second thought way by honourable senators.

Senator Roblin: You are very persuasive.

Senator Stewart: If there is such a consideration, it should be revealed, but so far none has been revealed; consequently, I think that honourable senators ought to have an opportunity to deal with this important measure in an appropriate fashion.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Frith feels that he and I had a deal on this particular bill. I agree that we discussed it at length. I thought that I had made it clear that it was a bill that the government gave priority to and wanted passed before Christmas. I also thought we had discussed something to the effect that it was primarily of concern to the House of Commons and that we would not get into it all that much; that there were other bills that were more important.

I fully appreciate what Senator Stewart is saying in terms of the Constitution and the responsibility of the Upper Chamber to look at the legislation carefully. I just do not want honourable senators to think that there was some sort of arrangement that I or Senator Frith had sloughed off. Perhaps I did not pay enough attention to the seriousness of it at the time. It seems to me that this bill should be treated with the same seriousness Senator Stewart thinks it should be treated with.

I am not backing out of a deal that was made, because I do not think we had one. To that extent, I thought that that was a bill the government wanted and that they could have it, but apparently that is not so.

Senator Frith: Senator Doody is not backing out of anything. We did speak briefly about this at the beginning of the sitting. I think we simply misunderstood each other.

• (1550)

Senator Roblin: I gather from the discussion that it is not Senator Stewart's wish to proceed with it now and I would not urge him further. I simply take hope in the thought that we will dispose of it tomorrow. I hope that we could put it at the head of the order paper unless there are some good reasons why we should not, and there may well be. I put forward that idea so that if it seems advisable at the time we could dispose of it in time to give the committee the maximum amount of time to deal with it. I may be foolishly optimistic, but I believe that the committee will be able to report it back to the house in time for us to deal with it before the Christmas recess. I will watch the proceedings in committee with some interest, and if I have any information at that time which the committee ought to have about the importance of the bill, I will convey it to the committee, so that they will be aware of all the relevant facts.

My impression now is that this is one of the bills to which the government wishes to give Royal Assent before we break for the Christmas recess, and that is the position I am taking on it at the moment. Whether the government gets what it wants or not is not within its power to say because the Senate is going to do that. I have to express that opinion and, if possible, I would like to be present at the committee myself so that when the discussion is concluded, if there is any feeling that the bill is a problem, I might be able to say something further about the timing. In all candour I must tell the house that I am having that timing problem, but I am optimistic that the committee will do its duty as it sees fit and we will see where we stand at that time.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I think this whole discussion since the motion for adjournment has been out of order so I will continue in the same vein. I want to answer two questions that have been raised. Whether or not there was an agreement between Senator Doody and Senator Frith, I do not wish to debate and, frankly, I do not care whether or not there was because such an agreement was not communicated to me as a member of this chamber and I would not consider myself bound by it in any event. The second point that I want to make relates to allegations that the government leader in the Senate has made several times that the government wants this bill passed before we rise for the Christmas recess. This also leaves me cold. Unless the government can give us some reason why the bill should be passed before we rise, I do not think the government has the right to bring a bill into the Senate within 24 or 36 hours of the time that we thought we were going to rise for the Christmas recess and expect us to railroad it through. So I am not impressed by that argument either.

Senator Roblin: I know that Senator Corbin wishes to speak, but I really cannot allow the allegation to remain unanswered that I am trying to railroad anything or that the government's will is the consideration that will influence the majority in this chamber. I do not think it will. They will make up their own minds whether they want to do it or not. That has always been my position. I do not think I should be slated quite so vigorously by Senator Hicks.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I listened with great interest to the one-way conversation on either side of the House. It would seem that senators sitting in the far corners of this Chamber are forgotten.

I had intended to speak to this bill as a senator from the province of New Brunswick. I am worried about the contents of this bill and about what it seeks to accomplish, certainly not because I would want to deny the gains deserved by the western provinces, that is not at stake here.

I intend to focus on what will happen to the relative position of New Brunswick within the confederative structure if this bill is adopted. The debate on this bill just began today. Senator Stanbury was the first speaker and gave a detailed account of the situation. I mean on behalf of senators on this side of the House, of course, in the name of my political party. Such things are important in the constitutional context.

I think it is my duty as a senator from New Brunswick to speak on this issue. I would not want honourable senators to be under the illusion that only Senator Stewart will speak. I do not feel bound by any agreement that might have been made by Senators Frith and Doody. If there is one, I am not aware of it. On basic questions such as this one, I intend to express my opinion on second reading.

Senator Flynn: Nothing prevents you from doing just that!

On motion of Senator Stewart, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

PINE HILL DIVINITY HALL—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—SECOND READING

Hon. Henry D. Hicks moved the second reading of Bill S-7, to amend the Act of Incorporation of Pine Hill Divinity Hall.

He said: Honourable senators, the act incorporating Pine Hill Divinity Hall was passed on May 30, 1930 by the Parliament of Canada. The act empowered the transfer of all property then held by the board of the Presbyterian College, Halifax, which consisted mainly of the Albrow property, so called, on the shores of the North West Arm in Halifax. Since 1930 many additions and modifications have been made to this property.

At the time of incorporation in 1930, the property value was well below the $2-million limit specified as the upper limit of permitted holdings of the board of Pine Hill Divinity Hall. This limit is noted in clause 4, section b, of the 1930 act. A routine review of bequests revealed this specified limit of the holdings and it became apparent that the property value had increased well beyond the limit specified in the act. This increase is the result of the normal increase in the value of land on the shores of the North West Arm as well as of the addition of buildings for educational use constructed on the property. Also to be noted are the many bequests left over the years to Pine Hill Divinity Hall for use in the education of persons for the ministry. Insurance records indicate the value of the buildings to be in the vicinity of $5,200,000, and it is apparent that the land value at the present time has increased beyond the $2-million limit set by the act. This together with the bequests and other investments valued at approximately $4,100,000 indicated the need for modification in the act in order that the Board of Governors of Pine Hill Divinity Hall may carry on the strong traditions and ensure that the property and bequests are held within the powers given by the act for use in the education of persons for the Christian ministry and other forms of Christian service.

The Pine Hill Divinity Hall property comprises approximately 12 acres.

Honourable senators, I know that we have a lot of business before us but I would like to place on the record a very brief resumé of the history of this worthy institution located for many years in the city of Halifax.

On a November day in 1820 the Reverend Doctor Thomas McCulloch began the theological instruction of 12 students gathered in an upstairs room of Pictou Academy. This venture was supported by the newly formed Synod of the Presbyterian Church of Nova Scotia created in 1817 by two uniting branches of the Church of Scotland. The Synod appointed Dr. McCulloch as its Professor of Divinity, and he assumed this responsibility in addition to his duties as Principal of Pictou Academy. This Presbyterian "Divinity Hall," so modestly begun, was the first enterprise of its kind in the British colonies. Its first students had completed their philosophical studies, their arts course, at the academy and were deemed to be ready to begin the study of theology. Four years later, in 1824, six of these were licensed to preach the Gospel and were eligible for ordination. Now, for the first time, instead of ministers imported from overseas, native sons trained in Nova Scotia were prepared to minister to maritime congregations.

• (1600)

Dr. McCulloch left Pictou in 1838 to become the first President of Dalhousie University. He took the Divinity Hall with him to Halifax and conducted classes in his own house on Argyle Street until his death in 1843. The Synod appointed Rev. John Keir of Princetown, Prince Edward Island, as his successor. For three sessions, Dr. Keir carried on theological instruction in his own house, assisted by Rev. James Ross of West River, Nova Scotia. In 1846, the two professors decided that the school should be transferred back to Pictou County, and it met in the Ross house, with three students. In November 1848, the West River seminary was inaugurated, for instruction in arts as well as theology. Classes met in the Temperance Hall, a cramped and primitive room above the log school house. For ten years the divinity school was carried on there, classes being held for six weeks in the spring after the arts courses for the year had been completed.

In 1858, the school moved to larger quarters in Truro. It remained there for only a few years when, in 1860, with the formation of the Synod of the Presbyterian Church of the Lower Provinces, the school moved to Halifax. In 1878, the college board decided to purchase the Albrow property on the shores of the North West Arm, and there the school has remained ever since.

When, in 1926, it was decided that the Department of Theology of Mount Allison University should be moved to Halifax to unite with the Presbyterian College, there were searchings of heart in Sackville, and some misgivings. From its inception in 1858, Mount Allison Wesleyan College had provided theological instruction and, in 1875, a Department of Theology within the university was organized. Courses required for ordination by the Methodist Conference were given, and a full course was offered leading to the Bachelor of Divinity degree. Through the years, the theological students and professors had played a prominent part in campus life. It was natural that the university should feel keenly the loss of this vitally important faculty. Nevertheless, it was realized that this move was necessary for the cause of church union, and that it was a practical and realistic step. Two professors from Mount Allison came to Halifax although, for some time, the first year of the theological course continued to be offered in Sackville. Time has shown the wisdom and advantage of the action taken at this juncture.

At the time of church union, that is, the union between the Methodist, the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches in 1925, the school came under the jurisdiction of the United Church of Canada. It had a number of distinguished principals among whom were Clarence MacKinnon, who served for 28 years; Dr. A. E. Kerr, who, after excellent service, resigned, again to become President of Dalhousie University in 1945; and he was followed by the Rev. Dr. Clarence MacKinnon Nicholson who gave outstanding leadership for 25 years, retiring in 1971. Among the good things he did, honourable senators, was conduct the marriage ceremony uniting me with my present wife.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hicks: In any event, following World War II, the theological colleges in Nova Scotia faced further problems. In 1971, 14 years ago, there was founded the Atlantic School of Theology, a truly remarkable example of ecumenical education of ministers of the Gospel. The Atlantic School of Theology comprises theological education for ministers of the United Church, Roman Catholic priests, Anglican priests, and some others. For the past 14 years, this truly ecumenical institution, the Atlantic School of Theology, has occupied the premises made available to them by Pine Hill Divinity Hall.

The story of the growth and development of Pine Hill is a noble and worthy chapter in the church annals of the maritimes. For more than 160 years, it has been the main source of ministers for the United Church and its uniting communions in the Maritime and Newfoundland Conferences.

In 1959, student enrolment reached a high point of 61 full-time candidates for the ministry. In 1946, Dr. Falconer, a distinguished principal of the school, estimated that more than 1,200 ministers had graduated from the colleges in Pictou, Sackville and Halifax, including more than 100 missionaries in various countries throughout the world. To these must be added more than 500 graduates from 1946 to 1971 and on to 1985. Within the Atlantic School of Theology, Pine Hill's noble traditions will be maintained and magnified.

I pray for support from honourable senators in this chamber for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I do not think there is anything in this bill that requires it to go to committee. On the other hand, its passage is not at all urgent and if any other senator wishes it to be referred to committee, I shall move its referral to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Flynn: I think you have to do that.

Senator Frith: I think there is something in the rules which says it has to be referred.

On motion of Senator Hicks, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SIXTH REPORT REFERRED BACK TO STANDING COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Hicks, for the adoption of the Sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Committee Reports), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with the advice and consent of Senator Molgat, for whose assistance I am indeed grateful, I should like to proceed with the arrangement we made yesterday by which unanimous consent was given to allow me to withdraw the motion I originally made and to substitute another one.

The one that I now ask consideration for is worded in this way:

That the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Senator Molgat informs me that he would take that to mean that the substance of the subject matter of the amendment I originally proposed would, indeed, be the main object of consideration in committee. Members would then have an opportunity to consider whether it was a good idea or they may have something better to propose.

Therefore, I should like to propose this motion, seconded by my colleague, Senator Doody.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I will be very brief. I have had a discussion with Senator Roblin in this regard, and I agree completely. We will see to it that the proposal he made yesterday is reprinted for committee members, and we will be discussing it at our first meeting.

I have discussed this matter with Senator Godfrey who had originally presented this idea, as honourable senators will remember, here in the Senate and again in committee. He feels that the proposal that has been made would suit his purposes. That, of course, is not necessarily the committee's view, but I suspect that we will arrive at a reasonable solution.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Roblin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the committee for further consideration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I am prepared to close the debate on this matter, after a little reflection, but Senator Walker has not withdrawn and I do not like to do so in his absence.

Senator Flynn: He withdrew yesterday.

Senator Hicks: But the order still stands in his name on the order paper.

Senator Flynn: That is a mistake.

Senator Hicks: At the next opportunity I would be glad to close the debate, but I am not quite prepared to do so now. I have not brought my papers with me.

Order stands.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS DEPOSITORS
COMPENSATIONCONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE & COMMERCE
COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-79—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, (subject-matter of Bill C-79) tabled in the Senate on 19th December, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am willing to yield to Senator Olson if he wishes to speak on the matter now.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, in view of the hour I move the adjournment of the debate until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-70—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I simply want to say a few words to explain the request I made this afternoon. I asked for leave to proceed immediately with the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, on a subject which is familiar to us, because some of our colleagues had expressed the wish to speak on this report today.

I see no need to speak myself at this stage. Therefore, I am quite willing to give up the floor immediately to anyone who wants to speak on this report.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the committee report does not suggest any amendment to the bill. One of the reasons why certain members of the committee and myself did not attempt to amend the clauses of Bill C-70 is that the House of Commons has not yet completed consideration of this legislation and we have not received it.

We are convinced that, when the Senate receives this bill, we shall be able to take another look at this piece of legislation which, at least in the eyes of some of us, including myself, seems too hard on certain members of our society who are unable to defend themselves. The bill de-indexes family allowances.

[English]

I think that this legislation is going to do a considerable amount of harm to those people who can least bear such harm. The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology asked the research branch to produce a study tool, which is available, that shows the effects of changes to the family security system, taking into account not only family allowances and the tax credit but also taking into account the effects of other tax measures such as the child tax exemption, the spousal equivalent exemption and so forth. If we consider a family with no income at all, according to the study we have done, it benefits very marginally between now and 1990 but, after 1990, it begins to lose. If we consider the majority of the families affected between now and 1989, they will lose $100 per year.

Let us not forget that the majority of the families in this country have relatively low incomes. The median family income is between $26,000 and $27,000 per year. These are not rich people. The loss of $100 per child per year will be a considerable one, indeed. Forty-two per cent of Canadian families have annual incomes of between $10,000 and $30,000. If we look further, however, we will see that of that 42 per cent, 22 per cent have incomes of between $10,000 and $20,000. That is poverty level. These people are going to lose money through Bill C-70.

There are other aspects of the bill which some of us also find disturbing. Of the $50 million that Bill C-70 is expected to save, $6.9 million will come from families with incomes of less than $10,000, and $9.8 million will come from families which earn between $10,000 and $20,000. A small amount is going to come back from those rich families which receive Family Allowance unfairly.

If the calculations are projected over about four years, honourable senators will find that between 1986 and 1989 $300 million will be taken away from families that are raising children. This is an important point. We are taxing child rearing through this bill. This country has a falling birth rate. There are many other things we could have done to find money with which to reduce the deficit. We could have done so through the tax system in a way different from the one used in this bill. Honourable senators, I find it disturbing—I am even ashamed—that the first measures which were announced to us were those cutting Family Allowances, those de-indexing old age pensions—which we managed to reverse—and those increasing capital gains deductions. This is changing the tax system and is changing it in a shameful way, because we are hitting the very poor and giving benefits to the very rich. In a country like Canada, we should not do that. At the Christmas season there is only one way of characterizing this sort of thing: That is what Scrooge would do.

We must also not forget that 11 per cent of all Canadian families are single-parent families. Most of them are run by women. Six hundred thousand single-parent families are run by women. The others are run by men. Those families are helpless. They cannot get out of poverty. When we study the figures, and the taxes that are connected with these measures, we see that in about four years' time they will be losing money, compared with the pittance they already receive. We are going to hit women who are heads of single-parent families, and they have a much higher unemployment rate than other people. I find that very difficult to take, particularly at this season. Why are we penalizing Canadians and Canadian families with children? Canadian families with no children do not have to worry. Their tax situation is not affected. Those whom we are affecting are families that have children. Why are we doing it now, when the baby boom has passed and the birth rate is declining? In other words, when the problems associated with family allowances are declining, we hit them. We give $500,000, free from capital gains tax, to the rich, and we take food out of the mouths of the poor. I find that extremely difficult to take.

Moreover, the Family Allowance is a cheque that is received. We heard testimony that on the nineteenth of each month, if one goes to low income housing, one will find the mothers waiting for that cheque. They really need it. They are waiting for that cheque not only because there are urgent needs that must be met by the spending of that cheque; they are also waiting for that cheque because, we were told, they are afraid that some other poor mother, perhaps a neighbour, will steal the cheque. That is how bad the situation is. Those are the people that this bill will hit, either immediately or eventually.

I believe that our committee will look at it again in the light of the fact that 1.2 million children, in families that are below the poverty line, with single parents who are condemned to stay below the poverty line, are going to be hit by these measures. There are other ways whereby we can save money for the budget—not on the backs of the children of the poor. When the bill comes from the House of Commons and goes to committee, I believe that honourable senators will find that the legislation will result in a loss of $100 per child per year in four years' time and that it will be hotly debated in committee. The report will then look different from the report that honourable senators have now. Some of us will say there are better ways of doing it than departing from universality in this instance; that it is better to give the Family Allowance to everyone, and then have a tax system that takes back most of it from those who do not need this contribution. It will be said that it will take, at most, 40 per cent of it from those who are very rich. But those who are very rich are such a small proportion of the taxpayers that, in effect, to avoid benefiting an infinitesimal part of the population, we are going to hit 1.2 million children. I find that very difficult to take at this Christmas season. I hope that when we get back to studying this bill—probably in the New Year—when and if it passes the House of Commons, we will remember that no country, no legislature, can sleep at ease if it tries to do things that benefit the rich and hit at the poor.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, in speaking to this report on the pre-study of Bill C-70, certain factors might perhaps be identified. I listened carefully to Senator Gigantès, and, in committee we all listened carefully and tried to understand what the government was trying to do, not only with Bill C-70 but also with the changes to the Child Tax Exemption and the Child Tax Credit. Certainly one cannot look at Bill C-70 without looking at the other changes identified in the budget last year.

Poverty, particularly as it affects our children, is very difficult for all of us to accept; but unfortunately we have been living with poverty for a long time. Those of us who have worked in this area have had many sleepless nights and suffered much agony in trying to find the resolution to this really national disgrace in a country like Canada, with so many resources. If we look at the statistics of those people who are living in poverty, there appears to be no accurate figure of children between the ages of zero to six. But I suppose it would be reasonably accurate to assume that the figure would be comparable with that for those under 16 years of age. May I point out a trend? In 1980 the population of children living in poverty in Canada was about 896,000. In 1983 the population of children living in poverty had increased to 1.131 million. So we have not made much progress. Things have been going the wrong way with this extremely difficult problem. That trend of one in five Canadian children who live in poverty must be distressing to each one of us in this chamber.

Senator Gigantès alluded to the de-indexation of the senior citizens' pension benefits, and claimed credit for the reversal of that policy. I guess that's fine. However—I have to say this, because I believe that in many ways the two relate to each other; there are similar forces at work—I suppose I would have become terribly excited about the de-indexing of the senior citizens' benefits if someone could have convinced me that the indexing of the senior citizens' pension cheques and the GIS would eliminate or alleviate poverty in Canada among our seniors. Even with the OAS and the GIS, the two component parts, and full indexing, we still have 42 per cent of our senior citizens living in poverty. Indexing has been around since John Turner was Finance Minister. The figure is 42 per cent. So, obviously it is not working. But that is a subject for another debate, so I shall not become too deeply involved in that.

But, with children living in poverty, we do not have the same differential that we have with seniors. With seniors you have the OAS and then a means test for those who receive the Guaranteed Income Supplement. Even with that, 42 per cent of seniors are still living in poverty. With regard to universality and the Family Allowance, there is one blanket cheque for everyone. There is no second level of support. So I suppose it is no wonder that the number of children living in poverty has increased at a regular rate in the past few years.

The subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology prepared a document. I am sorry that Senator Marsden is not here this afternoon, because she spent a lot of time and energy, along with others, in preparing this document. I hope honourable senators have read it, and if they have not, I recommend it to them as Christmas reading. I suggest that they put it on their night-table and give it some consideration. The document is an analysis of child and family benefits in Canada. I must say that I am very satisfied with the document and it is a very significant piece of work done by the subcommittee. For the first time we have tracked dollars that go to children from the federal government through the various provinces, taking into account the complexity of the taxation systems in each of those provinces. As the report points out, there are variables that cannot be accounted for but I believe it is the best effort in this regard that could be done.

I shall not take up the time of the house to go through the report in detail, but it shows what happens. One of the tables shows what occurs when an extra $100 is given to a child in each province taking into account each province's tax system. We see that by giving dollars in this direct manner we cannot guarantee that the child or the mother will receive the benefits. We see that there is a big difference in the amount received when it is exposed to the different tax systems in the provinces. So I suppose, even if we had a parallel to the Guaranteed Income Supplement for children, it would not be sufficient. For instance, in Saskatchewan the money is completely taxed away. In other provinces it is taxed away partially. If you cannot solve the problem of poverty with a cheque, if you cannot buy your way out of this problem, how else will you approach it?

Honourable senators, I would submit that the government has been reasonably responsible. None of us is totally satisfied, but I believe that the legislation is a step in the right direction because, not only does Bill C-70 come into play, but the changes in basic assumptions and the Child Tax Credit come into play. For the first time, I think we are moving in the right direction. Those of us who worship at the altar of universality must remember that it does not solve the problems of poverty for the aging and you will not solve the problems of poverty for children simply by passing out money. Some of that money will disappear into the system and will only serve to frustrate ourselves and frustrate the intended recipients.

I come back to the problem that we studied when the committee examined Bill C-70 and changes in the tax exemptions and credits. We took this document, which is the methodology for analysis of child and family benefits and can be applied to any changes in the system from now on, and we assessed what happened with these changes in those three or four areas that we referred to. I wanted to be absolutely accurate, so just a few hours ago I talked with one of our researchers to make sure I was reading the application of the methodology accurately. I want to assure honourable senators that with the multiple changes not only in Bill C-70, but in the budget documents, that the poorest children in Canada will be better off with the new system for the next five years. Certainly, it will benefit many of the working poor. Of course, it depends on where your classification falls and the parameters within which you look at things. Some children will not benefit. I am advised that for the group in the $12,000 to $20,000 level, the change is really insignificant, whether you are on the new system proposed by the government in Bill C-70 and the changes to the tax exemption or the Child Tax Credit that, I understand, we will be looking at in a bill very shortly, or whether you are looking at the other system without any changes and with full indexation. However, for the poorest of the poor, generally those living on social assistance, you will find that they receive an increase of up to 10 per cent. I have applied these tables to the next five years, because one budget is not a finality. One budget is a step in the right direction.

Senator Frith: Or the wrong direction.

Senator Robertson: We have all been around legislatures, the House of Commons or wherever when a budget has been brought down and we know the significance of one budget. One budget is very important, but it is not the beginning or the end of a given policy. One budget indicates which way a government wants to go. I am satisfied that the government is moving in the right direction in this regard.

I would like to have seen the government go further. However, I have to recognize, as I am sure we all do, that you cannot do everything in one year. The financial circumstances that we face demand that we move carefully. I have found over the years, particularly in the areas of social policy, that you had better move very slowly and very carefully because if you do not you will have more problems than you anticipated. No matter how you try to push something faster, you will get into deep water if you try to move too quickly.

This is not the first time that the Family Allowance has not followed the cost of living index. Honourable senators will remember that in 1983-84 the increase was limited to the six-and-five policy of the government, and I do not have to remind you what the cost of living was at that particular time. In 1979 there was a reduction in the Family Allowance when the Child Tax Credit was introduced. In 1976, Family Allowances were frozen at the 1975 rates. I am sure many of you in this chamber must have approved those changes, knowing full well that they were not permanent changes; they were budgetary changes that seemed to be necessary at that particular time.

● (1640)

I believe what we are looking at here, honourable senators, is a subtle direction that the government wants to take. Thank heavens they are looking at the whole package. They are not just dealing with something in isolation. I doubt if there is a senator in this chamber who would not want the full indexing of Family Allowances to be doubled, in order to do all of the beautiful things with it that we might. We know, however, that that is not always possible. Indeed, we would love to have more money for the children and for the senior citizens. It is very easy to criticize. However, after reading some of the reports in the newspapers recently, I do not have to tell you that the economic climate of Canada is significantly healthier today than it has been for some time. That, in itself, will give the government an opportunity to move in better directions for the disadvantaged. You cannot move in a better direction unless you have the resources to go there. One can always say, "Why did you do this and why did you do that?" Let me tell you, I do not know why governments do some things, but they do some very strange things. I was a member of government for a long time, and the only way I can protect myself when someone says, "Yes, Senator Robertson, you were first elected in 1967," is to say, "Yes, my constituents had the good common sense to send me to the legislature when I was 12." In any event, some of us have been around for a while.

Senator Frith: If they had had a chance, I am sure they would.

Senator Robertson: When you have been around for a while, you get frustrated. I remember something happening about which I was exploding, and I am sure Senator Simard will also remember. This happened in 1982 or '83 when I was chairman of Social Policy in the small province of New Brunswick. In that position, I had a budget for all of our social programs in the province of $1.3 billion. That budget included the health delivery system, the educational system, the justice system, the youth system and all of the libraries and cultural activities that we could possibly afford. In a small province such as New Brunswick, I was asked to co-ordinate all that on a budget of $1.3 billion. That is not a lot of money. Someone said earlier today something to the effect, "What's a billion?" However, when you are from a small poor province, a billion dollars is a lot of money.

During the time that I was wrestling with that budget, and with the myriad of problems that we have down east—which I will not go into today—and during that same eight or nine month period in that same year when I was attempting to make that $1.3 billion pay for all of those services for the little province of New Brunswick, the federal government of the day had given more than that amount to Canadair. That is fine and dandy, but to me, that did not seem fair since, today, we cannot even sell Canadair.

My point is that every time you criticize and compare, there are other criticisms and comparisons that come to mind. I understand what Senator Gigantès was saying when he alluded to other payments that the government was making. However, when we look at the figures, we see that the number of children living in poverty increased from 896,000 to 1,131,000 from 1980 to 1983. While those figures were increasing, the government of the day was able to spend $1.3 billion in an eight or nine month period bailing out Canadair. There are, therefore, always these imbalances and these frustrations and I doubt if we in this chamber will live long enough to see a better system in place.

Honourable senators, a lot has been said in committee and in pre-study of this bill. I am sure that a lot more will be said about it, but I am satisfied that the government of the day is moving in the right direction. It may not help as many children as we would like to help, but at least with a combination of these various changes, we are gradually moving toward putting more money in the pockets of the poorest people of this country.

I would strongly urge the government, in subsequent budgets, to increase that trend and start moving more money away from the "haves" to the "have nots." You cannot buy your way out of it by adding to the pot. I really believe that there must be some sort of redistribution. When the bill comes to us, it will be interesting to see whatever amendments have been made. However, I hope that we will look at the bill in combination with the other changes that the Minister of Finance has suggested. I also hope that the Senate will urge the government to continue moving in this direction so that the poorest children in Canada will receive more.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak to this order, it is considered debated.

CANADA-GREECE RELATIONS

Hon. Phillipe Deane Gigantès rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, December 17, 1985:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the relations between Canada and Greece.

He said: Honourable senators, the relations between Canada and Greece constitute an embarrassing subject to me because I am a Greek citizen, but I am a Canadian, first last and always.

I am, of course, interested in good relations between the country of my birth and the country that has been so generous to me, as Canada has. I find, however, that, without any ill-intention, we are taking certain steps that are putting these good relations at some risk.

The Government of Canada has agreed to give 20 re-conditioned fighter planes to Turkey. We were told in this chamber that these planes were offered to Greece back in 1981 but that Greece showed no interest. However, in 1981, these planes were not offered in a re-conditioned state. When they were offered to Turkey, the offer was changed. These planes have now been reconstructed and they will be some addition to the military potential of Turkey.

It may be that they were offered as part of an inducement set forth in front of the Turks by a former cabinet minister of this government in order to convince them to buy a Candu reactor. I am all for selling our Candu reactors. They are fine reactors and our nuclear industry needs to sell them. The research that goes on in order to keep each newly-built Candu reactor at the fine point of technological progress is good for Canada. So, if we send a Candu reactor to Turkey—and, in essence, we will not sell it, we are giving it away because we will receive figs in exchange, literally—the nuclear reactor's spent fuel could be used to make nuclear weapons. That and the warplanes have a kind of symbolic effect. Perhaps Turkey will never break its agreement with Canada to not use the spent fuel from the Candu reactor to make a nuclear bomb; perhaps it will never use the 20 planes against Greek forces, but there are 140,000 Turkish troops along the western Turkish coast facing the Greek Islands with landing craft. It is a question of perception. The Greeks ask themselves what those troops are doing there and why landing craft provided by NATO are in Turkish ports facing the Greek Islands. There is unease, and Greece spends an enormous amount of money placing troops on those islands to protect the people there against the possibility of an invasion. When one sees an invading force a few miles away with landing craft, one has to provide for the possibility that somebody will go crazy and start a war.

Canada has always been exemplary in trying to smooth these problems, in trying to act as a kind of referee between the Greeks and the Turks. In Cyprus, Canadians have been marvellous doing this delicate, desperately difficult job of keeping two ethnicities that have learned over a thousand years to be suspicious of one another from getting at each other's throats. We have not always been successful because the Turks did invade. But there have been situations, many of them one after another, where Canadians, with the trust they have earned on both sides for their impartiality, have been able to step in and keep matters from getting worse. Now we have Canada appearing—I am not saying it is doing it—to be favouring Turkey over Greece. That is bound to affect Canada's very valuable role as an impartial intermediary, as a civilized presence that lessens the risks of violence and war and brings a measure of Canadian civility to a region that has been much tried by violence.

I beseech the government to look at this again to see if there is some way that it could correct the impression that has appeared in the Greek press and in speeches by Greek politicians that Canada is turning its back on its traditional impartiality and is currently favouring the Turks. I do not believe that is what has happened, but I beseech the government to make sure that nobody in Greece believes that.

I thank honourable senators for their attention.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Would the Honourable Senator Gigantès permit a question?

Senator Gigantès: Certainly.

Senator Hicks: Is it not true that Canada also offered these planes, or an equivalent number, to Greece and that Greece declined them?

Senator Gigantès: Yes. In 1981 those planes were offered to Greece, but "as is"; in the condition in which they were. At that time those planes were not, as my fellow Quebeckers would say, "n'étaient pas un cadeau"; they were not much of a present because they were planes that were not in good condition.

When the former Minister of Defence, the Honourable Robert Coates, went to Turkey he changed the offer and said that Canada would reconstruct those planes and make them new. That was not the nature of the offer made to Greece.

Senator Hicks: I understand that the honourable senator dealt with this question while I was called out of the chamber. I apologize for asking him to repeat.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, since Senator Gigantès would like to find out what the thinking of the government is behind this move, could he not put a question on the order paper so that he will receive a direct reply from the government on the subject?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I expressed in my Inquiry the belief that the government's intentions are not bad; they are not against Greece. What I am speaking about is an impression that is being created. I think it has been created by mistake and not with any ill intention. That is why I chose the avenue of expressing a wish and a request rather than asking the government if it has any ill intentions because, of course, it will tell me that it does not have any ill intentions and I would believe it. I think something has to be done, and that is why I chose the Inquiry route.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other honourable senator wishes to participate, this Inquiry is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Friday, December 20, 1985

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore in the Chair.
Prayers.

PETITIONS

On calling of "Presentation of Petitions":

Hon. Jacques Flynn: There may be no petitions in this chamber, but in the other place there are thousands of them.

Senator Petten: Do you want some?

Senator Flynn: Why not? I challenge you to do it.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, after watching the proceedings yesterday, I hazarded the beginnings of a limerick:

If you happen to see Ray Hnatyshyn,
Do not mention the word "petition."

Senator Fairbairn, on hearing this beginning, came up with a full limerick, which is:

We grieve for a man named Hnatyshyn
Who thrived during tough opposition,
But the government game
Brought him dubious fame
As a House Leader foiled by petition.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CRIMINAL CODE

BILL TO AMEND (LOTTERIES)—REPORT OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Twelfth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs respecting Bill C-81, to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries), without amendment, but with observations and recommendations.

A Clerk at the Table:

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its Twelfth Report—

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this is a most interesting report but it is five pages long so, perhaps, we could dispense with the reading of it because, ultimately, and despite the observations, the bill is reported without amendment.

However, I do not mind if honourable senators want to have the report read.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suggest that we dispense with the reading of the report until we deal with it later this day. Meanwhile, we will circulate the report. I think that it bears reading and that the reading of it completes the debate, in a sense. We may wish to debate some of its aspects, but it is a report that has a lot of support on both sides of the house.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): And third reading of the bill will take place later this day.

Senator Frith: Third reading of the bill will take place later this day. Let us deal with the report on third reading.

Senator Flynn: Dispense.

(The text of the report follows:)

Friday, December 20, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill C-81, intituled: "An Act to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries)", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, November 27, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations and recommendations:

Bill C-81 is a proposed Act to amend the Criminal Code in relation to "lotteries", or gaming and betting in general. But it is also one element of the federal government's fulfillment of its perceived obligations pursuant to an agreement entered into with the provinces in June 1985. Under that agreement, the provinces promise to pay, through the agency of the Interprovincial Lottery Corporation, $100,000,000 to the federal government and to discontinue certain litigation between the Corporation and the federal government. In exchange, the federal government has promised to do several things:

(i) to introduce amendments to Part V of the Criminal Code, removing the permission therein for the federal government to conduct lotteries and other forms of gaming; and to make changes to other provisions dealing with gaming;

(ii) to refrain from re-entering the field of gaming and betting, and to ensure that the rights of the provinces in that area are not reduced or restricted;

(iii) to use its "best efforts" to ensure that the winding up of the Sports Pool Corporation and Loto Canada Inc. are accomplished; and

(iv) to discontinue the appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada of the decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in the case of Attorney General of Canada v. Loto-Quebec.

The proposed amendments to the Code, under the agreement, are to be subject to "consultation" with the provincial attorneys general, and the federal government is to use its "best efforts" to ensure that they are passed and proclaimed in force no later than December 31, 1985. One of the principal objectives of the agreement is to provide funding for the Winter Olympics in Calgary, Alberta in 1988.

The Committee has a number of concerns with regard to Bill C-81, and with regard to the agreements from which it derives. These concerns have reference to both its substance, and the process by which it was developed. At the outset, however, we wish to make it clear that we do not feel legally constrained by the "deadline" of December 31, 1985 contained in the agreement. The advice the Committee has received convinces us that the agreement is a political arrangement between the federal government and the provinces, and is not legally enforceable as such, in the sense that there could be justiciable remedies for default of any of the "obligations" in it. Thus, we do not feel that the Committee could put the federal government in legal jeopardy by the manner in which we deal with the Bill. In any event, we are also satisfied that, in presenting this Bill to the Senate, after having secured passage in the House of Commons, the government has used its "best efforts", as required in the agreement, to have the amendments proclaimed.

We now turn to the question of process—how this legislative initiative developed and was submitted to Parliament. The genesis of the proposed amendments to the criminal law embodied in Bill C-81 was unusual, to say the least. They first appeared, in draft form, in a schedule to the June 1985 agreement. That agreement was signed not by the federal Attorney General and his provincial counterparts; but by the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport and the ten provincial ministers under whose authority permitted lotteries and gaming fall. Notwithstanding the reference in that agreement to consultation with ministers responsible for the administration of justice, we are not satisfied that this was ever adequately done.

In an appearance before the Committee a representative of the Attorney General of Ontario took the position that the customary process by which changes to the Criminal Code are made was not respected in the case of this Bill. He outlined the usual process which accompanies such amendments, including the following:

—An idea for change is studied by the Law Reform Commission or the Criminal Code Review Section of the Department of Justice. The idea can originate within the government, from the public, or from a body such as the Uniform Law Conference.

—Formal substance is given to the idea in the form of study papers, working papers or reports from the Law Reform Commission or the Department.

—There are multilateral and bilateral consultations among federal and provincial departments of justice, involving telephone communications, formal meetings and written exchanges. Often, there is also extensive consultation with the public at this stage.

—The federal Department of Justice prepares a position with respect to provincial or public concerns. That position is presented to the Cabinet.

—Following approval by the Cabinet, a legislative draft is prepared, and then a draft bill. The draft bill is often circulated through the foregoing process again.

—Finally, the bill is introduced in the Senate or House of Commons, where again there can be input from the public and provincial governments in either or both Houses of Parliament.

According to that official, this customary process was not followed with respect to Bill C-81. In his view the amendments were prepared in haste, without very much consultation. While he does not expect that entire process to be necessary with every change to the Code, he took the position that at least some of its elements could have been respected. He was, however, careful not to lay the blame for this at the door of the federal Department of Justice.

The Committee finds itself in substantial agreement with the submissions made by the representative of the Attorney General of Ontario with respect to this issue of process. We believe that even minor amendments to the Criminal Code (and we, as will be seen, do not believe that the amendments in Bill C-81 are in any way "minor") should be the subject of thorough and careful consultation with the law officers of the provinces who are directly responsible for the administration of justice in their jurisdictions. The process described above should be abridged only in very exigent circumstances. Those circumstances did not exist with respect to this Bill. A representative of the federal Department of Justice who appeared before us took the position that no formal or even informal process is required before the federal government can exercise its jurisdiction over substantive criminal law. This is no doubt constitutionally correct, but surely, in our federation, it makes eminent good sense to have and foster cooperation between federal law officers who formulate our laws and their counterparts who administer those laws. In this regard, it is instructive to note that even the federal justice official who appeared before us expressed some frustration with the process in this case, particularly in relation to the inclusion of the deadline in the agreement.

The Committee has taken steps to consult with the provinces on this Bill. As noted above, we heard submissions from the Province of Ontario. We also communicated with the attorneys general of the other provinces. Only one other attorney general, the Honourable Roland Penner of Manitoba, has directly contacted the Committee to inform us of his general satisfaction with the Bill. We proceed on the assumption that the other provinces also do not have significant objection to it. We would urge that, in the future, ministers responsible for the administration of justice be involved in the formulation and consideration of all amendments to the criminal law, and that the customary consultative process with the provinces with respect to such amendments should only be disregarded or abridged in exceptional circumstances.

We now turn to the substance of the Bill. In his appearance before the Committee, the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport indicated that the Bill would essentially do two things: remove the exemption which the federal government now enjoys from certain lottery and gaming offences, and "clarify" the law with respect to other provisions in Part V of the Criminal Code. In subsequent testimony from officials of the Department of Justice, however, it was submitted that the amendments to Part V would impose further restrictions with respect to some gaming offences; and, on the other hand, somewhat widen the scope of gaming which can be conducted, or permitted, by the provinces.

On this issue of the real effect of the amendments the Committee heard a considerable amount of conflicting interpretative evidence. An understanding of the issues in this area is rendered difficult by the almost impenetrable language of Part V. It is a complex and confusing part of the Code, and we look forward to an early revision which we understand is part of a larger project to review the whole statute.

As we understand it, Bill C-81 would do the following, in addition to removing the federal government from lotteries and gaming:

1. It would broaden the exemption in s.189(3) in respect of certain games to apply to "annual fairs and exhibitions" rather than only to agricultural fairs or exhibitions, so that fairs involving fish products could take advantage of the exemption.
2. It would allow all those who are provincially licenced to conduct gaming under s.190 to use wheels of fortune. At present, only a restricted few licencees are so permitted.
3. It would forbid betting or pool-selling on a race, fight or single sporting event under s.190. At present, it is arguable that, those who are permitted to conduct lottery schemes or games may become involved in such betting and pool-selling.
4. It would restrict the availability of gaming computers and video devices, as well as slot machines, to lottery schemes actually conducted and managed by the provinces. At present, it is arguable that, those who may conduct gaming under provincial licence are not precluded from using these devices.

These last two matters are a subject of some controversy. According to officials of the federal Department of Justice, the 1983 decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal in the case of Attorney General of Canada v. Loto Quebec has resulted in betting and pool-selling, as well as slot machines and similar devices, being legally available to those who are permitted to conduct gaming and lottery schemes under s.190. Thus Bill C-81 would place new restrictions on their use. The representative of the Attorney General of Ontario takes the position, however, that that decision is far from clear on these issues and that the permission to use slot machines, in particular, is a significant expansion of the law. The Committee heard extensive evidence from officials of the Ontario Provincial Police, and received submissions from other law enforcement authorities as to some possibly serious consequences that might flow from the enactment of Bill C-81. Reference was made to the possible involvement of organized crime in casino-type enterprises which might be established. They expressed particular concern with the possibility of the legitimate use of slot machines. In their view, this would be a major step towards Nevada-style gambling, and all the problems of violence and corruption which might result.

We recognize the seriousness of these concerns, and would not wish to minimize them. However, gaming and lottery schemes which would be permitted under revised s.190 are under provincial control. It should be noted, in addition, that slot machines would only be available when under the direct management of a province. If a province wants to avoid the potential effects of the use of such devices it is within its power not to allow their use.

These witnesses did make a valid point when they stressed that the degree to which the negative consequences of gaming and lottery schemes are avoided is dependent on the rigour of provincial control. We heard evidence to the effect that, in those provinces where substantial legitimate gaming is carried on, the control is quite effective and that there has been no perceptible change in the incidence of criminal behaviour which might be thought to accompany that activity. The Committee notes that the province of Manitoba has introduced a system of control of permitted gaming that might well be emulated by other provinces.

Another matter which concerns the Committee is the scope of licenced gambling. We would urge the provinces to apply strict and, as far as possible, uniform criteria with respect to identifying those charities, religious, and non-profit organizations which should be permitted to conduct and manage lottery schemes. This would contribute to the exclusion of any potential participation by organized crime. The Committee also recommends that consideration be given to amending sub-section 190(3) to make it an offence to contravene the conditions or requirements of a provincial licence.

The Committee has concluded that Bill C-81 should be approved without amendment. Our concerns with respect to the process of its development and passage in the House of Commons remain, however. We have felt constrained to go into some detail in this report, because these issues were not canvassed in an adequate fashion in the House, where the Bill was considered, in Committee of the Whole and on third reading, in one afternoon. We would also reiterate our plea that, in the future, the federal government should allow for as much consultation as is possible with respect to amendments to the criminal law. Although we recommend no amendment to the Bill we would urge the Department of Justice to monitor the operation of the changes very closely. In the future, if some of the negative consequences alleged to flow from the Bill should come to pass, we believe that the federal government should not hesitate to take initiatives to re-enter the area and bring them to a halt with appropriate amendments to the Criminal Code.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO WRITTEN QUESTION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the honourable government leader if he is in a position to inform me today of the time at which I should expect an answer to my written question of 12 February 1985 which has been put on the order paper since that date. I suspect that the government house leader may well give me the same answer he gave me the last time; namely, that it is not a matter within his control. However, I thought he indicated that he would have another look at it and perhaps come back to me. Is he now in a position to do that?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, although I am not the government house leader, I will answer the question just the same. Written questions, as my friend intimates, are really not handled through my office at all. They are handled through the Clerk's office in both this and the other place. But if he wants someone to ask the Clerk where the answer is and when we will get a reply, I will be glad to take that on.

Senator Corbin: I thank the honourable senator for his answer. Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. Could he inform me if this matter has been put on the agenda of that committee for study?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, in reply to that question, yes, the matter was raised at the last meeting of our committee and it is on the agenda. I presume that it will be discussed at the next meeting of our committee. Since our last meeting, some proposed new standing orders for the House of Commons have been introduced in the other place. One of those standing orders deals with this matter. Some changes have been proposed there which our committee may, of course, consider. One change is basically an addition to the rule indicating that no member shall have more than four written questions to a ministry on the Order Paper at any one time.

Specifically on the item about which the Honourable Senator Corbin is asking, a member may request that the ministry respond to a specific question within 45 days by so indicating when filing his or her notice of written question. Whether our committee would wish to follow the same sort of approach I do not know, but the matter is before the committee.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

CHRISTMAS RECESS

Honourable Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have a question either for the Leader of the Government or his Deputy.

Under our rules, when we adjourn today either before or at 6 p.m., we would normally return next Monday. I wonder if those who haven't resigned themselves to being here on Monday should make reservations.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That is a question that I am sure is of interest to all honourable senators. The short answer is: I wish I knew. I can, however, give some idea of what I think is going on in the hope that it might be of assistance to honourable senators. My information is that the question as to what they are going to do in the other place is still being actively canvassed by the house leaders. I know for certain of no arrangement that has come out of that which would allow the houses of Parliament to rise today. But, as I have said on a previous occasion, I am full of hope. I would not like to foreclose the possibility that some agreement will be arrived at. What do we do in the meanwhile? What I would suggest is that we carry on with our order paper—I foresee a number of interesting debates—that we work our way through the agenda and see what happens when we reach the end of it. Should we complete our agenda by, let us say, 4 o'clock and there is still no word from the other place, but no positive sign that no agreement will ever be reached—in other words, the subject is still open—then I would suggest that we adjourn until 8 o'clock tonight and see what the result is then.

Should nothing transpire by then to relieve the blockade, I think we are duty bound to return here on Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and it would be my intention to suggest that that is what we should do.

I should say, to show what an optimist my honourable colleague is, that he has considered the possibility of Royal Assent some time this afternoon if the blockade is lifted in the other place.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): We might have it, anyway.

Senator Roblin: We might have it anyway—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We have some bills before us.

Senator Roblin: Yes, we have other bills before us. We may very well have Royal Assent this afternoon, anyway, but the time is uncertain. That is pretty inconclusive, I am sorry to say, but that is the state of play at the moment.

Hon. H. A. Olson: May I ask a question of the Leader of the Government? I thought I heard him say that he knew of no agreement that would indicate that the government could adjourn today. I was under the impression that there was already a motion adopted by the other place that they would adjourn today. Unless something intervenes in connection with that motion, then the adjournment will take place at 6 o'clock.

Senator Roblin: My friend may be right. I am not aware of exactly what they are going to do, and I have learned not to try to predict. I will wait and see.

Senator Frith: As I understand it, they need unanimous consent to sit past 5 o'clock today.

Senator Flynn: It is a rule.

Senator Frith: It is a rule. We do not need to speculate about that. Of course, there is always the possibility that the Speaker might be asked to call the house back for Monday. That exists as a possibility. But I do not see any logical possibility of a blockade and unanimous consent. If they were going to give unanimous consent, there would not be a blockade—or perhaps “deadlock” is a better word to use.

I do not want to give the impression, by silence, that I fully support this suggestion that if they do not resolve their differences in the other place, then we have no choice but to sit on Monday. However, I do not want to get into an argument about that. We may have to have an argument about it later. I just do not think it follows, as night follows day, that if the House of Commons, bound as it is by its rules, adjourns at 5 o'clock, we should feel duty bound to come back on Monday because of the possibility of the Speaker calling the House of Commons back. But why anticipate that? It may never happen. Let us talk about it if it does happen.

Senator Roblin: On the very sound principle of not anticipating the matter, I simply say that it would be the government's view that if the House of Commons does meet on Monday, it would be our duty to be here to deal with any legislation they might conceivably send us.

Senator Frith: That is quite a different matter. If it is clear at 6 o'clock that they are coming back on Monday, then that is quite different. But if it is not clear at 6 o'clock that they are coming back, then all that we will be doing is sitting and waiting to see whether the Speaker is going to call them back. That is where we might have some difference. However, I do not quarrel with the point just made by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: I hope that contingency will not arise. But if, whenever we adjourn this afternoon, there still seems to be a possibility that there might be a Monday sitting, I think we shall have a choice. We have the choice of either coming back at 8 o'clock to get the final word or adjourning at the end of our session this afternoon to Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock as the rules of the Senate provide. So it is Hobson's choice.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: We are still having the same trouble over the word “possibility”, so let us leave it.

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order to correct something that was put on the record by myself earlier this week in the course of an exchange with the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In relation to the United Nations resolution on Afghanistan and Iran, I indicated that I had called the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa only to find out that no one was available because they were out on a little Christmas party. I would not want to be the object of the ire of those devoted employees here in Ottawa. They were not the people to whom I should have referred. The employees who were having their noontime, lunchtime Christmas party are with the Canadian delegation to the United Nations, not the public servants here in Ottawa.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, for the second reading of the Bill C-74, intituled: “An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census”.—(Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough)).

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, it is interesting how often we look back to those days in the 1860s when the Constitution of Canada was being hammered out. When we look back to those debates we find that there were two matters which attracted major attention, and they are not matters that might attract major attention nowadays at a federal-provincial conference. One was the insistence of the representatives of Upper Canada, particularly George Brown, that the lower house of the proposed Parliament be based on representation by population. The reason Brown and his friends were so determined that there should be representation by population, of course, was that they felt that the representation law which prevailed in the old province of Canada had been most unfair to the larger population of Upper Canada in the previous decade, that law being based on equal representation from each of the two parts of the province notwithstanding that their populations were unequal. The second great matter was the need for a strong, active Senate, a Senate which was to defend the Province of Quebec and the so-called "lower provinces" against the anticipated dominance of Ontario.

It is very difficult to discuss the matter of representation in the House of Commons apart from a discussion of the nature of the Senate and its powers. I shall desist from the second part of that discussion after saying one thing. It is important to remember that it was never anticipated that certain bills coming from the House of Commons would be exempt from the famous sober second thought and, indeed, even rejection after sober second thought by the Senate. That applied equally to what some now call money bills and non-money bills. Indeed, it was the intention that the Senate would be able to protect Quebec and the lower provinces especially with regard to taxation and expenditures. That is the only point I wanted to make at this time with regard to the Senate.

Going back to the question of representation in the House of Commons from 1867, up to the present time there have been three different approaches. Now a fourth variation is being proposed. I think it is important to survey those three approaches because they show how difficult it is to achieve an entirely satisfactory arrangement in a country such as Canada. Our provinces are relatively few in number; that distinguishes us from the United States. In addition to that, we have some relatively small provinces and we have some provinces which, in American parlance, would be called "empire provinces"—Quebec, Ontario and now British Columbia, with Alberta pushing hard. Moreover, the population is not scattered out through a great rectangle; it is drawn out along a long line from Atlantic to Pacific. Representation is not easy.

From 1867 to 1946, the scheme was based on assigning 65 constituencies to Quebec and, generally, all the other provinces had a proportionate number. If the population of another province was double that of Quebec, then it would have 130. On the other hand, if it had just a little more than half the population of Quebec, it would have 33 constituencies. There were some variations of this basic rule, as senators know, right from the beginning when Manitoba came in and when British Columbia came in. Later on, special arrangements were made to accommodate the needs of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. However, the basic scheme was 65 for Quebec with the others having proportionate numbers, with certain modifications to take care of special situations.

[Senator Stewart.]

By the end of World War II, this first approach had been found generally unsatisfactory, so it was decided that, instead of proceeding by using what one might call a benchmark—in other words 65 for Quebec—a target size for the House of Commons should be selected. The target size that was selected was between 260 and 265 members. The House of Commons would then be divided among the several provinces, basically, in proportion to their several populations, but with certain exceptions. The exceptions were the so-called Senate floor, which protected Prince Edward Island from having fewer than four members in the House of Commons, and which protected New Brunswick, in effect, from having fewer than ten members. Then there was the 15 per cent rule, which was that no province was to lose more than 15 per cent of its representation at any redistribution.

That is the arrangement that prevailed for almost 30 years, from 1946 to 1974. However, by 1974, it was generally agreed by members of the House of Commons that that approach—using a target size for the house—was unsatisfactory. They thought that it was unsatisfactory for two reasons. The first of these was that the population of Canada had become concentrated in, at the most, four provinces. In addition to that, within even those provinces, the population of Canada was concentrating into three or four major cities, with the result that the rural areas were under-represented. When we talk about the rural areas being under-represented, we think chiefly of the great northern constituencies, but we have to remember, honourable senators, that in terms of the work of representation, it is the constituencies that border on relatively warm water which provide the greatest amount of federal activity. There are active fisheries and there is the need for navigational facilities and navigational aids.

I remember when I was first elected to the House of Commons, my seatmate was from York Centre in Ontario. I had one of the smallest constituencies in Canada in terms of population; he had the second largest. Suddenly he said to me, "You work much harder on your constituency work than I do." I said, "Yes, I guess that that is so." He then asked me, "What kind of work do you have?" I reversed the question and asked him, "What kind of work do you have? How many wharves do you have?" He answered, "None." I then asked him how many breakwaters he had. He answered, "None." I asked him how many canals he had, and he again answered, "None." I asked him if he received letters from constituents, and he answered, "Yes." I asked him what those letters were about, and he answered, "Immigration matters." That was the one big topic of his letters.

As Senator Muir can confirm, anyone who has a constituency bordering on warm water has all sorts of problems which, if they cannot be dealt with today, must be dealt with tomorrow. Those are matters of great urgency and of real significance to the people who make their living in fishing and in other rural and sea coast activities.

One of the problems with the 1946 to 1974 arrangement was that it was working to the disadvantage of those constituencies that bordered on warm water and, of course, of those constituencies located in the great northern area of several of the provinces. In order to deal with these two key problems—concentration in a few provinces and concentration, indeed, in a few cities—the so-called amalgam method was adopted with general agreement by the House of Commons. It is worthwhile looking at the amalgam method, because that is what the current bill proposes to abolish.

Senator Frith: When was that?

Senator Stewart: In 1974. The amalgam method, which addressed the real problems of representation, is now being put aside by Bill C-74, as introduced by Senator Flynn.

The amalgam method is not a simple method, because it addresses three different situations. First, it was designed to protect the so-called small provinces—those with populations under one and a half million, without introducing a new set of what we could call artificial floors, floors comparable to the Senate floor. Second, it was designed to prevent traumatic reduction of representation in the rural areas of the large provinces. That is why there is provision in the law for additional seats for Quebec. As honourable senators know, the law with regard to the large provinces is that they are to be treated equally with Quebec. Under the law a province with a population over two and a half million is regarded as a large province, and those provinces after 1981, or after 1991, under the present law, are all to be treated as Quebec is treated. Originally, that meant Quebec and Ontario; now British Columbia has moved up into the category of “large province.”

The third arrangement was for the intermediate provinces. Here the intention was to provide for a more rapid increase in the representation of the fast growing provinces. Initially these were British Columbia and Alberta, but now, of course, only Alberta. British Columbia has become a large province. It was to provide a rapid increase in representation of these fast growing provinces until such time as they moved over into the category of “large provinces.”

Senator Frith: Which ones were they again?

Senator Stewart: British Columbia and Alberta.

Senator Frith: The intermediate ones?

Senator Stewart: The intermediate ones were British Columbia and Alberta.

Senator Frith: They were also the fast growing ones?

Senator Stewart: They were the fast growing ones, that is correct; but British Columbia, after 1981, is a large province.

Under this system the size of the House of Commons was not regarded as a target. In other words, they moved away from the notion that they started with a pie of a certain size and then split it up more or less fairly. They addressed the needs of the three different categories of provinces. They accepted a House of Commons of the size produced by the remedies needed to deal with the real requirements. That was the basic arrangement.

What the government has done in Bill C-74 is to focus on the question of the size of the House of Commons; in other words, instead of focusing on the needs of the three different categories of provinces, the small, the intermediate and the large, they have become keenly concerned about the size of the House of Commons which results from dealing with the real requirements in each of these three categories. Basically, what we have here is a proposal to revert back to the 1946 approach, to define the size of the house roughly and then split it up. It is a reversion to the 1946 approach—a reversion with a vengeance.

The four largest provinces will come under clause 2, which provides a new section 51(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867. That clause reads:

The number of members of the House of Commons and the representation of the provinces therein shall, on the coming into force of this subsection and thereafter on the completion of each decennial census be readjusted by such authority, in such manner, and from such time as the Parliament of Canada from time to time provides, subject and according to the following rules:

1. There shall be assigned to each of the provinces a number of members equal to the number obtained by dividing the total population of the provinces by two hundred and seventy-nine and by dividing the population of each province by the quotient so obtained, counting any remainder in excess of 0.50 as one after the said process of division.

The second rule applies to those provinces which are exempt. In effect, we have rule 1 which will apply to Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. For the other six provinces, rule 2 will apply. What rule 2 does is create a floor for each of those six provinces. Each of those six provinces, in effect, is not to have a number of members lower than it has at present.

Under the existing law two of our provinces rest on what we could call the old Senate floor. Prince Edward Island has four and New Brunswick has ten. Under this proposed new arrangement, six provinces will rest on a floor. Prince Edward Island will rest on a floor of four and New Brunswick ten. Nova Scotia will rest on a floor of eleven. Manitoba will rest on a floor of fourteen; Saskatchewan will rest on a floor of fourteen; and Newfoundland will rest on a floor of seven. We have four new floors out of a total of six floors.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, what is wrong with this whole new plan? I suggest to you that, in some cases, it accords quite unequal treatment. Let us compare the treatment of the province of Saskatchewan with the treatment of the province of Newfoundland. If we look at the figures Senator Flynn kindly provided for us, we will see how much better Saskatchewan comes off than Newfoundland. That is true for 1981, for 1991 and for 2001.

Perhaps the easiest way to present this is to tell you how many people there will be in each average constituency in those two provinces after each of those redistributions under this plan and using the population figures provided by the sponsor of the bill.

After 1981, in Saskatchewan, each of the constituencies would have, on the average, 69,165 persons living in them; but poor Newfoundland, with seven seats, would have constituencies with 81,091 persons, on the average, in each.

After 1991, Saskatchewan would have fourteen seats as before, and the size of the average constituency would be 78,235; but Newfoundland, with its seven seats, would have an average constituency of 91,271. That is higher than any other province except British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. It is even higher than Quebec. How can you defend that?

For the year 2001, Saskatchewan would have 14 seats again and Newfoundland would, again, have seven; but in Saskatchewan the average population of a constituency would be 84,442, and in Newfoundland, honourable senators, it would be 99,714. That will be the highest average size of constituency in any province except Alberta. In Newfoundland, a far-flung province with a great deal of federal activity, the size of the constituencies, in terms of population, will be the highest in Canada except for the province of Alberta.

Surely, there is not a senator from Newfoundland who would not agree that that is unacceptable. I have now illustrated one thing that is wrong with the present plan. There are specific instances in which it is eminently unfair, and I should think that any Newfoundland senator would be on his feet deploring and, indeed, denouncing this proposal.

The second thing that is wrong with the government's plan as set forth in Bill C-74 is that it introduces a new lack of flexibility among the six smaller provinces. Unless their populations suddenly zoom, they are all to be at a floor.

The third thing that is wrong with the government's plan is that it has the effect of putting a squeeze on the representation of the rural areas of Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. Even the large provinces, which come out relatively well under this plan, are squeezed in terms of the rural areas, where people find it far more difficult to consult with their members of Parliament and to get the services they need than those living in urban areas. Very often, urban people have access to other counsellors and other offices from which they can get information and assistance. It is most unfair to rural Quebec; to northern Ontario; to rural British Columbia; and to many parts of Alberta. I should think senators from Quebec would be unhappy about that.

Senator Flynn: Confine yourself to your own problems.

Senator Stewart: I am always glad to have the assistance of Senator Flynn with any matter regarding Nova Scotia, and I hope he will not resent a comment with regard to adequate representation of the people of rural Quebec. I am really surprised that he should take that attitude towards the people of rural Quebec. It is not becoming at all to a senator who represents an entire province and not one specific area.

Yet another thing that is wrong with this plan is that it decreases the representation from the Atlantic provinces in the House of Commons. If you compare the percentage of members in the present House with the percentage of members in the House that would be produced by the application of the present rules to the results of the census of 1981, you may not become too uneasy. The explanation of this is that there are two things to be remembered. The first is the fact that Prince Edward Island, with a relatively small population, attracts four members in the House of Commons, and that distorts the percentage. The same is true, although to a lesser extent, in the case of New Brunswick which has ten members.

Because the House of Commons, under the proposed law, will be somewhat smaller, the percentage attracted by Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick will be somewhat larger. Consequently, taking the four Atlantic provinces together, you have an in-built and—in the case of Prince Edward Island—significant distortion.

What will happen will be that, for 1981, taking the four Atlantic provinces as a whole, under the proposed law the total will remain the same, but Nova Scotia will lose. For 1991, under the present law, these four provinces would attract 11.3 per cent of the members of the house, but that will drop under the new law to 10.8 per cent. Both Nova Scotia and Newfoundland will lose considerably. For the year 2001, the four Atlantic provinces, notwithstanding the distortion caused by the larger representation for Prince Edward Island and, to a lesser extent, by New Brunswick, will drop from 11.5 per cent to 10.8 per cent; yet, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland will go down sharply.

Taking Nova Scotia and Newfoundland alone, the drop would be from 6.3 per cent to 6.1 per cent in 1981; from 6.9 per cent to 6 per cent in 1991; and in 2001 the figure would drop from 7.1 per cent to 6.1 per cent in terms of members of the house.

Honourable senators, it is very clear what is happening here. Atlantic Canada is being deprived of the representation which it has now and which it would have in the future under the existing law.

Honourable senators may say, "What's new?" That is a very good question. I would ask you to look at the information Senator Flynn has placed before this chamber—taking into account, of course, the fact that there is a bad mistake in the figures relative to Prince Edward Island. You will notice that he lists the provinces starting with British Columbia, Alberta, and so on, moving east. That is not the way in which they traditionally are listed when the results of elections in Canada are shown. Those figures are traditionally listed according to the order in which the units became provinces of Canada. I have always listed the provinces in another way, beginning with Newfoundland.

● (1440)

Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick before 1867 were sea-bound colonies, the territories of which could not be expanded, unlike the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. If we were to look at a map showing the Dominion of Canada in 1867, we would see that, in terms of territory, Ontario and Quebec were relatively small. Those two provinces later were presented with vast territories and vast riches, which belonged to the people of the Dominion of Canada. In the case of Ontario, its present land mass is nine or perhaps ten times as large as that of the original province. Ontario was presented with a great gift.

Moving west to Manitoba, that province at one time was described as the "postage stamp" province. It was not a simple matter of its appearance on a map, although it did look a little like a postage stamp. It was enlarged step by step as the beneficence of the government at Ottawa assigned new lands and new riches to it.

In the cases of Saskatchewan and Alberta, these are provinces created out of the Northwest Territories and given large land masses and great riches, riches far greater than was realized when the assignment was made. In the case of British Columbia, that province, like the Atlantic provinces, is one which has retained its original size. But all the others in between have been enriched through the beneficence of the Canadian people in general.

I suppose that when we examine what is being done in this bill, there is really nothing new: Unto him who hath shall be given, and from him who hath not shall be taken away. That seems to be the attitude that is taken here. I suspect, honourable senators, that the government really does not recognize how bad a bill this is. Perhaps they thought that those who were opposing it on the other side were doing so because it permits gerrymandering, the appointment of new electoral officers and the like. But there are much more substantial reasons than those why this bill should be examined carefully, particularly by those of us who were summoned here to represent the regions of the country.

I hope that before this bill is given third reading in this chamber, we will hear witnesses from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Quebec who can give us an on-site reaction to what is proposed in this bill. When I say "witnesses," honourable senators, I am not referring to the sort of people who like to play a kind of mathematical game with demographic statistics. I mean those people who know something about the real problems involved in representing the people of Canada in far-flung areas of the country—people of Canada who are highly dependent on the federal government, perhaps more dependent on the federal government than on their provincial governments. Honourable senators, I hope that when the bill goes to committee we will hear from such witnesses.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Would the honourable gentleman permit a question?

Senator Stewart: I do not know whether I can give a complete answer, but I will certainly do my best.

Senator Bosa: The honourable senator has presented the flaws of the bill in an eloquent manner, but he has not proposed a solution. I would like to hear from him whether he has a solution.

Senator Stewart: I thank the honourable senator for his question. There is, at present, a law which was accepted unanimously by the House of Commons in 1974—accepted by all parties without either closure or time allocation. The process required by that law to bring in the redistribution subsequent to the census of 1981 has almost been completed. In fact, in a few more weeks it will have been completed, so there is the alternative. The alternative is not going to require our sitting here long hours; it is already on the books. Moreover, it will not require any additional expenditure, because almost all of the work, which cost several millions of dollars, has been virtually completed. There it is—there is a good law on the books. If we simply do nothing, that law will be effective and will provide a good solution—one which was found acceptable to the House of Commons in 1974 as being a satisfactory resolution of the difficult problems to which I have referred.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, we all know the context in which this bill was sent to us by the House of Commons and I do not intend to say more about it. Still I would like to draw your attention to an editorial published in the December 18, 1985 issue of La Presse of Montreal and entitled "Parliamentary Circus". At the very end of the editorial, signed by Jacques Bouchard, I read this:

As to the Bill on redistribution, which will not change anything much in fact other than again increasing the number of elected MPs...

And we know of course how much regard journalists have for elected MPs!

... it could very well be the subject of a more thorough study when the House resumes in January.

Indeed, what is so...

and I am still quoting the editorialist.

... urgent that they should decide this week...

This week.

... on the advisability of increasing parliamentary representation from 282 to about 298 seats in the year 2001?

Of course, that is the opinion of a Quebec editorialist. I do not intend to do as Senator Flynn has suggested and get involved in the business of Quebec, any more than I want Quebecers to pry into the affairs of New Brunswick. But the scope of this editorial is universal and applies to all situations. That the legitimate interests of Quebec, of New Brunswick, or of the western provinces, which have not had their fair share in the past, are at stake, I agree.

In the case of New Brunswick, perhaps certain aspects of the bill create more concern than others. We have to remember, when as legislators we study the merit or scope of a bill such as this one, that the average people represented in the House of Commons are also, in a way, our constituents. Although we are not elected, the Honourable Louis Robichaud and I speak in this house on behalf of the citizens of New Brunswick, and we have a mandate to carry out. What I am saying is that most of the people we as senators represent in this house do not really have any idea about the effect of this legislation or the immediate impact it will have in each of our regions in New Brunswick. I will now limit my comments to the situation in my own province of New Brunswick.

Indeed, the proportion of seats allotted to New Brunswick in the Canadian Confederation becomes increasingly smaller at each electoral redistribution. There is no denying the fact that, as more seats are given to the other provinces, even though we are protected by the number of seats in Senate as there cannot be fewer seats in the House of Commons than in the Senate, in the case of New Brunswick, the space we occupy in this federation becomes increasingly smaller each time. That is difficult to accept for one of the original partners of the Canadian Confederation.

In the case of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, since Prince Edward Island hesitated before joining the others, I do not believe that the situation today is quite what the Fathers of Confederation had foreseen at the time. Naturally, they could not anticipate the extent to which Canada has developed, especially as concerns the western provinces and the Northwest Territories. Early on, there were annexations by small provinces, which became important members of the Confederation. I repeat that they should have their rightful place in Parliament and be fairly represented. However, because of all kinds of demographic, economic and geographic reasons, New Brunswick, whose population rate of growth is excessively slow, loses more and more each time there is a redistribution of seats, at least when compared with other provinces.

What is the feeling about redistribution in New Brunswick since the people we represent have not had the opportunity to reflect on these issues which, at first glance, are not very exciting for most people? Passions will be aroused, however, when the commissioners travel around New Brunswick and tell people: "For the federal elections, we are planning to cut up your province, here with an axe, there with a knife and there with a saw." Then, you will see the mayors of small villages, and there are many of them in New Brunswick, and the mayors of small municipalities and urban centres jump up in their seats and say that they are being had. I can tell them that that is not when they will have been had. New Brunswick is being had now by the passage of this bill, because we are granting discretionary powers to the commissioners. It is true that subsection 6(b) in Part III, on page 4 of the bill, has been strengthened. This provision now states:

(b) the commission shall consider the following in determining reasonable electoral district boundaries:

(i) the community of interest or community of identity in or the historical pattern of an electoral district

This has been strengthened, but otherwise, the commissioners are given a great deal of discretion. Whatever the legislator might say, however the will of Parliament is expressed in the bill, the commissioners will have extensive discretionary powers. Moreover, when the general public in New Brunswick finds out how this discretion is applied, as described in the commissioners' report to Parliament, I think that in a number of New Brunswick regions, some people will tear their hair and cry bloody murder, because the situation of New Brunswick—perhaps one could say the same about the other provinces, but I am not familiar with their situation—is different, being the only officially bilingual province in Canada. Things have changed since the beginning of Confederation.

Special considerations were granted to Quebec because most francophones lived in that province at the time of Confederation. But they no longer live only in Quebec. There is a French-speaking cultural community in New Brunswick which will be cheated by this legislation. I want to say right from the start that I like the Diefenbaker-MacEachen formula a lot better than the Hnatyshyn formula, even though it increases slightly the total number of seats in the House of Commons. The old formula treated New Brunswick more fairly. What will happen then under the Hnatyshyn formula? As far as urban areas are concerned, the Hnatyshyn formula will not give New Brunswick a single additional seat. The Diefenbaker-MacEachen formula would have given it two more, eventually. Under this new formula, there is no gain for New Brunswick. Our relative influence in Canadian affairs is reduced in Parliament. But two more seats in New Brunswick would have reflected the population growth in our three or four major urban centres. Four major urban areas which are enormously expanding at the expense of their suburbs, eating away at the rural areas, so that the province could have received two more seats to meet the requirements of proportional representation. This way, rural areas would not have lost their ridings or representatives. That is particularly important for the francophone residents of New Brunswick, because the Hnatyshyn formula will freeze at 10 the number of seats. Because of the future population growth, especially in urban areas, there will be further inroads into rural French-speaking areas, which will again be deprived of adequate representation in the federal Parliament. This will happen, I warn you. This will startle French-speaking New Brunswickers, once they realize the artfulness of that formula which, to all intents and purposes, is freezing us until well past year 2000.

This is unfair to New Brunswick, one of the original partners to Confederation and to the French-speaking people of that province. I feel that the bill must be referred to committee. That aspect of its consequences should be considered in greater detail, because public attention has not really been drawn to the consideration of that bill. The people who looked into the legislation were members of Parliament between themselves, with their experts, the returning officers and what have you.

Ordinary citizens, the people who are to be represented by members in the other place and those we represent as senators have not really been made aware of the impact and the implications of the bill.

This is the reason why I suggest the Senate must proceed with the maximum speed possible (there is no question of blocking the bill) in order that it may go through the stages provided under our rules.

Neither should we press on to the point of imposing closure, it was done in the House of Commons, and stop the debate for the purpose of fitting in with a possible urgent Royal Assent.

I resent proceeding in such a fashion, even though we are nearing the end of a session, and even though I am just as anxious as you are to join my family for the Christmas season.

This is a bill that goes right to the heart of Confederation. I would not want the people I represent here in Ottawa to be hurt with such a bill.

Mark my words, what I told you will happen. Commissioners are all-powerful men and women. First, they will be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The Speaker, upon receiving the commissioners' report, will refer it immediately to a committee of the House. The report will not even be debated on the floor of the House of Commons, but will be referred to a committee. There, members who have objections will be able to submit them to the committee. This committee will again report to the Speaker. The report will not be discussed at that stage, either, on the floor of the House of Commons.

This is an unheard of novelty I feel is dangerous for democracy. However, the House of Commons have voted on that aspect, and if members of that House want to restrict their own parliamentary rights, their democratic rights, that is their business! But I tell you this is a move that could be costly for them in the long run. As many others have done, they will wake up too late because they will then be under the rule of that act. They will have to abide by it until the next electoral reforms provided for in the Constitution.

Honourable senators, I could mention many other points and quote any number of figures. Anyone can interpret these tables to mean what he wants them to mean. You can juggle figures as much as you like. But I say that New Brunswick is losing on the principle, on the numerics of the system and on the rep-by-pop aspect.

You can take the same figures I would give you and interpret them to mean something entirely different. But I say that New Brunswick is losing on the deal.

This is not right. It should not be losing. In a confederation, we have to protect those who are at greater risk. Sure, give the big ones a chance. I don't mind. But it should not mean squeezing the smaller provinces. How strong will New Brunswick's voice be under this new electoral system? In absolute terms, it will be weaker. It is as simple as that. The Diefenbaker-MacEachen formula was to complement the redistribution that would normally take place after the 1991 census, and provided the demographic progression extrapolated in these figures took place, we would have twelve seats instead of ten.

I think it would be very useful for the people of New Brunswick to have twelve seats in the House of Commons. We do not need them in the Senate, since we are very well represented, when I see my honourable colleague opposite. We don't need any more seats in the Senate.

We have a duty as senators to defend these provincial interests, as we are doing today. I want to thank you for your attention, and I may decide to discuss the subject further in committee.

[English]

Senator Stewart: Will the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Corbin: Yes.

Senator Stewart: I realize that we have here a constitutional amendment that does not require the agreement of any of the provinces. Nevertheless, many of the bills that go through Parliament are of concern to provincial governments and, accordingly, arrangements are made to advise them. Would the honourable senator regard this bill as one on which the premiers of, for example, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Nova Scotia ought to be given an opportunity to be heard? They could either appear themselves or have an informed person appear who would know the impact of this legislation on outlying areas of the provinces and who could be of assistance to us while the bill is in committee.

Senator Corbin: I would certainly subscribe to that viewpoint. I wonder, however, whether the premiers would be interested in appearing before the committee. They would probably take the attitude that this is basically a federal matter, that they have their own problems getting elected and that, likewise, they would not want the feds telling them what to do with regard to redistribution in their own provinces. I see no harm in extending an invitation to them or to some of their people who would know all about this problem.

In raising the matter of the provincial premiers, you have reminded me of something. Only a few weeks ago Premier Hatfield of New Brunswick decided, for some reason, to appear before the Transportation Committee of the Commons when it made its tour of the eastern seaboard. I think Premier Hatfield was right when he said during the course of that hearing that when it comes to transportation, regional economic development or what-have-you, New Brunswick has a weaker voice. The federal establishment, willingly or not—and I presume that it is unwillingly—tends to complicate life more and more every time they bring in new legislation, proposals, policies or programs. I am sure that, for example, Premier Hatfield would have something to say on this legislation. However, he may be reluctant to appear. For example, the Honourable Louis Robichaud may probably have taken the attitude that, "It is not my bailiwick. It bothers me but I had better not say anything."

Senator Stewart: Premier Peckford would not be so reticent.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

Senator Corbin: While I am on my feet, I would point out to Senator Stewart that federal members have much larger constituencies than provincial MLAs, as they are called in New Brunswick. When I was a Member of Parliament I represented the same area as six elected members of the Legislative Assembly. I was expected to be seen at all the bloody openings, ribbon-cuttings, funerals, weddings and anniversaries, as was the local MLA. For example, Senator Simard had a nice, tiny little bailiwick in Edmundston. He was king of the mountain in Edmundston. He would sometimes say, "Where is the Member of Parliament? We do not see him here today." Sometimes that Member of Parliament was in the fifth road of the sixth settlement, in the backwoods, looking after some local problem. In that respect I think that provincial politicians and—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order!

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Your Honour, I have not yet finished; I still have the floor.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I am sorry to interrupt the honourable senator, but I should like to remind him that one can rise only once on second reading.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I have been interrupted by His Honour. I do not think that His Honour ought to interrupt me when I am answering a question from an honourable colleague. I hope this will not happen again.

[English]

Senator Stewart, you were addressing me on the matter of provincial concerns and I was responding to that concern with an illustration, and I will take the time required to do so. I was not making a second speech.

Provincial premiers and provincial members would indeed like to have smaller federal constituencies in New Brunswick. I am sure they would be delighted to have two more members of Parliament here in Ottawa to represent New Brunswick, as proposed by the Diefenbaker-MacEachen solution. I do not think they would object to that, and even if Premier Hatfield or any other premier on the Atlantic seaboard came to us and told us that, and that only, I think we would have to pay attention to them. Thank you very much for your question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the time seems to have arrived in the course of our proceedings this afternoon when it would be convenient if the house were to adjourn for a short period in order to facilitate certain discussions. Therefore, if it met with your approval, I would be glad to move the adjournment of the Senate for a short period of perhaps half an hour, or to the call of the bell, whichever occurs first, in order that those consultations may take place. I therefore move the adjournment of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask all Liberal senators to meet during the adjournment, if they can do so, in room 263-S.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, before adjourning the house, we must dispose of Bill C-74.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I neglected to make arrangements for the continuation of the debate in the house. My hope would be that, when we came back, we would proceed from where we are now to deal with the items on the order paper, which would include a continuation of the discussion of the bill in question. While there is no name attached to the adjournment, perhaps when we come back others, including myself, will be speaking to this bill.

[Senator Corbin.]

Senator Frith: Perhaps we can then consider this a recess so that it does not need to stand as an adjournment motion. By unanimous consent, we can recess to resume in half an hour or to the call of the bell.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to recess for half an hour and return at the call of the bell?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Debate interrupted.

The Senate recessed during pleasure.

At 4.15 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the time we took our recess we had just had an opportunity to listen to two of our colleagues who had comments to make about Bill C-74, which has been before us for a couple of days now. I want to add a short contribution to the discussion that has already taken place.

I think it might be interesting to review the way in which this legislation developed in the House of Commons, because I would not like anyone to think that, whether or not there was 100 per cent agreement as to the nature of the bill—which, of course, is unusual in that chamber, as is sometimes the case in this chamber—it did not receive a thorough examination and going over. The first stage, of course, was a white paper. A white paper on redistribution was submitted to the House of Commons in June of this year, six months ago. It was then referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections for a thorough examination of the policy implications contained in it. After that consideration had been under way, in October of this year the Government Leader in the House of Commons introduced Bill C-74. It was debated and then referred to another committee for consideration because it then represented a piece of legislation rather than a study paper.

The committee had the bill before it for some six weeks, and heard from a number of witnesses. It went through the usual clause-by-clause consideration, but I am told—and I do not know whether there is any significance to this fact—that the Liberal members did not attend any of the committee meetings. Perhaps that was to indicate their feelings towards the bill, and I presume that that was the case. In any case, they were not in attendance.

The committee reported the bill back to the House of Commons on November 21 of this year. During the report stage a number of amendments were moved, one by Maurice Foster, MP, which was accepted and which had the effect of halving the reduction that would otherwise have taken place in the representations accorded to the growing provinces. In other words, during the course of the passage of the bill through the House of Commons, on a motion by a member of the opposition, supported by all members, the impact of the bill, insofar as representation of the growing provinces was concerned, was modified considerably. The reduction was reduced to about half of what it otherwise would have been.

I have an interesting statistic—

Senator Stewart: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Roblin: I should like to wait until the end of my remarks to deal with any questions, if you do not mind.

An interesting fact given to me is that under the current amalgam formula the province of Quebec, for example—which is one that has a particular stake in these matters—would have dropped to 23.5 per cent of the seats in the House of Commons. But under the new bill before us now, by the year 2000—15 years from now—that representation would be maintained at 25.2 per cent. So, I think it is important to know that the province of Quebec is affected in this way because in the original Confederation debates, and in the subsequent debates on representation throughout the years, the position of Quebec has always been a matter of paramount importance. So, I think it is interesting to know that that is the case.

I should also like to point out that the suggestion which was made—I think quite incorrectly—that there was a gerrymandering aspect to this piece of legislation is, in my view, quite without foundation. The commission which is in charge of the whole operation of redistribution is not a government commission. It is not appointed by the government; it is not controlled by the government. The commission is appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons. The Speaker is the man who has the job of formulating the commission in the first place, and the chief justice of each province of Canada is responsible for naming other members to the various subcommittees established under this commission. So, it has been designed to be a non-partisan operation. The commission is appointed by the Speaker of the House of Commons in the first place; the local committees that deal with provincial redistribution are appointed by the chief justices of the provinces concerned. So, I think we can have reasonable confidence—indeed, full confidence—that there is no element of gerrymandering in this proposition. I think it is unfortunate that that concept has been introduced into the matter.

The aim of the bill, of course, is to limit the rate of growth in the number of members of the House of Commons. The House of Commons has experienced a rate of growth in its membership which has been reasonably substantial, and if the present system were left unadjusted, the growth would be very high over the next few years to the end of the century.

I am searching for my statistic on that matter. I think it would have been 87 new members in the House of Commons if we did nothing by the year 2000. Indeed, it would be 28 new members in 1985, when the next redistribution is scheduled, instead of the 13 provided for in the bill. So, it is cut in half.

I am one who is sensitive to the argument of representation by population. I regard it as being the sound, overriding principle in these matters, but I think we have all recognized that perfection in this field has never been achieved.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I apologize for interrupting the speech of the Leader of the Government, but I do not interrupt to ask a question.

It is now 4.30 p.m. I know that the other place is dealing with Bill C-79 by a House order. Would it be a good idea for us to decide unanimously that we sit through this evening past 6 o'clock? I mention that because in similar situations we have arranged for sandwiches and coffee to be available so that senators can continue. If we want to do that this time we had better make arrangements now. I apologize for interrupting the leader during his speech.

Senator Roblin: I quite understand. I am happy to say that my colleague, Senator Doody, anticipated this event. Sandwiches and coffee will be provided for senators, and we will proceed through the supper hour. I know there are a couple of senators who have something to say regarding Bill C-79, and I am certainly one who is willing to hear them. So, if we have unanimous consent of the house, we will sit through.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: I could deal at length with the merits of the bill, but the concept is very simple; that is, to slow down the rate of growth of the number of members in the House of Commons in a reasonably equitable manner which will not disturb in any basic way the principle of representation by population, although it will not achieve perfect representation by population, as has been the experience with any bills in the past.

I remember in my own province, for example—and a province is not a federal state—we went by the principle of “rep by pop,” but we understood that for constituencies of an enormous size in the north, it would be impractical to have “rep by pop” as the sole criterion by which we would decide the boundaries of constituencies. We always understood that other factors, such as size and affinity of the people concerned in the areas, were matters that were reasonable and taken into consideration. I am not sure how far the current federal law goes in that direction, but we recognize that “rep by pop” is an ideal which we are probably not going to be able to achieve.

The position of the government is that these changes are crafted in such a way as to respect the position of the smaller provinces, to give them an undertaking that they will not have their representation reduced as might otherwise be the case with the population moving around the way it is and should. While we frankly admit that the growing provinces do not get the full measure of new representation that they otherwise would, we think the trade-off is not unreasonable and is one that should commend itself to the house.

I have been conducting a lot of negotiations recently on this bill as to when it should come into force; in other words, as to when the Senate is going to deal with it. I cannot promise anybody that the Senate is going to pass it, but I know that it is going to deal with it sooner or later. The argument has been ongoing with respect to how we should best handle this bill. I am aware that there are a number of honourable senators who think it should be referred to committee. If I take seriously every suggestion made in that respect, the committee may go on for a long time because the class of people who will be invited to testify might be quite numerous. Under normal circumstances one could hardly take much objection to that, as we are accustomed to that in the Senate. I think there is a good reason why we should be as discreet, as prompt and as dedicated as we can in getting this matter cleaned up and to decide what we are going to do about it.

The reason I say that is that there is a timetable attached to everything that goes on in this bill. To put it in a nutshell, the timetable is that from the day the bill is passed it will take two and a half years to put it into effect. That means if it is passed on January 21 of the coming year—

Senator Frith: Picking a date at random!

Senator Roblin: I am picking that date with malice aforethought because that is the date I would like to see it passed. If we pass it on January 21, because we are not willing to deal with it more expeditiously than that, it is going to take us into August or September of 1988 before this bill comes into effect. The significance of that is that if we were to have a general election before that time we would be working on the old act. That means that the government would be into its fourth year, in all probability, without the possibility of going to the people again under the new arrangements and, particularly, on the new census. If we do not deal with the bill soon and we have an election under the old rules, people will be voting on the census of 1971. That is a long time ago in terms of a census and the movement of population in the country, as it is getting close to 15 or 20 years. We have to pass this bill in order to base our representation on the census of 1981. That is why I hope we will move on it expeditiously.

I have received a communication from the Chief Electoral Officer, Mr. Hamel, in which he sets out for me the timetable that comprises this two and a half years. I should like to refer to it briefly. The first stage is the appointment of the commission by the Speaker. He is given 60 days to do it. The government or anybody else has little influence on the Speaker, so we assume that he is going to take his 60 days in which to put this commission together, and within that time his colleagues in the provinces, the chief justices, have to do their part as well, so that is the period with respect to that. Another 12 months goes by while these commissions are holding their hearings across the country to find out what the people think about the boundaries that are being advertised. They are going to be having hearings across the nation, and in that 12-month period they have their hearings and then they report back to Parliament. Parliament has a two-month period in which it considers what the commission has told it. So we find ourselves looking at 16 months. Parliament itself has to send the report of the commission to the Privileges and Elections committee of Parliament for which there is another two months allowed, and when all those people have expressed their views on that it comes back to Parliament and it is probably going to be debated. Nobody knows how long that will take, in order for it to become part of the law of the land. I hesitate to put any time limit on that but a month would not be surprising. In addition, if it is referred back to us, then we have our problems here as well.

After all that is done the law cannot come into force for another 12 months. That is what is laid down in the regulations, so we have a 12-month waiting period in order that the electorate can familiarize itself with the changes and, of course, all that is involved in setting up polling divisions and electoral matters of that sort, which may or may not be started before an election.

Without trying to stretch it too far, I am told by the Chief Electoral Officer that he thinks it would be a minimum of two-and-a-half years and perhaps longer, depending on other aspects. If the process proceeds on schedule it would be two-and-a-half years, but there are plenty of places in between, particularly with respect to parliamentary activities, where that might take longer. We are really looking at a situation where after a government is four years old, or perhaps as high as four and a half years into its mandate, it cannot call an election on the 1981 figures but has to work on the 1971 figures and that, of course, is a problem.

I am not going to place any blame on anybody for the time element involved in this. After all, the House of Commons had it for six months or so and I have recited to you its progress through that body. I am not one who would wish to ask honourable senators to do anything they are not willing to do in terms of dealing expeditiously with the bill in this house, despite the fact that some people who are not senators have some reservations as to exactly why we should be taking any time with it at all. I do not belong to that school of thought, so I am not going to offer that as a consideration for this chamber.

Just looking at the question of the time element, it becomes important for us to deal with it expeditiously. If it is referred to committee, I would like to see that committee hold its hearings before we meet again and, if it is necessary to provide authority to allow that to be done, I would certainly be very pleased to support it. To have the committee meet on this subject the week before we reconvene on January 21 gives us an opportunity in the first week after we return to deal with it in an appropriate way. That is my plea. Time is important and this chamber must discharge its duty but, on the other hand, it should be prudent in not stretching the time any further than it has to because, otherwise, it is going to expose us to the risk of fighting the next election on the 1971 census rather than on the 1981 census, and I am sure that nobody here really wants to do that.

My request to the house is that if it is determined—and from what I hear on the other side it is—that it must go to committee, the committee should meet as early as possible and the house should deal with this matter at the earliest date possible after we reconvene. I am conscious of the fact that the government's position in this chamber is a minority one. I am conscious of the fact that I am not even in a position to summon the house back on January 13 or 14, if honourable senators on the other side will not agree to come back, because they can vote me down any time of the day. My impression is that that would happen. I am tempted to suggest that we come back at the same time as the House of Commons, a week early, and get on with this job and give ourselves the time to do it in a way that is proper. I guess it would be a mistake for me to chance my luck on that because I sense that I do not have majority support. It would be unfortunate for me, at any rate, if that support were not forthcoming. If I am wrong on that and there is support on the other side to come back a week early, I would be happy to accommodate myself to that suggestion.

On the assumption that the government in the Senate is in the minority and on the assumption that it is not the will of this house to return before January 21, which is the usual time that we return, I would have to recognize that and I want to make an earnest plea to all members of the house to treat this matter with a sense of urgency and to make a decision with respect to this bill as soon as they can after we reconvene.

● (1540)

Honourable senators, I am advocating that you support it, but I recognize the right of the Senate to exercise its judgment. What I am really concerned about is finding out where the decision lies one way or another. I hope we may have this bill through the committee and back here at the earliest possible moment so that we can let the House of Commons know where they stand on this. Then, we will give the Chief Electoral Officer a signal to go ahead. Even with a signal on January 1, we are looking at two and a half years plus.

Senator Frith: January 30.

Senator Roblin: I said January 1. Even if it is passed on January 1, which is unlikely, we are looking at two and a half years plus before this can become part of the law of the land. If one considers the matter in that light, the reason for expeditious treatment in the Senate is clear. I solicit your co-operation.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the honourable senator now permit a question?

Senator Roblin: Yes, certainly.

Senator Stewart: My question relates to the substance of the argument and not to the matter which has just been discussed.

Did I understand the honourable senator to say that the government agreed to an amendment which reduced the number by which the representation of the electorate in the growing provinces would be increased? I think that is what I heard him say. Yet, my understanding, as I look at the records of the other place, is that the original bill would have effected an increase to 289, whereas, according to Senator Flynn's table, it effects an increase to 295; in other words, just the opposite of what I think I heard the honourable senator say. Since this is a matter of great importance, I should like to be sure that I heard the honourable senator correctly.

Senator Roblin: I will give the information I have before me which is that as a result of the amendment the number of seats allotted to the growing provinces was increased from what had previously been suggested.

When we are in committee, we can certainly check my figures.

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I heard the request of the Leader of the Government with respect to the committee's consideration of Bill C-74. The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was charged with a pre-study of this bill, which it did not carry out because of the pressure of other bills coming to the committee. However, I assume the bill will again be referred to that committee.

The committee is certainly prepared to commence the study on January 21, assuming that is the day the Senate resumes. However, the Senate may wish to give the committee permission to sit during the previous week if the Senate has not resumed by that time.

I will consult with members of the committee, most of whom may not be present at the moment, to determine whom the committee may wish to hear from as witnesses and what needs to be done. I will do my best to accommodate the wishes of both sides of the house in dealing with this bill.

Senator Roblin: I should like to thank my honourable friend for a most generous offer.

I would be prepared to cause to be moved a resolution giving the committee permission to sit during the adjournment and leave it to the committee to decide what to do about it.

If I can get the attention of the Clerk of the Senate, I would ask that a resolution be prepared giving the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs permission to sit during the adjournment. I will then leave it to the chairman of that committee to proceed from there.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should just like to add a couple of points.

Senator Roblin: The Clerk has very kindly furnished me with a rule which says that, for the duration of the present session, any select committee may meet during the adjournment of the session. Therefore, my suggestion is unnecessary. The committee chairman is in charge.

Senator Frith: I was going to mention that that was my recollection.

It seems to me that that approach solves the question of whether or not the entire Senate should return earlier than it is accustomed to in order to achieve an objective related to the work of one committee. It seems to me that point has been settled.

The only other thing I want to add is that I agree with the context in which Senator Roblin has put this bill, its debate on second reading and its progress through the house. It is clear from the observations of Senator Flynn, the sponsor of the bill, from those of the two speakers who followed him, Senators Stewart and Corbin, and from the comments made by Senator Roblin, that there is a dimension to this bill, in particular the question of regional and provincial representation, which lies within the mandate of and, in fact, forms part of the responsibility and duty of the Senate.

For that reason, the bill should be treated carefully. For the reasons put forward by Senator Roblin, the Senate can take its time in carrying out its duties with regard to the bill and still define its time within the context of the urgency that Senator Roblin underlined.

I want it to be clear that the position we are taking and that Senator Flynn took that it should receive committee study is not to lead to the inference that there is any intention to delay or not to deal with the bill precisely within the framework in which Senator Roblin placed it.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Of course, I am not a member of the committee, but, as I have indicated in the course of my remarks, I would want to be present to put questions to any witnesses who may be called. Can the chairman of the committee commit herself, the clerk, or whoever, to have the witnesses that we would want to question appear in front of the committee at that time? In other words, will the chairman accept suggestions from myself, although I am not a member of the committee, as to the types of witness we would like to hear beyond Mr. Hamel, for example? Senator Stewart suggested that an invitation should be extended to, not necessarily the premiers, but someone in the eastern provinces who knows something about this whole matter, because the questions that we wish to follow up on, I believe, are of some concern to someone like that.

Therefore, I presume that when the chairman convenes the committee, she will do two things; take into consideration our suggestions in terms of certain witnesses; and that they will have been notified ahead of time so that they can be there the minute, the day and the hour that the committee is ready to proceed.

Senator Neiman: Perhaps Senator Corbin misunderstood part of my earlier remarks. I did say that I would first have to consult with the committee members to be sure that they would be able to be present during the week of January 13. That has still to be established. Of course, there would be no point in having a committee meeting if we did not have witnesses who we felt would be helpful to the committee's consideration of the bill. We normally get in touch with all of the provincial counterparts or with whoever would be interested in the provincial jurisdictions on any bill we are considering. In that respect, it might be better if we were to allow ourselves the extra week so as to be sure that those people would have a chance to receive and consider our communication over the holiday season. Of course, we also accept suggestions. Normally, our steering committee would be happy to receive any recommendations from our colleagues, whether or not they are members of the committee, as to whom it might be appropriate to hear.

• (1550)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I am pleased that we have come to an amicable arrangement as to the disposition of this bill. I must say that when I listened to Senator Flynn introducing the bill, I did not feel any sense of urgency in the comments he made. It seemed that the bill would simply follow the normal course. Therefore, I was quite surprised yesterday when I heard the government leader in the Senate say that he wished to have the bill referred to committee this morning and dealt with immediately. That sense of urgency did not, by any means, come through to me in the statements of the sponsor of the bill. Far be it from me to suggest that there was a difference of opinion on the other side of the chamber, but, in my view, no sense of urgency was evident.

I rise to speak on one point that was raised by the Honourable Senator Roblin. It is not for me to protect my colleagues in the other place—they can do that quite adequately on their own—but a statement was made in this place with regard to the participation of Liberal members in the work of the House committee. It is my understanding that in the early work of the committee in June of this year an agreement had been reached involving all members to the effect that there would be an increase from 282 to 289. The agreement was that there would be an additional seven seats. Subsequent to that, at a meeting in November when the Liberal member was not present—he was in western Canada attending some agricultural hearings and did not attend that meeting—it was changed from an increase of seven members to an increase of 13 members. That is how we arrived at the 295 figure. It is my understanding that the Liberal Party was represented at all meetings but that one and that it is certainly not a case of being uninterested in the bill. On the contrary, there is a great deal of interest. It so happened that there was no one representing the Liberal Party at that one meeting.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if nobody else wishes to speak, I move second reading of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS DEPOSITORS COMPENSATION

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-79

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Thirteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (subject-matter of Bill

C-79), tabled in the Senate on 19th December, 1985.—
(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon, during the debate on this report, Senator Flynn—and I regret that he is not here this afternoon because my speeches are always more interesting when he is. He constantly interjects—

Senator Doody: Would you like me to interrupt? Anything to make you comfortable.

Senator Olson: I am not sure that, as well as you have demonstrated you can do that, you are yet a match for Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn moved the adjournment of the debate to “later this day” so that other matters could be dealt with. Later that day we never got back to it. As a matter of fact, I have been sitting here with an undigested speech during most of today. The only reason I raise that point is so that honourable senators opposite—particularly the Deputy Leader of the Government—will understand in future that if I am a little reluctant to give consent to the sort of action that was taken yesterday, it will be because I remember what has happened to me on this occasion.

Senator Doody: Particularly having been here all night.

Senator Olson: Yes, right. Honourable senators, it is particularly important that we take some time to debate the report of the committee respecting the subject matter of Bill C-79. That report contains some conclusions and recommendations and, from time to time, some fairly soft language so that we could get the report back to the Senate with the meaning of those words intact. For example, there are several areas in which the report gingerly and softly indicates that senators were divided on particular issues. Therefore, in my view it is extremely important that members of the committee and others make it clear that we held some pretty strong opinions, whichever side of the fence we found ourselves on.

On the front page of one of Canada's leading newspapers, the Globe and Mail, the reporter states:

Left unscathed, however, were both Finance Minister Michael Wilson and Minister of State for Finance Barbara McDougall, mainly because committee members were divided on the roles they played in the failures.

That will do for the wording in the report, as far as I am concerned, because that is true. There were, obviously, some members of the Conservative Party who were not prepared to be as critical of the two ministers as were some of the other committee members. I have to say this, too: I do not think that the division of opinion with respect to that went strictly along party lines. I think many members were equally disturbed about what happened, how it happened, and, if I may add, what we are going to do about correcting the situation so that it does not happen again.

Honourable senators, I think that the committee report reasonably and accurately—I have no criticism of the accuracy because I supported it then, as I do now—summarizes the evidence and gives a chronological outline of what happened up to the failure, the declaration of the insolvency and the liquidation of both banks. I say the same with respect to the conclusions that were based on that summary of the evidence. But what disturbs me is that during the discussions and the cross-examination of the minister directly responsible—namely, the Minister of State (Finance)—who was appointed by the government to be responsible for this aspect of the government's involvement, and also some of the senior officials, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada, Mr. Bouey, and the Inspector General of Banks, Mr. Kennett, regarded the situation almost with indifference. To begin with, when we were cross-examining these witnesses, the buck-passing that went on was almost unbelievable. I believe that the Governor of the Bank of Canada was questioned by the committee before the Inspector General of Banks, and when he was asked about the basis on which he was advancing hundreds of millions of dollars to the CCB and the Northland Bank, and what his view was of the value of the assets against which he was making those enormous advances, he simply said, “I don't make assessments. I don't do audits.”

● (1600)

Are we to believe that the Governor of the Bank of Canada does not know the value of the assets against which he is making such huge advances? At one point in the report there is a figure of $1.8 billion, made up of $1.316 billion to the CCB and over $500 million to the Northland Bank. I was surprised. So far as I am concerned, the statement was incredible. I guess I have to be careful how I say this. To put it in plain, simple language, I simply do not believe that someone in a position as senior as the Governor of the Bank of Canada does not have any idea of the value of the assets. Yet that is what he told us, not once but several times.

We asked him: “On what basis do you advance this kind of money?” He replied, “Oh, on the Inspector General of Banks.” I want to be clear on this. He said, “As long as the Inspector General of Banks says that the bank is solvent, I advance the money.” As a matter of fact, he did. He made advances right up to the last day or so of August. I think that within three or four days of the CCB being declared insolvent, he was still advancing money. That, to me, is something that has to be corrected. I do not believe it is quite that simple, and the Inspector General of Banks has since said that all of the evidence on which one determines the value of the assets of the banks were available equally to the Governor of the Bank of Canada and to the Inspector General, and “therefore he doesn't have to take my advice. He can just as easily”—this is what he said to the Estey Commission—“make his own assessment of the value of those assets just as well as I.”

I do not wish to take too long on this, because no doubt we will be in formal possession of the actual bill before long; but there are a number of things that, in my view, have to be said. I should point out that I know that it is not quite fair, in most cases, to use 20-20 hindsight in assessing the situation against those who were responsible but who could not fully see what was happening. Let us be clear about this. No senator had the advantage of foresight in the situation. We were not aware of the facts at the time and it was not our responsibility to predict, to forecast, or whatever, the action that would be most appropriate under the circumstances. Let there be no misunderstanding. We were charged with the responsibility of looking at the facts in retrospect and coming forward with an assessment and then some recommendations. Therefore I make no apology that all we had was hindsight. We were not in a position to predict, without knowledge of the facts, what administrative action might be taken.

Honourable senators, I am disappointed—that is the softest word that I can use—that no action has been taken by the government. No minister has resigned. The senior people who were involved in reaching the decision are still in office. Senator Kirby pointed that out yesterday. Frankly, I consider that an appalling situation, because, when in retrospect we look at the evolution of the circumstances leading up to the action that was taken, it is pretty obvious that some very serious mistakes occurred—and, indeed, some omissions—in complying with its responsibility on the part of this administration.

Quite frankly, I do not believe that that is good enough. The government will try to excuse itself by taking the position that since it has appointed the Estey Commission, we should await its report. They are coming to Parliament and are asking for money. The proposed bill will cost something between $800 million and $900 million. That probably is not the whole amount, because there is also the problem of the great deficit in the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation. Perhaps over time that will be recouped through changing the premiums. But there is also the matter of the $1.8 billion that the Bank of Canada has extended over and above the $800 million or $900 million that will be paid to the uninsured depositors. We may get some of it back. I would expect that some of it has come back now since the liquidation was announced in September. But we do not know that we are going to get it all back, and no matter how persistently we tried to examine the Governor of the Bank of Canada or the Inspector General of Banks—or, indeed, several other people who had some knowledge—we still could not get them to give us a more precise or accurate assessment of what the assets were worth. Some reports say that some of them should be discounted as much as 50 per cent. I am referring to the loans that the CCB had made. We have heard other reports that said that a whole lot of them should be discounted down to 30 cents on the dollar, and so on. Those are the assets against which the Bank of Canada has put up almost—I was going to say almost 85 per cent, because the bank had almost $2.3 billion in assets and the Bank of Canada advanced $1.8 billion. But I realize that that is for both banks; so I am not sure what the percentage is, but it is important to understand that there are three expenditures involved in the action. One is the pay-out that the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation will make. I am not sure how much it will be because it is not part of the bill. There is already legislation that requires that depositors with deposits up to $60,000 be paid. Bill C-79 provides for the uninsured depositors. On top of this legislation, there are the advances made by the Bank of Canada. The Governor of the Bank of Canada says that we will get all that money back because the bank is higher on the priority list than any of the other creditors. However, because so much money was paid out, we do not know for certain that we will get all of it back.

The other point I think is extremely important is that if the government allows both ministers, particularly the minister charged with the responsibility for this legislation, to remain in office, it will mean that the principle of ministerial responsibility for their actions and what they are required to do has gone out the window. The government kept making the statement, "We acted on the best information that was available at the time." They probably chose the most expensive option available; that is, to pay out money to the uninsured depositors and to pay the mortgage corporation that was a subsidiary of the CCB. In doing so, it changed all the assessments from a "going concern," assessment basis, to a liquidation basis, which lowered the value of the assets of the bank substantially. If the minister can get away with that, it means an end to ministerial responsibility.

I believe that ministers must be held responsible for their actions. They made the decision. Ministers are also responsible for the bureaucrats in their department, particularly the ones who report to them. Frankly, I do not believe that these bureaucrats have the right to present to Canadian taxpayers a bill for more than $1 billion to simply walk away and continue to perform their services in the same position they held before this incident. I want it to be clear that this action changes the concept of ministerial responsibility very dramatically and substantially from what I understood it to be.

So far the action taken by the government to deal with this matter is not, in my view, in keeping with the traditions of responsible government, and it is far from satisfactory. A few minutes ago, I was listening to the debate in the House of Commons. They were talking about the last bank failure, the Home Bank in 1922 or 1923. At that time, it was considered to be a terrible situation. The federal government was being asked to pay out slightly over $5 million to clear up the deposits made in that bank. Today, we are talking about $1 billion in this failure. Some people say that it is only one per cent of the assets within the banking institutions and that, therefore, they try to treat it as though it is not terribly important. One billion dollars is 20 times as much as the government could find to deal with the drought situation affecting the livestock producers in Western Canada. Some might say, "What's a billion?" One billion dollars is an enormous amount of money, even though it may only be one per cent of the bank's assets. It is approximately the amount of money that the government that I was part of had to struggle with for two years until we could find the money we needed to assign to programs of high priority. One billion dollars is an enormous amount of money. I have not detected that the senior people involved in this fiasco have treated it with the seriousness that it deserves.

I have one or two other points that I would like to make. The first point is that I am disturbed by this matter of confidentiality. There are many views on this question of confidentiality between a banker and a depositor. I realize and respect the fact that there is a section to this effect in the Bank Act. However, what we are dealing with in Bill C-79 is not part of the Bank Act. If it were, there would be no need for this bill. We have Bill C-79 before us because there is no statute and, therefore, no legal authority whereby the government can repay depositors anything in excess of $60,000. There is no question at all that the Bank Act does not apply in this case. The government is asking Parliament to provide money to pay off all the depositors, even those who have deposits in excess of what the Bank Act and the other pertinent acts provide for.

In my view it is not a matter of confidentiality. No one will publish the names of people who are in the $60,000 category and who are insured. What this bill calls for is payment to those in excess of that amount. I cannot follow the reasoning that this Parliament does not have the right to know to whom the money will be paid. As a matter of fact, I am sure that there will be many opinions written about what the government is doing. What it is doing is illegal. It is trying to circumvent the provisions of the Financial Administration Act, which says that those to whom the government pays money must be identified. I am told that the money will be paid to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and that it, in turn, will pay it to the individual depositors who are listed by category. There are some very large amounts involved. The report alludes to this question of confidentiality at the top of page 38. It reads: "The injunction against disclosure however is less clear in the case of insolvency." Earlier the report says that the Bank Act prohibits disclosure, and I am not arguing that point. The report goes on to say:

Insolvency proceedings fall under the Winding-up Act which is silent on the principle of confidentiality. In fact, claimants under the Winding-up Act must publicly identify themselves in making their claim . . .

Some senators, including Senator Kirby, have said that there are two principles involved. One refers to the precedents and the substance of the Financial Administration Act. The tradition is that whenever a payment is made by the government to anybody, the Parliament of Canada has a right to know. In fact, there is an obligation upon Parliament to identify who gets money out of the public treasury, despite what is contained in the Bank Act. What I am arguing, honourable senators, is that in this situation the Bank Act does not apply.

● (1620)

I want to repeat that Bill C-79 is before us because there is no authority to make those payments until Bill C-79 passes. I say to you, honourable senators, that the government is circumventing the requirements by paying the amount in one lump sum to the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and then, somehow, keeping silent regarding the identity of those to whom they issue the cheques so that we can never know to whom this money is being paid. That method is fraught with danger. If these people want to be paid in this unusual and extraordinary situation, we should at least know to whom the cheques are made out.

The report said:

The committee members are divided on this issue.

I would like honourable senators to know just where I stand on that. Other members of the committee had different opinions. But if these people are not willing to make a public claim so that when we make payments out of the public treasury, we know to whom these payments are made, then it opens the door for the government to act in this way with respect to other matters where payments are made to unidentified recipients. As far as I am concerned, honourable senators, a wrong and very dangerous precedent is being set here.

There are one or two other things I would like to say about this bill. I would draw your attention to the recommendations on page 44 with respect to the reform of the bank auditing standards. At the bottom of page 44, the report states:

We wish to encourage CICA to consider, in collaboration with the Office of the Inspector General of Banks and the Canadian Bankers' Association, the development of "current value" audit standards to supplement existing audits which value assets and liabilities on a "going concern" basis.

Honourable senators, I would like to point out that the trouble occurred with at least one of these banks, if not both, when they changed from a "going concern" assessment to a liquidation assessment. At that time, the capital of the bank disappeared; the equity in the bank disappeared. In other words, they had to take write-downs right at that stage, which of course justified the liquidation. The question that we must ask ourselves about that situation is: Who decided to change the basis from "going concern" to liquidation, and why?

The evidence that we were able to adduce from the various witnesses at our hearings did not indicate who made that decision. I know that there was an attempt to pin it on the Inspector General from time to time. It was he who decided on the last day of August, I suppose, that the CCB was no longer solvent. I suppose it was also he who made some decisions with respect to the Northland Bank by the end of that month when that bank was also declared insolvent. However, we never did find out who made the decision changing the method of calculation.

Some people would say that perhaps that is not important; if you are insolvent, you are insolvent. But that, honourable senators, is just not true. The fact is that you are insolvent if your liabilities exceed your assets, and the equity in the bank has disappeared. That is when the insolvency takes over. Usually the assets are worth as many as 15 to 25 times the equity that is supposed to be there. However, honourable senators, we did not have those answers at the time.

In my opinion, honourable senators, the government has not acted appropriately in this situation. Perhaps they are awaiting the Estey Commission report before they take further action. Therefore I conclude by saying most emphatically that the action that as been taken so far is inadequate in relation to the cost to the taxpayers of this country. It is inappropriate for the treasury to be called upon to pay out $1.2 billion without any significant changes in the system being made to ensure that this situation will not happen again. That, to me, is a situation that should not be tolerated.

In a few moments, I suppose, we will have Bill C-79 which will enable this large amount of money to be paid out of the public treasury. The government has made that commitment and I suppose it is their right so to do, but there has been no indication, as far as I am concerned, that there is any repentance yet. As far as I am concerned, they need to clean up their act, come clean, say that they have made a mistake, and tell us what they intend to do to correct it so that it does not happen again.

There has apparently been some commitment that the government intended to increase the staff and the capability of the Inspector General in order that he can do audits. I am not sure that that is satisfactory unless there is a change in attitude and in some other things. We must remember that this situation went on for weeks and it seems, in retrospect, that it was obvious enough that there was great difficulty. While that was happening, honourable senators, we were unaware of the fact that the government would present a bill to the taxpayers for $1.2 billion to pay off everybody who was involved. I think it is important for us to know what the government's attitude with respect to these kinds of things will be in the future.

Honourable senators, these are the comments that I think had to be made about this committee report. It seems to me that all of the members of the committee do not hold the government responsible for this action. I simply want honourable senators to know that there are a number of senators who do, in fact, hold the government responsible for bumbling and fumbling and, consequently, costing the taxpayers of this country a great deal of money.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words to give a somewhat different perspective to the debate which, until now, has put the entire responsibility of the decision to try to save the Canadian Commercial Bank and the Northland Bank on the Government.

The senators who have spoken until now have all attempted to throw on the Government all the blame and all the responsibility for the actions of the Inspector General, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the banks involved in the bail-out. I believe that this is not entirely justified.

It would be more accurate to do what the report does and place these events in the context of the economic conditions which existed at the time, not only in March, but also in previous months and years.

As the minister said, the economic climate was quite unusual. Of course, this does not remove any responsibility for the action taken. If we want to have a more accurate picture of the situation, we have to point out that we were going through an economic crisis such as Canada had not seen for a long time.

[Senator Olson.]

We witnessed the creation of regional banks in 1975 and 1976. The very nature of these banks causes difficulties as their deposits and loans are often concentrated in one region. As for the western banks, they are more vulnerable to a changing economic situation.

Very briefly, it is easy to recognize that the management of these banks had certain problems. The Inspector General had some himself. However, I can forgive him many things. We found out during the committee sittings that he did not always have the resources and expertise required to do his job.

I would have liked some of the Liberal senators to take some of the responsibility for what happened because some of them served either as ministers or as advisers under the previous government. These people could have been more supportive when faced with the repeated requests of the Inspector General for additional funds to obtain the resources he needed to do his job. We have not heard a lot about this aspect.

It is fortunate that the experience acquired by the present government and other Canadians has shown the urgent need to provide more resources for the Inspector General and that this will in fact be done. This is perhaps one beneficial result of a very difficult and costly situation.

I also believe that the banks which took part in the bail-out may bear more responsibility than anyone else for the disaster, and it is indeed a disaster as it involves an amount of $1 billion. This shows a certain weakness on the part of the banking system. This weakness may at some point have cast some doubt on the solidity of the Canadian banking system. Only the banks had the necessary expertise to see what was coming. Last March, these people could have said: "What we need is no longer $255 million or $300 million, but $500 million." They could have done that. Today the fact that they have not been repaid leaves me rather cold. I think they must accept a major share of responsibility for that fateful March decision.

Personally I think that other things can be found in the recommendations. Mention is made of improving monitoring or government agencies, like the Governor of the Bank, for example, Mr. Bouey, who blindly followed the advice of the Inspector General of Banks.

In this case I think that an agency like the Bank of Canada should try to check the value of the guarantee, and I would suggest that it is not fair or satisfactory. In the future I hope they will be able to prevent a recurrence of that incident. I hope the mandate of the Governor of the Bank will be reviewed and perhaps enlarged so he will have the authority and responsibility to make sure that the guarantee he accepts when lending money to a bank is worth something, just so the institution can get out of trouble and look forward to the future.

We have heard, as I said earlier, that some people would like to blame the current government for the breakdown in the system. They referred to some weaknesses in the system. I think, by and large, the system was strong, but not quite up to par to survive and not strong enough to withstand a breakdown in places where the economy was in difficulty, and so forth. We have heard people placing all the responsibility on the current government, and I do not think that is quite fair. A decision was made. The report says that there were signs in the last weeks and months. I say there were signs over the past several years that we were heading toward a disaster or into a very difficult situation. There were signs, but what did the previous government do having passed legislation to allow these regional banks to operate? Well, not very much.

I was amazed about half an hour ago to hear the current Leader of the Opposition in the other place use a figure of $3 billion as the total loss to the Canadian taxpayers. Well, what did he do when he was the Minister of Finance? What did his party do to prevent this from happening?

I thought Senator Olson was fair in keeping the figure around a billion dollars, but the other fellow used $3 billion and tried to tell us how much that means for every student in Canada, what it means to every welfare recipient, and every family. He used the figure of $20,000 for each Canadian. Well, I do not think those arguments and that smokescreen will restore the confidence of Canadians and people all over the world in the Canadian banking system. I invite the Leader of the Opposition to be more careful and to check his figures and ask that he be humble enough to accept his share of the responsibility.

Senator Frith: For what? For the failure of this bank?

Senator Simard: For having failed to protect the Canadian banking system and for having failed to give the Inspector General of Banks more resources when he asked for more. He has a responsibility, as does his party.

Senator Frith: We should see what R.B. Bennett had to do with this or John A. Macdonald, or, for that matter, Finlay MacDonald.

Senator Simard: The legislation which created these banks was passed in 1976 when Mr. Turner and his friends were still in the government. He certainly takes pride in referring to some of the good things he was part of, or his political family was part of, so he should assume part of the responsibility. A decision had to be made and there were not that many options. Either this bank or the two banks would be allowed to fail in March. It has been said that the bank was, obviously, insolvent or bankrupt. That was not what the experts or the agencies told us. The minister said that she based her decision on the best information available at the time, and I take her word for it. I realize that the report and other speakers before me keep referring to the fact that the banks were doomed, and I agree that they were, but it was not evident then. The system broke down and the question was then: What do we do about it?

The report makes some recommendations as to how to prevent another breakdown. It was a very expensive breakdown and I am not happy to be part of a decision that will cost Canadians close to $1 billion for uninsured depositors, but we will have to do it. That is part of protecting the integrity of the system. I am pleased to see recommendations that suggest measures to improve the CDIC. I was also glad to hear that the CICA, of which I am a member, has seen fit to review their auditing process. I will certainly be ensuring that they follow that course. Our profession was under attack and many things were said that were not warranted or fair. I realize that they do have to assume some of the responsibility and I am prepared to admit it, but I am not prepared to allow the sole responsibility to be placed on the present government, because these other people and agencies should share that blame.

Another point that honourable senators opposite keep referring to is this business of confidentiality. They want to know who will get that money. Is it that important? I know the Financial Administration Act requires it and it is a good principle, but an equally good and sound principle that needs to be protected as well is that the names of depositors, no matter what size they are, remain confidential. That is a big part of the nature of the banking system. I hear that there is one individual who has a million dollars. I say: Who cares whether he is a Liberal or a Conservative or from the maritimes or the west? What is more important is that the principle of confidentiality be maintained, and this legislation will ensure that.

Senator Kirby referred to the problem of paying foreign banks and I do not agree with him on that point. If this bill should discriminate against foreign banks, where would that leave the Canadian banking system? It does not make sense to protect Canadians and not the offshore and other people and companies resident in foreign countries. He says that the people who helped with the bail-out are going to be left in the cold while we are paying foreign banks. I have dealt with people who have put the package together, and I put the blame on the banks and squarely on them. I think they have to assume responsibility and they should not be part of the repayment by the CDIC. I have no problem with foreign banks being paid. I would like to see a Canadian institution get the same treatment in other countries as native institutions would get in a similar case.

In closing, following this unfortunate experience I hope that the mandate of the Governor of the Bank of Canada will be reviewed and improved as well as that of the Inspector General of Banks and, of course, that the CICA will perform a better job, because that is what is lacking. Let us hope that this experience will not only maintain but improve the integrity, the good reputation and the soundness that our banking systems have had over the years.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Before Senator Argue proceeds, I should like to interrupt the proceedings.

Debate interrupted.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS DEPOSITORS COMPENSATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-79, respecting the provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): With leave, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps for the sake of the record we should, with unanimous consent, dispose of the order that we were dealing with when His Honour read to us the message from the House of Commons. Since the order we were dealing with is consideration of the report on Bill C-79, shall we consider the debate on the report as having been completed and then move to second reading of the bill itself?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

SECOND READING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved second reading of the bill.

He said: Honourable senators, the intention of the government was to request the Honourable Senator Murray, who is chairman of the committee and well informed on this bill, to handle it in the chamber. Unfortunately, he is not well today, but we have a very competent substitute in Senator Kelly who is a designated hitter—and, believe me, he can hit!

Senator Doody: And he doesn't fade in the World Series!

● (1650)

Senator Roblin: I am going to suggest that some other senator, perhaps Senator Kelly, will lead off, if Senator Argue permits, from the government's point of view, to explain the bill. Then we can proceed with a regular second reading and see how we get along.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I was afraid for a moment that I would lose my opportunity to present this rather lengthy speech. I hope you will all settle back.

Senator Roblin: You have been warned!

Senator Kelly: I rise today to speak to Bill C-79, respecting the Financial Institutions Depositors Compensation, which, when passed, will authorize the government, through the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, CDIC, to compensate uninsured depositors of the Northland Bank, the Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB, and, in the event of its wind-up, the associate of the CCB, the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation.

Honourable senators, I do not intend, except by very slight reference, to get into all of the details which led up to this particular bill. I intend to deal, in a reasonable amount of detail, with the bill itself.

In spite of the complicated wording of some parts, this bill is quite straightforward: It seeks parliamentary approval for an appropriation from the Consolidated Revenue Fund of $875 million which the government, through its agent, the CDIC, will use to repay the uninsured depositors in the Northland, the CCB and the CCB-MIC.

As we all know, the CDIC now insures depositors in Canadian banks up to $60,000 per individual per bank. There was a total of $275 million in insured deposits in the CCB and a total of $318 million in insured deposits in the Northland. The CDIC is now in the process of compensating depositors for the full amount of their insured deposits—a total of $593 million. The CDIC will recover this money over time from liquidation of the banks' assets and from higher premiums that the banks, in future, will be required to pay to the CDIC.

On November 29, the Minister of State for Finance introduced Bill C-86 to raise premiums paid to the CDIC by the banks. I will return to this point in a moment.

In any event, honourable senators, once the insured deposits are taken care of, a total of $414 million in uninsured deposits remain at the Northland and a total of $532 million in uninsured deposits remain at the CCB.

Honourable senators, given the controversy that certain members raised on this point in the other place, it is instructive to review quickly just who the uninsured depositors are by groups. They are as follows:

The two largest groups of uninsured depositors happen to be small businesses and provincial governments;

Approximately $145 million in uninsured deposits are held by 437 small businesses situated largely in western Canada;

Approximately $145 million is held by various provincial governments;

Approximately $130 million is held by Canadian credit unions and co-operatives;

Approximately $113 million is held by non-Canadian banking institutions;

Approximately $110.1 million is held by various investment dealers and brokers;

Approximately $80 million is held by municipal governments;

Approximately $37.7 million is held by Schedule A banks;

Approximately $48.9 million is held by Schedule B banks;

Approximately $27 million is held by 750 individual depositors across Canada;

Approximately $21 million is held by religious and charitable organizations;

Approximately $8 million is held by trusts;
Approximately $7 million is held by Canadian labour unions;
Approximately $5 million is held by hospitals; and Approximately $4 million is held by school boards and educational institutions.

Honourable senators, not to compensate the uninsured depositors would have a tremendously negative impact on the small business sector, particularly in western Canada. I do not think I need to point out that it is the small business sector that is generating most of the job creation in the economic recovery that is currently under way.

Not to compensate provinces and municipalities would only leave the taxpayer holding the bag, albeit in a different guise.

Not to compensate religious and charitable institutions would be a very unfortunate act.

Therefore, I believe the basic decision to compensate was the right one in this case and at this time.

Some have argued that the government should not compensate certain classes of uninsured depositors. I believe that once the principle of compensation was agreed to, it would be wrong to distinguish between classes of depositors, or between individual depositors. Such an action would have been seen—legitimately, in my view—as arbitrary and discriminatory.

Should we, for example, decide to compensate Widow Jones because, in our view, she cannot afford the loss and, in our view, cannot be expected to understand the intricacies of the banking system? On the other hand, should we decide not to compensate depositor Smith, either because, in our view, he can absorb the loss or because, in our view, he should have known better than to have let his deposits exceed the insured level? I think that drawing such distinctions would be arbitrary and capricious. Once the decision is made to compensate, everyone has to be compensated.

Parenthetically, I should repeat that a total of $37.76 million is to be repaid to Schedule A banks to cover their uninsured deposits in the Northland and the CCB. This is money deposited by Schedule A banks in the normal course of banking business and is separate and apart from the deposits that formed the rescue package the major banks put together for the CCB.

Senator Frith: Do you mean that, once it is decided to compensate any insured depositor, all must be compensated?

Senator Kelly: Yes, that is the point I am making. The point I am trying to underline here is that, aside from the amount of money the Schedule A banks put together in a rescue package, in the normal course of banking, the Schedule A banks had $37.7 million in deposits and they will be repaid.

I feel that responds to Senator Kirby's point. He seemed somewhat confused in suggesting that we are compensating American banks and not compensating our own banks, and that is not quite so. The American banks to which he referred are on the same footing as our Schedule A banks who, in the normal course of banking, had money on deposit in those banks.

Senator Olson: Senator Kirby was only talking about the rescued banks.

Senator Kelly: I would point out to Senator Olson that I also have my view on that.

Money deposited by the banks as part of the rescue package will not be reimbursed pursuant to this bill. The government believes that there is a qualitative difference between the banks who participated in the rescue operation and other depositors. The banks who participated in the rescue operation, in the opinion of the government, had access to information that was not available to other depositors.

I am aware that some of the banks have claimed that, pursuant to the rescue agreement, they are entitled to compensation. It is difficult for me not to come close to agreeing with them. I would simply point out that the rescue agreement is quite distinct from the bill before us now and should be addressed separately.

Honourable senators, I should return for a moment to the figures I used when totalling up the uninsured deposits. Those of you who are good at figures, and I know you all are, will have noticed a significant discrepancy.

I said there was a total of $946 million in uninsured deposits: $414 million at the Northland; and $532 million at the CCB. However, the bill before us now asks only for $875 million. What accounts for the difference? The explanation, I am afraid, becomes a little complicated, but it is interesting.

The liquidators at the two banks have estimated a total of $140 million in banks' claims against uninsured depositors. These take the form of outstanding loans, unpaid overdrafts, lines of credit and the like held by depositors with deposits in excess of $60,000.

In effect, the $140 million has been counted twice—once as part of the money owed to depositors; and once as part of the money owed by depositors to liquidators. Accordingly, the $946 million is reduced by $140 million to arrive at $806 million.

However, the government will pay up to $140 million to the liquidator on behalf of depositors and reduce by the same amount the money it pays directly to those same depositors. This is the "off-set" arrangement contemplated in clause 4 of the bill.

The government estimates that approximately 50 per cent of the liquidators' claims against depositors' uninsured deposits will be disputed by the depositors and, therefore, will be subject to review.

The government, therefore, is asking for only an additional $69 million as a contingency to have available in the event that the decisions go in favour of the depositors. In such instances, the net amount of uninsured deposits would increase by the disputed amount and the new, higher amount would be paid by the government directly to the depositors. Thus, we arrive at the figure of $875 million, which, according to the explanation I have just given, is the estimated maximum needed and could be anywhere up to $69 million in excess of what will ultimately prove necessary.

● (1700)

Honourable senators, whatever the ultimate figure is, it will not be the final cost to the government and the Canadian taxpayer. The eventual cost will be reduced by whatever money the government recovers from the liquidation of the assets of the two banks. It is impossible at this point, however, to estimate exactly what that amount will be.

Turning to specifics, I will proceed to outline the major clauses of the bill. Clause 3 authorizes uninsured depositors to apply to the Minister of Finance for compensation on a dollar-for-dollar basis for deposits in excess of $60,000 held by the CCB, the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and the Northland Bank immediately prior to September 2, 1985.

Actually, the CDIC will receive applications and act on behalf of the minister in this respect. Incidentally, interest on uninsured deposits accrued to September 2, 1985, will also be payable.

Clauses 7 and 8 outline the process by which applications from uninsured depositors will be handled and payments made. In essence, the government, through the CDIC, will issue two cheques to qualified applicants. One cheque will be for 60 per cent of the uninsured deposit and will be payable immediately; the second cheque, for the remaining 40 per cent, will be post-dated to April 1, 1986. As far as the government is concerned, however, the entire transaction will be reflected in its 1985-86 budget.

Clause 4 sets out the set-off provisions I mentioned earlier.

Clauses 5 and 6 provide a mechanism for resolving any disputes between the liquidators and the uninsured depositors for purposes of defining the amount payable through offsets.

Clauses 12 and 13 relate to the powers of the CDIC and the liquidators. Of course, clause 16 entails the appropriation by Parliament of the $875 million required.

One might query why the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation is included in this bill. The Mortgage Investment Corporation is not a subsidiary or affiliate of the CCB. The CCB holds only 5.6 per cent of its shares.

However, the CCB provided the Mortgage Investment Corporation with a substantial portion of its liquidity requirements. This, plus its association by name with the CCB, may make the Mortgage Investment Corporation and its depositors vulnerable.

The CCB-MIC is now being carefully monitored by the government and is subject to a "freeze order" that effectively prohibits a run on its deposits. When the freeze order expires, the government and the CCB-MIC shareholders will review the situation and make a decision on the future of the institution.

Honourable senators, if a decision is made to wind up the CCB-MIC—and I am not suggesting that will necessarily happen—this bill enables the government to compensate the uninsured depositors in the CCB-MIC.

In any event, it is a relatively small matter. Of the $96 million in deposits with the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation, $94 million is insured by the CDIC. Accordingly, only $2 million of the $875 million appropriated by this bill will go to uninsured depositors of the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation.

There have been suggestions that this bill should authorize the publication of the names of uninsured depositors who will be compensated pursuant to the legislation. I take this opportunity to say that I join with those who find such a suggestion repugnant. The law is not entirely clear on this point. The liquidation of the CCB and the Northland fall under the provisions of the Winding-up act. That act is silent on the question of confidentiality. Accordingly, since it is banks that are being wound up, the government looked to the Bank Act, which unambiguously protects the confidentiality of depositors. Further, the Access to Information Act reaffirms the confidentiality of depositors' names. Section 24 of that act prohibits the release of information which is withheld pursuant to another statute. Since the Bank Act prohibits release of depositors' names, the Access to Information Act effectively confirms that prohibition.

I understand that others are taking the precedent from the Bankruptcy Act to claim that the names of uninsured depositors to be compensated should be disclosed. The Bankruptcy Act authorizes the publication of creditors' names and, as a matter of practice, creditors' names are disclosed during bankruptcy proceedings.

Finally, honourable senators, some may be tempted to use Bill C-79 as a catalyst to reopen the debate about the government's handling of the CCB and Northland affairs. I sense that probably that time is past, in that the very fine report presented by Senator Murray has been discussed, during which discussion almost every issue that came before our committee and the committee of the other place, as well as the issues currently before the Estey Commission, have been covered.

Honourable senators, I commend this bill to the Senate's consideration. I hope that it can be passed quickly so that the uninsured depositors need wait no longer than is necessary for their compensation.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I think that this is a rather sad time for Canadians in that we have before us a bill that is a failure on all counts. It is a failure because it is asking the taxpayer to put up a large sum of money—almost a billion dollars—and it is a failure because two banks have been lost. Western Canada has lost two regional banks and Canadians have lost the opportunity to deal with banks that have shown themselves to be considerate of small borrowers and people owning and operating small businesses.

I think that the Senate committee in its study did some very valuable work. I agree that Senator Murray conducted himself in a very fair and unbiased manner. I enjoyed, on those occasions when I attended the committee, seeing him in operation. I think that the manner in which he conducted himself was helpful to all who attended the meetings.

Honourable senators, the report covers all of the major ground. I think that Senator Kirby, Senator Sinclair and Senator Olson did well in pointing out the flaws in the system and the errors made by ministers that led up to the failure of the banks. It seems to me, however, that, in bringing that report to the Senate, those senators who took particular positions with regard to the issues should have tried to outline their positions clearly. I think that there are times when a minority report ought to be made that shows the differences between the two positions.

In any event, Senator Kelly has said that it would be unconscionable not to compensate the depositors, that we just could not fail to do so, that they had to be compensated. Well, the best possible solution would have been to have had no failures. Then we would not need to be dealing with that situation. I think that there was a reasonable possibility that the banks could have been saved, and every effort should have been made to bring about a practical, workable and accomplished merger. That was an avenue that should have been pursued and concluded.

Honourable senators, I sat on the committee and I repeat that it is just in my bones to believe that if the head offices of these banks had been located in either Toronto or Montreal, we would not now be dealing with a bankruptcy bill. Some other solution to the problem would have been found. I think that western Canada has lost a great deal in the loss of these two banks. I have been informed by borrowers out west and by people who have had experience with those two banks that they served the business community well. The people who spoke about the sort of loans that they had obtained from those banks were businessmen who operated viable businesses, who were good credit risks, but, because they were not in the big league, found that they were not getting the sort of consideration they thought they deserved from the big chartered banks. They were, however, getting consideration from these two banks. I think that the west has lost a great deal.

The big chartered banks are not dealing with the public, in my judgment, in the way in which they should. Small business has made it crystal clear that the big banks do not really provide the sort of services that should be provided. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business has issued a report which states that 31 per cent of the 20,000 members who were canvassed said they were unhappy about the actions and policies of the big five chartered banks. It said:

● (1710)

The big five banks are ganging up on small business by raising fees and cutting services and should be subject to the same anti-monopoly rules as other industries, says the head of a small business organization representing 74,000 members.

John Bulloch, president of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business . . . said Wednesday that in the past three years small business owners have been faced with higher fees, less service and tougher rules for borrowing money at the same time that bank profits are improving. That is evidence of the banks' monopoly power, he added.

I can say that the attitude taken by the major banks in western Canada today toward farmers who have loans with those banks, is tough, often unconscionable, and the banks have trapped farmers in what was—and that should have been clear to anyone—an impossible financial situation. Now, when the farmers cannot perform, and cannot meet their obligations—which, as they were set out three or four years ago, were impossible—the banks are closing the trap.

We are asked for $1 billion. The government was able to find money for the two banks. They were able to decide to pay those huge sums of money very quickly—$1 billion—but when it comes to smaller sums of money for poorer people, for farmers in difficult situations, it is almost impossible to get the government to move. It takes many months to get a program going, and, when a program is decided on, it is ruined by bureaucratic red tape, and the benefits are not clearly set out. But, in this bill, it is clear what the uninsured depositors will get. It is clear what has been done to help foreign banks, Canadian chartered banks and others. So I believe there is a double standard here that I really cannot condone.

It is clear from the evidence taken in committee that the Minister of State (Finance) and the Minister of Finance made very serious errors; they were not well informed of the actual situation; they came forward with inadequate amounts; and all of the players involved were able to say that very serious mistakes had been made.

The government and the ministers should have endeavoured to arrange a merger and should have been firm with major banks to come forward to assist in providing a viable merger and a viable alternative. The major banks have had their problems before, and they have them today. There is $20 billion outstanding in South American loans. In 1982 some people who were well informed believed that the chartered banks would have been in grave financial danger had the government failed to bail out Dome Petroleum, Massey-Ferguson and Chrysler. So the major banks are not without their problems periodically, and they certainly have major problems today.

In committee, when I questioned the Minister of State (Finance), she said she could give the committee "reasonable assurance" that the chartered banks and the Canadian banking system was in "reasonably good shape". It is amazing that the Minister of State (Finance) would not say to the committee, and to the country, that without question the chartered banks, the big banks, were sound and viable and did not have any particular substantial problems. The best she said she could do was to provide "reasonable assurance."

Those banks have huge assets. Since 1982 they have been doing much better, and recently they have indicated that their total profit for the end of this year exceeds $2 billion, which is up 18 per cent from last year.

The government should have tried to bring about a successful merger, to save taxpayers money, to save these banks as viable institutions for western Canada, to enable them to continue to perform in western Canada. To me that is the major failure of the government.

On October 30, when in committee, I asked a question of Mr. McLaughlan, the President of the Canadian Commercial Bank. If I may, I should like to quote some of the questions and answers from the report of that committee meeting. I asked Mr. McLaughlan:

Could you give us a picture of what might have happened if a bank had come in and accepted a merger or arranged a merger? What would have been the financial costs? You know your company and the assets that a new bank would have been given. What kind of cost do you think this might have been to such a bank over the years? Would they have just taken on a lemon and have lost ever since, or do you think that in due course they would have done something relating to a moderately good business move?

MR. McLAUGHLAN: The parallel I would look at is what has been done in the U.S. rather frequently and that essentially involves one of two choices. The FDIC, or in this case, the CDIC, essentially buys the problem loans and the merged bank is cleansed of those particular loans, or the government or the insuring agent provides a deficiency guarantee to the acquiring bank. Obviously, the acquiring bank will strike as good a deal as possible to avoid any costs.

My estimation is that that very well could have cut the losses—and this is purely projecting in my mind—by about half.

SENATOR ARGUE: To the government?

MR. McLAUGHLAN: Yes.

SENATOR ARGUE: And then, presumably, the bank taking over would have made income on the assets it would have acquired?

MR. McLAUGHLAN: Yes.

SENATOR ARGUE: And the cost to the country would have been half as much, and the bank would be ongoing but in another name and under another arrangement?

MR. McLAUGHLAN: Yes.

So I believe that it should not have been necessary for this bill to come before us, that these banks did not need to go into bankruptcy, that a solution to the problem could have been found. It could have been found at half the cost, or at much less than the current cost; the banks would have continued to function; they would have been there to provide competition for the future and to serve the regional interests; and, as a country, we would have salvaged, from a very difficult situation, the best possible result.

I am sorry that the bill is before us. I consider it a dreadful piece of legislation, in view of all the circumstances, and I am sure that for a long time Canadians will remember the total failure of this government in dealing with this situation and the double standard it uses in taking huge quantities of taxpayers' money to bail out uninsured depositors in a situation that could have been avoided, while, for other Canadians who are in need, it acts in the manner of chisellers, and is mean and stingy in not providing similar assistance.

● (1730)

Senator Doody: Good stuff!

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I rise to support Senator Argue in his comments. I would like to make very clear at the outset that I intend to vote against this bill. I am totally opposed to it in its present form. I am opposed to bailing out those depositors who unfortunately will lose some money, and I am opposed to the confidential way in which the pay-out is going to proceed. The events leading up to this situation and the present situation have been described in some sense as a tragic mistake. Senator Simard has said today "que c'était un désastre." I really cannot find any words that adequately describe the situation we find ourselves in now. I do not blame the government or the ministers for the situation which led up to the downfall of the bank. The circumstances to that point were outside the control of the government.

However, I think that the government is very much to blame for not taking action at an earlier date, when it knew that there were problems, and for not taking the proper action. Earlier today Senator Simard said that the management of the Canadian Commercial Bank is the guilty party in all this. I am not here to defend the bank, but I do not know how the management could be described as the guilty party when we were not even given the facts by the government at the time of the bail-out last March. The other banks involved were not even told the full truth by the government at the time, and now they are being accused of having created the situation. Yesterday we were told by Senator Kirby, during his comments on this debate, that the minister responsible knew about this matter as early as October 4, 1984. I quote exactly what he told us yesterday:

The minister herself told us on the first of her two appearances before the committee that as long ago as October 4, 1984—shortly after she assumed her office, and shortly after she was given responsibility for, among other things, banking issues—she was briefed by her officials on the problems of CCB. She went on to point out that starting in January of 1985 she received almost weekly briefings on the CCB.

We have a situation where a minister of the Crown, responsible for the banking system, is advised as far back as October 4, 1984, when she received her first warning, and is then subject to weekly briefings after January 1985, and then we are told that apparently the government did not have the right information or sufficient information in March. What happened? What went on? What is the system in which we are working? Were the officials not telling the minister the truth? If they were not telling her the truth then, obviously, the officials are at fault and they should resign. There is no question about that in my books. If the minister was told the truth, then why did she not act earlier? Why were we faced with this precipitate action in March, an action which was ill-considered, inadequate and wrong at the time?

We end up with the worst of both worlds. We end up with two bankrupt banks. If the government gets its way, we will bail out the depositors. We will lose a great deal more in the liquidation of those banks than we would have lost had they simply been closed out in March. If they had been closed out in March, there would have been no obligation to bail out any depositors. What will we recover on the assets? Quite obviously, substantially less than we would have obtained had there been a simple takeover, merger or other sensible progressive action. But no, we have thrown them out and we are going to bail out everybody. As a result we will lose a substantial part of the original assets that were involved. We have created in western Canada some very serious problems. I simply cannot support that kind of operation.

Let us assume that the minister was told the truth by the officials. In my books, that makes somebody at the ministerial level responsible. If the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Barbara McDougall, is not responsible then surely her senior minister, Mr. Wilson, is responsible. If Mr. Wilson says that he is not responsible, then who is responsible? None other than the Prime Minister! It has to be one of those three people. Yet, what kind of situation do we find ourselves in? We are going to pay out taxpayers' money—the exact amount of which no one knows at the moment. Certainly, it looks as though it will be over $1 billion, and everybody is still in place, all the officials are still in place. The Minister of State (Finance) is still in place. The Minister of Finance is still in place. The Prime Minister is still in place. Yet, the Canadian taxpayers are being asked to bail out, not the depositors but the ministers, including the Prime Minister, for the decisions they made.

We do not have a situation where the government is coming to us and is saying that it has made a mistake, that the minister has resigned because everything that was done was done wrong, that it was an honest mistake. That is what happens when you are a minister. You must live by your mistakes and by your decisions. At least, in that circumstance there would be some sense in what we are doing, but nothing has changed. As Senator Olson says, we have put nothing into place to deal with anything.

I would like to deal with the question of confidentiality which has been raised several times in this debate. It has been said that because we are dealing with a banking question there must be confidentiality. It is no longer a banking question. It is not a bank that will be paying out anything. It is the Canadian taxpayer. I respect the confidential aspect, and I do not suggest that we should issue any kind of information on who has money in the Canadian Commercial Bank or the Northland Bank. If the depositors do not want their names to be published, let us not publish them. If the government insists on paying out the money, why does it not simply say to those who wish to receive it, "Those who want to take advantage of the government payments, come forward, list your name and you will be paid"?

Senator Frith: That is reasonable.

Senator Molgat: However, that is not what the government is proposing. It is proposing to pay out some $800 million. What does the taxpayer know about the transaction? Nothing, absolutely nothing. In my opinion, we can have confidentiality. Those who want to be paid will simply come forward and make application. In that way we, as taxpayers, will know exactly where we stand. But to say, under cover of confidentiality, that we are going to pay out $1 billion in taxpayers' money and nobody will know who is getting it goes against my belief in the responsibility that we have here as representatives of the people of Canada.

Therefore, honourable senators, I simply cannot support this kind of bill. I see my colleague, Senator Doody, shaking his head, although I am not sure in what direction.

Senator Doody: I am disappointed.

Senator Molgat: I can just imagine the sort of speech he would be making tonight if our positions were reversed.

Senator Frith: I can see him up there; that finger would be waving.

Senator Molgat: We would be hearing the very finest of Newfoundland wit coming through and scorching us, and I would say, quite properly so, because the situation simply is an unconscionable one. I feel sorry for my honourable friends on the other side of this house in having to support this kind of legislation because there are absolutely no sound grounds on which this can be done except if they confess that there has been a mistake. However, they are not saying it is a mistake. They are saying it is everybody else's fault except the minister's.

Senator Frith: No repentence.

Senator Molgat: Absolutely. It is the bank's fault; it is the economy; it is everyone's fault except the minister's. I must say to honourable senators that I have never heard of this kind of situation where a government is asking the taxpayers of Canada to pay out $1 billion plus—and to do what? Not to bail out depositors but to bail out failed ministers—or a failed Prime Minister: One or the other. If the government would only come clean, then we would know exactly what the Canadian taxpayers are being asked to do.

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, over 60 years ago, my parents lost their savings in the Home Bank bankruptcy in Toronto. My mother, who was an orphan, on the advice of her banker and her lawyer—who happened to be a Conservative—invested the liquid assets of the estate of her mother and father. My father, who was a little immigrant boy, came to this country, worked hard and saved a few dollars, met a lady and decided to get married, and lost his savings. This was shortly after they had married and bought a house. Honourable senators, what a way to start out in the Canadian way of life. This is the "just society," and we are again experiencing that today.

Many years later, my friends in the CNR were investing money in the Atlantic Finance Corporation. That corporation had a large office in London, Ontario. In the window of that office, there was a large sign. There were also many newspaper adds telling the public that they were selling this great new deal with interest rates at 12 per cent. Everybody went down and jumped in. I checked with my lawyer and he said: "Charlie, I hear noises; stay away from this investment."

Later, this corporation got into financial difficulties and before the financial mess was over, several companies were in deep trouble, falling one after the other in a chain reaction and thus causing hundreds of residents of the southwestern Ontario area to lose investment money to the tune of over $20,000.

Honourable senators, looking back, we remember the trust companies in Niagara Falls and in the St. Catharines area going under. I say to you, honourable senators, that there is something wrong with our financial system when these organizations are allowed to fail. Therefore I wish to state that tonight I speak on behalf of the CNR pensioners, the teacher pensioners, the Air Canada pensioners and all of the employees who are losing millions of dollars of their hard-earned pension money. I would like to ask a few questions of Senator Kelly on their behalf. If the government believes that Bill C-79 is such an important bill, why is it that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State for Finance were absent from today's debate in the House of Commons? As a former whip in the House of Commons, after consulting with the House Leader and the Prime Minister, I insisted that the minister whose department was under scrutiny should be in the House to face the debate.

The government of the day has set up the Estey Commission to hold hearings into why the CCB and the Northland Bank needed to be supported and, when this action did not succeed, they were liquidated. Can Senator Kelly tell me why Bill C-79 needs to be rushed through in this final sitting before the Christmas break?

Suppose for the moment that Mr. Justice Estey's commission finds something wrong in the manner in which the banks were managed. Suppose he finds that there was wrong-doing, such as fraud and crooked management. What happens then if Bill C-79 has already passed the House and Senate? Will there be full prosecution of these matters? Why did the government set up the Estey Commission in the first place if they are not prepared to wait for the final report of the proceedings of that commission? In my opinion, the members of the House of Commons and the Senate will look absolutely stupid if they allow Bill C-79 to be passed before the Estey Commission releases its report.

What if there was something wrong in the way that the banks were operating? The uninsured depositors will be laughing all the way to the bank to deposit the taxpayers' dollars that have been used to bail them out.

Bank and trust company deposits are usually insured to the amount of $60,000. After $60,000 is reached, the risk factor takes over. This was the reason for the introduction of the increase in the CDIC insurance from $20,000 to $60,000 after the trust company problem developed. People who invest their money in the deposit areas of banks and trust companies have been warned on many occasions by media articles that $60,000 is the limit. If a person wishes to invest money in a bank or trust company because the interest rates are higher than the rates paid by the big five banks, then he should be prepared to take the higher risks that go with the higher interest paid on the deposits. This makes a great deal of sense.

During my lifetime, I have bought and sold stock, and made money. I have also bought stock on the advice of so-called experts who told me to hang on to it and not sell, as it would go higher. Eventually, the stock went down and I lost. I took that risk, and like many of the investors in these banks, I lost many dollars. Honourable senators, no one came to my rescue; not the company, not the CDIC and not the government. I took the risk, and I lost. I did not go crying to the Government of Canada for help. I accepted the risk and I lost.

Honourable senators, today when I have money to invest, I look for the CDIC emblem on the door of the financial institution. If it is not there, then I am sorry, I walk away and go to an institution where that emblem is displayed on the front door. I also take the trouble to ask the manager of that institution whether the savings I deposit there are insured up to $60,000. Over the $60,000 limit, it is my risk, and I would not expect to be compensated by the Government of Canada. Common sense tells me to withdraw some funds and go to another institution. Therefore, honourable senators, with this in mind, I am not taking any risk.

Honourable senators, I take no risk in my investments. I use common sense and, therefore, I am opposed to supporting Bill C-79, which does not cover all the citizens who made investments in both banks, but instead bails out a favoured few of the uninsured depositors. Senator Kelly can answer my questions in writing.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I do not propose to delay the house for long, but there are three or four points I should like to make.

I was glad this afternoon to see the Leader of the Government in the Senate assume responsibility for moving second reading of this bill, because I think it is the government's responsibility, and that the government should indicate this in every possible way.

The second point I wish to make is that it was the government itself which for one reason or another decided to intervene in this situation. It decided, for one reason or another, to put together a support package, and it encouraged depositors to leave their money with the banks. That support package was inadequate in the circumstances. As a result, the taxpayers are now being asked to come up with something like a billion dollars. It was the government that made the decision to intervene, and from everything that has been presented here, either in the report or by way of a speech, we can only conclude that the government intervened without taking adequate steps to acquire full information. The government intervened without adequate information.

My third point is that the government failed to sustain the bank. We might be prepared to pay out a fair number of hundreds of millions of dollars as the cost of success; but here we are putting out something like a billion dollars as the cost of failure. We will make a mistake if we emphasize too much that the means were lost, the money was lost, but we have to recognize that in addition to the means being lost the end was lost—the support operation was a complete failure. I indict the government more on that point, the failure of the whole undertaking, than on the fact that this is a burden on the taxpayers of Canada, although the latter is bad enough.

My fourth point relates to Senator Kelly's statement that the bill is right in this case and at this time. I assume that by using that language he intends to imply that depositors in other cases and in other times should not anticipate so generous an attitude on the part of the government. I think he is right to make that insistence; I think he is correct to emphasize that point. What worries me is that in addition to the money that has been lost, in addition to the fact that the undertaking to preserve these banks was a failure, there is being created in the minds of some investors the notion that they can seek out those situations in which their money will attract very high interest rates in full confidence that at the heel of the hunt the good government of the day will come along and bail them out if things go wrong.

I am sure Senator Kelly wants to quash any such thinking; nevertheless, I think he would agree that there will be people who will think that way. That is an additional disadvantage flowing from this whole situation.

The government should not be intervening in the money market in this way. If there is any section of the economy which ought to be allowed to operate under market force, it surely is the money market, for once the government starts intervening, people will assume that they can undertake "high risk investments" with really no extraordinary risk at all. Then what is the situation of the bank or trust company which does not pay premium interest rates? Honourable senators immediately see how these interventions can distort the money market.

In this case the government made a commitment; it made a commitment by urging the depositors to leave their moneys in those banks. The government is now presenting a bill to the taxpayers of Canada for its failure.

I have no enthusiasm whatsoever for this bill.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Azellus Denis: Honourable senators, I have a few observations to make in respect of this bill. When this bill was introduced, the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Barbara McDougall, made a statement to the effect that the bill was introduced because there were some poor people, some poor companies or some poor corporations that would lose out if they were not reimbursed for amounts over $60,000, and in order to have us swallow that, she told us about the poor fate of the hospitals or the poor municipalities. She forgot and the government forgot to tell us what proportion of the moneys over $60,000 deposited in those banks represented hospital deposits or municipal deposits. So, we were inclined to cry when we heard the Minister of State (Finance) say that in order to save the hospitals money and the municipalities money, we needed this legislation.

When one puts money in a bank it is a business proposition. It is a risky proposition just like any other business. In ordinary matters, when one fails, one loses money, that's all; one is not reimbursed.

I do not understand why the government should reimburse people for sums over the $60,000. In some cases, those people who have more than $60,000 are millionaires; they have plenty of money. When they go to get their cheque they will be driven in limousines, but the taxpayer will walk to the Department of National Revenue to pay his or her $10 or $20 so that the millionaire can pick up his cheque in his limousine.

Those investors put all of their investments into one basket because they were not intelligent enough to put them into 20 different baskets. Perhaps they had so much money that they already had covered every bank in Canada. These big trust companies are going to benefit from this.

As another example of unfairness, the Minister of State (Finance) said that this will not be a precedent; it will not necessarily cover any other bank that fails in the future. Do honourable senators think this is fair? Let us suppose the Royal Bank of Canada failed, or the National Bank of Canada. Do honourable senators think the government will not bail out those with deposits over $60,000? Do honourable senators think that the government is not going to do that? Perhaps not, because the Minister of State (Finance) said that this is not a precedent! We would like to know what proportion of a municipality's money and what proportion of a hospital's money will be covered by the money we are going to vote by this bill as compared to big trust companies and the banks and even foreign money. Perhaps there are some Arabs who have millions of dollars. As Mr. Mulroney used to say, we are signing a blank cheque so it is just unfortunate that this happened in this government.

As Senator Simard has said, it is not the fault of Sir John A. Macdonald, or the Liberal government, or Mr. Clark's government or Mr. Diefenbaker's government, but it is the responsibility of the government that presented the bill, and that is all there is to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, ever since the Minister of State for Finance, Mrs. McDougall, appeared in this chamber a few months ago, I have been very skeptical about the way the Government decided to proceed.

I did not intend to express all my concerns in a formal speech, but considering the fact that others mentioned a number of points about which I was particularly concerned, I believe I must agree wholeheartedly with the views expressed by my colleague, Senator Turner, who said that this measure was premature and that we should at least have the decency to wait for the Estey Commission to report on this unfortunate series of events.

When this government was elected and took office, it was going to deal with all the ills of this country. It was going to put the country on the right track, on the road to economic recovery and development. We soon found that its plan had a number of weaknesses, competence being one of the major problems.

From what has happened up to now, it is clear that there has been a great deal of incompetence and a great deal of blind acceptance by the Government of proposals by public servants for solving problems, and a great deal of acceptance of such proposals as Gospel truth. It seems to me that to be a competent administrator, one must start by challenging the information fed by public servants to the government. That is where the government, the Minister of Finance, the Minister of State for Finance and the Prime Minister failed. They assumed that everything public servants said was valid. And I cannot believe all this should be blamed on the previous administration. These events did not occur under the previous administration. They occurred during the mandate of the present administration which was going to solve all our problems.

I think the Estey report will set the record straight. Parliament should have waited for the commission's report instead of relying on what transpires in the course of the inquiry, because there is a difference between what witnesses say and the objectivity a judge can bring to bear on what they said. We should have waited for the whole story instead of proceeding with this legislation. It would have been more sensible.

It's the old story of putting the cart before the horse. So why have an inquiry if they can't wait for the results?

When a person has a car accident, whether he is hit by another car or drives into a ditch or hits the bridge railing, he usually reports to the police. Then he sees his insurance adjuster, an estimate is made of the damages, and often, if two people are involved, negotiations take place between the insurance companies for the two parties. At this stage, an agreement is reached on the amount to be paid. There may be further adjustments when the car goes to the garage and repairs are done, and finally, there is a definitive settlement of accounts.

In this case, I don't think we have had the final accounting yet. There has been no final decision on the matter of responsibility and ethics. There has been no adjustment. There are some people who may be satisfied with the numbers, but in any case I think the government is being far too hasty. They are rushing this legislation. It would not surprise me if we were to hear about other scandals in connection with this case.

For all of these reasons, honourable senators, I refuse to support this bill. It has been a government failure from start to finish. The only ones to blame for this failure are the present government of this country and its advisers. Not the previous administration but the present government, which told any Canadians who would listen: We are ready to govern! However, it failed abysmally to act responsibly in this particular case.

[Senator Corbin.]

[English]

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I shall be brief because I made a speech on the report presented by the committee earlier today, but I would like to put some points on the record in this debate, now that the bill is formally before us. Perhaps Senator Kelly, who is sponsoring this bill more or less, could give us an undertaking that the government will take some action, because I can tell him without any reservation that we expect the government to take some remedial action. It might be that they are going to wait until the Estey Commission report comes in so that they can have a better idea of the details of the remedies that they are going to propose. One thing we need, and we expect, is that they will bring in provisions so that regional banks can at least have an opportunity to succeed and, indeed, so that the public, generally, will know that it is safe to deposit their money in regional banks notwithstanding the difficulties that arose with these two. I believe that action could have and should have been taken some time ago to make regional banks safe for depositors.

The other thing we must ensure, without any reservation, is that there will be no possibility of the kind of buck-passing that we have seen in this situation where the Governor of the Bank of Canada has said that he has no way of doing assessments and no capability to do audits and, therefore, he relies solely on the Inspector General of Banks to do that. Then, when we heard from the Inspector General, he said that he did not have that capability either and that he relies on the audits that are done by the external auditors. The buck was then passed to the external or outside auditors, whichever you want to call them, to do an assessment of the assets of the banks. I see that Senator Kelly is shaking his head, but that is what they told us. When those auditors appeared before us, they were very surprised that all the people in the system relied on their auditing of the banks' books and, particularly, had relied on them to do what they called a qualitative analysis of the assets, in other words, an assessment of the loan portfolio. They were surprised that all these people had leaned on them. Quite frankly, I was too.

We hope that Senator Kelly will take these questions seriously, and perhaps he will give us an undertaking that he, as sponsor of the bill in this chamber, will exert the necessary pressure and the great influence he has to see that these remedies are, in fact, taken as soon as possible.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to add just a word about this sad story which is represented by this bill and to remind honourable senators that the story, for us, started some time ago. It started when the Minister of State for Finance sat just where Senator Doody is about to sit.

Senator Doody: May I sit down? These are difficult times.

Senator Frith: Yes, you may. I will thank the honourable senator for his assistance.

The Minister of State for Finance, as you will remember, honourable senators, said, and I am paraphrasing, "Calmez-vous. It is perfectly all right, honourable senators. Don't worry; this bank is going to be all right. I know that you are worried about this $250 million, as you should be, but I am here to tell you that all the advice I have received and all the good judgment from the years I have spent on Bay Street, which I can bring to bear on the facts of this case, persuade me and convince me to persuade you to authorize the expenditure of this $250 million because that is all it is going to take and we are going to have a healthy patient. It may be just a bad cold and, with this little bit of cough medicine, it is going to be fine."

Senator Lucier: The baby choked.

Senator Frith: In fact, the baby choked.

Honourable senators, as trustees of the taxpayers' money, we asked what we could do. We accepted the honeyed words, the blandishments, of this elegant lady who came to us, admittedly as a new minister but with a great deal of experience in financial circles, without any doubt and she persuaded us to pass the bill.

Now what has happened? Well, we have heard in evidence in committee, in debates in the other place and in debates here what took place. We have heard of it in the studies and committees that have been launched. Honourable senators, one of the good summaries of what took place, unfortunately, I am unable to find. I was going to quote one of Canada's most popular, at least with me when I am quoting him, financial commentators, Mr. Newman, but I cannot seem to find it.

Senator Doody: I have your quotation here.

Senator Frith: Did I leave it over there? Perhaps Senator Doody would like to read it for me.

Senator Doody: Is this a non-partisan debate?

Senator Frith: I am going to read what a non-partisan observer would contribute to this non-partisan debate if he were here. He said:

Yet looking back at the tumble of events that made 1985 a time when banking news moved securely onto the front pages, it is still impossible to credit how anyone in his or her right mind could have allowed the Canadian Commercial Bank fiasco to happen. I keep trying to comprehend the sequence of misjudgments that took place and nothing adds up, even if you accept the basic assumption that most of the bit players involved were really trying out for one of those Keystone Kops silent films that consisted mostly of unintentional patfalls.

Senator Doody: Read the last part.

Senator Frith: I do not want to. I will leave that to you. I do not want to get into personalities.

Senator Olson: It says at the end that the Governor of the Bank of Canada should resign.

Senator Frith: It certainly says that someone should resign.

Honourable senators, what happened is that among all these investigations that were launched was included, as Senator Turner pointed out, a judicial investigation meant, I am sure, to be impartial. How can it be that, if that investigation is to have any effect; if the government sincerely wanted to disclose all the facts; if it really wanted to understand and to share with the people what took place, as it said it did, it is now asking Parliament to pass this bill before learning the results of that report? By the time we get that report, the money will be gone to these masked strangers.

Senator Corbin: In U.S. funds.

Senator Frith: Some of it in U.S. funds.

I say "masked strangers" because the principle of confidentiality, surely, has no application here at all. The principle of confidentiality applies to the relationship between a solvent, healthy bank and its customers and clients. I cannot understand how Senator Kelly could use the word "repugnant." He thinks it would be "repugnant" to have these people's names disclosed.

Senator MacDonald: He was quoting Senator Sinclair.

Senator Frith: If he were using the word "repugnant" and quoting Senator Sinclair, then I find it just as difficult to understand how Senator Sinclair could use the word "repugnant." If there is any repugnancy, surely the repugnancy is in the slick, legal explanation for how there is some conflict between statutes. It is not a matter of saying, "I cannot believe we should treat this situation as if the bank were insolvent; as if it were a bankruptcy." It is insolvent; it is a bankruptcy. It is not a matter of saying, "Now, let me see, how should I look at this? Should I look at this as the principle of confidentiality because there is a little problem as between the wording in some statutes? Should I look at it as a principle of confidentiality whose whole basis is in relation to a solvent and healthy bank or should I look at it as if it were an insolvency?" Honourable senators, this is not a case of "as if." It is insolvent. The repugnancy, surely, is in making the payments without identification of the uninsured depositors—if the payments should be made at all. The principle is clearly one of insolvency.

• (1810)

Kim Hubbard, who wrote some years ago for a western newspaper, was known for his pithy sayings. They were called the sayings of Abe Martin. One of them was: "When a feller says, 'It ain't the money, it's the principle of the thing,' it's the money." That is the principle here—it is the money. It is not the principle of confidentiality; it is the principle of an insolvent bank, and the claimants should identify themselves. We have heard the figures mentioned by Senator Kelly as to those classes of persons to be paid—$200 million here, $147 million there. As Senator Dirksen once said, "A million here, a million there, a billion here, a billion there, and the first thing you know, it adds up to real money." Well, it adds up to real money—$1 billion, more or less; possibly more, possibly less than the $875 million that is being authorized here. I ask honourable senators to remember that the money we voted in answer to the blandishments and encouragement and assurance of the minister in March is gone. Now we are asked to vote another $875 million.

I can just picture how John Diefenbaker, if he were a member of the opposition, would be talking about this bill:

Oh, yes,—
he would say,

—they can find a billion dollars for their friends, the bankers; oh, yes, and for all of these depositors and these foreigners who have been putting money in here. Oh, yes, they can find money for them, but not a penny—not a penny—for the poor. Not a penny for family allowances. “Sorry, we are going to have to reduce family allowances. Our hearts bleed for you, but you must understand we have to reduce the deficit.”

Senator Doody: I liked your Gilbert and Sullivan better.

Senator Frith: Do you? You did not really see the Gilbert and Sullivan.

But that is what is happening, honourable senators; that is what we are being asked to do. Eventually, we will receive a bill, C-70, which is going to call for a reduction in the deficit—we will really have to reduce the deficit now because we have just given it a really big boost before Christmas when we persuaded Parliament to pass this bill paying uninsured, unidentified depositors.

Honourable senators, I join with those of my colleagues who feel that they cannot support this bill. Surely, from the point of view of the farmers and of those in receipt of family allowances—from the point of view of every other Canadian or groups of Canadians who have genuine, merited claims—this will look like a shameful superscam. Yesterday, Senator Robertson, in a very eloquent and effective intervention in the debate on the Family Allowance bill, told us that we cannot solve these problems by throwing money at them but that there has to be redistribution. She said that we must understand that we must take from the “haves” to give to the “have-nots.” The bill we are being asked to pass today is taking from the “have-nots” and giving to the “haves.”

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Roblin speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Olson: If that is true, honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Kelly could take a moment or two to answer the valid questions that Senator Stewart and I put to him? I am sure that he is willing to undertake some of the commitments we asked of him.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I would prefer to make my comments now, after which, perhaps, Senator Kelly could comply with my honourable friend's request so far as he is able to. Would that be agreeable?

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Olson: I think that if Senator Roblin speaks now the debate is closed.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to fight about it.

Senator Kelly: I could answer those questions briefly, honourable senators, yes. I believe that Senator Turner raised a question. By way of a quick reply, I have no way of describing any particular reason why, if in fact it is so, the Minister of State for Finance and the Minister of Finance were not in the house when this matter was being debated today. I cannot, therefore, provide an answer to that question.

On the question of the possibility of the Estey Commission finding evidence of fraud and whether or not that would be followed up by the appropriate attorney general, I am quite sure that the answer, clearly and obviously, is yes.

There was a question put by Senator Olson on whether something will be done about what appears to be a faulty method of supervision in the banking system. I think that the Minister of State for Finance has clearly undertaken that that will be done. However, I would like to take a moment to suggest that we keep in mind that the system of supervision that existed at the time this matter became clear had been in existence for some time. There has been a lot of comment about why the minister did not check more carefully on the information she was given. In fairness, and given the history of stability in our banking system, she probably had reason to believe that all was well and that these people were competent. I think that she would be the first today to say that she probably should have been more suspicious than she was. However, the history of the banking system and the way the supervision appeared to be working suggested, in my view, that those suspicions were not necessary at the surface. I am confident that, as both she and Mr. Wilson have said, this whole question of revising the structure, making it stronger and more dependable, will certainly be done.

On the question of confidentiality raised by Senator Frith, I have a document in my hand that is rather interesting. It is Bill 182 of the fourth session of the fourteenth Parliament, 1516, George V, 1925. It is an act for the relief of the depositors of the Home Bank of Canada. There was a bill in 1925 on the collapse mentioned by Senator Turner. It is interesting that there is no reference made in it to the disclosure of the names of those depositors. I suppose that this constitutes a bit of a precedent. I believe that that takes care of the questions that were raised.

Senator Denis: I wonder if the honourable senator would answer the question put when I spoke a moment ago respecting the difference between the amounts of money invested in the bank over $60,000, the money invested by hospitals and municipalities and the amounts of money for the rest of the depositors of those two banks.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I believe that those figures are contained in the references I made in describing the bill. I gather that the question is: What was on deposit from hospitals? There was $5 million deposited by hospitals. There was $80 million deposited by municipal governments.

• (1820)

Senator Denis: What about the rest?

Senator Kelly: It is in the record. I would have to do a little adding and subtracting, but it was read into the record today.

Senator Denis: It is important, because Mrs. McDougall said she was doing that to protect the hospitals and municipalities. I agree with that. But I would like to know the difference between the deposits of those corporations and the amount of other deposits.

Senator Kelly: I think the best suggestion I can make is that I be allowed to read the references all the way through. There are 437 small businesses.

Senator Frith: It is already on the record.

Senator Denis: It must be at least $900 million.

Senator Kelly: Yes.

Senator Denis: You have just said that the municipalities and hospitals had $85 million, and the bill is asking for almost $1 billion.

Senator Frith: That is only about 10 per cent.

Senator Kelly: It is in the record.

Senator Olson: I am sorry. I was mistaken. The answers did not add anything to the debate.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I repeat that if Senator Roblin speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, those are the most welcome words that have been spoken on this matter this evening. The debate will ultimately come to an end. There is one thing about which I am quietly satisfied—if I might use that expression. When the whole of this matter arose, now some long time ago, there seemed to be a suspicion on the part of some that if we referred the matter for discussion to a committee, as I was urging we should do at the time, there was some danger that the committee would not have the power, the authority or the opportunity to examine all aspects of this matter. I gave the assurance then—and I am glad that it turned out to be completely correct—that the committee would be master of its affairs and that it would investigate all aspects of this matter that it wished to examine.

That, indeed, is exactly what happened. The committee met for many long hours. It was well attended by senators from both sides of the house, and I believe the results of the committee's examination were of sufficient depth to make it unnecessary for us to engage in that process again. I would like to say that when I conclude my second reading remarks, I hope that we will proceed to third reading without the necessity of referring it back to committee. If I may, I wish to offer a word of praise to those senators who sat on the committee, whether or not they agree with me, because they certainly stinted nothing in their examination of this matter and their desire to get at all of the facts. If my interpretation is not the same as theirs, then probably that is to be understood; but there is a wide area of the work of that committee in which we are agreed. We are agreed, for example, that the fundamental cause of this problem was the mismanagement of the banks by the banks themselves. That comes out clearly. That is the basic finding of this committee, namely, that the trouble arose because the banks were badly managed. That is a fact that colours everything else that follows. Particularly it colours what follows when we recall the nature of and the manner in which that mismanagement took place, and the way in which that mismanagement is reflected in the books of account of the bank, and of all the figures that arose from the information they were providing to their shareholders in respect of their operations.

So the fundamental cause of our problem, which colours my judgment on what happened afterwards, has to do with the finding of the committee itself that the principal cause of our difficulty was the mismanagement of the banks.

The committee went on to make another unanimous finding, in which there was no dissent, and with which I believe I agree—namely, that the second contributing factor was the attitude of the auditors, who, instead of examining those accounts from a completely detached point of view, allowed themselves to be persuaded by the management of the bank that they could certify those accounts without reservation, and thus give to the wide world, the government and Inspector General included, a picture of events, of transactions and of a financial position in those banks which we now find to have been quite misleading.

So it seems to me that in any review of these affairs, we have to consider the findings of the committee itself, which placed the fundamental root of our problem on the bank management itself, and then on the audited figures by the shareholders' auditors that arose from those calculations.

Who are those shareholders' auditors? In other countries they have different methods of inspecting banks. In the United States it is much different from ours in Canada. Some time ago—I believe after the Home Bank affair, which has been mentioned—we decided that we would have our own system of keeping track of banks, so that the public, depositors and so on, were well informed. We decided to have a system of dual auditing, whereby two auditors would be responsible for providing the information that the shareholders needed. And for many a long year, for 63 years, from the time of the failure of the Home Bank until the present time, that system of dual auditing was thought to be a satisfactory, safe, prudent arrangement by which one could ascertain from time to time the state, the financial condition, the solvency, and indeed the cash position of the banks of this nation. It is not surprising that a system that worked quite well for that period of years acquired a certain aura of dependability, of reliability, of confidence. That is the situation in which we found ourselves when we examined what happened to those banks.

But it did not happen all at once. Several things have happened during the past few years which bear on this issue. One of them has to do with changes in our banking system. A few years ago we had essentially six banks in Canada, and we did not have an easy and convenient system of establishing regional banks, or of inviting foreign banks into this country. At the last amendment to the Bank Act, that was changed. It was made much more convenient, and encouragement was given to small or regional banks in this country to find a place in our system—and I believe that everyone in this house and in the country agreed that that was a good thing. But what we did not do when we changed that Bank Act some four or five years ago is to make any assessment as to whether or not that altered the Rock of Gibraltar system that we had had for approximately 60 years with respect to the major banks in Canada. I do not think anyone gave a thought to that, or to whether we needed any change in our system of examination, control or oversight that would arise because of the new conditions which were manifesting themselves in our banking system. That is a consideration which a calm reflection of the facts will disclose to have been worthy of comment at this moment, because it certainly had its effect in the years to come.

But what I find rather extraordinary is that, according to the speech given by Senator Kirby, for him the world began in October 1984. He had a lot to say about the culpability of the minister from October 1984 until the present time, of the dereliction of the minister in failing to use her powers to demand further examination or explanation of the banks' figures. He made quite a point of that aspect of our record of the discharge of our duties, by intimating to us, if not saying it in so many words, that in October 1984 she was warned by the Inspector General of Banks that there was something wrong, and she should have done something about it.

Let us take a look at that concept for a moment or two. Does anyone think that the problems of the bank began in October 1984? Not if you read the evidence. If you read the evidence you will know that it started in 1981. If you read the evidence you will know that that is the time when the depression hit western Canada with full force. That is the time when these banks began to experience their troubles. In October 1984 the banks themselves and the Inspector General were optimistic that the worst was over, that they had emerged from this depression in 1981 and 1982 and that in 1984 the worst was over. They were going to surmount their problems and would probably be back on the road to financial health.

All that time the Inspector General had been making reports to the minister in which he raised his concerns about the bank. During the time of the ministers who preceded the Honourable Barbara McDougall and during her time, what happened? Did the Inspector General in any of those reports raise issues which would cause any thoughtful person to say, "I must take some further action"? Did he raise any flag to say to the Liberal ministers or to the Conservative ministers that "there is something seriously wrong here and we have to do something about it"? Did he indicate that in his opinion this was a critical situation? No, and he candidly said that he did not make recommendations of that kind. If you, as a minister in office, have that situation with the experience of the years, with the record of the Inspector General which, up to that time, had been pretty good, receive that kind of comment on a bank that is not in perfect condition, would you not be inclined to accept that as a warning that there was a problem? Perhaps. But you would not accept it as one which would require you to invoke the powers Senator Kirby has suggested we should invoke—and conduct a thorough examination of the bank about what is being done, particularly when it had been the experience of decades that the auditor could be relied upon, that the bank manager's policies were sound and that the Inspector General was well qualified to advise and warn if there was a problem that he felt should be dealt with. That is the situation we were in. However, Senator Kirby wants the world to start in October 1984. It did not. The problem started long before that, and you work your way up to March 1985.

What do you find there? Right up until the very time that the bank itself came to Ottawa to tell the Inspector General that they were in deep trouble, up to that moment, while there was concern, while there were observations that certainly indicated concern, there was not that quality of warning, that degree of concern and difficulty which would have caused the Inspector General to raise the red flag, because he never did so. If he never did so, it seems a bit extreme that a minister of the Crown should be asked to do so, particularly during this time, as there was another actor on the scene. That actor was the Governor of the Bank of Canada. This bank was in trouble before 1984. We all know that it was in trouble in 1983. What did the Governor of the Bank of Canada do on that occasion? He took the trouble, because he thought it was his duty, to tell the public that the bank was sound. He took the trouble to do the same thing in March 1984 when the final deal went ahead.

What Senator Kirby was asking for, as he said, was not hindsight, but foresight. What he really means is that he wanted second sight so that someone would be able to look beyond the reports that were put on one's desk and say, "It is not good enough. I have to do something more than that." I submit that nothing appeared on the minister's desk, according to her testimony and according to the testimony of the Inspector General of Banks, that would cause a responsible public official to take the action that Senator Kirby said should have been taken. He went on to slate them vigorously because they failed to do it. I do not think that that kind of criticism is telling when one examines the details of the situation in which the minister found herself.

Let us come to the critical point of this business. What was the right thing to do in March, 1984 when this bank got into trouble? Should you have tried to save it? That is the first and fundamental question that legislators, politicians and ministers have to ask themselves. There is no obvious answer. It was quite possible to have let it go. There were councils, and it appears that the Minister of State was at one time, at least, of the view that the right thing to do was to let it go. But what advice was the government given? The government was given advice that it should not allow the bank to go under for a very simple reason; namely, because its preservation would be valuable and important for the stability, legitimacy and credibility of the banking system in Canada. That is no light argument. That is a very important argument and it is one which a responsible government would have to consider. When the government found that two provincial administrations, the Governor of the Bank of Canada and six banks—and we will come to them in a little while—concurred in the principle that it was important to try to save the bank, what was the government to do? I suggest that on balance, if I had been there I would probably have agreed with the minister, who said that our first responsibility is try and save the bank. Then you come to the next question.

Do you know enough about this whole proposition to devise a policy for saving the bank that you can present to Parliament? We have heard a great deal of argument on the point that the government did not know enough to make a sound decision. Certainly, that is a matter of opinion that some members hold very strongly. I say that the government had to work on the information that it had if it was going to save the bank. It is no good saying, "We would like to save the bank, but because we do not have this particular statement we are not going to do it." They had to make a decision in principle about whether to save it and they had to use the information that was available. What was the information that was available? They had available the auditors' statements, which were unreservedly in support of the bank, the opinion of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that it was the thing to do, and they had the observations of the banks. The six chartered banks and the Bank of Canada are not unsophisticated investors. They know as much about the activities of their competition as anyone else is likely to know. They had the information before them and the government had the same information. They decided on the basis of that information that they would subscribe to the principle that the bank ought to be saved.

It did not work. There is nobody on the side of the government who will try and gloss over that fact because it is impossible to do so, even if one were to try. I do not gloss over it. It did not work. The cost of this situation is probably more expensive than if we had let the bank go at the time. However, when you consider the advice and forces that were brought to bear at the moment of the decision, it seems to me that reasonable people might well agree that the government had little choice but to take the step that it took. That is the position that I subscribe to here tonight. It seems to me that the information that the government had was the only set of facts that it could work on. It could decide that the information was not good enough, that it would not go ahead with the bail-out. That was a possibility, but in view of the information from the auditors, the opinions of the other banks who are in the business and have a vested interest in being correct in these things, I think the government was entitled to place some weight and some merit on the information given to it. So here we have this deplorable result, and I make no bones about making that statement.

I would like to deal now with a couple of other points that I think are important and they are in the areas where the committee disagreed. The committee did not disagree as to the situation with respect to the management of the bank; it did not disagree with respect to the actions of the auditors; it did not disagree with the action of Governor Bouey; it did not disagree with respect to its attitude toward what the Inspector General was doing. That was common ground, so I do not intend to cover that at all. However, it did disagree on a couple of other things and one was confidentiality. We know that we are split on confidentiality, and we are not split on a party basis. We are split on a different basis, and we have just as many government supporters on one side as we have members of the opposition. It seems to me that we will soon have an opportunity to find out what the best opinion is on that when Mr. Justice Estey renders his report, because the likelihood is that he has been asked to deal with this matter and he will say what he thinks about it.

Senator Frith: That is like locking the stable door after the horse is stolen.

Senator Roblin: It does not matter if you are locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen. What matters is that you get the thing right, and we are going to try to get it right. We intend to wait and get what we think is not a political judgment but a more judicial one. I do not blame members of Parliament for having political opinions. That is what we are here for, and one can see the politics running all the way through those parts of the report on which we disagree. That is clear enough. However, a satisfactory settlement of those things will probably not be achieved within a political forum; it is more likely to come in a judicial one, and I think we will hear more about confidentiality when Mr. Justice Estey reports. I think he will rule that, all things considered, confidentiality is the right way to go, although I cannot predict that that is what he will do.

Senator Frith: If he rules the other way, then it is too late.

Senator Roblin: On the other main point on which we disagreed with respect to the reimbursement of the banks, I have to admit that that is a difficult question. Senator Sinclair put the case for the banks, I think, in the strongest possible terms. However, there is another argument. Regardless of what sympathy I have for his argument—and it is considerable—I have to point out to you that the banks did not enter into this matter as an act of charity. It was not altruism; it was not even concern for the CCB that brought them into the act. It was certainly one which was primarily motivated—as it should be—by what they regarded as a combination of policy and self-interest. On what other basis could they possibly justify it? Of course they did that. They entered into it because they were concerned about the stability of the system, which indicates again their opinion at the time that it was worthwhile to try and save the bank. They went into it because they knew that they would be involved in the CDIC situation and that this might indeed help them with their losses. Who is to know? They went into it because they accepted—and I am sure they did—the opinion of the Governor of the Bank of Canada that the thing would work, and they went into it because they had a letter of comfort from the Inspector General of Banks. If they had not received a letter of comfort, it would have been a great surprise to me, because you know what banks are like when it comes to pieces of paper.

They went into it for all of those reasons, but they are sophisticated money managers. They know the banking system and they understood their risk. I can understand them asking for their money back. They have a substantial case, but when you come to weigh the pros and cons of that case, I think it is very difficult to conclude that without a shadow of a doubt they are entitled to reimbursement. I must say that I have that shadow of a doubt.

Honourable senators, I do not wish to detain the house much longer because there have been a great many speeches on this subject and there is not an iota of the matter that has not been covered in one way or another. However, I just want to come back to the principle of ministerial responsibility because that has exercised a number of members. I was brought up in the traditions of the British parliamentary system where ministerial responsibility, I must admit, is regarded in a somewhat different light from the way it is regarded here. I do not intend to recite precedents, but in the last Parliament and in the last government, there were a number of occasions on which some of us—and I hope I was not among them, although I cannot guarantee it—asked for the resignation of various ministers of the previous government on the very same ground of ministerial responsibility, and we were rebuffed; nobody resigned. Therefore I think that one must say that the tradition in Canada is not that clear. I also think there is another—

Senator Frith: You did not have as good a case, that's all.

Senator Doody: You did not have as good ministers, either.

Senator Frith: Poor comparison, I am bound to say.

Senator Roblin: I will tell you one thing: My honourable friend opposite is a good lawyer. He may not have a good case, but he is a good lawyer and he makes the best of it, and I congratulate him on it. However, it seems to me that this question of ministerial responsibility is not as clear-cut as some members of the opposition would have us believe. I have traced in some detail the source of the information which ministers get; I have traced in some detail the kind of support that their judgment received from people whom we are entitled to respect. If we cannot place credence in the opinion of the Governor of the Bank of Canada on financial matters, then just who can we place any confidence in? He is not even a creature of the government. The government cannot order him to say anything unless they give him the instruction in writing. Otherwise, he is a completely free agent, as he was on this occasion, and he was in on the act from 1983, so one would imagine that he kept pretty close tabs on this whole situation.

When one considers the opinion of the trade, of the bankers; when one considers all of those things, it is not just a question of whether the Inspector General of Banks produced the right information or not; it is the fact that the financial community as a whole deemed that this policy was the best one to follow—

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Olson: Is it a committee decision to bring the bill into Parliament?

Senator Roblin: No, it is not; the government must do that, just as we have brought this bill in. However, on the basis of all that, to say that without a shadow of a doubt some minister ought to resign is, to me, a case that is certainly not proven and I, myself, would not support it.

I say here that we have a bill which is a blow to the Minister of Finance, and let us be sure about that. It is one that has set back our plans to reform the budgetary and deficit situation, which had been showing an improvement over anything we have seen in the last five or six years. It has set that back. I think the economy and the public finances will be strong enough to get over it, but it certainly is a setback and it is a grave disappointment to those who are responsible for the public finances upon whom this burden is being imposed. However, it seems to me that when you have given the depositors in those banks what seems to me to be a pretty clear assurance that it was a safe and prudent thing to do, and this out of the mouths of the most important financial luminaries in the country, not including the ministers, it seems to me that there is a liability that is hard to avoid—if one wished to avoid it—not to deprive those depositors of the full protection that is provided in this bill. I myself express the opinion that I hope that arrangements will be so iron-clad from now on that this situation will not be something that we will have to repeat. The question was asked: What is the government doing to see that it does not happen again? You will be informed, honourable senators, that the government intends to do quite a lot because we want to make sure that not only the CDIC but the Office of the Inspector General and, indeed, the whole regulatory system is completely overhauled and reviewed in the light of what we have learned. I am sure that will come as a welcome piece of information to the members of this house. So be assured, the government is not complacent. We do not take this thing lightly. We regard it as one of the most serious and difficult problems we have had to face. We are not sure that we have the gift of always being right—I do not think we have, but I can say that we have done our best in a difficult situation, and one which I find a good conscience in speaking to justify here tonight.

Senator Frith: Not repentant enough, I might add.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

CRIMINAL CODEBILL TO AMEND (LOTTERIES)—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill C-81, to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Bill C-81 is the famous lotteries bill. Briefly, the background is that the federal government and the provincial governments entered into an agreement, the essence of which was that the federal government would get out of the lottery business in exchange for a payment by the provinces of $100 million to support the Calgary Olympic Games, and the provincial governments would totally occupy the field of lotteries.

So that honourable senators will understand what is an excellent report from the committee, the problem, in a nutshell, was that it seemed to us in the committee, and we received evidence to this effect, that the amendments to the Criminal Code that were presented to us as a part of the agreement went much further than they needed to go in order to implement the agreement. I must say that we had conflicting evidence on that subject. We heard from the Province of Ontario on the amendments that were before us—and they were of two main categories; one was a simple amendment that repealed, in effect, the federal jurisdiction or occupation in this area. That we had no difficulty with at all. Then there were a long series of amendments to those provisions in the Criminal Code that deal with lotteries and gambling generally. They seemed to be there as a part of the federal government's undertaking to implement the agreement and make certain amendments to the Criminal Code of Canada.

Ontario took the position that those amendments were very wide and expanded, in effect, the areas for legalized gambling in Canada under the auspices of the provinces. In particular, we were told that it would now be legitimate and legal to use and have slot machines in casino-type gambling operations run under the auspices of the provinces.

Then we heard evidence that said that this bill did not really expand that law because, at the present time, all provinces had that power as a result of the interpretation of a decision in the Loto-Quebec case. So we had that conflicting evidence.

One thing was very clear to us, and that is that if that was so then, even without the bill being passed, the provinces have had, do have and will have the power to run casino-type operations, including slot machines. They did not know that because none of the provinces tried to run those operations. So, we can assume that most provinces at least did not think they had that power.

Then the federal representatives told us that not only does this bill not expand the law, it restricts the current law because it limits certain types of gambling to the provinces themselves and does not permit them to be licensed. Again, that may be the case—that is, that this is not an expansion—but we did get, for example, a response from the Attorney General of Manitoba saying that we should pass the bill with the clear implication that Manitoba felt that they would now be able to use slot machines, whereas the Attorney General of Manitoba did not think they could up to that time.

So, what it comes down to is this, honourable senators; I think that the report really merits careful reading. It does sound the alarm bell; it shows that the study by the Senate committee has raised considerable concerns as to whether or not this does expand the possibilities for gambling. I think most of the members of the committee are satisfied that when we pass this bill we will have taken another step towards legalized gambling.

If honourable senators think back, many will remember, as I remember, the days when this all started. In Canada, generally, I think the public perception was, or the conventional wisdom as to the morality of gambling was that it was not a moral pursuit, that it had terrible consequences for individuals and terrible consequences for society in terms of expanded criminal activity, expanded corruption and, of course, lost lives and ruined lives, and all the traditional corollaries, the unacceptable and terrible corollaries, to wide-spread gambling.

Then honourable senators will remember that those were the days when gambling related to the Irish Sweepstakes. People would gamble on the Irish Sweepstakes. Then the idea started to develop: "Well, why should we have Canadians gambling on the Irish Sweepstakes with the money all going to the Irish hospitals? Why not legitimize it? Why not allow that sort of gambling in Canada?" Honourable senators must remember that the word was "allow". That was, again, the honeyed word that led us to start—

Senator Doody: On the slippery path.

Senator Frith: —on the slippery path, exactly. We started, for the first time, hearing a distant bell saying: "Perhaps the state allowing gambling is not a bad thing; perhaps there is nothing immoral about that." That was the first blow against whatever principle existed as to the morality of gambling.

Then what happened? Then the state got into gambling.

Senator Petten: And the churches.

Senator Frith: Yes, that is a bit of an irony—that is, if it is a moral issue to gamble, why should churches be involved in it? Let us just get back to the state because it is the state that we are concerned with when we are talking about the approval of gambling. We started permitting it when the state realized what kind of income it could get from gambling. It was no longer a matter of permitting it but a matter of encouraging it with the publicity that money was being made from it. The situation is now that you cannot get on a subway in Toronto, you cannot drive down the highway, you can hardly open a magazine without the state saying to its citizens, not simply, "Gambling is permitted" but saying, "Please gamble. This is something we are encouraging you to do. Come and join the fun." I know the plaintive last cry in the wilderness because I know that the game is over when it has got to the point where the state is spending money encouraging people to gamble. Then it is no longer possible to say that our country considers gambling to be a vice, a sin, an undesirable activity, and I urge honourable senators—

Senator Doody: That is why Senator Austin gave it up.

Senator Frith: Are we into uranium?

Senator Doody: Was he not looking after the lottery business here for a while?

Senator Frith: I suppose so but I do not quite get the relevance of that remark.

Senator Olson: He is just as close to it as he usually is.

Senator Frith: It observes the rule of relevance, you mean, as much as it ever does. If we are going to talk personalities and who here has gambled or been involved in running the government's involvement in gambling, I think that is another subject and perhaps Senator Doody will entertain us on that later in the debate. I do not think that we should let this bill pass without the comment that it is just a further step in the state's enthusiastic involvement in legalized gambling. I think it is another illustration of the frustration sometimes of being a Canadian senator when my political power does not match my constitutional power, and that is one of the reasons I am in favour of an elected Senate, but that is getting away from the rule of relevancy, too.

Senator Doody: You might entertain us on that subject at a later date.

Senator Frith: I thought you might mention that. I am sure Senator Austin, if he were here, would have said the same thing, but he is not.

I must say with respect to this agreement concerning lotteries, signed by ministers of sport and so on without the involvement of the Attorneys General, that if I had the political muscle that could match my constitutional muscle, I would certainly vote against those portions of this bill that deal with amendments to the Criminal Code, and would insist that the normal processes that go on when criminal law is amended be observed and not just thrown in as an "oh, incidentally" as they are attached to this agreement.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a brief point to make with respect to Bill C-81. There is a sentence in the twelfth report of the committee which states:

Our concerns with respect to the process of its development and passage in the House of Commons remain, however. We have felt constrained to go into some detail in this report, because these issues were not canvassed in an adequate fashion in the House, where the Bill was considered, in Committee of the Whole and on third reading—

The point I want to make is that I do not think we appreciate the other House commenting on our behaviour or querying why we do or do not do things. I think it is inappropriate to comment on the conduct of the proceedings in the other House and, furthermore, I do not think that the Senate needs to justify why it looks into a matter in its report. If we see things that need to be commented on and suggestions or conclusions made, we should rest on that and not claim that we are doing it because somebody else did not do their job.

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, before I make a few brief comments, I should like to respond to Senator Olson in my capacity as deputy chairman of the committee. The committee's view was that had the House of Commons committee made any kind of review of this matter, our committee would have had much less concern and anxiety over this particular bill. But it seems that we got saddled with it, quite frankly without much help. It may be a little unusual that on the report of a bill we have gone into such detail, but there was an attempt made yesterday to report this bill, and with a view to covering almost all of the concerns of the committee we have gone into a reasonably detailed report.

Getting back to the spirit of non-partisanship, Senator Frith has just asked me off the record to raise another point which is a valid one. We know in the lottery business alone across Canada the take from the Canadian public—I assume they are almost all Canadians who purchase lottery tickets—is in the range of $2 billion. The thoroughbred industry has a take of about $2 billion. In Senator Frith's impassioned plea for some morality in the country—and I do not make light of it—that is a tax on what I am sure is the poor to the tune of approximately $4 billion. If someone were to examine the market for either of those two items, you would find a reasonably lower level of the already low income group.

Senator Doody: If they were not low income when they started, they will be low income when they finish.

Senator Nurgitz: As my colleague, Senator Doody, says, if they were not low income when they started, they will be low income when they finish.

Senator Frith: Like horse players who are not broke when they start but they sure are later on.

Senator Nurgitz: There is one thing for us to comment on in considering whether this is good or bad. It is a law that we are providing for the provinces, and there is an agreement signed by ten provincial governments, and it does not say that "we are lotteries ministers." It says that "Her Majesty in the right of the province of" and it binds the government. We did have some conflicting evidence, and without any of us playing lawyer, there is some suggestion that the agreement may be politically binding but not legally binding. The committee felt that its purpose was to approve the bill so as to provide the politically binding mechanism for the political will of these ten governments and the federal government.

I should like to mention that the committee report does not mention a telegram received from the minister responsible for lotteries in the province of Saskatchewan as well as from a comparable minister in the province of New Brunswick and from the newly appointed Minister of Finance of Quebec.

Honourable senators, I should point out that the RCMP and the Ontario Provincial Police provided evidence that, in two provinces of Canada, Manitoba and Alberta, there is a wide range of this kind of operation going on and that there is no other rational conclusion to come to except that it is very well run.

On the other hand, we heard evidence that in the province of Ontario there is a fair amount of illicit gambling going on, that is, non-governmentally-controlled and non-supervised gambling and that, in fact, it includes, if I can just use generalities, well-known undesirables. The evidence referred to organized crime families.

I am not suggesting for a moment that if we had this kind of legislation we would resolve that problem, but, I guess, I am suggesting that if you do not provide a proper mechanism, an improper mechanism will be found.

Earlier today, I was pointing out to Senator Frith that in the Ottawa Citizen one can find, in the sports pages, a listing of every National Football League team and its players who are hurt; what the injury is; what the likelihood is of that player playing this weekend, whether it is probable or possible; what the betting line is; and then you can have your choice, if you like, because the United Press International will give you their picks. They often indicate how well their picks have been going—they have been right so many times and wrong so many times.

Senator Frith: Like a tip sheet.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes, like a tip sheet. They are touts. The Ottawa Citizen is a tout.

Senator Frith: Or an accessory.

Senator Nurgitz: An accessory to a tout.

Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the chamber much longer. The committee gave serious and extensive consideration to all aspects of this matter, which is a credit to our chairman, Senator Neiman. The committee came to this conclusion. As well, we found no real substantive opposition, even when we looked for it.

Therefore, honourable senators, I urge passage of this bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

TAX REBATE DISCOUNTING ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-83, to amend the Tax Rebate Discounting Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), moved that this bill be read the second time now.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to address you regarding Bill C-83, to amend the Tax Rebate Discounting Act.

This bill, and the total package of initiatives dealing with the practice of tax rebate discounting, ensures the protection of consumers while being consistent with government policy to maintain an efficient, equitable marketplace for the benefit of all Canadians.

Among other things, an efficient marketplace means that those goods and services desired by consumers are available for them. An equitable marketplace means that consumers have the protection and information they require to make informed choices. These are the principles that have been applied in the government's approach to tax rebate discounting.

[Translation]

A Senate committee has already made a preliminary study of Bill C-83. During the committee hearings, two facts stood out very clearly. First of all, we have to correct the deficiencies in the present legislation, to adjust to the circumstances of today's market.

Second, the entire series of measures presented by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs includes some excellent solutions to the various problems caused by the practice of tax rebate discounting. I wish to congratulate the Minister as well as the members of your committee who were generally agreed that the changes were necessary.

[English]

The government's comprehensive package of reforms comprises five initiatives; two of them are legislative.

First, Bill C-83 will lower the cost of discounting. This is particularly important for the low-income Canadians who are the main clientele of tax discounters. Under the new rate structure, fees charged will be limited to 15 per cent on the first $300 of a refund; this takes into account the discounter's fee for filling out a tax return. For any portion of a refund over $300, the rate will be held to 5 per cent.

In practical terms, this means that under the new rate the most a person would have to pay on a discounted refund of $1,000 would be $80, while under the old rate, the cost would have been $150—a saving of nearly 50 per cent.

The bill will increase consumer protection by improving the government's capacity to administer, to detect and to prosecute violations of the Tax Rebate Discounting Act. For example, the time limit on prosecutions under the act will be extended to two years, from the present six months. In the past, it was not unusual to have the time limit expire before complaints could be fully investigated.

In addition, the bill will spell out client rights. Discounters will be made to show clients their calculations, and clients will be sent a form showing the actual amount of the refund received by the discounter, along with the notice of assessment.

[Translation]

Third, certain measures will be introduced subsequently by the Minister of Finance to provide for payment at regular intervals of the Child Tax Credit, and this will be done before the deadline for filing 1986 income tax returns. In this way, it will be possible to practically eliminate the need for resorting to Child Tax Credit discounting.

Fourth, by providing simple administrative measures, the legislation will make it possible for financial institutions such as credit co-ops and credit unions more readily to provide alternatives to discounting. For instance, these new measures could make it easier for financial institutions to obtain from Revenue Canada the information they might need to accelerate processing of a loan application on the basis of an expected tax rebate.

Fifth, honorable senators, the government will launch an information campaign to ensure that consumers are well informed about the facts concerning their tax rebate, including the time it takes to process income tax returns, the fee for completing the returns, the cost of the actual discount and the alternatives to this practice.

The information campaign for the general public will include mailings, together with the Family Allowance cheques, of information concerning tax rebate discounting. Furthermore, the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will be working in close co-operation with the appropriate consumer organizations and legal aid clinics.

I think it would be appropriate to congratulate the minister on the way these measures were taken. Consultation has always been a fundamental policy of the present government in the last year, and Bill C-83 follows in the same tradition. This bill is the result of effective consultation with a host of intervenors. The many views that were aired included those of provincial governments, consumer associations, tax rebate discounters, social service agencies, the business world, parliamentarians and the general public. A working paper was published last June. The subject was also examined at the federal-provincial conference of Ministers of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in September.

[English]

● (1920)

The widespread support these measures have already received from various provincial and territorial governments and from groups such as the Consumers' Association of Canada is a tribute to the effectiveness of the consultation that has gone into their development. The consultation process showed that the status quo was unacceptable.

Arguments for a ban should be rejected. I know that the New Democratic Party would like to have this practice banned. I do not think that that view is shared by many people. It is not shared by the Official Opposition in the House, nor is it shared by members of the government. Canadian consumers are quite capable of making the choices that are in their own best interests. Canadians have shown by their numbers—over 500,000 in 1984—that they wish to use the services of tax discounters. A denial of this kind of market choice would have been unfair. The challenge was to protect the consumers, reform the service and make it work rather than to abolish it.

[Senator Simard.]

Likewise, it was argued that discounting of the Child Tax Credit should have been banned. The government's role was to prevent the diversion of the Child Tax Credit payments away from low income recipients. This will be done fairly and effectively through the system of periodic payment that I have mentioned.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, since Canadians have expressed the wish to have the choice of dealing with tax discounters, the real challenge therefore was to reform the discounting practice. The government began to tackle the concrete problems inherent in that practice and came up with a series of measures designed to revamp a service which Canadians want to use, as they have clearly indicated.

The government faced the challenge. It is to be hoped that both sides of the house will endorse this bill, because these important measures will ensure that discounting will be carried out as any other legitimate commercial practice. The market economy will be protected and consumers will be able to make the necessary choices to make it possible for that market to operate properly.

So far the work on Bill C-83 has progressed rapidly in the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, as it did in the other place. I am convinced and I sincerely hope that this progress will be maintained until Royal Assent.

[English]

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I should first like to thank Senator Simard for an enlightening outline of Bill C-83 and for the explanation he presented in support of the bill.

Bill C-83 is a good news and a bad news bill. It is good news because it does improve the present situation. It is bad news because it just does not go quite far enough. Under it, tax rebate discounters will still flourish, and probably more and more people will be forced, through necessity, to avail themselves of these services. As was explained by the sponsor of the bill, there will be additional capacity to administer, detect and prosecute violations of the Tax Rebate Discounting Act. This will be assisted by a change that will allow prosecutions under the act up to a time limit of two years rather than to the present time limit of six months.

The government will later introduce measures that will provide for the periodic payment of the Child Tax Credit so as to enable the recipient to get the payment before income tax returns are due. This will greatly reduce the need to use a discounter. We will wait with anticipation for this proposed change.

The act will encourage financial institutions to offer the same service as tax discounters but at substantially lower consumer credit rates. The minister indicated that this will, at least for the present, probably be a service provided by credit unions and caisses populaires. It would appear that other financial institutions have not shown much interest in this approach. Those who use tax discounting services are to get more information so that they have better knowledge of what is involved.

These changes, honourable senators, are what Bill C-83 will enact into law. For the opposition side of the Senate, these improvements go some way in alleviating what has become a growing burden on the poor.

Under the new act, a taxpayer with a refund due of, for example, $800, which is about the average, will lose 15 per cent of the first $300, or $45, and 5 per cent of the balance of $500, or $25, for a total of $70. Under the old act he would have paid 15 per cent of the $800 refund, or $120. Thus the change does make possible a substantial savings. For going this far, I applaud the government, but what we must really consider is the overall question of tax discounting: Who uses the service? We must also consider whether it should be legal at all.

I would point out that in the United States it is not legal, nor is it legal in the province of Quebec for provincial tax rebates. An interesting sidelight is that the largest tax discounters are H&R Block, a U.S. controlled company, along with Ben-Tax, a subsidiary of Beneficial Finance, also an American controlled company. These two firms together did over 80 per cent of the discounting business, and, I understand, very profitably.

During the 1970s, tax discounting sprang up on a relatively small scale and it was not controlled. Some discounters charged what could be called disgraceful rates. In 1979 about 7,000 individuals availed themselves of the service of discounters. The government of the day realized that something had to be done and regulated discounters by enacting legislation that limited the discount to 15 per cent and included the preparation of the tax return. Regarding the tax return, it is usually a simple preparation. Those who are forced to use discounters for tax rebates do not often have complicated tax returns.

It is often argued that the cost of the income tax return would take care of what the individual loses by discounting. The preparation of the income tax form can be done by the claimant without too much difficulty. Indeed, we all applaud the many community groups that help individuals prepare their income tax returns. In addition, Revenue Canada, according to the minister, will offer Canadians information that may be needed through its system of regional offices.

As I have stated, Bill C-83 is a step in the right direction, but it does not go quite far enough.

I say this because it is an unfair tax on the poor. It has grown from 7,000 claimants in 1979 to 515,000 claimants in 1985. That is quite a little jump. Despite warnings by some discounters that the 15 per cent limit would put them out of business, the industry has grown by leaps and bounds. It has prospered in large measure because of poverty in the country, and also because of new programs that have been developed, particularly Child Tax Credits.

● (1930)

It should be noted that two-thirds of the persons using the tax discount process had incomes of $8,000 or less, a figure far below the poverty line in Canada. A large number are heads of single-parent families with incomes that are desperately low.

Other shocking statistics are that in 1983, 61.6 per cent of the male clients of discounters had an annual income of less than $8,000; and, what is even worse, the figure for females was 82 per cent. So we can see who makes use of the service.

Some would say that the new bill is effective because the amount lost by discounting will generally be less than it was. But whatever the amount, for the poor who use this service, every dollar is important for a marginal standard of living.

It is not enough that the Child Tax Credit shall be paid in instalments, as promised by the minister. If this is done, it will certainly help; but even if that happens, there will still be some tax discounting of Child Tax Credits. It will be done by people who desperately need every penny that can be obtained at the earliest possible moment.

With tax rebates getting larger year by year, it could well be argued that there should be a maximum set rate; and perhaps a figure of $75 maximum would be reasonable.

At the very least, the Child Tax Credit should be excluded from any tax discounting at all. It would not be a terrible hardship on the needy. The Department of Revenue has speeded up the refund process. As of now, the usual wait should be no longer than eight weeks, and, in many cases, it may be done in four weeks. Indeed, it is important that a reduction in the time taken by Revenue Canada to get out the refund cheques should be a prime objective of the government.

It is my hope that in future discounting tax rebates will be made illegal, as it is in the United States. It is an opinion shared by many national organizations. It should be recalled that on April 2, 1985, the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs in the other place reported:

The federal government, in consultation with provincial governments, should take steps to outlaw tax rebate discounters.

Provincial Ministers of Consumer Affairs are unanimous in believing that the discounting of Child Tax Credits should not be allowed.

A large part of the business of discounting tax refunds involves Child Tax Credits. In 1983 almost half of all of the users of discounters claimed a Child Tax Credit, and the figure is 83.5 per cent for women claimants.

Income tax rebating is big business, with fees earned in 1984 of $41 million, of which more than $15 million came from claims for rebates for the Child Tax Credits.

I believe that allowing credit unions, caisses populaires, or other co-operating financial institutions to make loans at normal consumer rates, to replace the tax refund discounter, may ease the problem a little; but I predict that it will make a small inroad into the growing number who use the high-cost service of income tax discounters.

In June 1985 the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs published a discussion paper on tax rebate discounting, outlining the historic development, the current system, the options available, and the limitations on federal action. It was a candid and complete presentation of the subject. The paper used many statistics which are of interest, and I will give honourable senators just one dealing with median incomes. The 1983 median income of all tax filers was $13,520. The median income of all discountees was $5,573. The median income of all female tax filers was $8,884—which is a very dramatic indication of the income status of those who use tax discounters.

What was the response of national organizations to that discussion paper? The Consumers' Association of Canada favours lowering the discount rate to 7 per cent and suggests that discounters should be required to have past business experience, and that only year-round operations should be licensed. It also recommends the streamlining of Revenue Canada's taxation procedures so that refunds on uncomplicated returns can be expedited.

The National Anti-Poverty Organization takes the position that tax rebate discounting should be illegal. It argues that such services are very tempting for the poor, but that they lose too much in the transaction. In its opinion, in addition to increased credit facilities for the poor, a streamlining of the tax refund system by the government is the key to ending the exploitation; and it points to Quebec's legislation as a single efficient model. The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women responded as follows:

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women recently considered the question of tax rebate discounting, and has resolved that the practice should be immediately outlawed.

Another sentence from their reply is:

By prohibiting the practice, benefits received by low income Canadians would rise by $41 million, without increasing the deficit.

That sounds to me like a good use of money. I fully respect the opinion of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that people should have freedom of choice, and for that reason he feels that the amended act, with its new features, should be helpful in assisting them. However, I do not agree that his solution is the best one. An individual cannot sell to a discounter his Old Age Pension or Family Allowance. I believe the same should apply to child tax benefits.

As Canadians, the government and the people want to do whatever is financially possible to assist the poor and needy. Bill C-83 helps to a degree, and for this we must be thankful. However, it does not go quite far enough, as I stated earlier. It is my hope that the government will closely monitor the results and will bring in further amendments that will rectify the situation, or will abolish entirely the whole practice of tax rebate discounting. We, as a responsible opposition, will co-operate fully with any government action to assist the needy in this country.

Honourable senators, I would again like to thank Senator Simard for his presentation. We will support this bill; and since this is the last bill that we shall be dealing with in 1985, I would like to take this opportunity to wish all honourable senators the very best.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Lucier.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA
GOVERNMENT HOUSE

20 December 1985

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 20th day of December, 1985, at 8.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be
Sir,

Your obedient servant,
Leopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable
The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting the reorganization of the Canada Development Corporation (Bill C-66, Chapter 49).

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (prostitution) (Bill C-49, Chapter 50).

An Act respecting the provision of compensation to depositors of Canadian Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank in respect of uninsured deposits (Bill C-79, Chapter 51).

An Act to amend the Criminal Code (lotteries) (Bill C-81, Chapter 52).

An Act to amend the Tax Rebate Discounting Act (Bill C-83, Chapter 53).

The Honourable John W. Bosley, Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986 (Bill C-89, Chapter 54).

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

CHRISTMAS GREETINGS

Hon. C. William Doody: (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before I put the adjournment motion, may I take this opportunity to wish all my colleagues on both sides of the house a very Merry Christmas and best wishes for the coming year and for many years to come.

Please do not take all this too lightly. I honestly mean it. It has been a very pleasant year. I look forward to many more pleasant years. After that last exhibition, I am happy that I am in the Senate, as I am sure the rest of you are.

[Translation]

The Hon. The Acting Speaker: Before leaving, I too would like to wish you a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year. The best way to do this is to drink to your health.

[English]

Before I leave the Chair, I should like to express to you best wishes for Christmas and the New Year, and there is no better way to offer greetings than by raising a glass of cheer.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, because of the late hour, I have decided not to proceed with the prepared speech and program of carols I had intended to offer this evening.

I simply say, on behalf of my colleagues on this side, that I ditto with enthusiasm the comments of Senator Doody and His Honour the Acting Speaker.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 21st January, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 21, 1986, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, January 21, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

HON. JEAN-PAUL DESCHATELETS, P.C.

TRIBUTES ON RESIGNATION FROM SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was very sorry to hear that Senator Jean-Paul Deschatelets has decided to retire from the Senate. He will be greatly missed, and his departure from this chamber means we are losing a man known not only for his exceptional competence and dedication but also for his insight and compassion.

Senator Deschatelets' political career, which goes back three decades, started when he was elected to the House of Commons in the 1953 general election. The fact that he was re-elected every time he stood for Parliament is ample proof of his dedication and hard work. I may add that he was among that handful of Liberals who were elected, and thus had the personal satisfaction of winning their campaign, in the general election of 1958.

In 1963, Senator Deschatelets was appointed Minister of Public Works, and Prime Minister Pearson also made him the minister responsible for Expo 67.

At this point, I would like to say a few words about the tremendous impact Expo had on all Canadians. It not only changed our perception of ourselves as Canadians but also of our country's place within the greater international community. Canada came of age in 1967, and it comes as no surprise that we should owe the organization and success of Expo to Senator Deschatelets.

In 1966, Senator Deschatelets was appointed to the Senate, where he first became Deputy Leader of the Government, and went on to earn the confidence, respect and affection of honourable senators as our Speaker from 1968 to 1972.

Senator Deschatelets has always made the aspirations and concerns of Canadians his own. He was a member of the Special Committee on Retirement Age Policies, which tabled in the Senate its report called "Retirement Without Tears," one of the Senate's most eloquent documents which became a landmark.

In 1981, he suggested setting up a special committee responsible for examining the subject of labour relations in Canada. As we all know, that year was marked by a general strike of post office workers and other equally serious labour disputes. Senator Deschatelets was fearless in his desire to get to the bottom of things in a field that Senator Lawson, an expert on the subject, has described as "this landmine that is across Canada".

A subject that interested Canadians was necessarily of interest to Senator Deschatelets. The senator often commented on the Senate, but there is one remark in particular that will strike a sensitive chord in each one of us here in this chamber, and I quote:

I express the hope that increasingly, the public will realize that as far as the neediest in our country are concerned, the doors of the Senate are always wide open.

And the senator's door has always been and I am sure still is wide open.

[English]

Since his recent absence from the Senate, he has been missed, and he will continue to be missed on both the senatorial and the Canadian political scene.

[Translation]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I felt I had to say a few words in the language that Senator Deschatelets uses with such vigour and eloquence.

To this incredibly warmhearted man, this true French Canadian endowed with a profound understanding of our history and with that measure of patience we shall always need to resolve our most stubborn and thorny problems, I want to say that his political career has won the respect of all those with an interest in the political profession.

We wish to offer our good friend our best wishes for a prompt recovery and for a long, interesting and satisfying retirement.

[English]

Senator Frith quite properly has given the house a recital of the very great accomplishments of our distinguished colleague. I shall not repeat them. We all know Senator Deschatelets as a man who has brought to this chamber a courteous mien, a courtly manner; a man who has demonstrated qualities of reflection; who is capable of incisive comment and contribution to our debates; and, above all, a man of very independent cast of mind. They are no small qualities, and they certainly do not exhaust the list of things that one could say about the merit, virtue and ability of our colleague.

The qualities that remain in my mind, watching him in the performance of his duties here, is the standard of conduct, the standard of deportment, and the standard of intellectual honesty that he brought to the political activity of this house. For those qualities he will certainly be well remembered among the members of this chamber. I know that we all join in wishing that his health may be fully restored and that he may continue to live an active, interesting and productive life.

I am glad to offer to Senator Deschatelets an expression of warm good wishes on behalf of the government in this chamber on the occasion of his retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I had the pleasure and the honour to know Senator Deschatelets long before he considered entering politics. We are old friends.

What has always struck me and what I remember from our friendship, which I hope to maintain, are his sense of conviction and his extreme courtesy at any time and in any circumstance.

Like all of you I am sorry to see him leave, but time does take its toll. I remain in close contact with him and I can say that his health has improved considerably. I wish him good health and I hope he will be able to enjoy long years of retirement filled with good memories.

● (1410)

[English]

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps I could add just a word. When I entered this chamber, Senator Deschatelets was the Speaker of the Senate. After he finished his term as Speaker—and I may say that he was a very good one, too—he became my seat-mate, occupying the seat from which I am now speaking. At that time I was seated in the seat to my right. We became good friends. I do not say that was in consequence of our proximity of seating in the Senate, but at least it gave us an opportunity to get to know one another a little bit better than we might otherwise have done. He is all those things that the honourable senators who preceded me—particularly Senators Frith and Roblin—have said. He is indeed a man who understood the nature of this chamber, who understood the process of government and who understood the function of Parliament. He never failed to contribute to the discussions that were at hand with the independence of mind to which Senator Roblin referred and which was characteristic of him throughout the portion of his political career with which I am familiar. I am sorry that he is gone from our midst. I join those who have spoken in wishing him a satisfactory retirement, an improvement in his health and a life that will continue to be of interest and usefulness to him and to his friends.

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, like many of you, I have known Senator Deschatelets since he came to the Senate. I got to know him particularly well in the last few years when he chose, because of his convictions, to sit with our small group here which some call Independents and others call simply “those who wish to vote according to their conscience.” Since that time I came to know his thinking and I came to know a great deal about Jean-Paul Deschatelets. All that has been said about him by our colleagues today is certainly warranted and more than true because he is a man of the very highest integrity. The fact that he decided to cease to be a member of the caucus does not constitute a reflection on his party, nor does it indicate disagreement with the political process in Parliament. He chose this course simply because he felt that his conscience should direct his actions. As we all know, he has been ill for some time. It is regrettable that we have not had the benefit of his presence and opinions over the last few months. I join with my other colleagues in hoping that during his retirement his health will improve and that he will have many long and happy years.

HIS EXCELLENCY YASUHIRO NAKASONE PRIME MINISTER OF JAPAN

ADDRESS TO MEMBERS OF BOTH HOUSES PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I ask that the address of the Prime Minister of Japan, delivered on January 13, 1986, to both houses of Parliament, the introductory speech by the Right Honourable the Prime Minister of Canada and the speeches of the Speaker pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Commons be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate of this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of address and introductory speeches, see appendix, p. 1843.)

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

CN RAIL—REDUCTIONS IN SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND AND EAST OF MONTREAL

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I have a question relating to the Canadian National Railways and its operations in the east. As reported in the House of Commons Debates, there were two questions raised regarding the proposals for closing operations in Newfoundland and also a general comment relating to all operations east of Montreal.

● (1420)

When the minister dealt with both of these questions, he took quite a strong position, and my question arises out of that position. There is a question mark left arising out of words he used with regard to closing CN's operations in Newfoundland. He said that he and the railway chief denied that there were any informal proposals to close CN Rail operations. In another part of his answer he used the word "formal".

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate try to clarify for us by consulting with his colleague what he meant by the word "formal", and whether CN has made any "informal" suggestions about closing operations in Newfoundland?

The second question arises out of a statement made by a member of the board of directors stating that—and this is supposed to be a quote—"everything east of Montreal is a disaster." I wonder if the Leader of the Government could give us some details on that.

Senator Doody: He was talking about CN Rail.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Marshall: Many things in Toronto are disasters.

Senator Frith: Senator Marshall has said that there are other areas of disaster, and I certainly do not want to limit the minister. However, my question does arise out of the fact that a member of the board is alleged to have said that "everything east of Montreal is a disaster." I wonder if the leader can get us details as to what was meant by that member of the board of directors.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can offer a few comments in answer to the question. It is generally known that the future of CN Rail's operation in Newfoundland is not a new issue; that has been batted around this country for quite some time now. The fact of the matter is that those operations were included as part of the arrangements for the confederation of Newfoundland with the rest of Canada and, as such, that matter has to be treated as a constitutional question.

So, whatever discussions may take place—and I have no knowledge of any that might be described as "informal"—they are meaningless in respect of this matter, because, if any change is contemplated, it will have to be dealt with at the highest levels.

With respect to the part of the question relating to the disastrous rail situation in eastern Canada, I noticed that the member of the board of directors who is quoted—if he said it, in fact—very carefully refrained from advertising his name, because if he had I am sure he would be hearing from many people in Canada who feel that CN Rail provides an essential service in eastern Canada and who expect, quite rightly, that that service will be continued.

Senator Frith: Perhaps the leader could get us that name. There were widespread changes made to the make-up of the board of directors of CN Rail by this administration. A number of members appointed by the previous administration were asked to leave and new appointments were made by the current administration. No doubt the information as to who this director is in the hands of the government, so perhaps we can get that name.

Senator Roblin: The list of names is well known; it is a matter of public information. But I do not think I will undertake to verify a report in a newspaper in respect of this matter, particularly as a question of privilege might well be raised in respect of it.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT AND OTHER CONDITIONS— GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to establishing a national sugar policy. This is a subject Senator Fairbairn and I have been asking questions on for a number of months now. My notes indicate that on May 28 we began asking the government what the sugar policy was going to be. However, Senator Fairbairn may have raised a question even earlier than that.

Since we are coming to the time of year when farmers are making advance preparations for what they intend to seed, I wonder if we could know now, or soon, whether or not there will be a national sugar policy in place that will allow sugar-beet producers in southern Alberta to prepare to plant a crop this year.

My second question is a related one because it affects the same area, in part, although the area is somewhat larger. I wonder if we could know the terms and conditions under which the payments will be made to the producers in the drought area resulting from the $150 million the government announced some time ago. I am unaware if, in fact, the government has issued any instructions as to the terms and conditions and, indeed, who will qualify and who will not qualify for payments out of that fund. Perhaps such instructions have already been issued by the government but, so far as I know, the people who expect to be the recipients of this fund do not yet know whether they qualify, nor do they know the terms and conditions under which they will be paid.

I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government would give us some answers today. If not, would he take notice of my question and, perhaps, provide us with a response tomorrow? After all, the government has now had four weeks since we last raised these questions to prepare the details of administration. Certainly, the producers from the area I represent would like to know what they are going to be.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a policy statement will be forthcoming with respect to the 1986 sugar-beet policy. I am as anxious as my friend to get it on the table. I undertake to continue to request my colleagues to provide that information in good time.

Respecting the second matter, yes, a statement has been made on the crop drought assistance program and application forms have been mailed to farmers in Saskatchewan and Alberta. A telephone number has been provided so that they can obtain any information they require which is not apparently clear to them on receipt of the forms. The toll-free telephone number is 1-800-667-7121. We hope all farmers will be able to get any information they need by the use of that number.

Senator Olson: That is helpful. I wonder if senators or members of Parliament could at least have a printed copy of the terms and conditions, or the regulations, whichever you prefer to call them. I do not mind calling the number since that is easy, but surely a printed form must be available. I will check to see if one has been sent to my office but, if it has not, I would appreciate it if I could have one.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, there has been a general distribution of this information. If, on checking, my honourable friend finds he does not have it, I will be more than pleased to provide him with another copy.

Senator Olson: I have one final supplementary question. Perhaps this matter has not reached the stage of urgency as yet but the question as to whether or not there will be a crop planted in 1986 will become progressively more urgent because, I believe, some of the beet producers will have to know by mid-February if they should make arrangements for seed and for a number of other things for the 1986 production year.

Would the Leader of the Government convey the urgency that is going to become progressively more intense to the people who are involved in announcing policy?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend and I are of one mind in the matter.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, on the outstanding issue of an apology and compensation to Canadians of Japanese descent respecting acts of the Government of Canada during and following World War II, it appears that bills are now proceeding before the U.S. Congress, both the House of Representatives and the Senate, offering an unequivocal apology and direct, partial compensation in the amount of $20,000 U.S. to each American of Japanese descent who was incarcerated in the United States during the Second World War.

I am informed that the Minister of State for Multiculturalism has refused to discuss this issue with community representatives of Canadians of Japanese descent, and intends to announce government policy unilaterally on this question.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us as to the government's position on this question in light of Mr. Mulroney's unequivocal promise reported in the Globe and Mail on May 16, 1984, which was as follows:

—Canadian citizens whose rights were abused and violated and trampled upon indeed should be compensated—

Would he also answer this question in light of the undertaking given by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and announced in a press release by his department dated December 15, 1984, where an undertaking was given to establish a negotiation process? I would quote the points outlined in that statement, which are as follows:

- 1) the time frame for the process of negotiation
- 2) the wording and content of the official acknowledgement of the injustices suffered by Japanese Canadians
- 3) the amount and nature of compensation
- 4) the steps that should be taken to prevent the re-occurrence of such injustices
- 5) the possibilities of a series of meetings with Japanese-Canadian communities across the country

It would be appreciated if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could give us the government's current position in light of these facts.

● (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that is the sort of question I really like to hear in Question Period in the Senate—it lends itself to a short, succinct, decisive answer. But seeing that it does not do any of those things, I shall tell my honourable friend that I think the policy of the present government represents a distinct advance over that of its predecessor, which refused to discuss the matter under any circumstances. Therefore, it seems to me that we must give the minister in charge some credit for his willingness to discuss this matter. I also think that my colleague would not agree that the minister's conduct in respect of this matter would go so far as to refuse to discuss this issue with people on the other side of the question. I will certainly ask him to make a comment on that.

The policy of the government is clear. We recognize the injustice that has been done to these, or, indeed, to any citizens of the country. We are searching for an appropriate way to give expression to that recognition, whether it be in terms of words or in terms of money. However, the real crux of the matter, in my opinion, is to try to find an agreement which is regarded as being equitable by the parties concerned and by the government. That is the problem. I will state frankly that we have not found that meeting place yet; we are still trying to find it. I think I am quite correct in saying that we will persevere in our efforts until something suitable has been worked out.

PENITENTIARIES

CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT STUDY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which will lend itself, I am sure, to a short, succinct response. It deals with the statement made by the Solicitor General that he is "studying" a situation in Kingston Penitentiary where tensions are reported to be high and where inmates are threatening violence. Could the government leader encourage his colleague to include in that study the Drumheller institution and the Stoney Mountain institution, both on the prairies, where I can assure him the same general conditions exist today?

In raising this matter, I should like to advise the Solicitor General that nothing contributes more to unrest and tension in those institutions than change and uncertainty. The conditions prevailing today result, in part, from the overcrowding in practically every institution. Perhaps an even greater contributory factor would be the punitive, regressive steps proposed in the government bills C-67 and C-68—provisions which merely serve to lengthen the sentences of men in custody on the premise that those men will likely commit an offence when released. Those provisions do not offer any long-term measure of public safety, as we are told by the chairman of the National Parole Board. Further, there is no means by which a future offender could be identified or future conduct could be predicted with any degree of success.

Senator Frith: He said that the answer could be short—you cannot have it both ways.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will resist the temptation to reply in kind. I will merely say that I will see that my honourable friend's pointed observations are brought to the attention of the minister.

INDIAN ACT

REINSTATEMENT OF INDIAN WOMEN TO MEMBERSHIP OF INDIAN BANDS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he provide to this chamber a report on the reinstatement of Indian women to band membership and the reinstatement of the first generation offspring to status following the passage of Bill C-31? That occurred, I believe, towards the end of June last. When I was home for the holidays, I received a number of complaints from my friends that this process is slow, indeed. For example, on my home reservation of Okanagan, only one person has been reinstated to band membership.

I will be grateful if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can provide some information in this regard.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend will correct me if I am wrong, but I am under the impression that the reinstatement provisions of Bill C-31 are really in the hands of the bands concerned. In any case, if he will submit his question as an order for return, I will get an answer for him.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I had considered that route but it is a rather slow process. If the government leader would be so kind as to treat this as an urgent matter—because it is an urgent matter—I think that many in the Indian community would be happy. It is now several months since the bill was passed. The minister responsible at the time the bill was being considered assured us that the process would move along quickly, but it has not.

Senator Roblin: I will do my best to expedite this matter for my honourable friend.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no delayed answers to oral questions.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should mention that we had hoped that during the Christmas break some of the outstanding questions would have received attention. We have prepared a list of such questions. I do not want to be mean but I do want to tell the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate that a number of my colleagues are looking forward to answers to their questions, some of which have been on the paper for some time.

Senator Roblin: There are a number of delayed answers to questions which are on my desk now for presentation to the Senate, but we were not quite ready to proceed with them this afternoon. If my honourable friend would be so kind as to give to me his list, I will do what I can to expedite any of those that are still outstanding.

Senator Frith: I will gladly do so.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to Order No. 4 and if I have read my notices of committee meetings correctly, it would seem that our colleague, Senator Flynn, has before him a busy week in terms of his responsibilities as joint chairman of the Committee on International Relations. Since Order No. 4 stands in his name, I wish to inform him and the government that we would like to refer this subject matter to committee. Senator Flynn and I have almost reached agreement on this. I mention it only because he will no doubt be reading the Debates of the Senate. When he returns, perhaps we can discuss having this matter referred to committee, as is the intent of the amendment.

Senator Doody: I will certainly pass that information along to Senator Flynn.

Order stands.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-FOURTH ANNUAL CONFERENCE, OTTAWA, AND SPRING CONFERENCE, LOMÉ, TOGO—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-fourth Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union which was hosted by Canada in Ottawa from 2nd to 7th September, 1985, as well as to the spring Conference which took place in Lomé, Togo, from 25th to 30th March, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On November 7, honourable senators, our colleague Senator Bosa gave us a summary of the 74th Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union which was held in Ottawa in early September 1985.

I want to explain why I am taking the floor today: the fact is that Senator Bosa did not tell you everything. He did not mention a rather disagreeable behind-the-scenes incident which occurred during the conference. Since Senator Bosa was not directly involved in those problems, he did not have to refer to them in his remarks, and therefore I do not blame him.

However, I consider the incident serious enough to mention it today. This fact which some people would say was incidental reveals that our traditional freedom of expression is a fragile structure which can come crashing down in the presence of ill-advised, unscrupulous and badly informed individuals.

Over the years I have had the privilege of being chairman of a parliamentary association, the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française, AIPLF for short, and of taking part in many conferences held in various countries as well as here in Canada. Never had I witnessed episodes as unpleasant as those which took place during the conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in Ottawa.

As an executive member of the Canadian section and the organizing committee, I had been entrusted, together with a colleague of the House of Commons, with the direction of a sub-committee responsible for the security of the delegates and the facilities during the conference which was held at the Ottawa Congress Centre. I attended faithfully all the proceedings, even though I was not an official delegate. I feel, therefore, that I am well enough informed of the incidents to tell you about them, I hope, objectively.

It had been decided that a number of seats would be reserved for members of the public anxious to attend these proceedings. Moreover, both as host and organizer of the conference, the Canadian section had agreed to make sure that the public could attend. A contract signed with the officials of the Union's head office in Geneva contained a clause to this effect. Only a few people took advantage of this opportunity, in view of the fact that the conference took place at the end of the summer holiday. The principle had been therefore fully established: there would be no conference without a free admission of the public.

Yet, at one point, a group of six or seven young Iranian men, extremely polite and cleanly dressed, including one with a Canadian citizenship came in. Absolutely all of them had met the security and protocol requirements to be admitted to the conference. One of them had registered with the Press Office. As far as I know, none of them had a criminal or terrorist record. Yet, they were treated in an extremely disrespectful manner by Canadians. At the rear of the general assembly hall, there was a room where delegates, observers and members of the general public could buy food from a cafeteria and have conversations with other delegates and other participants in the conference. Other services, admirably well coordinated by a dynamic staff of parliamentary relations, the Senate and the House of Commons, were also provided in that area. The young Iranians used these facilities to seek discretely—I repeat, discretely—the support of national delegations and individual parliamentarians for the following statement, written in English, and which I will quote in extenso:

● (1440)

[English]

In view of our firm belief in the right of existence for every individual on earth, and peaceful co-existence among the nations, we the undersigned, members of parliaments from various countries of the world, take the opportunity of the 74th Inter-Parliamentary Conference to urge governments, parliaments and International Organizations to embark upon the following:

1—Constant endeavour to bring an end to the Iran-Iraq conflict now well into its fifth year. Recent years of the war indicate that a peaceful settlement, as a result of which the lives of thousands may be saved, is well achievable. Various proposals have been put forward by Mr. Perez de Cuellar, the UN Secretary General, by the Islamic conference, and by the Non-Aligned Movement in this regard, including the NCR (National Council of Resistance) Peace Plan proposed by Mr. Massoud Rajavi, the leader of the Iranian Resistance, on 13 March 1983, according to which a peaceful settlement calling for the immediate declaration of a cease fire, withdrawal of the armed forces to the internationally-recognized borderlines before the commencement of the war, and the exchange of prisoners of war under the supervision of the International Red Cross, has been deemed agreeable. This plan has met the approvals of the Council of Europe (Written Declaration No. 123, 31 January 1985) and the European Parliament (Document B2-527/85, 11 June 1985).

2—Denunciation of the abuse of human rights in Iran which has so far led to thousands of executions, regarding which a list of 10,300 victims has been published, particularly bearing in mind the Iranian people's desire to attain human rights and fundamental liberties in that country.

In view of our commitment to uphold human rights, peace and democracy, we deem appropriate to stress upon the necessity of backing by the world parliaments and governments for the peace-loving and freedom-seeking efforts of the Iranian people, and to deplore the policy of the Iranian regime in pursuing and insisting on the war.

Parliamentarians from 35 countries signed that document, but I was the only Canadian to do so. Those who did come from the following countries: West Germany, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, the Cape Verde Islands, Colombia, South Korea, Costa Rica, Cyprus, Denmark, Ecuador, Spain, Great Britain, Equatorial Guyana, Haiti, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Jordan, Luxemburg, Malawi, Morocco, Nepal, Norway, Papua New Guinea, the Netherlands, Peru, Portugal, Singapore, Sri Lanka, Sweden, Switzerland, Uruguay and Venezuela.

The signatories included several senators, Members of Parliament, Speakers of Parliament, as well, of course, as heads of delegations. People from 35 of the 94 countries taking part in the conference signed the document.

That is a lot, more than one third, but it could easily have been twice as many if it had not been for the stupid way Canada, which was hosting the conference, treated the young Iranian pacifists.

Some of my Canadian colleagues refused to sign and others could not be approached. However, many members of the Canadian delegation met the delegates of the Khomeini regime at the conference in a private lounge at the instigation of Canadian officials who had said that they felt sorry for the Iranians because everyone was avoiding them. I was invited to join them, but I refused for the simple reason that these people represented a regime marred by blood and terror. My colleagues justified their action as hosts of the conference and that is their business. However, as far as I know, the Canadian delegation did not meet behind closed doors with other bored delegates.

These young Iranians represented the National Resistance Council. Except for the Canadian citizen I have already mentioned, they were all expatriates studying in the United States. While frustrated in their general objective, they always behaved very properly and with a lot of dignity.

Of course, the Khomeini delegation from Iran at the conference, when seeing the pacifist action of the young expatriates, reacted nearly immediately, and rather rudely and embarrassingly for Canada.

That is when individuals acting for the Khomeini regime, and introduced, I believe under the cover of diplomatic privilege, appeared on the floor of the conference hall, shouting and mouthing obscenities and threats at the young Iranian pacifists, following them outside the Convention Centre, on the sidewalks, in the foyer of the Westin hotel, which, as we know, is not part of the Ottawa Convention Centre, and following them by car right in the middle of Ottawa. The underworld has picturesque terms to describe such individuals, but because of the dignity of this assembly, you will forgive me if I do not use them today.

That is when the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, whose motto is "Maintiens le droit", came into play. In fact, the Canadian organizers of the conference, including myself, had asked for the security services of the RCMP for the previously explained reasons.

We had specifically in mind the prevention of any possible terrorist action against the Turkish delegation, since Ottawa has been plagued with violent criminal attacks against Turkish diplomatic personnel over the last few years.

We had not thought we would have to extend that kind of protection to other delegations in particular. However, the objectives and tactics used by Khomeini agents, the Iranian delegation, with the sanction and assistance of the Iranian mission in Ottawa—how else could those individuals have penetrated and moved about—were to silence young Iranian expatriates, prevent them at all costs from receiving wide support for their resolution from among parliamentarians. I would point out that the Iranian pacifists, representing the National Resistance Council, preferred to ignore even the presence of Khomeini representatives and at no time did they ask for police protection. They only wanted the opportunity to proceed peacefully.

The squad of policemen, with their radios in their pockets and earphones in their ears, spread out without too much discretion, everywhere in the backroom, the parlor, the halls, were watching what was going on. Their most visible presence was exaggerated as to numbers and unprecedented in the rather relaxed environment of a conference of parliamentarians. It put you ill at ease.

Suddenly, I was asked to go down to a private salon in the basement where the young Iranians had been shut in. They had asked to see me. Their confidence flattered me, since I had only talked with them for a few minutes the day before, when I signed their petition. They had been locked in that room under the surveillance of RCMP officers. In my presence, the officers asked them to stop all activities. They requested a commitment to stop asking for support for their resolution on the conference premises, the Convention Centre. The idea was not to "disturb" the Khomeini delegation. The representatives of the National Resistance Council complied with that request.

They did so of their own free will, but regretfully. I repeat, their behaviour was in every respect unimpeachable. They co-operated fully with the security forces. Their presence was not aimed at confrontation. However, they were granted permission to go on attending the debates and asking for support amongst delegations, but outside the limits of the Convention Centre.

Also, having from that point on been identified as a sympathizer to their cause, RCMP officers began watching me also to the extent that they preceded me when I tried to have one of the young Iranians recover press privileges that had been withdrawn from him. The mere presence of the young Iranians highly unnerved the Khomeini delegation which, not only continued to have those young people harassed, but had them also chased around and followed even outside the Convention Centre.

Who amongst you has not been approached, who has not in the past put his signature at the bottom of a statement similar to the one I just read, resolutions supporting peace, human rights, put out by oppressed people? Such is the crime committed by those young people. That is why that "conspiracy" had to be crushed. That is what completely embarrassed the Khomeinis. Had those young people committed such acts on Iranian soil, they would have been imprisoned, tortured, and maybe worse still, who knows—the blood of the martyrs of the Khomeini regime is indisputable proof.

● (1500)

Finally, these young Iranians were prohibited from entering the Convention Centre. Their press privileges were arbitrarily taken away by a former journalist and member of the Senate staff, who, I must admit, ran a very good press centre. In the daily press clippings prepared for delegates, that same staff member forgot to include an article published by the Ottawa Citizen about the incident I am referring to. He corrected this omission an hour before the end of the conference, when delegates had already packed their bags. A coincidence, no doubt! Finally, the young Iranian pacifists were confined to their hotel room "for their own good and for their own safety," as they were told by the RCMP.

During that time, the Khomeini gang circulated freely in hotel corridors, elevators and lobbies, looking for the young National Resistance Council's representatives, under the indifferent gaze of the RCMP.

What I found particularly distressing about this incident was the attitude of the chairman of the Canadian delegation who was also chairman of this particular international conference, namely the Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta. He did not bother to find out more about the matter or consult his parliamentary colleagues, and without further ado, ordered the RCMP to remove the young Iranian pacifists from the conference premises, including the one Canadian among them, if they refused to leave otherwise. When I dared to challenge his decision, the honourable member's attitude was one of arrogance and disdain. I will not repeat the far from courteous terms he used. I must admit that since then, I have no respect for him whatsoever. He is typical of the extreme right in Canada whose members arouse the indignation of people who are tolerant and respectful of the democratic rights of others.

This was the same member who not long ago was talking out loud and laughing at the back of the room during a meeting of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs. This latest incident strongly confirmed the suspicions I had about him since September. He simply cannot tolerate any kind of protest, however insignificant, however pacifist it may be.

I sum up: Having honoured the commitment to keep a section open to the public, the chairman of the Canadian section threw out young people who had promised to sit there peacefully. Why? In response to the rude and insolent representations of spokesmen for a totalitarian regime which has deleted from its vocabulary the very notion of parliamentary democracy and peace, and which throws in jail—or even worse—those who dare speak out against the fiats or the Ayatollah Khomeini.

The Canadian parliamentary tradition, which allows our fellow citizens and even foreigners to voice their disapproval or their support before Parliament itself, was trampled and disregarded during the Inter-parliamentary Union Conference. Honourable senators, we had an unprecedented opportunity to show to these parliamentarians of the world that we are tolerant of those who express views contrary to ours. Is not the barometer of true parliamentary democracy indeed the freedom of expression of those who are governed and their absolute right to have views which differ from those of the people who govern them, without fear of retaliation? In Ottawa, in September 1985, some Canadians saw fit to put a stop to legitimate and pacifist protests, pretending that they might lead to violence, something which has never been shown nor proven. Their action supported the representatives of the Khomeini regime who did not make a sensible intervention during the whole conference other than arguing with just about everybody.

They pushed away from the site and the vicinity of the conference—which apparently was held under the aegis of parliamentary democracy—a small group of young pacifist students who represented the National Resistance Council opposed to the totalitarian and fanatic regime of Khomeini, who politely, noiselessly and without pressure were seeking the support of world parliamentarians to put an end to hostilities between Iraq and Iran, and restore respect for human rights in Iran.

One of our parliamentarians, on the basis of some questionable authority and for reasons which I feel were unjustified, gave the RCMP more power than it needed under the circumstances. I feel that in this case the RCMP overstepped its authority and missed the target by gagging the young Iranian students and allowing Khomeini's braggarts to walk around and intimidate people as they pleased, under the doubtful cover, apparently, of diplomatic immunity. Otherwise, why did not the RCMP step in to bring these individuals under control instead of throwing the young students out?

As a Canadian, I am not very proud of this kind of behaviour and it worries me. When we give a free hand to our police forces, without too many questions or evidence, we take big risks and create dangerous precedents for democracy. Some may say: "Yes, but this conference had to take place without interruption or incident; throwing these young people out was a good thing".

I believe we are all for the establishment in Iran of a democratic system de jure and de facto. These young people were promoting a worthy cause. One day, Iran's internal affairs will operate under a democratic system; the cruel Irani-Iraqi war will be over and hopefully Canada-Iran relations will be normalized. I suggest that our future relations with a democratic government in Iran could be conditioned by a better understanding of the conflicting forces and a thorough knowledge of the realistic options which exist already for us, as Canadians.

For the time being, the relations between Canada and Iran are not normalized. I hear that discreet efforts are being made to normalize them. Iran would agree to an exchange of ambassadors on condition that Canada admits "its guilt" in the evasion of American diplomats in 1979. This is the result of secret meetings between Canadian parliamentarians and the Khomeini delegation at the conference. What nerve! I, for one, believe that we should neither admit any guilt nor provide any excuse, still less re-establish so-called "normal" relations with a cruel government which is torturing its people and especially its youth, both within the country and on the battlefield, and which had the gall to send a delegation which was a real pain in the ass during the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference in Ottawa. I suggest they should get lost.

I understand that the government is being pressured by Canadian and Iranian interests into re-establishing diplomatic relations; but it would be guilty of hypocrisy to bend under these pressures. It would be endorsing everything we have found repugnant about the Khomeini regime since 1979. Iranian individuals who have been tortured, mutilated, persecuted, deprived of their basic rights, killed; Iranian families which have been attacked, torn apart and mutilated, deserve that we continue to express our disagreement with and indignation toward the Khomeini regime. Keeping quiet would be to endorse the continued violation of individual rights and basic freedoms in Iran.

But that the Khomeini regime should export this hatred to Canada and manage, through intimidation and with the naive support of some Canadians, to deprive some people of their freedom of expression in the very capital of our country is the last straw! The normalization of relations between our two countries can wait for better days; a democratic and humanitarian regime will surface there soon. But it is high time for Canadians to find out about Iran and what is going on in that country.

We should not prostitute ourselves for a few barrels of oil or a few tons of dates. Let us wait until the wind of madness has died down and fanaticism is buried deep in the sands of Iran before re-establishing real diplomatic and trade relations. Let us wait for democracy to be implemented.

I fervently hope that, in the future, Canadian parliamentarians will be more cautious than they were at the Ottawa conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union. Otherwise, all their nice meetings, all their eloquent speeches, all their learned and complicated resolutions will seem empty to the public and the rest of the world where, in spite of such unfortunate incidents, Canada is still seen as a land of freedom.

Honourable senators, the International Youth Year came to an end on December 31, 1985. My own contribution was to support the cause of the young Iranians who yearn for peace and freedom. I have the feeling that young Canadians share their objectives and their hopes.

I should also remind honourable senators that Canada was the joint sponsor at the United Nations last December, in New York, of a resolution about human rights in Iran. Do honourable senators not find it strange that, a little over three months after the incident involving the expulsion of young Iranian pacifists from the Ottawa conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the Canadian delegation at the United Nations would endorse and successfully support a resolution deploring the refusal of Iran to admit the special representative of the United Nations Human Rights Commission?

When speaking at the United Nations on this issue last December 5, was Member of Parliament Léo Duguay from Saint-Boniface criticizing the action of his colleague, Benno Friesen, at the Inter-Parliamentary Union conference? We may well wonder.

Here is what Mr. Duguay said:

Canada continues to deplore the fact that it is not possible for the special representative to go to Iran. Consequently, the allegations of very serious violations of human rights, including executions and torture, are not being investigated and acted upon as requested by the international community.

Later on, Mr. Duguay said:

We urgently ask the Iranian government to put a stop to religious persecutions and to protect the rights and freedoms of all its citizens.

● (1510)

How comforting and probably how sincere, are those words spoken by Mr. Duguay M.P., on behalf of Canada, on behalf of all of us. Mr. Duguay could perhaps give a copy of his speech to Mr. Friesen, the interim Chairman of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, Canadian section. This could open his eyes.

Otherwise, we might all be taken for a bunch of hypocrites by the international community.

I must also inform you, honourable senators, that the action of the young Iranian pacifists at the Inter-Parliamentary Union Conference in Ottawa, in September 1985, was not an isolated action of a global will to get rid of fanaticism and despotism in Iran.

On Sunday, July 28, 1985, the New York Times published a full page containing more than 2,000 names of parliamentarians, ministers, senior government officials and politicians from the United States, Canada—I was pleased to see the signature of the Honourable Renaude Lapointe, P.C.—and 15 other European and Asiatic countries as well as from international organizations which, first, celebrated the day of martyrs and political prisoners in Iran; second, condemned the repressive and warmongering policies of the Khomeini regime; and third, expressed their repeated support to the just resistance of the Iranian people for the establishment of a democratic government.

The newspaper Le Monde also published the names of 220 members of the European Parliament who support the Iranian National Resistance Council and its Chairman, Mr. Massoud Rajavi.

On April 16, 1984, the Liberal International, with headquarters in London, England, condemned the violations of human rights in Iran, the mass execution and the torturing of prisoners of the Khomeini regime.

The International Red Cross Committee has spoken against the atrocities committed by the Khomeini regime on November 23, 1984, in violation of the Geneva Conventions on Prisoners of War, and has launched an eloquent appeal to the permanent representatives asking for express support from their respective governments. The European Council, on January 31st, 1985, took a position on the situation in Iran. Sixty-one members signed the written Declaration No. 123 on the abuse of human rights in Iran and supported, as did so many other personalities around the world, the peace initiative of the Chairman of the National Resistance Council, Mr. Massoud Rajavi.

But in Ottawa, the young Iranian pacifists knocked on our door, on the door of that Great Lady, the Inter-Parliamentary Union, and shame, the Canadians threw them out. But nonetheless, those young people had a degree of success. Ironically, because of the way they were treated, they gained many more sympathizers than they would have had they been left in peace.

Honourable senators, I hope those few words will have the honour and privilege of your reflections as to our current and future relations with Iran. The Khomeini regime is not your average totalitarian regime. It is beyond the pale and beyond any concept of decency. For this reason, any parliamentarian living in a democracy would not hesitate to condemn it.

In future, parliamentarians ought to give a warm welcome to those who fight for the restoration of democracy and respect for human rights in Iran and an immediate end to the bloody hostilities between Iraq and Iran which have caused such pain and anguish in both countries and aroused international concern.

An incident, however unimportant at first glance, needs the proper context if we are to understand its real dimensions. And what is that context?

An international conference of parliamentarians who claim to defend human rights, meeting in Ottawa to do what parliamentarians do best, which is: talk! Seven young Iranians came to collect signatures for a petition to promote peace and restore democratic rights in their country.

Why did they bother to come here, to the capital of this country?

To get help, understanding, some support and a signature from each delegate.

Among 7,448 of their fellow citizens who were executed and whose age is known (average age at the time of the executions was twenty-three), 599 were under nineteen and 27 were children.

Among the 7,407 whose education is known, 51.6 per cent were university students or school children, 37.4 per cent were high school graduates, 6.3 per cent were university graduates and 1.7 per cent had either a Master's or Ph.D.

Among 2,433 persons executed whose profession or trade was known, 26.6 per cent were teachers, 25.5 per cent labourers, 12.2 per cent office workers, 10.2 per cent members of the armed forces or the police, 10.7 per cent merchants, 6.2 per cent engineers and 3.6 per cent members of the medical profession.

Among 11,128 martyrs whose political affiliation was known, more than 81.5 per cent were members of the People's Mujahadeen, a socialist political party that forms the core of the National Resistance Council.

Of 10,722 whose manner of death is known, 71.5 per cent were executed. At least 361 died after being tortured and 250 were hanged.

Forty-five women who were executed and whose names appear on the list were pregnant at the time. The real figure is probably much higher. The lists include 130 families who have lost at least three members each, one even eight, as a result of executions since June 20, 1981.

Of the 7,394 martyrs whose marital status is known, 22.5 per cent were married. At least 300 cases of martyred spouses, man and wife, were recorded.

To date, the total number of known victims of executions under the Khomeini regime was 12,028 in September 1985. To those martyrs we must add tens of thousands who died on the battlefield, and we must add God knows how many more who died for political reasons.

That is why and for whom the young Iranian students who represented the National Resistance Council were handing out a sheet of paper, a declaration of support, to the Inter-Parliamentary Union delegates. In the context of Iran's drama, it does not matter to them whether an individual did not understand anything or did not even try to understand.

But now they do not want to get from him lame excuses and letters written to commend their public spiritedness in an attempt to justify himself.

I salute the valour, the courage and the determination of all Iranians who are working to restore human rights and democracy in their country. I wish them every success, despite the indignities they have to suffer now and again. The support they continue to receive is so much more generous and important. They could not be distracted by a horsefly in a field of ripe wheat.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Since no other senator wished to take part in this debate, the matter is considered as having been debated.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

ADDRESS of
HIS EXCELLENCY
YASUHIRO NAKASONE
Prime Minister of Japan to Both Houses of Parliament in the House of Commons Chamber, Ottawa on Monday, January 13, 1986

His Excellency, the Prime Minister of Japan, was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore of the Senate, and the Honourable John Bosley, Speaker of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. John Bosley (Speaker of the House of Commons): Your Excellency, we are highly honoured to have you address this joint session of the Senate and the House of Commons. I think you can tell by that reception, sir, how you and your wife are regarded by the Members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

May I now call upon the Prime Minister of Canada.

[Translation]

The Right Hon. the Prime Minister of Canada.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Deputy Speaker of the Senate, Mr. Speaker of the House, ladies and gentlemen of the House and the Senate.

[English]

I have today the high honour and distinct privilege of welcoming among us today His Excellency, the Prime Minister of Japan, Mr. Nakasone. To you, sir, and to Mrs. Nakasone we extend a warm welcome to the Parliament of Canada.

Your visit to Canada, Prime Minister, celebrates and cements the partnership between our two countries, for we have become partners in peace, partners in progress and partners in prosperity. There is infinitely more to this than commerce between our two countries, although it goes without saying that we greatly value the fact that Japan is our second largest trading partner. However, there is a common commitment to a free world and a world free from the threat of nuclear war. There is also a shared understanding that perhaps the greatest threat to the prosperity of the developed world is the poverty of the developing world. A partnership based on a mutual range of interests, our relationship has blossomed into a friendship based on mutual respect. For our part, Prime Minister, it goes even deeper, to admiration as well as respect, admiration for the real miracle of modern Japan which is to have brought about an economic transformation in harmony with its heritage.

[Translation]

Now, under Mr. Nakasone's vigorous leadership, Japan is moving ahead again, to a new stage of its development, from a leadership role in the technological revolution of today to one in the intricately interdependent world of tomorrow. During Mr. Nakasone's tenure as Prime Minister, his countrymen have increasingly come to share his view that it is not enough to have markets in the world, it is essential to have a place in the world and indispensable to have a view of the world. As it happens, from our window on the Pacific, from our place at the summit table, our two countries have much the same global perspective.

And from our private discussions, Prime Minister, I know we have many shared objectives for the Economic and Diplomatic Agenda. First among our many shared global concerns is our fundamental preoccupation with arms control, with reducing international tensions and reducing nuclear arsenals.

[English]

Canada and Japan begin from the premise of two countries which do not allow nuclear weapons on their soil. Japan, alone among the nations of the earth, has experienced the catastrophic devastation of nuclear weapons. It is from this uniquely tragic and poignant vantage point that Japan speaks as an advocate for nuclear sanity and for a very constructive dialogue between East and West. All mankind lives in the shadow of nuclear war but Canadians live geographically and uniquely between the two superpowers, the United States and the Soviet Union. Thus, Prime Minister, we were deeply encouraged by the spirit of the Geneva Summit between President Reagan and General-Secretary Gorbachev last November. We are very heartened as well that they will be meeting again this year and next. There is no more compelling responsibility for leaders of East and West, great powers as well as small, than to encourage the pursuit of a more secure peace.

There is a new, insidious threat to stability in the world, the murderous scourge of terrorism, an international plague that knows and respects no boundaries, from which no person is safe, and to which democracies such as Canada and Japan, to name but two, are most vulnerable. Japan and Canada were linked in the horror of terrorism last year when a bomb exploded among the luggage of a Canadian commercial flight after its arrival in Tokyo. Our people have a right to expect their governments to take forceful action to rid the world of these cowardly creatures who do not recognize the bounds of decency or the dictates of reason.

As it happens, Prime Minister, we, as leaders, are not powerless to do something about this. We can encourage support for more effective enforcement of international law, as you have done on many occasions. Under your leadership at the summit the partners may yet contemplate effective, coordinated action against terrorists of every origin and terrorism in every form.

[Translation]

I look forward to meeting you and our summit partners again in Tokyo, as I look forward to our discussions there. Canada is firmly committed to the principles and the process of the Economic Summit of industrialized nations. The issues may have changed since the first summit in 1975. But the challenge remains the same, the imperative of acting together.

Where previously our stability was threatened by external economic forces, we must all confront an enemy within, the surging sentiment of protectionism that threatens the underpinnings of the multilateral trading system.

This is why, on behalf of my colleagues from all corners of the House and the Senate, I praise your courageous determination to open up Japanese markets to new finished foreign products, including our own, especially in the high technology and telecommunications field.

This is why we welcome your support of our trade initiative with the United States, in the knowledge that freer trade between these two partners, the world's most important trading relationship, will lead, hopefully, to trade liberalization among other partners.

This is why we share your commitment to a new round of multilateral trade negotiations, which we hope may begin this spring at the ministerial level, and we have offered Montreal as the site of the talks.

[English]

Our commitment to an enhanced multilateral system is a cornerstone of Canadian trade policy. That commitment extends to Asia and the entire Pacific Rim. It is a commitment that goes beyond our interest in trade to an over-riding concern for the development of the Third World and the financial stability of the entire world, for, unless ways and means are found to reduce the level of indebtedness of the nations of the South, the mountain of debt could also crush the nations of the North. I know this is a particular concern of yours in your region of the world, Prime Minister, and I can assure you that we share it in ours.

Your stay with us by no means ends here today. Tomorrow you will visit Vancouver, our jewel of a city, on what is, for you, the far Pacific shore. Your visit to Canada has strengthened the relationship between us and between our two countries. We have become friends as well as partners.

[Translation]

Thirty years ago, at the time of your first visit to Canada, our two countries were experiencing strikingly different economical conditions from today. Japan, now in the full flower of technological achievement, was then in the throes of reconstruction. Canada, now in a period of economic adjustment and renewal, was then in an era of unprecedented prosperity and growth.

[English]

Then as now, you, Prime Minister, were a member of the Japanese Parliament as, indeed, you have been since 1947. In our Parliament you would be the dean of the House of Commons. The Prime Minister has won 15 consecutive elections in his home district. That only leaves 13 more for me, Prime Minister.

I would hasten to point out to my colleagues that Prime Minister Nakasone is much more than an astute politician who has endured from one generation to the next. He is a learned statesman who, in the traditions of his country, dares to put the global questions as to the future peace and security of mankind. His enlightened perspective springs from a civilization that is both ancient and modern, and from a contemporary society that remains no less cultivated for having become so competitive. This, then, is Prime Minister Nakasone, sumoiteer and statesman, painter and politician, athlete and author. Esteemed colleagues and fellow citizens of Canada, I present to you the very distinguished Prime Minister of Japan.

His Excellency Mr. Yasuhiro Nakasone (Prime Minister of Japan):

Right Honourable Prime Minister,
Honourable Speaker of the Senate,
Honourable Speaker of the House of Commons,
Honourable Members of the Senate,

Honourable Members of the House of Commons and distinguished guests,

[Translation]

It is a great pleasure for me to visit Ottawa, Canada's beautiful and serene capital, and this Parliament, whose splendour is famous the world over. I am particularly honoured with this opportunity to address my dear friends in the Parliament of Canada on the very day it reconvenes in this new year, 1986. I would like to express my sincere thanks to Prime Minister Mulroney, Speaker Charbonneau, Speaker Bosley and all concerned for having given me this opportunity. I also wish to thank the Government and the people of Canada for the very warm welcome extended to me and my party since our arrival in this country.

[English]

As I flew into Toronto yesterday I saw vast stretches of land frozen by the bitter cold and covered by silvery-white snow. I was struck by the thought that only those who endure the rigorous challenges of nature can reap her rich rewards. Endurance is a true mark of courage. I salute and pay my deep respect to the generations of courageous Canadians who toiled to build this nation and have carried on with the task to make it what it is today.

I am further struck by the tolerance and understanding of Canadians toward multiculturalism, and their compassion and support for the handicapped. Many refugees who have unfortunately been driven out of their homelands in various parts of the world are choosing Canada as their final place to settle, and Canada is accepting them. This is testimony that the peoples of the world view Canada with respect, affection, and gratitude, as a nation with a warm heart and humanitarian spirit, which does not discriminate among human beings.

On this valued occasion of addressing the representatives of the Canadian people, I should like to speak on Japan's position and the basic elements of its policies towards the world. I should further like to state my views on how Japan and Canada can co-operate for their own progress and that of the world, as we move on to the 21st century, now only 15 years away.

The basis of Japan's world policy is to seek its peace and prosperity in the attainment of world peace and prosperity. As we put this into practice, we attach the highest importance to strengthening solidarity among the free nations of the world with whom we share common values.

After the end of World War II, the Japanese people, with deep remorse for the past, vowed to pursue peace as their national objective, and set about rebuilding their homeland, guided by the stars of freedom and democracy.

Forty years later, Japan has arrived where it is today, exceeding our expectations of ourselves. In the meantime, there have been major changes in the situation both home and abroad. The international community is asking Japan to make a contribution commensurate with the expanded influence it now exercises. For Japan which has for long enjoyed the benefits of world peace and prosperity, and of freedom and democracy, it has now become a national mission to respond positively to the call of the international community and to exert its energies toward the happiness of mankind. Japan's aspiration to work toward world peace and prosperity, on the basis of enhanced solidarity with the free nations of the world, is thus rooted in the very heart of the Japanese people.

With these thoughts in mind, let me enumerate what I consider to be the main points of Japan's world policy.

The first is the promotion of peace and disarmament. Since mankind first appeared on this earth several million years ago, history has been a constant struggle—a struggle to secure untroubled survival for mankind. It remains a fact, however, that in this age of highly developed human wisdom, the world is still torn by elements of unreason which threaten billions of lives. We owe it to our posterity to strive to eliminate these elements.

The largest single element of unreason is nuclear weapons. Except at the time of the Flood and Noah's Ark, mankind has never before been faced with such a threat of being totally and instantaneously wiped out. Whether mankind has the wisdom to eliminate by its own hand what is of its own making—this is the unprecedented test to which Clio, the Muse of History, is subjecting mankind.

As the only nation ever to have experienced the devastation of nuclear weapons, Japan has steadfastly maintained its three non-nuclear principles, and has been calling at every opportunity for the elimination of nuclear weapons. As a means of achieving this, we have advocated that the superpowers reduce these weapons drastically while maintaining a proper balance. We have also made proposals for arms control and disarmament, including a step-by-step formula for steadily reducing the size of nuclear weapons with a view to achieving a comprehensive test ban.

I have felt it essential that the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union meet and talk in order to promote peace and disarmament, and have been calling upon President Reagan, General Secretary Gorbachev and others concerned to do so. Fortunately, the two leaders met last autumn in the first U.S.-Soviet Summit to take place in six and a half years. This meeting is only the start of a process and does not in itself warrant undue optimism. But it is true that we have seen the first ray of hope shine on these daunting problems. For my own part, I strongly hope that the two leaders respond to the ardent wishes of the peoples of the world, and continue to negotiate with sincerity and patience until they can achieve the desired results.

The regional conflicts raging in the Middle East, Asia, Africa, Central America and elsewhere should also be important matters of our concern. The conflicts not only affect the lives and safety of those who live in these areas, but also, if escalated, may trigger a major war involving nuclear weapons. Japan has thus been working hard to devise ways of creating a climate conducive to the early resolution of these conflicts, as well as to the prevention of their escalation.

The increase in the stockpile of nuclear weapons and the eruption of regional conflicts are both attributable, in the final analysis, to distrust between the parties involved.

Therefore, the key to the resolution of those issues lies in bringing the parties around, through better mutual understanding, to mutual trust. Indirect as it may seem, efforts have to be made over time to create opportunities for deeper mutual understanding to eliminate mutual distrust, gradually, and to attain mutual trust. Japan views the United Nations and other international organizations as important for such efforts, and intends to exert its efforts to revitalize the functions of these organizations.

I note that Canada, on its part, has attached great importance to the activities of these international organizations, and has been taking the lead in actively promoting them. The people of Japan have never forgotten the very great help Canada extended to Japan in the post-war years as we returned to the international community and joined these international organizations.

The second point of our world policy is to strengthen solidarity among the free nations of the world.

The global political and economic situation has undergone major changes between the end of World War II and today. However, there has been no change whatsoever in the supremacy and legitimacy of freedom and democracy and in our pursuit of these cultural and political values.

Recognizing this, Japan has established as fundamental policy the maintenance of our peaceful and stable society on the basis of political and economic co-operation and solidarity among the countries of North America, Western Europe and Japan, which share common values. Together, these three regions account for half of the world's economic production. We form the backbone of the Free World. Today, as the world is beset politically and economically with increasingly complex difficulties, it is all the more essential that we maintain our trilateral co-operation and unity among the three regions. We need this in order to cope effectively with the problems confronting us, such as, promotion of peace and disarmament, revitalization of the world economy, and meeting the problems of the developing countries.

The seven-nation summit meeting of industrialized democracies is an important forum for our trilateral co-operation. Japan is determined to continue to contribute as positively as it can to our trilateral solidarity while placing our main emphasis on the summit.

The third point of our policy concerns development and prosperity.

[Translation]

Since the end of the last war, world economic growth has brought considerable benefits to people the world over, starting with an increase in our collective well-being. We have a duty to consolidate and further develop this economic progress in order to help meet the growing needs of the countries of this world. To achieve this, we urgently need to defend the international system of free trade. However, the free trade system is as fragile as glass, and a recent wave of protectionism is giving increasing cause for concern. I maintain that if we let these protectionist tendencies develop any further, this may lead to a collapse of the economic order we enjoy today.

[English]

To defend and promote free trade, Japan has been implementing a series of programs to increase market access, including the reduction or elimination of tariffs, without seeking reciprocal action by our trading partners. These initiatives are aimed at achieving a degree of market openness unparalleled elsewhere. At the same time, we are redoubling our efforts for the promotion of a new round of multilateral trade negotiations within the GATT framework. I intend to join hands and march forward with Canada, which shares our belief in free trade, as we forcefully promote the new round.

It is argued that there is no way to avoid the pitfalls of protectionism other than to vitalize domestic industries and improve their competitiveness. Structural changes in our industrial and economic fabric would be specially conducive to defending free trade. These changes may be brought about through the promotion of scientific and technological innovations that may attract private sector vitality, and by the ensuing transfers of technology and structural adjustment. On the part of Japan, we are taking bold steps to expand domestic demand and are also in the process of tackling fundamental adjustments in our domestic economic structure in the interest of international harmony.

In the world economy as a whole, the advanced industrial countries and the developing countries are the two wheels, without either of which we cannot drive forward to achieve further development. This is why co-operation with developing countries to advance their economies and their welfare constitutes one of the important objectives of Japan's national policy. In this regard, I pay homage to the fact that Canada started its assistance to developing countries as early as 1950. For my own part, I have advocated, ever since my assumption of office as Prime Minister, that there can be no prosperity for the North without prosperity for the South, and have appealed for greater assistance toward the developing world. Japan has already planned and implemented two consecutive programs to double its Official Development Assistance, ODA. On the heels of the successful attainment of these goals, we have recently decided, despite stringent budgetary conditions, upon a new set of policy goals with the twin objectives of raising the total amount of our ODA for the seven years from 1986 through to 1992 to over $40 billion, and of making the disbursement level for 1992 double that for 1985. This new program will enable Japan to continue to expand its ODA, which today ranks in value second only to the United States among the free nations of the world.

I should add that what is noteworthy about the developing world these days is that we are increasingly required to fine-tune our assistance to meet the varying needs that reflect different conditions and stages of development in each country. Japan attaches particular importance to co-operation in human resources development, assigning priority to dispatching experts and Japan Overseas Co-operation Volunteers, and accepting trainees in Japanese companies.

Ladies and Gentlemen, with these policies of Japan in mind, I should like next to state my views on future co-operation between Japan and Canada.

Thirty years ago, in 1955, I visited Canada as a member of the Japanese Diet. I saw industrial facilities in Ontario and Quebec, as well as the innovative heavy reactor at Chalk River. I was struck and amazed by the high level of your industrial technologies, and entertained great hopes for the expansion of economic interchanges between our two countries.

Since then, Japan and Canada have succeeded in expanding the value of their two-way trade by about 100 times, due, in part, to our mutually complementary trade structure. Further, our bilateral economic interchanges have continued to intensify.

fy in a broad range of areas including investment and industrial co-operation. Today, each of us is indispensable to the other.

However, we should not be content with a relationship based merely on economic complementarity. I believe that we, the free nations of the world, should aim at building a world where nations, unfettered by the parochial interests of each or by the walls between states, exchange freely, help one another, highly respect each other's cultural values, and prosper together. That will be a world of true interdependence.

In this context, I note with keen interest Canada's unique role in the international arena. Canada has not just reacted passively to superpower politics but, taking full advantage of its self-defined role as a "middle power", is contributing actively to the building of peace as an international mediator or as a quiet but effective negotiator. This course of foreign policy chosen by Canada has amply demonstrated that any nation should and can play a valuable role appropriate to its characteristics in international politics. You have thus encouraged many nations of the world and have also made them aware of their respective responsibilities. Your contribution in this regard has indeed been immense.

Japan, for its part, is playing its own role in the international community through the world policies I have outlined and is exploring new ways of contributing. In this context, I propose that Japan and Canada consult and co-operate even more seriously on such problems as world peace and disarmament and on our policies to achieve prosperity in the developing countries.

With the Tokyo Summit in May and the expected start of the new round of multilateral trade negotiations in September, 1986 is an important year for the international community, which may determine whether we can expect a sustained growth in world trade and economy. It is also an important year in the sense that we shall see whether progress can be made toward world peace and disarmament through the second summit meeting between the leaders of the United States and the Soviet Union. For these endeavours to succeed, co-operation and unity among the free nations of the world are essential. It is indeed significant that the exchange of visits between Prime Minister Mulroney and myself is taking place in 1986, a year which may well determine our course toward the 21st century. Let us together set the basic agenda for Japan-Canada co-operation and start our joint actions on global issues, so we can develop our partnership in breadth and depth into a truly mature one.

Ladies and Gentlemen, located in a corner of the galactic system and inhabited by six billion people, our planet Earth now enjoys a most advanced material civilization. At the same time, however, our planet is exposed to the most barbaric attacks since its creation. Limited fossil resources have been exploited nearly to the point of depletion; green tracts of land are rapidly being reduced to deserts; clean air and water are being contaminated with toxic materials; and rare species of animals are being forced to the verge of extinction. Furthermore, many human beings are being driven to starvation, and tens of thousands of nuclear warheads are threatening the annihilation of all living creatures on Earth. If left unchecked, these merciless waves may doom our spaceship Earth to a lifeless wreckage.

[Translation]

It was with reference to this picture of the present situation on our planet that I said the following on the occasion of the fortieth anniversary of the United Nations Organization in New York last fall: "If we are to preserve this planet Earth and ensure the survival of mankind, I believe we must create a new world ethic and set up mechanisms to support that ethic."

[English]

We must now rid ourselves of arrogance toward Mother Nature. Japan's traditional religion teaches us that nature is the mother of all creatures and that all living things are essentially brothers and sisters in the natural universe. Such philosophy is not exclusively that of the Orient but can also be found on other continents. Needless to say, I am not suggesting that religions unique to different peoples should be united under one great Oriental theology. Instead, I submit that it is perhaps high time for us to redirect our thinking toward the basic feelings of awe, intimacy, respect and love toward nature, which mankind has had over the millenia, and to appreciate afresh what they mean to us today.

When such reorientation has started on a global scale, what I call the grand enterprise of establishing a new global ethic will have begun. The groundwork for this significant enterprise needs to be laid through promoting mutual understanding, not just among nations, but also among peoples and cultures, and through fostering mutual appreciation and respect based on such understanding. We should spare no effort in this regard.

I believe the current of history is steadily heading us in the desired direction. There are two major civilizations represented in the world today, the Occidental and the Oriental civilizations. They both emerged on the Eurasian continent. One grew and matured in the Atlantic region and has reached the eastern edge of the Pacific Ocean on the American continent. The other has already reached the stage of maturity on the western edge of the Pacific. In historical terms, it is only a matter of time until the two civilizations converge and are joined in a ring. When these two civilizations of the West and East are brought together, our planet Earth will become a full and true "globe", marking another important stage in world history and emitting an unprecedented glow. Then all living creatures on Earth will enjoy the supreme bliss of their existence.

This convergence of the different civilizations of the East and the West is no easy task. There will be difficulties and barriers in the process. But I am convinced that they will be overcome.

I believe this because history has shown that different civilizations attract each other, and come closer together, just as in physics positive electric charges repulse each other but positive and negative charges attract each other. I believe that, in the 21st century, the Pacific Ocean will be a grand and romantic stage for enactment of the great drama of creating a new world civilization through the convergence of two civilizations.

Japan is a part of Asia and shares many common values with western civilization; Canada, which has close historical links to Europe and the United States and diverse cultures within the nation, is looking increasingly toward the Pacific in recent years. Our two nations must play out together our important roles as main actors in this drama.

Let me, in closing, express my fervent hope that the everlasting friendship and co-operation between Japan and Canada will bear abundant fruit for the future of our planet Earth.

Thank you very much.

[Translation]

Thank you very much.

Hon. Martial Asselin (Speaker pro tempore of the Senate): Your Excellency, we are pleased and honoured by your presence in this Chamber, where we have invited you to speak to the Canadian people. We have listened with the utmost interest to the message you have brought us from your Parliament. I trust that your address will encourage us to pursue our efforts to meet our objectives of cooperation.

When the Canadian Government decided many years ago to place particular emphasis on the development and expansion of relations between Canada and Japan, it was because it recognized the emergence of this country as a world power whose considerable interests were situated mostly, but not exclusively, in the area of international trade. Being one of the major trading nations, Japan has been playing for many years a key role in the management of the world economy. Moreover, like Canada, Japan is an industrialized country which shares our democratic ideals and wants to react efficiently to an increasingly complex economic and political situation on the international scene. It is therefore in the interests of both our countries to increase our contacts on international issues.

Moreover, Japan has a vast domestic market for Canadian goods and services as well as the means to take part in the development of Canada, for instance through needed investments in this country. We must therefore conclude that increased relations with Japan based on greater cooperation and closer ties in the political, economic, cultural, scientific and technological fields correspond to the objectives of Canada to build a healthy national economy and reduce its economic vulnerability.

[English]

The framework for economic co-operation and the Canada-Japan Cultural Agreement signed ten years ago embodied the principles of a new relationship in each of these areas. Since then continued co-operation between our two countries has produced significant results and progress, particularly in the trade and economic sectors. Thus trade has increased threefold. Japan is Canada's second biggest trading partner and Canada is one of Japan's major suppliers of important natural resources and energy. Three years ago the Canadian Government prepared a market development plan for Japan to assist the public and private sectors to expand business in your country. The plan identified export opportunities in targeted industrial sectors which are consistent with Canadian production capabilities. The resource, petrochemical, agricultural and manufactured products sectors were identified as a priority.

Detailed discussions will take place between yourself and the Canadian counterparts of your delegation on bilateral and multilateral issues which are of interest to both our countries. We anticipate positive results from these contacts and exchanges and I am convinced you share our expectations.

[Translation]

Mr. Prime Minister, there is therefore no doubt that the commercial and economic relations between our two countries will develop even more in the future.

In closing, I would like to appeal to Canadian businessmen, academics, scientists, and all those who play an important role in the Canadian society to support our efforts so that our two countries can reach the goals they have set for themselves.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Prime Minister, on behalf of the Hon. Members of this House of Commons, I wish to thank you for sharing your eloquent vision of Japan's relationship with Canada and its successes and accomplishments as well as your expectations for the coming years. There are many ties and common interests that bind us and help us co-operate in building a peaceful and more prosperous world with institutions emphasizing the principles of fraternity and freedom exemplified in both our countries.

[Translation]

Throughout the years, we have consolidated and intensified our bilateral relations, not only for trade and investment, but also in the social and cultural areas, such as tourism, sports, education, theatre and youth.

[English]

And as I am sure you know, sir, this year represents a bit of a watershed for parliamentary relations between our two countries, as you can see the first creation of a full Canada-Japan Parliamentary Association. Sir, we hope that our increased exchange in all areas, whether political, economic, social or cultural will enhance the respect and friendship of our peoples towards one another. I think, sir, I can say on behalf of all our Members here that you came to us with great advanced publicity, and your speech today, sir, has lived up to it completely. I say that, sir, as one who was only born in 1947.

On behalf of all my Members we wish to extend to you, to your wife, to the members of your official delegation, an excellent and a fruitful visit to our country.

UKRAINE

SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Martha P. Bielish: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to your attention the fact that today, January 22, marks a great event in the history of some 700,000 Canadians of Ukrainian origin and of approximately three million Ukrainians who live in democratic countries in other parts of the world. I refer to the Declaration of the Fourth Universal Proclamation in Kiev on January 22, 1918, establishing the Ukrainian nation as an independent democratic republic, recognizing the highest principles of democracy, namely, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly and personal freedom.

Although the independence was short-lived, because in 1922 the Russian communist regime subverted and conquered this new independent state by force, we have cause to take heart, for, in the words of Senator Yuzyk, in his speech in this chamber on January 22 last year:

The acts of January 22, 1918 and January 22, 1919 marked the victory of principles now written in the Charter of the United Nations, of which Canada is a signatory. Free Ukrainians and the free people of all the subjugated nations of the Soviet Russian empire and its satellites will continue to celebrate their independence days and impress upon the western world that freedom is indivisible.

Today the blue-yellow flag of free Ukraine is flying over Ottawa's City Hall, and, on behalf of Ukrainians everywhere, I wish to acknowledge with thanks this recognition from Mayor Jim Durrell and the members of City Council.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PENITENTIARIES

CANADA-ALBERTA AGREEMENT AND MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING

On the tabling of documents:

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the Leader of the Government a question with respect to an agreement between the Government of Canada, as represented by the Solicitor General of Canada, and the Government of Alberta, as represented by the Solicitor General of Alberta? I understand that the agreement was executed during the month of November. It provides for certain capital grants to the Province of Alberta with respect to the Fort Saskatchewan gaol and the Grande Cache gaol as well as for the assigning of up to 300 federal inmates to provincial institutions. I wonder whether the government leader would ascertain if that agreement is to be tabled in the Senate forthwith—it has great implications with respect to the inmate population in Western Canada—as well as a memorandum of intent between the Correctional Service Canada and the Solicitor General of Alberta to put into effect what amounts to the practical destruction of the parole service of Canada in Alberta and containing other provisions with respect to farming out our responsibilities to the Province of Alberta.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is no point of order that I can discern in my honourable friend's comments. Nevertheless, I will accept them as a question and ascertain from the two governments concerned whether they are willing to table the documents.

RULES OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, today is "Weedless Wednesday" and to mark the occasion and for other purposes I give notice that, on Tuesday, January 28, 1986, I will move:

That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after rule 77(7), the following:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It sounds like it is a popular motion, but Senator Hastings may have some reservations.

Senator Frith: I would say that it played to mixed reviews.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—PROTECTION OF INTERESTS OF PRODUCERS— GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government respecting the significant decline in oil prices and the effect that decline will have, not only on the producers but also on the economy of those parts of Canada where the oil and gas industry plays a major role. Of course, this matter is particularly applicable to Alberta, but it has important implications for Northern Canada, for the east coast and some of the other western provinces. It says in the Western Accord on page 3, paragraph 9:

In the event of international oil market disturbances that result in sharp changes to crude oil prices, with potentially negative impacts on Canada, the Government of Canada, following consultations with provincial governments, will take appropriate measures to protect Canadian interests.

Would the Leader of the Government tell us what appropriate measures the government is prepared to take to protect the interests of the producers? It is claimed that this industry is the engine of economic recovery and development in some parts of Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I agree with my honourable friend that the freeing up of the industry in recent months has had a marked effect on economic activity in western Canada in particular, and all of it to the good. There has been a remarkable rebound in that industry in recent months. However, I am also frank to admit that the question of oil prices is an important factor at the present time and, indeed, for the future of the entire nation, quite apart from the province of Alberta and the other oil producing provinces. What we seem to be faced with is a reduction in the price on the spot market. The spot market is very volatile. It goes up and down in movements which are not always reflected in the regular price of oil, so we have a bit of a problem there. The position at the present time, I suggest, is that we must hold a watching brief in connection with these price changes to see where they settle down and what their overall effect will be. It would be reasonable, I think, to assume that the recent downward movement is not likely to continue and probably is not likely to result in the same degree of price fluctuation in the regular market. I underline the word "probably", because no one really knows, and it seems to me that we should wait a while to see how this thing turns out. If prices go below a certain level, which would be a happy circumstance for some, it will present real problems for others and I do not overlook the fact.

● (1410)

Therefore my answer to my friend is that we are watching this situation very carefully and will take measures when it is deemed appropriate to do so.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. Am I to take it that all this government intends to do is to watch the situation? Are we to report to the people involved in making decisions for the on-going economic development of the gas and oil industry that the government simply intends to sit back and watch the situation for a while and that is all the action they intend to take?

Senator Roblin: I do not think we are going to panic, in the first instance. We intend to watch the situation carefully because, as you know, it depends on where you sit as to how some of these things go. For example, the Independent Petroleum Association is quoted as saying that they can withstand world oil price drops of $6 or $7 per barrel without a significant reduction in their revenues, and that is, therefore, a factor to be taken into account.

However, I think my honourable friend would agree with me that it would be wiser to wait a while and make certain of the course of developments before rushing in to apply what might be an inappropriate remedy to what may or may not be a serious problem.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my honourable friend's comments are interesting, but they certainly indicate new policy. On March 31, 1985, the government stated quite emphatically that they intended to take appropriate measures to protect Canadian interests if there was a significant change in international oil prices. Surely the government must have done some planning and can therefore give some indication of what they mean by "appropriate action." Is it "appropriate action" simply to sit back and watch the whole industry go down the drain?

I might point out to my honourable friend that oil prices have indeed gone down more than the so-called $6 or $7 per barrel, as quoted by some official from IPAC. What is more, the price of oil to most Canadian companies—at least all of those Canadian oil companies that made their discoveries after 1973—had already gone down $5 to $7 per barrel because of the direct government action in eliminating NORP, the New Oil Reference Price. What that amounted to was a transfer of approximately $5 to $7 per barrel from the Canadian companies that were qualified for the NOR price to the multinational companies that owned approximately 85 per cent of all the oil that had been discovered prior to 1973. I wonder if the government intends to take appropriate steps to correct that terribly unjust action that was taken.

Senator Roblin: I know that my honourable friend does not expect me to debate oil pricing policy in Question Period, and I have no intention of doing so. I simply tell him that when the government decides that a change in policy is necessary, that step will be taken.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, this is another new policy of the Honourable Leader of the Government. When he sat on this side of the house, he, together with Senator Murray, wanted to debate every economic change that took place. Even a change in the value of the Canadian dollar from week to week generated a mini-debate every Thursday afternoon. I cannot believe that he is now rejecting the idea that we should have a discussion about a matter that is of such significant economic importance to a part of Canada that has come through a very difficult period because of international prices.

I would be pleased to discuss the changes that have been made, but the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not seem to think it is appropriate to talk about such things in the Senate. I suppose one could discuss those changes by way of an Inquiry, but surely the leader is in a position to tell us about these significant changes after all the weeks and months of preparation. Oil prices have been decreasing since November, although I admit the slide has been more dramatic in the past few days. Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate only going to say, "We will sit and watch it slide further"?

Senator Roblin: I have no objection to my honourable friend's discussing the oil question; he may do so to his heart's content, but he should do so in the proper way and at the proper time. If he wants to have a rational debate on the subject, he cannot deal with the subject during Question Period, and neither can I.

If there is to be a policy change in respect of this matter, my honourable friend will hear about it.

Senator Olson: I am raising these questions because some people in Alberta are vitally, significantly, almost desperately concerned about what is going on.

The government, at least the party to which my honourable friend belongs, had all of the solutions to this problem a short while ago. Am I to say that there is nothing going to happen? Surely, the leader can at least take these questions as notice and find out what is going to happen, or are we to wait, as we had to in the case of the drought payments, for announcements? We have been waiting three months now to find out what the terms and conditions of those payments are to be. I looked through my files yesterday and can tell the leader that I did not receive any documentation in the mail respecting that matter.

Getting back to the price of oil, surely the government has a plan to deal with a situation in which a 35 to 40 per cent decrease in gross revenue will take place.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we do not have all the answers to all economic questions, but I can tell my honourable friend that we have a few better answers than he was able to provide when he was in charge of things.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend's assertion today that there is going to be a significant change in the price of oil is not substantiated by the facts. What has happened so far is a fluctuation in the spot price of oil. That does not necessarily mean that there will be other changes, although there may be. I do not discount that fact. However, if there are such changes, then the government will consider the appropriate measures to take. I do not think it is appropriate for us to announce any change in policy today.

Senator Olson: I will ask a final supplementary because it is obvious that the leader has chosen not to answer my questions, and worse, he has also chosen not to take them as notice. I do not expect the leader to have all of the answers as to what the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources and the rest of the government are going to do, but I think it is reasonable to ask the leader what action the government deems appropriate now that this situation has descended on the Canadian oil industry, because it was claimed that this was provided for in the Western Accord.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend cannot accuse me of having failed to answer his questions; I have answered them in categorical terms.

Senator Olson: The leader has not answered my questions. I hope he is more forthcoming in the next few days, because a large part of the Canadian economy is interested in this matter.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—EXPORT OF FRESH WATER

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, respecting the current trade talks with the United States, was Mr. Reisman, Canada's chief negotiator, authorized by the Government of Canada to put the export of fresh water on the trading block, and was it within his terms of reference to do so?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think that Mr. Reisman has received any instructions from the Government of Canada with respect to this matter, but if I may be allowed I should like to say what I think he said when he was asked by people interested in water whether the question of water supply would be a matter raised at the conference. He said, and, I think, quite appropriately, that he thought it would be. He did not give any indication of the policy of the Government of Canada; he simply answered a question as to whether water would be raised by the Americans by saying "Yes".

Senator Grafstein: Would the leader advise the Senate whether or not the Province of Ontario—since fresh water is a subject of provincial jurisdiction—was consulted prior to Mr. Reisman making any statement whatsoever on this question?

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: I do not know about that, but I do not think we can accept the implication of the question that Mr. Reisman man has to receive the assent of a particular province before he makes a statement.

Senator Frith: He is asking for information.

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—REMUNERATION OF CANADIAN NEGOTIATOR

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my question, although not in the same vein, also concerns Mr. Reisman.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate must remember the outcry when it was announced by the previous government that Mr. Macdonald would be paid $800 per day to head a royal commission.

Is the fact that on the day the Senate is asked to give second reading to a bill reducing family allowances, the government announced its intention to pay Mr. Reisman $1,000 per day further confirmation of the government's policy to treat different classes of people in different manners?

Senator Perrault: Shame.

Senator Roblin: The answer is, no, honourable senators.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on the line of questioning which Senator Olson pursued yesterday concerning the national sugar-beet policy. The Leader of the Government indicated that he would continue to ask his colleagues to provide information on this "in good time."

I understand that next week representatives from the sugar-beet growers of Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec will be in Ottawa, and I wonder, given that cabinet will meet tomorrow, whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate would undertake to impress on his colleagues the urgency of this matter in light of the visit to this city of those individuals next week.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, I would be glad to do that, honourable senators.

While I am on my feet, I shall say to Senator Olson that I will dig up the information we were discussing.

Senator Olson: I appreciate that.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ECONOMIC EQUALITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on December 3 last I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about the item on the agenda of the First Ministers' Conference in Halifax concerning the economic equality of women of Canada, and he declined to provide any information about the follow-up or items which might emerge from that discussion. On December 5, he again declined to answer the question.

[Senator Roblin.]

Fortunately, the minister responsible for the Status of Women, the Honourable Walter McLean, did note these questions and answers and sent me a letter in December describing the outcome of those meetings and saying that there would be future discussions with the provinces in which the proposals put down in Halifax would be pursued.

My question is: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate now tell us the stage of development of those upcoming meetings? I understand they are coming up very shortly. Can he tell us the agenda items concerning the Status of Women?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am glad my colleague wrote to my friend on the subject. I will take the question as notice.

PENITENTIARIES

CANADA-ALBERTA AGREEMENT AND MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—EFFECT ON EMPLOYEES

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I have a further question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I might explain the reason I asked for the documents when I did. I had been watching and waiting for the tabling of those agreements and felt that that was the time to raise a point of order. If I was wrong, I apologize.

My second question flows from those agreements. As I stated, the parole service in the province of Alberta is being farmed out to the provincial government to administer on our behalf. In addition, two minimum security institutions are being closed, the minimum institution at Drumheller and the Grierson Centre in Edmonton.

This affects about 200 faithful employees of the Government of Canada, many of whom have staked federal careers in the corrections field. They have appealed to me to ask the government for a statement as to their future with the Government of Canada so that they can understand exactly where they stand. This is creating a great deal of uncertainty and is raising unforeseen problems for these employees.

I appeal to the Leader of the Government, if he would, to seek a policy statement from the government with respect to these 200 men and women in the Correctional Service of Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will not surprise my friend when I tell him that I am not aware of the circumstances of which he speaks, but I will do my best to provide a statement which meets the need he has described.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY—EFFECT ON HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on the earlier questions with respect to the decline in the world oil price. As the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware, there is comment that certain major projects might be put off because of the decline in world oil prices, which projects include the oil development off the east coast of Newfoundland.

My question is: Has the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources established a price range for oil, in which range the development of Hibernia would be justified or viable? Following from that, from an economic point of view, at what stage does that project become dangerously liable to indefinite postponement because of price changes? It is really a question of fact that I am interested in.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I see my honourable friend's point. I suppose that the same comment applies to a number of what I call high priced oil source projects which will have to be given consideration. While we have to cope with the day-to-day fluctuations in prices, we also have to consider the long range interests of the country in securing supplies of oil and gas, and the Hibernia field is associated with that.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—EFFECT ON CANADIAN LUMBER INDUSTRY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a separate question, I notice that there are talks going on at present between officials of the United States and Canada on the subject of lumber. Can the government leader tell us what is happening at these talks? Have they been called at the request of the United States to put pressure on Canada to halt its lumber exports to the United States, as was suggested some months ago by the ambassador? Just what is the purpose of these talks, apart from providing another opportunity to the United States to put pressure on Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): There is no doubt in my mind that the main object of the American lumber interests—and I differentiate the lumber interests from the American government—is to put pressure on Canada to reduce its lumber exports to the United States. The aim of the Government of Canada is to demonstrate once again the reasonableness of the economic facts that bear on our export position in the United States. I believe that the Minister for International Trade has been in Los Angeles discussing this matter with the Americans with a view to presenting our case as vigorously as he can. I have to tell my friend that I do not know the exact auspices under which he operates in that discussion, and I will try to find out.

Senator MacEachen: I would appreciate any information on the discussion. I would ask whether a resolution of this lumber question on the part of Canada has been related, by the United States, in any way to the proposed talks on a comprehensive free trade arrangement between the two countries. To put it another way, is the United States telling Canada that we must get this lumber situation settled if we expect to have favourable treatment in the U.S. Congress on the request of the President to negotiate a bilateral deal with Canada?

Senator Roblin: I think it is fairly clear that the lumber interests in the United States want to make the settlement of that problem a precondition of trade talks with that country, but that is their view only. It has not been represented to us by the Government of the United States as a precondition for those talks, and we stoutly maintain that, of course, it is not.

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, the Leader of the Government would have no hesitation in giving us an assurance that the government will stoutly resist the efforts of the United States government in this case—if efforts are made—to somehow maintain that this lumber question is so important that it must be settled in order to sweeten the atmosphere for a bilateral deal. I hope that the government will resist that notion, because concessions given in advance would be very dangerous, indeed.

Senator Roblin: I agree that preconditions or concessions given in advance by either party represent serious obstacles to successful negotiations. The stand of the Government of Canada is that the lumber situation should not be a precondition of the talks. We are maintaining that stand as vigorously as we know how.

AMERICAN COUNTERVAIL ON ATLANTIC GROUND FISH—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): While we are on the subject of trade, perhaps the Leader of the Government would tell us a little about what attitude the Government of Canada has taken on the countervail action by the United States against Atlantic groundfish? In this case it appears that the United States felt quite free to undertake an action which was very offensive to Canada, despite the upcoming trade talks. What attitude has our government taken on this particular action by the United States?

• (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no direct information on the particular point that my friend raises, but I do know that, as a matter of principle, insofar as we are allowed to do so under American law, we make the most vigorous representations to the boards and bodies that are dealing with these questions. Then, if we do not like the outcome, we have the opportunity to let the American government know what we feel about it.

My honourable friend has put his finger on one of the most pressing, difficult and important problems in our trading relationships. That is the amicable and equitable solution of problems of this sort with respect to trade between our two countries, whereby one of the parties applies its own rules, whatever they may happen to be, to the issue under question, and there is no means nowadays by which we can usually adjudicate any differences of opinion as to what the rules should be.

One of the great goals, I submit, of the trade negotiations, regardless of anything else that we might do, is to establish agreed rules and a means of equitable settlement of disputes regarding what constitutes unfair trading practices. Right now one gets the impression that in relation to our dealings with the United States—and perhaps they might say the same of us—each nation decides itself what is unfair, and the other nation thinks that the decision on unfairness is unfair. The question is: How do we adjudicate those things in an equitable and amicable manner? That is one of the great goals that I see. Until that matter has been settled between our two countries—and as yet it has not been—I expect we shall continue to have the kind of difficulties we are talking about.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 18, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Grafstein regarding a discrepancy between the estimated $200 million in losses projected by the government for 1986 and the $14 million in losses projected by the consulting firms of Burns Fry, Merrill Lynch and S.G. Warburg.

(The answer follows:)

Burns Fry did not project losses, but quoted a 1984 de Havilland projection. This 1984 DHC plan was a plan that was overly optimistic and constrained Dash 8 production and development; it made no allowance for future aircraft competitive sales financing. It, in effect, represented a downsized DHC.

The 1985 DHC plan, on the other hand, provides for increased Dash 8 production (with the consequent need for increased working capital), stretching the Dash 8 aircraft, development of a new aircraft and smaller government payments toward competitive sales financing. It is a plan for a different mode of operation than that contemplated by the 1984 plan.

The difference between the Burns Fry quoted loss and the $200 million cash requirement, therefore, reflects this expanded plan plus the degree of conservatism used for the underlying assumptions. The DHC forecast represented their best estimate of the outcome if all events happened as forecast. To a certain extent it represents a goal toward which the company is striving.

The DRIE forecast, on the other hand, was prepared from a more conservative set of assumptions particularly in the area of Dash 8 sale prices and projected productivity improvements. It reflects the fact that DHC is selling its products in a very competitive market and in order to meet the competition, may not be able to obtain full price for the aircraft.

[Senator Roblin.]

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION—BURNS FRY PROSPECTUS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked on December 18, 1985 by the Honourable Senator Sinclair regarding whether the Burns Fry prospectus was subject to due diligence before it was issued.

(The answer follows:)

The material that was produced was not in the form of a prospectus nor was it intended to fulfill that role. The material was in the form of an information brochure on the company's operations and contained an explicit disclaimer with respect to promotional information relating to the sale.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 3 and 10 last by the Honourable Senator Olson and the Honourable Senator Fairbairn respectively, regarding Agriculture—Western Canada—drought conditions—government assistance.

(The answer follows:)

Details of the actual formula have not been determined because it is necessary to fit eligible acres into a $150 million package. However, the payment will be based on accumulated drought-related loss experience data from crop insurance records for the past three years in a designated area (rural municipality, county, municipal district or other appropriate area). Some weighting will be included for additional emphasis on the most recent losses. The loss experience, in the form of the indemnity to liability ratio, will determine both the eligibility of the area and the level of payment that will be received by individuals. Payments will be made upon application to all eligible farmers within the area, regardless of whether or not they carried crop insurance.

There was hope that some cheques could be prepared prior to Christmas but the physical constraints to gathering the necessary information and processing payments made this deadline impossible. We now expect to be in a position to make payments in all provinces early in the new year.

THE DE HAVILLAND AIRCRAFT OF CANADA, LIMITED

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION—USE OF DE HAVILLAND TECHNOLOGY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Grafstein, regarding whether the technology developed by de Havilland will only be utilized for manufacturing jobs in Canada.

(The answer follows:)

Boeing has agreed that the de Havilland capacity for research and development activity will be maintained and enhanced. Boeing has also agreed to maintain de Havilland's capabilities to design, develop and produce products within its product mandate. The augmentor wing technology, whose rights are vested in the Crown, will remain the property of the Crown and will be exploited in Canada to the fullest extent possible. Production of the existing de Havilland products outside of Canada requires the Minister's approval.

In addition, Boeing is making long-term investments in DHC which indicate its serious approach to the future of the company. While some of the DHC technology will undoubtedly benefit Boeing, we would expect that DHC will benefit from access to Boeing's considerable expertise. Boeing is very impressed by the engineering skills at DHC and will use and build on this base.

SALE TO BOEING CORPORATION—OFF-THE-RECORD PRIVATE BRIEFINGS—JOB SECURITY

Hon Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Olson, as to whether members of the Prime Minister's Office and senior government officials provided briefings concerning the sale of de Havilland to select groups as well as caucuses at Queen's Park and Ottawa.

(The answer follows:)

Briefings on the sale of de Havilland were provided by Mr. Paul Marshall, president of the Canada Development Investment Corporation, for all parties in Ontario. No other briefings occurred.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Could I ask the Leader of the Government whether he can give me an answer to the questions I raised with respect to Mr. Raoul Wallenberg and his status as a Canadian citizen?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must confess that I do not have that answer at the tip of my tongue. I would have to take a look at it.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Arthur Tremblay moved the second reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-70, which we are about to consider on second reading, is aimed at amending the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Perhaps "re-amending" would be more appropriate, since the legislation has been amended five times since its initial adoption.

But I will get back to that later on. First I want to consider the provisions of the bill before us today.

The first two clauses merely update the amounts of family allowance and special allowance which I will use to establish the subsequent progression in the rates of these allowances. The amounts of $20 and $29.95 respectively for these allowances in 1974 have been replaced by the amounts in effect in 1984, that is, $29.95 for the family allowance and $44.68 for the special allowance.

Clause 3 does two things. First, it determines that for 1985, the family allowance is set at $31.27 and the special allowance at $46.65, the rates that were in effect that year.

Second, and this is nitty-gritty, as it were, Clause 3 determines how family allowances will be indexed after 1985. From now on, the allowances will be increased in proportion to the increase in the Consumer Price Index, less three per cent.

Clause 4 allows the minister to remit all or any portion of an allowance received by a person or institution that was not entitled to receive it.

Clauses 5 and 6 add two new headings, "Presumption of Death" and "Remedial Action".

Under Clause 5, in certain cases the minister would have the authority to presume the death of a child, for the purposes of the Family Allowances Act.

In its initial wording, this clause provided a procedure whereby the minister would issue a certificate declaring that the child is presumed to be dead, and so forth. This procedure was criticized for various reasons, leading to representations on the consequences it might have. The initial version was therefore amended and improved, so that according to the text before us today, although the change does not affect family allowances as such, the procedure followed by the Minister will consist solely in determining, for the purposes of this Act, the date on which the death is presumed to have occurred.

We now have a clause that is more general in scope than was the case in the previous version, which involved issuing a certificate. The clause was therefore amended and appears in its amended form in the bill before us today and as adopted in the other place.

Under Clause 6 the minister would be empowered to correct certain administrative errors, in the interest of beneficiaries.

Such are the provisions of Bill C-70 concerning family allowances. Of course the most important is the one related to the rate of indexation of allowances.

We should not be expected to make a proper analysis of those provisions without first putting them in the context of the child benefit system of which family allowances are part and parcel.

Indeed the system includes two other major elements, but they have nothing in common with what has happened to family allowances in recent years. The first of the two are the child tax exemptions, at least that is what it is called, although it is not really a tax exemption but a reduction in taxable income. The child tax exemption and the child tax credit are the other two measures. As it happens, major amendments to these two elements have also been proposed in Bill C-84 to amend the Income Tax Act and certain related acts. Indeed we have just received a message that this bill has been adopted by the other place.

The exemption will amount to $710 in fiscal year 1986, $560 in 1987, and $470 in 1989. Then after 1989 the amount of the exemption will be equivalent to the family allowance payment and both will therefore increase at the same rate.

With respect to the tax credit, there are two amendments under Bill C-84, first to the amount of the tax credit itself and, second, to the level at which it will begin to decrease.

The bill provides that the amount will be $454 in fiscal year 1986, $489 in 1987, and $524 in 1988. After that, beginning in 1989, it will increase at the same rate as the consumer price index, less 3 per cent.

As to the income level at which the tax credit will begin to decrease, it will be $23,500 in fiscal year 1986, then it will also increase in accordance with the consumer price index formula, less 3 per cent.

Such are the proposed changes to the child benefit system, at least a brief outline of them, if I may put it that way.

What will be the consequences and impact of those amendments?

Needless to say, we have to make a comparison with the existing system to assess the consequences for the people involved. A brief look at the changes made to the system in recent years will also help us understand what these amendments mean. As I said earlier, the Family Allowances Act, 1973, has been amended five times. Changes have also been made to the child tax exemption and the child tax credit.

With your permission, honourable senators, I would like to table a chart showing the figures corresponding to these various changes so that it can be printed in today's official report. It has already been distributed. This is not because I presumed that I would have the permission of the Senate. Someone else must have so presumed since the charts have already been distributed. However, with your permission, these charts have now been distributed. I therefore want to ask officially that they appear in today's official report. The request has now been made.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The source of the data does not appear on the document.

Senator Tremblay: I could clarify that as we look at the charts. In fact, I have also added a few charts.

Senator Frith: You will give the source of the data? The charts will be part of the official report. We can indicate their source to avoid referring to the speech itself. Will you be adding the reference? I imagine that you will identify the source.

Senator Tremblay: Yes.

Senator Frith: If it is acceptable that the documents be printed as an appendix, the source of the data included on the charts and in your speech can also be mentioned.

Senator Tremblay: I find this rather embarrassing as these charts have been prepared by myself and the research staff of the Library of Parliament. The figures are taken from a series of sources, including the bills themselves, as well as other sources, as you will see in our study. Are you referring to all the sources, Senator Frith? Very well.

Senator Frith: Very well, I will insist no further.

Senator Tremblay: For instance, in due course I will be referring to income tax statistics. There is a regular publication which gives all possible information on income tax.

In any case, if you agree, I will try to make a detailed list of sources which I may indicate later on. At this point, I cannot deliver them to you in any explicit way.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is Senator Tremblay's request granted?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For tables, see appendix, p. 1879.)

Senator Frith: Is there an English text?

Senator Tremblay: Not yet.

Senator Frith: Considering how often documents have been submitted in English only, with the excuse that a French text would be forthcoming, this is a fair change.

● (1450)

[English]

Senator Doody: That is a pleasant change. It is about time.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: Since you have it before you, the analysis and comments I will be making will make more sense to you, I hope.

At the same time, I will also be tabling other tables which I will be using further on in my speech. Let me also stress that those tables and the other statistics I will be referring to have been prepared with the help of the research staff in the Library of Parliament. I thank them wholeheartedly for their assistance in the circumstances.

At any rate, full bilingualism certainly must be respected as a principle. But when one prepares a speech to be given in the Senate and changes are made for instance to a bill under consideration, as in this case, one does not always have the time to write the English text as the rule of bilingualism would have it.

I therefore apologize for not having had translations made for the headings of the tables I will be using. In the Debates of the Senate, I imagine our own translation services will do the work and there will only be one day's lag before the principle is complied with.

Besides, actually you should have received three other tables which were distributed at the same time, in addition to the first one. In my speech I will be using those tables. In any case, it is my hope that having those tables made available to you will make my comments more easily understandable than if all this were just words and concepts, if I may say so, without your having the figures right before your eyes.

So, let us quote a few facts, merely concerning the evolution of federal child benefits from 1974 to 1985. Those figures are included in the first table.

As far as family allowances are concerned, two of the changes made, the first in 1974 and the second in 1981, obviously dealt with minor technicalities, and I will not refer to them. The other three changes, on the other hand, had a wider scope and substantially affected the rates of family allowances.

The first significant change was made under Chapter C-3 of the Statutes of Canada for 1976-1977, which was assented to on December 22, 1976, and the title of which, interestingly, was "Government Expenditures Restraint Act". Family allowances for the year 1976 were then locked onto the 1975 rate, that is $265 for both years, and they were paid on that basis as of January 1st, 1976.

The second major change was of a different nature, and derived from legislation assented to on December 12, 1978, "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".

As indicated in the title, that act included two measures that complemented each other.

First, an innovative provision, a child tax credit for families with a net income of less than $18,000, and the amount of that credit decreased gradually to an income of $22,000 for families with one child and to an income of $26,000 for families with two children.

Second, there was a reduction of family allowances from $25.68 in 1978 to $20 in 1979, monthly, in other words to the same amount as in 1974, five years earlier. Those figures are in the tables I just referred to.

Now for the third and last major change. The act amending the 1973 Family Allowance Act, assented to on February 17, 1983, had only one clause, which provided as follows:

(a) the amount of family allowance to be paid for a month in 1983 shall not exceed 106 per cent of the amount of family allowance for a month in 1982; and

(b) the amount of family allowance to be paid for a month in 1984 shall not exceed 105 per cent of the amount of family allowance for a month in 1983.

This was under the six-and-five program which everyone will remember. In preparing this retrospective on family allowances, I naturally asked myself what would have been the amount of family allowances in 1985 if the principle of full indexation promulgated in the 1973 act and never abolished since had been applied throughout the period.

I even asked myself a second question, which might seem a bit naïve: If, instead of full indexation, the principle of moderate indexation proposed in Bill C-70 had been applied during the same period, at what level would the 1985 rate have been set?

Senator Frith: Have been what?

Senator Tremblay: Have been set. Chart 2 gives the answer to both questions.

We can see that, if the principle of full indexation had been applied throughout the period, the result would have been as indicated, and I shall abstain from reading the figures for each year.

Let us simply look at what would have happened in 1985. Column 2 on the left gives the increases in the consumer price index for each year.

If the formula set out in the 1973 act had been applied, family allowances would have amounted to $51.87 in 1985 while, in fact, they amounted to $31.27. This information is provided on the last line of the chart.

If the rate proposed in Bill C-70 had been applied, family allowances would have been $38.15 in 1985.

It is interesting to be able to make some comparisons between these figures.

The first concerns the year 1976, which I have circled to highlight it.

That year, only the second one in which the principle of full indexation was to apply, the difference between the rate corresponding to the application of this principle and the rate set under the Government Expenditures Restraint Act is $2.47 a month, or $30 a year to make a round figure.

For the same year, the principle of moderate indexation would have been clearly more profitable for families and they would have had nearly $14 a year, or $13.92, more.

At the time, it would have taken two years of full indexation to catch up with limited indexation after application of the principle of full indexation had been changed.

My second comment will concern the year 1979. Objectively, it would be wrong to make for that year the same type of comparison as the one I have just made for 1976 between the two sets of figures.

● (1500)

It was in 1979 that the tax credit became part of the system. Family Allowances were therefore allowed to regress, for obvious budgetary reasons, which were not any more unreasonable at the time than they are now in our present economic situation.

There is a problem, however, with the introduction of the tax credit, because if we want to compare the rates in effect during the period following introduction of the tax credit, and I am referring to 1983-84, how do we do this without being too arbitrary?

To deal with this problem, in Table 2 I added column (6) where I continue my analysis for 1982 as if in that year, the rate in C-70 were applied to that year alone and not from the outset, to eliminate any cumulative effect. In any event, we reach the same conclusions. And for 1983, the policy introduced in Bill C-70 would have been even more advantageous. This is true for the first two years, 1983-84, of the period we considered. In the third year, the situation is reversed. Full indexation wins out over partial indexation, making up for lost time as it were, which leads to a fourth comment on developments in family allowances since 1973.

My fourth comment arises quite obviously from our findings. The fact of challenging the principle of family allowances is certainly not new. Ever since the principle was adopted in 1979, it has been challenged on several occasions, the effect being either to obstruct, purely and simply, its implementation as in 1976 or to moderate its impact, as in 1983 and 1984.

Although, it is being challenged today, and Bill C-70 proposes to substitute a formula for partial indexation for full indexation, I hope that my analysis of developments since 1974 will at least put the debate on a less dramatic plane and let it rise above the facile level of political rhetoric.

Objectively speaking, our duty is now to identify and assess the respective merits of the approaches in question: The one taken in 1973 and the approach proposed in Bill C-70. This will be the subject of my fifth comment.

I imagine that originally, the principle of indexation was introduced to protect families against undue increases in the Consumer Price Index.

However, what good is the principle if the very people who formulated it went right ahead and blocked its implementation, not once but several times?

Aside from the regression in family allowances in 1979 as a result of the tax credit, we found that in the economic situation prevailing in 1975-76 and 1981-82, which led to a major departure from full indexation, families would have been better off with the policy of partial indexation proposed in Bill C-70. This is a fact that, in our opinion, cannot be denied, in the light of our analysis of past events.

In other words, under these circumstances, it seems that in an era of skyrocketing inflation, a partial indexation, protects families better than a full indexation, the effects of which are periodically corrected.

Honourable senators, such a statement is likely to cause you to reflect as I did when I put it down in my presentation.

In case we were faced with an inflationary situation such as that which caused the government to shy away from full indexation, what guarantee would families have that even partial indexation would protect against events and budgetary constraints which, of necessity, are associated with them?

To such a question, there is no clear cut $2 + 2 = 4$ answer. How could we express these "imponderables" with a mathematical equation?

Common sense is the best method, at least political common sense. It seems to me that even those who are holding the state's purse strings are not in a position to go beyond the partial indexation even in an inflationary period, to reduce further the already partial growth of family allowances.

I recognize that my answer to this question has only a moral and psychological weight. Nevertheless, I feel it is quite valid.

Having said that, concerning family allowances and my own findings, let us return to Table 1 which tells the recent story of the other variables of the system.

While things were progressing the way I have just described for family allowances, what was happening with the exemption for children and the child tax credit?

The exemption for wholly dependent children amounted to $320 in 1974. Up until 1983, it was gradually increased more or less in line with the CPI, but in a very capricious fashion, sometimes more rapidly, sometimes less rapidly, but more often than not less rapidly and sometimes by a great margin. In 1983, it was set at $710 and then maintained at that level. It was set once and for all and stopped moving. Again, the reference or relation to indexation, because the question is as valid as in the case of family allowances, is rather elastic, to say the least.

As for the child tax credit which amounted to $200 in the 1978 tax year, the government applied the principle of full indexation, except in 1982, when it very curiously increased it 31.4 per cent. But it was quick to correct this "anomaly" by maintaining the credit in 1984 at the same level as the preceding year, following which it behaved as in the case of the exemption, increasing by less than the CPI in 1984 and slightly more in 1985.

As to the income level at which the tax credit begins to decrease—it was first set at $18,000 in fiscal year 1978—it was fully indexed until 1982 (and this time the indexation was just about right) and the amount rose to $26,330; it was frozen at that level in 1983 and has since remained unchanged. It seems to me it was worthwhile to take a close look at the way the situation has evolved, because I think it gives us a concrete and realistic idea of the significance of amendments such as those proposed under Bills C-70 and C-84.

So far we have looked back, let us now look forward. What if we were to extrapolate current data to gain an insight into next year? What will be the impact of the amendments contained in Bills C-70 and C-84?

I have gathered all relevant data in Table 3.

As they stand, those figures do not mean much. I will spare you and refrain from reading such boring figures. I would rather make a few comments on them. Family allowances are taxable, the exemption changes the taxable income, and the tax credit begins to decrease over the set limit. Indeed we must look beyond those figures and take family income into consideration if we want to be enlightened by a comparison between the new and the old systems.

That being so, I think a utopian approach would be to attempt to make an adequate description of all existing or imaginable situations which will be positively or negatively affected under the new system. As a matter of fact, is there a way to make such an exhaustive study?

I, for one, do not see a better way than to give examples of concrete situations and try to figure out the number of families likely to be affected one way or another.

• (1510)

Take the case of a two-parent family for the purposes of my demonstration, I will not consider single-parent families, although their numbers are not inconsiderable. So let us take the case of a family with two parents and two children under eighteen. This is the typical profile of families receiving family allowances.

If the family does not have enough income to pay federal income tax, taking into account the family allowance and the various exemptions it can claim on the income tax return, it will receive the full amount of the tax credit. In this case, we can apply the information appearing in column (7), Table 4. Here we read that in 1986, this family will benefit more under the new system with $44 for each child, increasing to $51 in 1987 and $57 in 1988. This amount starts to decrease in 1989 to $32 and will drop proportionally after that. That is the situation we get under Bills C-70 and C-84, compared with the present system. I think there are two questions we must answer. First of all, I think that is why our conclusions differ from those reached by many of the parties concerned.

What level of income must not be exceeded by this family if it is to take full advantage of the benefits of the new system? According to our calculations—and as I said earlier, I had the full co-operation of the Library of Parliament's Research Services, for which I am most grateful—the maximum income level was approximately $13,000. This applies to the entire period under consideration. We took our figures from sources such as distribution of families by income, and so forth. We can therefore conclude that all families with an income of $13,000—it is more often $10,000, but my purpose is to draw conclusions on the basis of my findings—all families with an income of $13,000 or less will benefit fully under the new system, and this applies to all amounts indicated in columns (7), Table 4, which we referred to earlier.

Second question: What percentage of families will be benefitting under the new system?

Income tax statistics showing the distribution of returns by level of income provide the answer.

There is a problem, however, since the latest statistics are for 1983, and as a result, we can only extrapolate approximate figures for subsequent years. Nevertheless, according to the people who provided the data I am about to give you, the information is accurate enough to be reliable. In this field, a difference of one or two per cent is a little like a survey when they say that nineteen times out of twenty, the margin of error will not be more than four or five points. And that is the potential margin of error. Here are the results.

I must admit that I was surprised. Families with an income of less than $13,000, who as a result do not pay federal income tax and who would benefit fully under the new system, represent 49 per cent of the population. People can say these benefits are not enough, that they could be increased, but they are still significant. Indeed, the amount of the child tax exemption remains the same for that year. It will decrease afterwards, but it will remain the same for 1986.

Moreover, it has been estimated that, for 1986, families with an income of $24,000 a year will benefit significantly, if not fully, from the new system, which adds another 26 per cent to the families that will be eligible.

From 1987, the proportion of beneficiaries begins to decrease. The figure of 49 per cent mentioned earlier remains, but only 6 per cent rather than 26 per cent of the families will receive partial benefits.

We must find out not only who benefits from the new system, but also who loses. We must therefore look at the other extreme in the income brackets. We find that 12 per cent of families will lose substantially.

As for the 33 per cent of families between these two extremes, they make up a relatively neutral zone where benefits and losses are not really significant.

It seems to me that these figures can reasonably be used to make as objective as possible a judgment on the new system proposed in Bills C-70 and C-84 for the three examined categories of child benefits. There are other benefits. For instance, in a single parent family with two children, one of the children can entitle the parent to an exemption equivalent to the spouse's exemption. This means that the child provides a significant benefit in a way.

I believe that these data give proper support to the following general conclusions.

First, the poorest families will benefit the most under the new system, that is the families with no income or whose income generated by employment and family allowances is under $13,000.

Second, the determining factor in providing the maximum benefits for the proper level of income under the new system is the reduction in the child tax exemption, so that the definition of "needy family" will still not correspond to the poverty line as generally established, even though the concepts of "poverty" and "poverty line" are very relative.

Third, we must recognize that even for the poorest families, the advantages of the new system are greater now and in the next few years than they will be in a more distant future. For that matter, it is remarkable that all the criticisms of the system which we wish to set into place are based on a projection for 1990 or 1991.

Fourth, more and more the tax credit will play a major part in the child benefit system. That is the most basic of the proposals which were submitted to us. As to the principle, the initial change of direction was taken when Parliament adopted this legislation in 1978 and introduced the tax credit in the system. The proposed legislation is based on the same principle and with a similar objective: Devise a child benefit system that will favour first the low income families, even at the cost of reducing the benefits for higher income families.

Fifth, the forward step which Bills C-70 and C-84 enable us to take is still only one step in the right direction, and obviously it is not enough to bring the system up to the ideal level where we might begin to cope efficiently with the real needs of the people involved. As Senator Robertson quite properly emphasized in her outstanding address on December 19, the government is moving in the right direction. That is precisely why we must urge it, and I quote:

I would strongly urge the government, in subsequent budgets, to increase that trend and start moving more money away from the "haves" to the "have nots".

From the perspective suggested by Senator Robertson we must consider other measures we should take to keep on improving the system.

That is the approach I will be recommending to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology when it resumes the work it began last spring after the Senate asked the committee to study the consultation paper entitled "Child and Elderly Benefits" tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Jake Epp.

Last December 18 I tabled in this house the committee's interim report on this document.

Among the committee members involved in drafting this report, Senator Marsden played a leading role as chairman of the sub-committee responsible for undertaking that study, so I will not say anything more about it for the time being. It will be more appropriate for Senator Marsden to comment on it whenever she decides to do so during the debate which normally follows the tabling of such a report.

If I may, however, I would say this: The document tabled was called an "interim report", a clear indication that there is to be another one. The second report will go further than the preparation of a methodology—that was done in the first report—and the way it is to be applied to the situation prevailing in 1985. We will try to make an objective assessment of the results of the implementation of Bills C-70 and C-84. In light of that assessment and the suggestions which might come to the committee from various sources, we might even go as far as making concrete recommendations likely to improve the system.

Personally I hope that, as soon as possible, our committee will take this constructive approach towards the future and follow the course I have just outlined.

All told, honourable senators, it seems clear to me that the proposed changes in Bills C-70 and C-84 will set the child benefit system on the right track because they will go a long way towards improving the lot of poorer families. That is the objective of the government and the basic motivation which prompts me to propose the second reading of Bill C-70.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Graham, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—
MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator

[Senator Tremblay.]

Davey, for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Royal Assent), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985.—(Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C.).

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this proposal, received from the Senate committee and having to do with the way in which Royal Assent to bills is to be given in the future, is an interesting one. It proposes that the traditional form—which is to be retained and used on certain occasions—should be augmented by making provision for another form of Royal Assent, which is less formal and which, certainly in one description, involves the giving of the assent in another place upon receipt of a resolution from the houses requesting that that be done. There seems to be a pretty widespread view that it would be useful to have another method of giving Royal Assent, other than the one we now use, and we have seen that other jurisdictions in our parliamentary system, such as Great Britain and Australia, have, in fact, provided that Royal Assent may be given in a way that is somewhat similar to the one that is being proposed for us here. Various studies in the other place have also concluded that this is a good idea.

• (1530)

My attention was drawn to the resolution when I noted the way in which it was proposed that this proposal be put into force, namely, that the two houses of Parliament should meet and prepare a joint address of both houses to be presented to Her Excellency the Governor General praying that she approve such changes in the Royal Assent ceremony as described in the report.

So what I have to say today really bears not so much on the substance of the matter, with which I have no great quarrel, but rather on the way in which it is proposed to put it into effect.

I raise the question, because it seems to me that there is an argument that a joint address by both houses is not an appropriate way of making the change that is desired. I hasten to put in the disclaimer that most of the points I am going to make this afternoon are not those which have automatically sprung into my mind as a constitutional expert. In fact, I recognize my serious shortcomings in that field, and I took the precaution of trying to obtain some views from those who are more skilled than I in the interpretation of the Constitution. I say frankly that I am really making use of the brains, experience and hard work of another who used to sit in this chamber. I refer to Senator Forsey.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): He wants a constitutional amendment!

Senator Roblin: I am not entirely sure that Senator Forsey would approve of my mining his work in this way, but I hope that I will be forgiven by him if I do so, because I think he raises points in a way which only he can do, that indicate that we have a bit of a problem here.

The point that is made to begin with is that it is not appropriate that the change should be made either by advice from the cabinet to the Governor General or indeed by resolution of the houses. Reference is made to history, particularly in the United Kingdom, where two changes were made in the method of giving Royal Assent. The first was some time ago, in 1541, and the other was in 1967. On both occasions it was deemed appropriate that it should be done by statute, and that it was not appropriate that it should be done by some other method. The reasoning behind that undoubtedly was because, in the opinion of the law officers in that jurisdiction at the time, the changes could simply not be made by the sovereign acting alone, or indeed with advice from the cabinet, or indeed by resolution of the houses; but that it required statutory implementation in order that it should be done and done properly.

I am not clear what application the experience of the United Kingdom has for us. In many ways we follow the parliamentary tradition as established there, and this may be a case where we should look at what was done there and relate it to what we are trying to do here. I am also aware that in the Commonwealth of Australia changes have been made—and I regret that I do not have information at my disposal at the moment to indicate how they did it. Again it is obscure as to whether their example is one for us to follow. We certainly will have to make up our own minds, no matter what we think of the precedents that might be quoted in respect of this matter.

It is certain—in my mind, at any rate—that the question as to how the Royal Assent should be given is a little more than a simple question of procedure in the two houses of Parliament. It is something more than that. Therefore I would say prima facie that there is some doubt as to whether the method of a joint address, dealing with the question of procedure, is the proper way in which we should go.

That question is now an open one in my mind. I raise it because I have not had any information put before me which indicates that the matter has been decisively settled, so far as Canadian policy or procedure is concerned, to the point where a joint address would be the way to go. I think that probably we should look into that a little more deeply than we have, and I put that point before the house.

If honourable senators do not like a joint address, what do they like? Would a simple statute of Parliament, as has been employed in the United Kingdom, be the way for us to go here? That too raises some doubt in my mind, because we have now a written Constitution. In the United Kingdom, Parliament is supreme. In the United Kingdom, Parliament can pass any law it likes, and provided that both houses agree, and the sovereign assents, that's it. It is the sovereign body, and there is no other rule that applies except the will of Parliament. That used to be our position here, and in the old days, I suppose, we could have passed the statute and done it that way. But now the question arises: Is the statutory route the appropriate method now that we have a written Constitution? I think that is certainly an open question, to say the least.

It is argued by Senator Forsey—and I have seen some others take the same view—that it is much more than if we wish to alter the system of Royal Assent. It is related to, it might be assimilated to, it verges upon, and has some connection with, a constitutional event—which is a very serious matter indeed. I think that one could make an argument, if I may express an opinion, as to whether a relatively minor change in the way we do things with respect to Royal Assent should be elevated to the full status of a constitutional amendment. There may be some view that it is not. But it seems to me that the question is not conclusively settled. It is open.

Senator Frith: One cannot find a precedent for it in Canada. It is impossible to settle it finally.

Senator Roblin: We can always refer these things to the courts for a settlement, if we want to know. Perhaps that should be done. I raise that point because it seems to me that if we reject the joint address, and we look at the statutory route—which at first glance appealed to me as the way to go—we then run up against the question of the new Constitution.

I do not intend this afternoon to try to develop the argument for suggesting that this is, in effect, a constitutional change. I merely raise a flag and say that we should be sure of our ground before we proceed any further in this matter in that way. Some have said that if we change the system of Royal Assent in the federal Parliament, what does that do for the provincial legislatures? Because they too give the Royal Assent under section 55 of the BNA Act of 1871, if my information is correct, and it may very well be that any changes we make here might have some bearing on that. I do not know. These are questions that I believe are really fascinating for anyone interested in the Constitutional development of our country, and ones which perhaps should receive more attention.

I may be doing the committee an injustice. It may very well be that unknown to me these points have been before it, that it has considered them and has come to a settled judgment that they are not insuperable or valid, and that the matter of a joint address is indeed the way to go. Perhaps the committee has done that, but I am not aware that it has. If the chairman says that it has, then that is an important fact.

I take the view that it might be wiser for us to have another look at this thing to try to satisfy ourselves as to whether the objections that are raised by what I might call the strict constructionists, when it comes to the Constitution—and there are one or two of them in the Senate—should be considered. I should like to be satisfied in my own mind that that point of view has been thoroughly ventilated in committee and has received consideration. It is my opinion—and I offer it freely, because that it is what it is worth. That is the price you are going to pay for it—that we would be on sounder ground if we proceeded either by statute, if that happens to be the right way to go, or that we consider alternatives to the joint address. I would appreciate it if consideration were given to this matter by the committee so that we may have their views and so that we may see whether they still feel that the procedure that they have promoted is the right one.

● (1540)

Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Doody:

That the Report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Committee for further consideration.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn the debate so as to have time to refresh my memory. Briefly, I can tell you that I got the original opinion from Senator Forsey several years ago when we went into this matter very carefully. I completely and absolutely disagreed with Senator Forsey at the time. I also discussed the matter with Senator Frith at that time. I would like to look at my file and refresh my memory and then make some comments tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

PRIVATE BILL

PINE HILL DIVINITY HALL—BILL TO AMEND ACT OF INCORPORATION—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 23, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee to which was referred Bill S-7, intituled: "An Act to amend the Act of incorporation of Pine Hill Divinity Hall", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, December 19, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Henry D. Hicks, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 23, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Friday, December 20, 1985, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege regarding the reporting of that bill back to the Senate today.

Honourable senators may be aware that I am not a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, but, nevertheless, I spoke on second reading of the bill here in the chamber. I attended the meetings of the committee and did extensive questioning. I raised a concern about the fact that there may not have been ample time given to prospective witnesses to appear before the committee. Of course, there was nothing I could do, not being a formal member of the committee, to prevent the reporting of the bill back to the the Senate this day; but I do want to register my serious concern—a concern which I raised in committee—with respect to the committee's adjourning its detailed examination of the bill until such time as we could ascertain in an absolute way that indeed no one was interested in appearing before the committee. I am not at all satisfied with the conclusion of that exercise, and I wish to record that grievance here today at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Cape Breton), that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of what Senator Corbin has said, the motion for third reading of the bill at the next sitting, based, as it is, on the report of the committee, should be recorded as having been adopted on division.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Perhaps Senator Frith could clarify that. I am not certain whether the report is debatable. I believe that Senator Corbin raised a point of privilege. I do not believe that he was speaking to the report of the committee but on a point of privilege, in terms of his own concern. If senators wish to record the motion as being agreed to on division, they may do so. I was wondering what the procedure was.

Senator Frith: The Deputy Leader of the Government is quite right. The report has to be received, I believe, under rule 78, without debate; and since it is a report on a bill which the committee is reporting without amendment, it stands adopted without debate. The rule then provides that the senator in charge of the bill shall move the adjournment to a future date; and that was done. It was on that basis that I wished to make my point.

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—EXPORT OF FRESH WATER—STATEMENT BY GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to refer to an answer I gave yesterday to Senator Grafstein with respect to the position of Mr. Simon Reisman on the export of fresh water. I believe I fell into the same trap as Senator Grafstein in taking the newspaper report as being correct. It was on that basis that I gave my answer. It now appears that the newspaper report was not correct, that Mr. Reisman did not make any statement on this subject. Therefore, I wish to explain my answer to the Senate and advise how I fell into what was something of a trap in respect of that matter.

Senator Olson: You do that all the time, you know.

Senator Frith: It is called "the Roblin formula"!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 28th January, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us what bills might be before us next Tuesday?

• (1410)

Senator Doody: In reply to Senator MacEachen's question, honourable senators, I would like to report that we are told that the three bills that we in the Senate have been referring to as the divorce bills, namely bills C-46, C-47 and C-48, should be before the Senate next week. At this point in time, the other place is working on those bills.

We are also told that in the very near future we can expect to receive Bill C-82, to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. Bill C-84 is now before us. We also expect to receive very shortly Bill C-85, to amend the Petroleum Incentives Program Act and Bill C-86, to amend the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act. I am not telling honourable senators that all of these bills will arrive next week, but I feel reasonably certain that the first three I have mentioned, together with the others, will be with us shortly.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to oil and gasoline pricing.

I think we are all agreed that the most ardent public political romance since Romeo and Juliet is that between sections of the oil industry and the Minister of Energy. As a prelude to my question, I would like to quote from one of the minister's speeches. This was a speech delivered by the minister to the Canadian Association of Oil Well Drilling Contractors on April 2, 1985. She said:

You told me that if we left cash in the industry's pocket, that cash would be used to hire drilling operators and supply and service companies.

Well, we did what you suggested.

You said: Go to world prices. We've done it.

You said: adopt policies that reward success . . . We've done it.

And they began to cheer. She said:

You said: Adjust incentives . . .

They cheered even louder. She said:

You said: establish an enduring fiscal framework . . .

They were almost ecstatic at this point. She said:

You said: adopt policies to increase gas exports. We've done it.

She continued:

You said: adopt policies to eliminate shut-in. We've done it.

They could not contain themselves at this point.

The minister then went on to say:

One of the major stimuli to investment is tax relief, and we have done that, too.

And they began cheering.

You know, this is pretty hot stuff. This is almost like a love letter.

And what did they say? They said the other day:

You have done all this; we have made you Oil Man of the Year. We have done it; we have done it.

So now the minister is Oil Man or Oil Woman or Oil Person of the year.

It is an interesting observation, honourable senators, that somehow providing tax relief for the oil companies is good. It is the fuel that the economic engine requires. Yet, boosting the price of oil products and the price of gasoline is somehow also good policy. However, they are in complete contradiction. On the one hand, you give millions and millions of dollars away to the oil companies and, on the other, you say to the oil consumer: "No, it is good economics to see these prices go up and up." This same minister said this about pricing, and this is the essence of the question which I am gradually approaching.

Senator Frith: But sure-footedly.

Senator Perrault: Honourable senators, this is not oil policy; this is snake oil policy in which we are involved now. Also, I think that the romance between the oil industry and the minister is about to be blighted very shortly because that policy is not predicated upon developing world conditions, as the government has been reminded so eloquently in recent days by members from this side of the house.

On March 28, the minister said:

I fail to understand how a toughly negotiated agreement which took six months to negotiate and is aimed at deregulating prices to reflect market forces could possibly increase gasoline prices. They are coming down in the fall. Do not believe those Liberals. Those prices are coming down in the fall because of the natural market forces and my friends in the oil industry in which I have implicit faith.

Then she went on to say "by creating a market environment, prices will continue to decline. Obviously, that provides the environment for gasoline prices to decline. They are not going to increase in a declining market. If prices go down, then product prices should go down."

Prices are plummeting in the United States, yet they are still at high levels here, and what do we hear? They will get around to it. We hear that "price declines are working their way through the system." They must be starting in the Arctic and working their way gradually out to the east coast of Newfoundland, to L'Anse au Meadows, because it is taking a long time.

She went on to say that "if prices go down, then product prices should go down."

All of these remarks were greeted by riotous applause from the Tory hordes, who just love to hear them.

Then she said the other day that it is not Petro-Canada's task to provide price leadership in the country. She said, "Go ye therefore into Canada and make as much money as you can." Some of us wonder why Petro-Canada was created, if not to help the consumer.

I have a couple of other comments to make before asking my question.

At page 3474 of Commons Debates she stated:

When you remove a tax, it is usual that price decreases occur. There is no reason to believe that gasoline prices will go up when we move to deregulation.

All they have done since then is move up, not down.

At page 3500 of Commons Debates she said:

Going to deregulation and going to world prices mean that we create an environment in which prices should go down if world prices go down.

What I would like to ask on behalf of millions of disappointed Canadian motorists and people in industry who depend upon gasoline and oil products to trigger that engine of growth is: What went wrong with the Conservative policy? Why did those prices not come down last fall, and how long must those people wait for any degree of meaningful relief?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am glad my honourable friend warned me that he was not going to make a speech, because that is one of the best non-speeches I have heard in a long time. When my honourable friend gets going, he can certainly make the rafters ring.

With respect to the price of oil, I think that it is perfectly true to say that there were price decreases last fall when certain changes were made in the price structure. But it is also true that we have an oil price now which, at this minute, does not reflect the changes in the spot price for oil that is being sold by the producers. Obviously, we now have a free market system, and this is the situation that will prevail until these prices work their way through.

I can understand my honourable friend's impatience at the time that it takes to do these things, but I think it is reasonable business practice—if one is able to do so—to dispose of one's inventory at a price which is a fair price compared to what one invested in the first place, and when cheaper supplies come along, then the price varies. I am afraid I cannot offer any comfort that I can bring the price down or that the government can bring the price down at once.

I have noticed that some analysts have said that it might come down within 30 days; that may be optimistic. I think that over time it will come down.

So, to the extent that these current low prices prevail—and that is a good question—I think we can expect to see lower prices before too long. That does not really satisfy my honourable friend, but I must tell him quite frankly that the government is operating on a free market system with respect to the price of oil, and we have to respect that and have to wait until those market effects take their course and, as a result of that, we may expect to see better oil prices.

I am now waiting for the supplementary.

Senator Perrault: The supplementary is this: The minister had some knowledge of the market when she made her predictions in March that the price would come down in the fall; it did not come down in the fall, it went up in the fall.

Why does it take so little time, relatively, to have these prices work themselves through the system in the United States? We have this ridiculous prospect of Canadian motorists now going to the United States and getting fill-ups on a regular basis because the disparity between the gasoline prices makes that journey worthwhile. Why this tortuous, long-term working-through process in Canada when the same process apparently does not occur in the United States?

Senator Roblin: It has to be admitted that they have a competitive situation that is different from the one here. I admit that there are more independent refineries down there and more independent gasoline retailers. This fact makes sure that market prices come along a little more quickly because they move faster than the bigger companies move. I find the argument interesting because I remember well, I must confess, taking exactly the same stand as my honourable friend is taking now when the National Energy Policy was in effect. Under the National Energy Policy, we in Manitoba could go from Winnipeg to Minneapolis and make a very substantial saving on gasoline. We objected to that situation then. The difference is that that situation was the result of government policy, but today the situation is not the result of government policy. It is the result of economic forces. So, while my honourable friend can berate me with respect to the matter of why oil prices are not coming down sooner, I have to say that the structure of the industry in Canada is such that we will have to wait for the higher priced material to work its way through the pipeline before we can expect to see some improvement in the retail pump price.

● (1420)

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government referred a number of times to a free market. One of the things that is clear—and it happened today, so we do not need to go back in history—is that the spot market for oil, after falling dramatically, had levelled off until Sheik Yamani, who is the oil minister of Saudi Arabia, made the statement this morning that as far as Saudi Arabian oil policy is concerned—and this is political policy and does not refer to the capability to produce—the price of oil would go down to $15 per barrel until and unless the other members of the exporting community came to some kind of agreement. Therefore, we must understand that there is no such thing as a free market, that the market is influenced by political decisions made somewhere in the world and in this case made by Sheik Yamani of Saudi Arabia.

[Senator Roblin.]

Does this government intend to stand by and watch someone else make political decisions which have a profound effect on an important sector of the Canadian market, or does it intend to continue with this illusion which has no substance by saying that there is some kind of free market out there? Would the Leader of the Government tell us if, as a result of some meetings which, I am sure, were held earlier today, the government intends to take any action so that Canadians and their government can have some influence in this matter, or does it intend to sit by, like the leader said yesterday, with a watching brief while somebody else makes political decisions that have an important effect on our economic well-being?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have to admit that Sheik Yamani has made a political statement, and it is obvious that it was made with a motive in mind, which is to obtain some agreement from the world oil community to limit the quantity of oil produced. I know of no way in which the Government of Canada can influence that decision, particularly since, while we are exporters of oil, we are not major exporters of oil.

The situation in the market at the present time is that the Government of Canada does not intervene in a way that is sometimes done elsewhere. To that extent Canada has a free market. The point made by my honourable friend is a valid one; that there are political forces in the world at play that affect the price of oil and over which we Canadians do not have very much say. However, that is not to say that those decisions will affect what oil prices will be. I am sure that there will be a lot of threats, to and fro, and consideration. I see that the Norwegian government is considering some question of control of production. The British government is not. Who knows what will happen? We will have to watch the situation and protect our interests as best we can.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Leader of the Government has made an interesting speech, but it does not have much to do with the question I asked. I asked whether the Government of Canada intended to take any action so that its political decisions will have an influence on this particular sector of the Canadian economy, or does it intend to sit back and watch, like the leader claimed yesterday, while somebody else makes political decisions that affect us? Would the Leader of the Government deal with that question.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we certainly cannot do anything about Sheik Yamani.

Senator Olson: I am talking about the price of oil, not Sheik Yamani.

Senator Roblin: We cannot do anything about international factors over which we have no control. We can do what we think is wise to protect our industry. However, I think it would be wrong to suggest that we should mount our horse today and charge off on the subject when there are so many unknown factors in the equation which only time can clarify. It seems to me to be reasonable to say that we should not attempt to intervene on the basis of the information that we have at the moment. The decline in oil prices has been particularly marked over the last week or two. There has been a gradual decline, but the real slide has taken place over the last two days, and it may continue. If it does, it will certainly pose serious problems for us. We are not going to stand by indefinitely without taking those factors into consideration. If that should happen, we would have to deal with the provinces and with the industry to see what course we should take. I would hope that my honourable friend would not expect me to announce policy today.

Senator Olson: I would not expect the government leader to announce policy, honourable senators, but I think that we in this chamber and, indeed, those in the oil industry have some right to know how much is enough. The Saudi Arabian oil minister, Sheik Yamani, said today that the price will go down to $15 a barrel unless the members of OPEC come back to the table to reach some kind of agreement on both price and quotas. He and others have said on different occasions that in some parts of the Middle East and, in particular, in Saudi Arabia, oil can be produced at less than $5 a barrel and still be profitable in financial terms. Are we going to sit by until the price drops to that level—until we get to this so-called free market—or are we going to let political decisions along the way influence our price?

I am just asking: How much is enough? The minister has indicated an unreadiness, at the price level of today, to make a decision. Can he indicate whether the government will accept its responsibility and take some action at $15 a barrel, $12 a barrel or any level?

Senator Roblin: Of course, the main thrust of Sheik Yamani's comment, I suspect, is to try to introduce some coherence into OPEC's plans. As much as anything else, that is what he is likely trying to do. It is simply impossible to expect Canada to intervene in that process; there is no way in which we could do so. The present spot price of oil at $20 U.S. a barrel is not a price that will set hearts beating in the oil industry, I am sure, but it is a price which makes almost all of the projects we are currently involved in still profitable. We have one of the most economic and efficient oil industries in the world. It has not yet reached the stage where it is in serious difficulties of the kind spoken of by my friend. Owing to the past policies of the government, the industry has been relieved of certain burdens. That makes it all the more probable that it will be able to carry a portion of the load and to adjust its affairs accordingly.

I think that everybody who thinks about this will realize that the drop in oil prices is not likely to be a permanent situation. It is quite probable and, indeed, highly likely that, before the decade is out, any trends of that nature will be reversed and we will again be looking for security of supply from Canadian sources. All of those factors have to be taken into account.

I know that that does not satisfy my friend. He wants me to do something right now. He wants me to tell him what the limits are, and so forth, but that is certainly an exercise which I feel I would not be well advised to undertake.

Senator Olson: With respect to the spot price of $20 U.S. a barrel, the level at which oil is sold today—in fact, it dropped to $18.50 for a while—is it the view of the government that this price level is sufficient to encourage investment in Canadian self-sufficiency? Does the government believe that it will encourage tar sands projects, heavy oil up-graders, enhanced recovery projects and that sort of thing? By way of an aside, I want to say that the information I have received from the oil industry is that none of these projects is viable. Further, it is not possible to finance any of them at $20 a barrel. If the government now holds the view that $20 a barrel is sufficient to attract investment into this sort of project which produces the higher priced sort of oil that I have just described, that is new. I would hope that the minister could provide us with some background information that would justify that comment. I know that yesterday he quoted someone from the OPEC as saying that they could somehow live with $22, or whatever it is, but I am talking about the massive increase that Canada needs to offset the decline in production of some of these higher priced projects such as the offshore, the Beaufort and the enhanced tar sands projects. Could the government leader help us try to understand where $20 a barrel becomes profitable on these projects?

Senator Roblin: I do not intend to make any pronouncement on the part of the government with respect to this matter. I could say, however, that the industry opinion which is open to us indicates that, at that particular level, these projects will not be stopped. They will continue and they will proceed on their way.

Some of them are well advanced. Hibernia, which was mentioned yesterday, is well advanced. The investment is in place, and I suspect that will be proceeding in due course. I would not be surprised if the same thing were true with some of the other well-advanced projects in the western Atlantic. I would fully expect that the other heavy sands projects, and so on, will stand a very good chance of continuing because these people are taking a longer view than what happens to the spot price this week and next; they are looking ahead. I think most of them are still of the opinion that when those plants come on stream the price will be adequate to support the economics.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do want to give another senator an opportunity to discuss this, but I should like to know if the minister would give us an undertaking that he will have some analysis done by the people in EMR or in another government department, such as the Department of Finance, in order to give us some indication to support those figures. Are they just figures which have been taken out of the air and are not supported by the facts?

Senator Roblin: I cannot give a firm undertaking that I will produce a report to show my honourable friend, but I can tell him that I will make inquiries to see what information is available.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate following from the question posed by Senator Perrault. The government leader gave us an analysis of oil marketing in Canada and how it would take three months for any price decrease to work its way through the system.

I would point out to the Leader of the Government that at this particular time of the year the refinery stocks and inventories are at their annual lowest ebb because they have held back purchasing until this time. Therefore, it should not take three months for a price decrease to work its way through that system.

Could the Leader of the Government explain why any price increase never seems to take three months to work its way through the system? In fact, it is reflected at the pumps the next afternoon. When, a few years ago, the Government of Quebec reduced its excise tax by 5 per cent, which only held for about three days, that was reflected as an increase at the pumps almost immediately the reversal was made.

In any event, why does it always take three months to reflect a decrease; yet, a price increase seems to be reflected within 24 hours?

Senator Roblin: I expect that the state of the inventories in the industry is one reason one of the commentators said that the reductions may show up in 30 days. I do not offer that as a guarantee. I merely say that it is opinion and that no one knows for sure.

Senator Frith: The same should apply to increases.

Senator Roblin: The price of gasoline is not set by the government; it is set by market forces to the extent that they operate, although I do admit there is a big argument about that.

Senator Doody: The same people who set it last year and the year before.

Senator Olson: You have abrogated your responsibility.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have just one question to put to the Leader of the Government who stated earlier that it was not the intention of the government to intervene in any way in the oil market; that it would leave the price to be established by market forces.

Am I to take it from that that the government is prepared to accept a very low world oil price without intervening? Some analysts are predicting the possibility of oil settling much below $15 a barrel. Supposing that did happen, would the government still accept the result of the market or would it, at that point, consider intervention?

Senator Roblin: I hope the government would never be so dogmatic that it would say, "This is our policy, come hell or high water, and we will never change it even though the facts change." I am sure that will not be the case.

My statement about interference or intervention in the market had to do with the situation as it exists today. In the hypothetical situation my honourable friend raises, I am sure all factors would have to be considered again to decide what policy course to follow.

[Senator Hastings.]

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, the Leader of the Government is not ruling out the possibility of the government establishing at some point a price that would be higher than the world price.

Senator Roblin: I learned long ago, one, never to respond to hypothetical questions of that nature and, two, never to rule anything out.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

U.S. WEAPONS TESTING IN CANADA—CRUISE MISSILE MISHAP

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate to us whether or not any further information or public explanation has been given to the Canadian government about the cruise missile which did not perform according to plan during its test in Alberta?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Of course, the reason for having the tests is to find out precisely how they will operate, and that is what transpired in this case.

As I understand the matter, the missile fell within the reserve area in which it was intended to fall, but not on the precise spot that was targeted. This fact in no way leads to any cause for concern for the safety of the public.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FORTHCOMING VISIT OF GOVERNMENT LEADER TO SOUTHERN AFRICA—CORRECTION OF PRESS REPORT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we reach the end of Question Period, I would appreciate the courtesy of the chamber in allowing me to comment on a press report that was prepared today as a result of an interview I gave respecting my forthcoming visit to southern Africa when the question arose of Canada's policy with respect to Angola.

The story as written says:

Canada may be on a collision course with the United States over Washington's designs to oust Angola's Marxist régime, a Conservative cabinet minister suggested Thursday.

The cabinet minister referred to was me. Of course, I said no such thing. Nobody in his right mind would indulge in that kind of comment. This is editorial comment on the part of the writer. I respect his right to make the comment, but I want to make it clear that the statement was not mine.

If you go on to read the rest of the story, you will find a sentence in which my comment that we have been strengthening our diplomatic ties with Angola is linked with President Reagan's seeking of funds from Congress for covert operations against the leftist régime. Of course, I made no such link myself. I did not attempt to make any such comparison, and the statement in the press is misleading because it leaves the impression that a spokesman for the Government of Canada linked those two policies together in a sense that would lead to a feeling of confrontation with the United States. I want to make it clear that I did not do this.

What I did say was that Canada did not agree with the policy of the United States respecting linkage with Cuba in dealing with Namibia and Angola. It is well known and it has long been known to the whole world that we have not followed the United States in their policy of linkage with respect to the presence of Cubans in Angola and the settlement of the Namibian dispute. That is not news; that is very much old hat.

It follows from that, I think, that, if we did not agree with the policy of linkage, we are not likely to agree with the policy of support for the insurgents.

I guess that is the base of the reporter's statement, but I want to be quite precise in clarifying the actual comment I made at the time.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): On that point, inasmuch as the Leader of the Government has raised the question of Namibia and Angola, what will he be saying to his interlocutors in Africa about the status of the Contact Group? Can he tell me when it last met? Has it met since the present government took office at the ministerial level? Does that signal that the Contact Group, for all practical purposes, is dead and has nothing to offer in the future with respect to the settlement in Namibia?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is right. I do not think the Contact Group has met since 1983, several years ago. There seems to be no plan for it to meet in the near future.

I think the attitude I will take is: I will broach the subject with our friends in southern Africa, the nine countries of the SADCC agreement, to see if they have any suggestions as to how Canada might be useful in reactivating the Contact Group. It is going to be exceedingly difficult to do that, but I would certainly be most interested to have their views on the matter. We will see what they think about it. So far, they have understood our position and have not been critical of it, as far as I know.

Senator MacEachen: Does Canada have confidence in the Contact Group to the extent that the minister has indicated, namely, that he would be probing the southern Africans, presumably the front-line states, as to whether they would like us to try to get the Contact Group together and to have a further meeting?

Senator Roblin: I think I will wait and see what they have to say.

THE SENATE

AVAILABILITY OF INFORMATION IN ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government has indicated that he will be away for a few days, I would like to ask him whether we could have some special arrangements made so that the Deputy Leader of the Government could both seek and convey information about a number of extremely important economic matters, such as the oil pricing policy. In the past the Deputy Leader of the Government has always, very amicably and with good wit and humour, replied to the questions, but he never gives any answers, on the grounds that he is not a member of cabinet, and so on. Would the Leader of the Government give us an undertaking that some extra special arrangements will be made so that information can be brought to the chamber during the next two weeks, so that we are not left in the dark. I would like the Leader of the Government to give us an indication that we will not be left completely in the dark for two full weeks.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I appreciate the implied compliment that sometimes you are not in the dark after you have heard an answer by myself respecting your questions. My colleague will be most prompt in dealing with any question. If he does not have the answer himself, he will be able to take it as notice, just as I do, and will provide an answer to the Senate as soon as possible.

Senator Olson: So we can expect a substantially better performance than the excuses we have received in the past?

Senator Frith: I think that is what he was implying.

PENITENTIARIES

STONEY MOUNTAIN—CONSTRUCTION OF DOGHOUSE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I am sure that we all wish the Leader of the Government bon voyage on his trip to southern Africa, and we wish him every success in his undertaking. I know he would not want to go without my reminding him of some responsibilities concerning that important institution at Winnipeg, namely, Stoney Mountain Penitentiary. Would the Leader of the Government provide me with the total cost of a doghouse constructed at Stoney Mountain Penitentiary, including the design, consultant, and architectural fees that were paid in connection with that project? The doghouse is supplied with power and water. I do not know why the dogs need power at night. Would the Leader of the Government also ascertain how many dogs may be double-bunked?

Senator Bonnell: Someone will be in the doghouse!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first part of my honourable friend's question was not a two-bit question. It was a 50-cent question, and I thank him for it. The rest was a two-bit question, and I will take it as notice for return. We will get the answer for him as soon as we can.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

U.S. WEAPONS TESTING IN CANADA—CRUISE MISSILE MISHAP

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I wish to complete my question regarding the cruise missile test. I realize that it was just a test and that the missiles are unarmed. However, there seems to be some question of our right to know when something goes amiss with such tests. It seems to be a question of no information being forthcoming. I think there was an understanding all along that if something did go amiss in connection with these tests, there would be an automatic parachute. Apparently that did not occur. I am seeking some assurance that people in the area do have a right to know what is happening over their territory. Has the government received any indication as to whether or not the other test, which was tentatively scheduled for tomorrow, will proceed without first having information on what went amiss with the test that occurred yesterday?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe my honourable friend is not quite fair to the officer at Cold Lake who gave the information about what happened, because he did give a pretty good description of the actual course of events. What he did not talk about were the technological reasons why—and I think it is obvious why it is a little difficult to be as frank about those as it is about other things, because, after all, it comes under the heading of military information. However, I am sympathetic toward my honourable friend's concern about what the people in the area think about it, and whether everything is being done that should be done to ensure that there is no risk to them. I will certainly convey that message to those concerned to see what can be done to clarify the situation. I have no information about the flight today.

Senator Frith: Perhaps he should have read the box. Perhaps parachutes were not included; batteries extra.

Senator Perrault: f.o.b. Cold Lake.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before the Leader of the Government leaves our shores, I, too, am concerned, as was Senator Olson, about his absence and about questions left hanging. I am wondering whether he has anything to report, following today's meeting of cabinet, concerning sugar-beets, and whether Senator Doody will be able to pass us the word, if the word is forthcoming, in the next few days?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can give an undertaking that one of the special obligations that I shall be leaving with Senator Doody is to take care of my honourable friend's concern regarding sugar-beets, because if I were to add up the number of times that she has asked a question on this matter, it would amount to a considerable number. Therefore I know she is concerned. I also know that she is not likely to stop asking questions until she has obtained an answer, and there is nothing wrong with that. So I will ask Senator Doody to take careful note of this subject to see that my friend is informed as soon as possible.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT AND OTHER CONDITIONS— GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—AVAILABILITY OF APPLICATION FORMS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to thank the Leader of the Government for sending me a copy of the press release concerning and the application form for drought assistance. So far as I can tell, it was not sent to my office, and I hope that in future senators from the affected area will have this sent without having to make a special request for it. I thank the Leader of the Government for sending me a copy of his.

Earlier today I checked with some farmers in southern Alberta and discovered that one of the provisions is that no application will be accepted after March 1. I find that some application forms have not been mailed out to farmers. Some farmers have not yet received them. Therefore I would ask the Leader of the Government whether he could indicate to the Minister of Agriculture, and the ministers concerned with PFRA, that some farmers have not yet received these application forms, and when there is such a strict deadline on them, they should have them immediately.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will do so; and my friend could help me if he gave me any names that have come to his notice.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

FORTHCOMING VISIT OF GOVERNMENT LEADER TO SOUTHERN AFRICA—CORRECTION OF PRESS REPORT

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government concerning the correction he made a few minutes ago to a newspaper story. I have not seen that story, and therefore I am going on the basis of what I think I heard him say, namely, that a Canadian minister had made the statement but that it was not he. Was it another Canadian minister?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No; it was yours truly.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

FUTURE OF STAR-KIST PLANT—GOVERNMENT POLICY— REQUEST FOR REPLY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to get back to the problems of eastern Canada. We have had an excellent exchange on questions concerning western Canada today and I am pleased about that.

I would like to get back to the problems concerning tuna inspection at the St. Andrews plant. As the Leader of the Government will recall, on October 1, I raised a question concerning the government's intention to resolve the imbroglio, namely problems of inspection, quality, and so on.

The Leader of the Government told me at the time, and I quote:

I think that I am within proper bounds if I tell my honourable friend that some announcements may be made with respect to this matter when the policy has been thoroughly considered.

Again I raised the matter with the Leader of the Government on October 16, but without success; I raised the question again on the 17th, again without result; I tried again on November 5. On that date the Leader of the Government gave me the same answer he had given me on October 1. I do not hold that against him. There can be no question of accusing him of not telling us exactly what he thinks.

A few months have passed since then. Today, again I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans or, at least; the government has completed that thorough examination of the general question of certification of every kind of foodstuffs.

Secondly, is he in a position to announce soon, or when does he intend to announce the new guidelines, if I am call them that?

● (1450)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make an inquiry.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, again I was expecting that answer! Frankly, I am disappointed.

The Leader of the Government has people in his office who can read Hansard and find out the concerns of honourable senators. Those people think that we rise every day in this chamber like puppets simply to get our daily exercise. This is the fourth time I have been given this kind of answer to the same basic question.

Yes or no, is the government concerned about what is going to happen to the St. Andrews plant? Yes or no, is it concerned about the future of workers in that plant?

That is not the way to answer. That is not the way to come to grips with problems. I have had it up to here with this kind of attitude, with this kind of government.

I am not at all satisfied with the answer of the Leader of the Government, and I want to make that clear.

[English]

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is tired of me, I can say that I am also tired of him.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, this was not a personal comment I made to the Leader of the Government. As a man, I respect him.

Still, he has a job to do and it is with that in mind that I direct my questions to him. If he does not like it, let him say so. Then we will understand why he insists on travelling all over the world!

However, if he wants to give his undivided attention to his performance as Leader of the Government in this house, well, he ought to tell his own staff. If they are unable to read the Senate Hansard he should tell them what concerns us. He should tell them that we are concerned about the future of a plant in New Brunswick and about the future of workers in that plant.

If he is unable to do that, he should let Senator Doody take his place.

[English]

Senator Roblin: I am glad my honourable friend is not making a personal comment.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

U.S. WEAPONS TESTING IN CANADA—CRUISE MISSILE MISHAP

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the point raised by Senator Fairbairn with respect to the cruise missile, I think there is a question of credibility here with respect to the information which was provided at the time that the test of the cruise missile was announced. As honourable senators will recall, it was a very controversial decision, and every effort was made to relieve the anxiety that might arise in the minds of the Canadian public. Based upon information provided by the Department of Defense in the United States, information was made available to the Canadian public that, in the event of any mishap in the guidance system or in the flight of the unarmed missile, there would be a soft landing because of the opening of a parachute which was expected to induce the missile to float gracefully to the ground.

We now know that there was a crash, and I think that the Canadian public is entitled to know what happened. As the one who put out this information, I too would like to know what happened. Why was there a crash when the military adviser said that in such an eventuality there would be a soft landing. I think it is a question of credibility in advising the public as to this very important matter. Therefore I hope that the Leader of the Government or, in his absence, Senator Doody, will try to obtain the information for us as quickly as possible.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My friend was there at the time, so I respect his special knowledge in respect of the matter and I will try to get an answer to the point he raises.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I speak to you today in support of Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes. This bill, which is before you today at second reading, is an important piece of legislation which effects changes not only to the Income Tax Act but also to the Canada Pension Plan, the 1971 Unemployment Insurance Act, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

Bill C-84 implements measures proposed in the federal budget of May 23, 1985 as amended in response to subsequent consultations. This bill is a responsible approach to the needs of Canada. I speak, of course, of the government's plan to secure durable economic renewal for Canadians. This is an important first step in this plan and proposes ambitious new measures that will form a firm foundation for Canada's economic recovery.

The highlight of this bill is, of course, the half-million dollar capital gains exemption, a measure which will allow Canadians in all walks of life to retain the benefits of their initiative and their success. The bill also contains measures to help bring the deficit under control by reducing the rate of growth on the revenue side by certain measures which I will mention in passing. Some have a revenue figure projected; others have not. There is an individual surtax, a measure that is expected to bring revenues of $235 million in 1985 and $500 million in 1986; elimination of the federal tax reduction, a measure which will increase federal revenues by approximately $650 million in 1986.

The budget also proposes to reduce the effect of indexation, commencing in 1986, by limiting the adjustment to any increase in the Consumer Price Index in excess of 3 per cent. Contributions to RHOSPs after May 22, 1985, will no longer be allowed and this measure is expected to increase government revenues by approximately $80 million in 1985 and $105 million in 1986. There is a temporary corporate surtax of 5 per cent of federal tax otherwise payable on all corporations, with some exceptions. The bill proposes that financial institutions such as banks, federally or provincially-regulated trust and loan corporations, et cetera, will be subject to a special deductible tax.

The bill that we are considering amends the Income Tax Act in certain fundamental ways, changing the direction of tax policy in Canada. Measures contained in this bill include the following:

● (1500)

- a lifetime $500,000 capital gains exemption for each and every Canadian individual, as already mentioned;
- rules permitting pension and other retirement savings plans to invest in small business;
- a capital tax on large financial institutions as mentioned;
- rules preventing unfair tax advantage being obtained through income splitting devices; and,
- changes to revenue Canada's powers to examine and audit taxpayers' books and records, including powers of search and seizure.

Measures affecting income splitting improve the fairness of the tax system. Measures imposing a capital tax on large financial institutions and preventing unjustifiable tax leakage through tax-free inducement payments are evidence of a new approach to fiscal responsibility.

This bill also represents evidence of a new willingness to co-operate with the private sector in the development of policies. For example, subtle but important variations of some of the budget measures are contained in this bill. As many of my honourable colleagues will know, the May budget proposed that, in consequence of the introduction of the capital gains exemption, capital losses realized after 1984 would be deductible only from capital gains. This measure has been relaxed to permit capital losses realized before the May budget to be deductible against regular income to the extent of $2,000 a year.

In response to recommendations of the Cape Breton Advisory Committee, the special 50 per cent Cape Breton investment tax credit was increased to 60 per cent. Bill C-84 implements this special measure at the 60 per cent level to help this most needy and beloved part of the country.

Similarly, the May budget proposed a capital tax on financial institutions with assets in excess of $200 million, and in order to restrict the application of this measure to only the largest financial institutions, this threshold has been increased to $300 million.

Honourable senators, in the past members of this chamber have witnessed situations where projects were financed with government grants once and then financed a second time with investment tax credits, so that the government has picked up virtually the whole cost of the project. This situation is now corrected; it is discontinued by Bill C-84, which recognizes the principle that investment tax credits cannot be earned by spending government grants. While this policy would seem obvious, it has taken some ten years to correct this deficiency.

Bill C-84 contains a variety of new measures affecting almost every facet of tax policy. It contains measures such as the income-splitting rules to promote the fairness of the system so that Canadians can believe in the fundamental equity of the system. This bill also contains measures to repeal the controversial scientific research tax credit and replace it with a refundable tax credit paid directly to research and development performers. Similarly, this bill contains provisions to prevent tax credit abuse by unacceptable sales of tax credits through the sales of shell corporations. These rules will restrict the way in which tax credits may be utilized after a change in the control of a corporation.

Honourable senators, I believe the bill is a true change for the better and represents a substantial improvement of the system. It has received, as you know, extensive pre-study. I commend it to all honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

MOTION FOR ADOPTION OF FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Davey, for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Royal Assent), presented in the Senate on 6th November, 1985,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the Report be not now adopted but that it be referred back to the Committee for further consideration.—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this question of changing Royal Assent has been around for approximately three years. I think Senator Flynn deserves credit for first bringing it up, and when he did bring that up, which was in January of 1983, as is the case with so many suggestions made in the Senate, nothing happened. So, I took it upon myself to ask the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament to look into the whole question of Royal Assent, how it has been done in Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia.

There are three reasons for wanting to have an alternative method. The main reason the United Kingdom changed the method in 1967 was that it could interrupt an important debate in or other important business of the House of Commons. The second reason is that, because of the time that Royal Assent is usually held, usually 5.30 p.m. or 5.45 p.m., it has no particular significance to the public. Although it is a rather impressive ceremony, there is nobody around to see it; usually the public galleries are empty at that hour. It is not like the Speaker's Parade before a sitting of the Senate or the House of Commons. So, there is no special significance on ordinary occasions, although there are occasions when it has special significance, and it is intended that we keep the current practice for those occasions.

From a practical point of view, one of the main difficulties of having no alternative method is that it means that the Senate must adjourn at the same time as the House of Commons; that there is no point in the Senate passing a bill after the House of Commons has adjourned because Royal Assent cannot be given until the House of Commons reconvenes, whereas if there were an alternative method and bills were referred to the Senate in the last days of a session, the Senate could take its time considering those bills. The House of Commons could adjourn, and when the Senate had disposed of the bills, Royal Assent could be arranged.

When I received the study—which is an excellent one—from the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament, dated February 28, 1983, I sent it to Senator Frith. Senator Frith went into the matter carefully and gave an excellent speech on May 10, 1983, in which he went into the whole history of Royal Assent, how they handled it in the United Kingdom, Australia, and so forth. He suggested an amendment to the Interpretation Act.

Nothing happened after Senator Frith's speech, and in January—because there was still this concern about what the proper procedure was—I asked for an opinion from Eugene Forsey. I received that opinion on January 24, 1984. In that opinion he said that the change could not be made by the Governor General acting alone, or by resolution of the two houses. The basis of that opinion was that when it was changed in 1541 in the United Kingdom, and again in 1967, it was changed by an act of Parliament and, because of that precedent, we could not do it by resolution nor could it be changed by the Governor General.

In that opinion Senator Forsey also referred to the Australian situation. In Australia they have exactly the same procedure as we have, but they also have an alternative procedure. I do not think Australia has used our procedure in the past 80 years.

After I received the letter from Senator Forsey, I wrote a letter to Senator Frith, which I should like to read into the record. That letter is dated January 31, 1984, and states:

● (1510)

Herewith copy of a letter I have received from Eugene Forsey. I must say that I was surprised with his opinion.

While it is true that the two changes in the United Kingdom were done by statute, this was obviously necessary because the statute of 1541 gave the power to someone other than the Crown to give Royal Assent. The 1541 statute also specifically provided that it be "declared and notified in his Absence to the Lords spiritual and temporal, and to the Commons, assembled together in the high House." Because the procedure of granting Royal Assent was provided in the statute, it was obvious, therefore, that it could only be amended by statute in 1967. This isn't comparable to the case in Canada at all. The only statutory provisions are in Sections 55 to 57, and Section 14, of the Constitution Act, 1867, and there is nothing in those sections providing for the Assent to be given in the presence of Senators and Members of the House of Commons in the Senate Chamber as provided in the 1541 United Kingdom Act. Therefore, I fail to see the relevancy of the procedure adopted in the United Kingdom.

Furthermore, I think your speech is very clear as to how the alternative procedure came to be adopted in Australia, and I don't see any point in getting an opinion from Professor Dennis Pearce.

Senator Forsey had also made that suggestion. The letter goes on:

However, in view of Senator Forsey's opinion, I do believe that you should ask the Department of Justice for a formal opinion and if there was any doubt after receiving that opinion, consideration could be given to a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada. That would be a lot simpler than either an act or a constitutional amendment and would remove any doubt as to whether or not anything more than a simple resolution of both Houses is necessary.

I would like to read into the record section 55 of the Constitution Act, 1867:

Where a Bill passed by the Houses of the Parliament is presented to the Governor General for the Queen's Assent, he shall declare, according to his Discretion, but subject to the Provisions of this Act and to Her Majesty's Instructions, either that he assents thereto in the Queen's Name, or that he withholds the Queen's Assent, or that he reserves the Bill for the Signification of the Queen's Pleasure.

Nothing whatsoever is said in that section about the necessity that it be in the presence of the Senate or the House of Commons. Exactly the same wording with a few minor changes appears in the Constitution Act of Australia, except that they do not include, "and to Her Majesty's Instructions." In my opinion that phrase is completely irrelevant. Australia had the same problem but they did not bother to pass a resolution. They went ahead, along with the Governor General, and have been doing so happily for 80 years. Surely, honourable senators, that is a much better precedent than the precedent set by the United Kingdom which, as I have explained, was forced to pass legislation.

After I sent this letter to Senator Frith, he then wrote a letter to Mr. MacGuigan, the then Minister of Justice, and included my opinion and Senator Forsey's opinion. I must say that my professional pride is wounded because Senator Roblin referred to Senator Forsey's opinion in his speech and not mine.

Senator Roblin: You can speak for yourself.

Senator Godfrey: Senator Frith asked for an opinion from the Department of Justice, but nothing happened, or, at least, the matter was not followed up. On February 26, 1985, I asked the following question in the Senate:

Honourable senators, the fact that we are having Royal Assent later this afternoon reminded me that several years ago there was a movement afoot in the Senate—I remember having some research done by the Library of Parliament—towards considering alternative forms of Royal Assent, which could be very convenient. As we all know, in this regard we are about 80 years behind Australia, and I forget how many years behind the United Kingdom.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: What has happened to the suggestion that we might reform our form of Royal Assent and bring ourselves into the twentieth century? If the honourable gentleman cannot give me an answer, would he look into the matter and consider some action?

The Honourable Duff Roblin replied:

Honourable senators, my problem in this instance is that the matter in question was introduced prior to the accession to office of the present administration. It is, therefore, not within my power to tell my honourable friend what happened to the matter during that time. In this matter, we had a staunch advocate in Senator Flynn, and it may be that the subject should be re-opened. However, at the present time I have no information in this regard.

[Senator Godfrey.]

After that reply, I decided that I had better give the honourable senator some information. On February 27, 1975 I wrote Senator Roblin the following:

Further to my Question in the Senate, I am enclosing herewith the following:

1. A paper prepared by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament on Royal Assent in Great Britain, Canada and Australia, dated February 28, 1983;
2. copy of a speech given in the Senate by Senator Frith on May 20, 1983;
3. copy of a letter from the Hon. Eugene Forsey dated January 24, 1984;
4. copy of a letter dated January 31, 1984, from me to Senator Frith;
5. copy of a letter dated February 7, 1984, from Senator Frith to the Honourable Mark MacGuigan.

As you can see, Senator Frith was in favour of adopting an alternative procedure. I suspect that nothing was done about it because of the usual inertia with respect to any concrete proposals to change well established procedures in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: You are right about that.

Senator Godfrey: I could not resist that little dig. Then on April 2, 1985, I asked another question.

Senator Doody: Oh, great!

Senator Godfrey: I said:

Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. A few weeks ago I asked him a question regarding Royal Assent. Honourable senators will recall the suggestions put forward two years ago by Senator Frith when he delivered a long and learned speech. I am wondering if anything has been done about it. I notice, in the second report of the Special Committee on the Reform of the House of Commons, the following recommendation:

Your Committee recommends that the declaration of Royal Assent by written message be adopted in Canada and that the Government embark on the necessary discussions to achieve this change. Notwithstanding this recommendation, provisions should be made for the use of the present practice should that be the pleasure of Her Excellency on the advice of Her Ministers.

My question to the Leader of the Government is simply this: Is he now prepared to push this thing?

The Honourable Duff Roblin said:

Honourable senators, I have been given very strong impetus in that direction by my colleague, Senator Flynn, who has a proprietary interest in this matter so far as the Senate is concerned. I should think that when the House of Commons has completed its study and tendered its advice as to changing the various rules, it might be advisable to take the whole of those recommendations under advisement to see which of them might be suitable for adoption by the Senate. The one to which my honourable friend has referred is certainly one that should be near the top of the agenda.

The matter then arrived before the Standing Rules and Orders Committee. I have forgotten exactly how it got there. I do not think that it was by formal resolution. I believe it was on the basis of a suggestion by me that the committee look into the matter. The committee considered the matter of procedure very carefully and came to the conclusion that it preferred my legal opinion to the opinion of Senator Forsey, that the Australian precedent adopted 80 years ago was better than the precedent of the United Kingdom and that we could do it by simple resolution. However, having said all that, I believe that Senator Roblin's concerns are legitimate ones. I cannot imagine the House of Commons adopting a procedure suggested by the Senate without getting some kind of opinion other than mine.

Senator Doody: Oh, come on; don't be so modest!

Senator Godfrey: I would expect the Senate to follow my opinion, but I would expect the House of Commons to go to the Department of Justice. I suggest that rather than sending this matter back to the Rules committee, which is presently jammed with other business—including a couple of matters I have before it—and which, I am told, would be unable to deal with this matter for some weeks, we ask Senator Roblin, who might have more influence with the Department of Justice now than Senator Frith had two years ago, to ask for an opinion. In other words, we let the matter of whether it should be referred back to the committee ride until we receive an opinion, and in light of that opinion we can decide what to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Could I ask Senator Godfrey if he has considered the possibility of having the government ask parliamentary counsel on the other side or here for an opinion, rather than the Department of Justice? I am not sure, but I have a vague recollection that Mr. MacGuigan, the then Minister of Justice, indicated to me in an unofficial capacity that he thought that perhaps parliamentary counsel, the Clerk's Office or the Speaker's Office might be better places to seek a legal opinion. Perhaps the honourable senator could use that suggestion in case the Department of Justice continues to resist.

Senator Godfrey: I have no objection to asking our Parliamentary Counsel for an opinion. I would put my legal opinion ahead of Parliamentary Counsel's so it would not have much influence on me.

Senator Hicks: You are so modest.

Senator Godfrey: I am so modest. From a practical point of view, the Department of Justice is more neutral. If the House of Commons wants to ask its Parliamentary Counsel, that is fine. However, I would also like to have an opinion from the Department of Justice, particularly on questions of the legality of acts of Parliament, and so on. I think that that department should look into the matter and provide an opinion by which to persuade our friends.

• (1520)

Senator Frith: On the subject of our own Parliamentary Counsel, the committee does have his opinion. I believe that it supports that of Senator Godfrey, as he will be glad to know.

On motion of Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough), debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I will dispose of this matter next week. I ask that the order stand in my name until that time.

Senator Frith: You sure know how to run a cliff-hanger!

Senator Hicks: I have had a lot of good mentors to follow. Order stands.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this item has been on the order paper for quite some time and I have no intention of competing with Senator Hicks in the suspense department. This order deals with the motion of Senator Davey regarding the televising of the proceedings of the Senate and, perhaps more specifically, with the amendment of Senator Phillips, who has suggested that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Honourable senators, I am not at all comfortable with the motion. I would have preferred not to deal with it at this time. I do not know that all of the implications of televised proceedings, either in the chamber or in committee, have been thought through. Perhaps that, in itself, is a good argument for referring the subject matter of this motion to committee. What I am saying is that this is not a simple matter of rolling in the cameras and getting ourselves on television. I think that it strikes at the very structure of the Senate and of its proceedings. If, indeed, it is decided that television be brought in, I think that we are going to look at an entirely changed Senate, first, in terms of its rules.

I have tried to envision a televised Question Period in the Senate under our present rules. Although that certainly would not be a problem with the present Leader of the Government, because obviously he is capable of answering any questions on any subject at any time and has been a veritable gold mine of information, honourable senators only have to wait until next week to see the contrast. Then they will see how much appreciated he really should be.

Having said that, with 103 senators, including the Speaker, presumably, all entitled to ask questions of the minister on anything at any time at any length—

Senator Roblin: “At any length”—that is the thing.

Senator Doody: —it would provide an obvious opportunity for anyone to give a speech. Senator Perrault probably illustrated that today when he gave us a delightful speech that was not only well delivered but timely. Eventually he did come to the question. Under the rules of the Senate as they now stand, that is fine; it works out very well. But I try to envision that same situation on television, when the viewers would no doubt compare the proceedings of the Senate to what they have been seeing for some time in the House of Commons. Obviously, at best, we would be involved in a competitive situation. We could not let the other place outdo us. I suspect that we would be sitting for longer periods of time, doing nothing but covering the Question Period under those circumstances. As I have said, that would certainly not pose a problem under the present house leadership, but somewhere down the road, if things change—God forbid they ever do—

Senator Frith: The whole country could share his informative answers.

Senator MacEachen: Especially Newfoundland.

Senator Doody: That's right. Imagine the pressure that will be brought to bear on the members of the House of Commons, who will be forced to compete with the sort of performance that our leader gives here.

[Senator Doody.]

Senator MacEachen: The ministers in the House of Commons would emulate the Leader of the Government.

Senator Doody: I can foresee situations arising where unlimited speaking time is granted on every subject.

Senator Roblin: And unlimited supplementaries.

Senator Frith: Followed by unlimited information—the country would be enriched!

Senator Doody: When I sat on the other side of this chamber, I had no complaints about Question Period—it was the answer period I had problems with. I do not suppose that that will ever change.

In the general proceedings of the chamber itself, I can visualize a great deal of competition for the opportunity to speak at length on every subject that comes up. Obviously, there is merit in that and perhaps it is to be advocated. Perhaps we should encourage every senator from every province to become involved in debates on matters concerning his province. But it cannot be done under our present rules, or else we would have late sittings and the general public would not be able to get any sleep. They would be awake, perhaps, 18 or 19 hours a day, watching the proceedings of the Senate. I can see arising across the nation complaints from harried parents who cannot get their kids to bed because of this new public spectacle, this free public performance put on by some of the bravest and finest minds in the country. These are the sorts of things that have to be dealt with before we get into television.

Senator Marshall: There will be no problems on Thursday afternoon.

Senator Doody: We will have to ask our supplementary questions at the airport! I just want to ask the mercy of the editors as they work on this.

On a different note, Senator Phillips spoke of the costs involved in such a project. That is a factor that the committee will have to consider very carefully. When television was first discussed at Queen's Park, it was suggested that it would be done for something of the order of $1.5 million to $2 million. The latest information I have indicates that the cost has risen to $7.3 million and the estimates are not yet finished. I grant that that figure includes some structural changes, some physical work in the building and so forth, which was not anticipated in the beginning. However, it may very well be that that sort of thing would happen here. As I have said, that is something that the committee will have to examine carefully.

Further down the road when we realize a Senate that is elected and is truly representative of the regions, as a balance against the “rep by pop” situation of the other place, I certainly think that television coverage would be appropriate. Perhaps when the recommendations have come back from the committee I could be convinced that television coverage might be appropriate at this time. However, I doubt that very much. I certainly do not think that it would be appropriate for this chamber as it presently operates. I cannot see the review process, the sober second thought—which is a terrible expression but is very much invoked—working under television. I cannot see the appointed Senate competing with the elected House of Commons for television time and coverage. I can visualize all sorts of problems, but I am sure that the same problems will surface in committee and will be dealt with in its report back to this chamber.

What I am saying, honourable senators, is that I would support Senator Phillips' motion in amendment that the subject matter of this motion be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words because I was in England in November—

Senator Doody: Congratulations!

Senator Godfrey: —and I looked into the matter of the televising of the House of Lords. I think that it provides an example that we can well follow here. I agree entirely with Senator Doody. I cannot imagine us being televised during the whole of our sessions.

● (1530)

The House of Lords in England has been televising its proceedings for a trial period of a year, and the last I heard was that they were trying to decide whether televising should be permanent or not.

In the House of Commons in that country, they voted down, by a few votes, allowing televising of their sessions. However, they did not experiment with it for a trial period.

After introducing it into the House of Lords for a trial period of a year, they eventually decided to leave it entirely up to the networks as to whether they wanted to televise the sessions of the House of Lords or not. Although I am not certain of this, I believe that about once the month the networks suddenly decide that a debate is of interest throughout the country and they announce, a couple of days before the debate takes place, that it will be televised. They have very large audiences consisting of 2.5 million or 3 million people. The stock in the House of Lords has gone up. They have suddenly realized what great speakers they are.

However, their sittings are not televised every day. It is only done on special occasions. That, I suggest, if we are going to do it here, is how we should approach the matter. We should not broadcast every day.

I must say I was rather amused when we decided to televise the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce when Mrs. McDougall appeared before us. Five minutes before the committee proceedings commenced, I was fortunate when I arrived to get the last seat, because 18 senators were present. The next day, when proceedings were not being televised, only four senators were in attendance. All we have to do is have our proceedings televised and, obviously, senators will turn out.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a reservation about the amendment. I have spoken to the main motion and I think honourable senators know that I support it. I support the principle of radio and television broadcasting of our proceedings. I also support the idea that we authorize arrangements to be commenced.

The reservation I have concerning the amendment is that it does not just put the question of cost to the Internal Economy Committee; it places the whole question before the committee. I do not think that is the right committee to decide whether the Senate should make its debates available for broadcasting; that is really the principle of the motion.

Therefore, I will vote against the amendment, not because I am against the idea of a committee or committees—whether it be the Rules Committee, the Internal Economy committee or any other committee—considering the arrangements and the details, but because I am against a committee making a fundamental decision such as the decision that is the subject matter of the main motion and, unfortunately, is also the subject of the amendment. It leaves the principle with the committee, and I do not think that is correct in a matter of this kind.

The Senate itself should decide whether it is going to start arrangements for making television and radio broadcasting of its proceedings available. In fact, it has already made broadcasting available for radio. What is going on right now in the Senate is available to radio broadcasters simultaneously, and it is recorded.

The principle of the motion is to authorize arrangements. It is then added that television broadcasting be made available. That should be a decision of the Senate, not a decision of a committee. The decision of the committee should be simply related to working out the details. I expect that the Internal Economy Committee and other committees would be involved in that procedure which in itself would probably take at least a year.

I still support the motion but will vote against the amendment.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am not quite clear on this situation. Is Senator Frith suggesting that this chamber now adopt the principle of television coverage and that a committee simply be charged with the responsibility of working out the logistics and details?

Senator Frith: And figuring out the costs and so on.

Senator Doody: But that the principle of television coverage of this chamber should be settled here and now in this place.

Senator Frith: It should be settled here, but not necessarily now.

Senator Doody: Not necessarily now, but without any prior research being done by any committee.

Senator Frith: The principle of its being available should be established by the Senate itself.

Senator Doody: Once the principle is established, of course, the rest is academic. Then it is just a matter of degree.

Senator Frith: I think, for example, it would be quite proper for us, once we established the principle that our proceedings are available for television broadcast, to introduce a separate motion to the effect that the cost should be investigated by the Internal Economy Committee and that we should wait for a report. We could also then ask them to look into the administrative aspects.

In other words, we should ask the Internal Economy Committee to give us a report on the implementation of the principle that we have adopted, but we should not ask the committee to deal with the principle itself.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, January 28, 1986, at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION OF THE UNITED STATES

SPACE SHUTTLE "CHALLENGER" DISASTER—CONDOLENCES

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to take a few moments to convey our condolences to those involved in the disaster at Cape Canaveral this morning. I think it is entirely appropriate for the Senate of Canada to send a message of condolence to those involved. I think it particularly appropriate in view of the fact that one of our fellow Canadians took a space flight a short time ago and it could very well have been that flight that met with disaster.

By no means do I want to play up the dangers involved in this sort of enterprise. I think one must look at all the successful flights that have taken place, rather than this one tragic flight that ended so terribly today.

Our congratulations to those who have developed this tremendous technology are in order, and I do not think that this tragedy should in any way diminish their achievements.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to join with the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate in expressing our condolences. I thank him for his timely comments with respect to the tragic occurrence at Cape Canaveral this morning. It was a sad, tragic and shocking event.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY CRISIS—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) TO CONSIDER MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, before the house proceeds to the Orders of the Day, I move, pursuant to rule 46(g):

That the Senate do adjourn for the purpose of raising a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the crisis of the sugar-beet industry in Canada

● (1410)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I certainly have no objection to Senator Fairbairn's raising this matter of emergency for public debate. I think it is well worth while.

I should like the record to show, however, that I think it would be more appropriate, if it is at all possible, that honourable senators give advance notice of a motion for an emergency debate. Perhaps the very fact that it is an emergency precludes any advance notice being given, but I really do not think that this particular emergency is that terrible. I say this because there may well be senators on both sides of the house who would like to participate in the debate, to raise their voices in support, or otherwise, of the concerns brought forward in the debate. It is for the sake of honourable senators interested in this subject that I say that, if at all possible, advance notice ought to be given.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on the procedural point raised by Senator Doody, I support what he says as being quite reasonable. He, himself, has pointed out that there is a bit of a paradox in giving full notice of an urgent or emergency matter, but the fact is that, often, when an urgent matter arises, it does so within a day or two of the Senate's next sitting. He has made a reasonable request, so if any honourable senator feels that he or she wishes to use rule 46(g) for the purpose of an emergency debate, we agree that he or she should advise the leadership on both sides of the chamber of such intent with as much notice as is practical in the circumstances.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Fairbairn: I thank honourable senators.

Before I begin, I should also like to join with the leadership in the Senate in expressing my personal shock and sadness at the occurrence above Cape Canaveral this morning. I think that it underlines for all of us the fragility of our own existence. I offer my deepest sympathy to the families of all concerned.

Coming to the reason for this emergency—and I would call it an emergency—debate, I completely agree with Senator Doody. Indeed, last week I had not planned to make this speech. Had I so planned, I would have given more routine notice under Inquiries or something of that nature. As events have transpired over the weekend and in the House of Commons yesterday, it became evident to me that, indeed, we had reached a stage of emergency in this industry in Canada. Today I wish to draw this to the attention of honourable senators as forcibly as I can, and I indicated to the house leader that this would be my intention.

I repeat that I did not think that I was going to have to make another plea for the survival of the sugar-beet industry in Canada. I really do thank my honourable colleagues in the Senate for their courtesy, forbearance and good humour over recent weeks and months as I have risen time and time again to ask for further reports and further intelligence as to how the discussions concerning the future of this industry were proceeding within the government. It was my hope and my belief, and that of other colleagues in this house and elsewhere, that, after all of the deep consideration and debate which this issue has received over past weeks and months, the government was ready with its decision on the future of the sugar industry. It was my hope and belief that finally this was the week in which it would be made.

Yesterday, once again, that expectation was dashed. In answers to questions in the other place, the Minister of Agriculture said that no decision had yet been made.

Honourable senators, quite simply, the sugar-beet industry in Canada is dying of uncertainty. Whatever other ailments it may have, and there are several, the killer is now "uncertainty". If it should come, it will not strike at the heart of our financial markets on Bay Street or St. James Street. The stock market will not shudder and the dollar will not take an extra plunge. But, by God, it does strike at the heart, the daily life and the future of families, industries and small communities in southern Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec—and they are not about to let it go without a final fight; and, I suggest, neither must we.

Yesterday, representatives of the Sugar Beet Growers Association of Canada, representing those three affected provinces, again came to Ottawa, because they did not know what else to do. The government has all the information it needs. It knows the options. It knows that without an immediate decision there can be no realistic planning for the 1986 crop year. It knows that really no fair bargaining time for the necessary contracts will be available without an immediate decision; and it knows if the issue drags on any longer there will be no adequate time to prepare for seeding.

Last weekend, in Lethbridge and southern Alberta, there was a final and determined outcry of citizens to their national government, and the Parliament of Canada, in the form of a petition carrying 18,000 names—18,000 names from Lethbridge and southern Alberta. People were signing up everywhere: in the shopping malls, the senior citizens' homes, from all over the city of Lethbridge.

The petition was presented yesterday in the other place by my friend, the honourable member for Lethbridge Foothills; and if the rules permitted, I would table a copy in the Senate today. This is not just another gimmick. This is a cry for help and understanding from a corner of Canada that generally is tremendously independent. It is pioneer proud. It wants to pay its own way and to contribute to the stability of its province and this country.

I should like to review briefly with honourable senators what is at risk with an industry which, to put it mildly, is not readily understood by the rest of our country. The sugar-beet industry in Canada has existed for about 90 years. It is uniquely Canadian. The beets are grown, processed, marketed and consumed in Canada. There have been approximately 1,400 producers and their families involved in the growing of beets, along with 1,600 other jobs directly related to the industry, on the farms and in the factories. Approximately 3,000 jobs are directly at risk, to say nothing of a multitude of other jobs too numerous really to hazard an estimate. Those jobs are spinoffs in the community. My own community and some 14 other municipalities are affected by this industry. This ripple effect is vital. In southern Alberta alone it accounts for an injection of $170 million annually into the economy of that community. Nationwide we are talking in terms of $0.5 billion per year going to Canada's gross national product. Canada produces 10 per cent of the sugar it uses, although there is the capacity to go upward to a level of approximately 16 per cent. It imports the rest from a surplus supply of sugar dumped on the world market by countries who protect their own industries through a variety of trade agreements. Our major sources are Australia, Cuba and South Africa. Of the approximately 40 sugar producing countries in the world, Canada is the only country that does not have a national sugar policy to protect its industry. Canadian sugar-beet producers have had to compete against surplus dumped sugar which can be purchased by Canadian refiners for a few cents a pound, and then processed cheaply. This of course results in a profit and makes good economic sense as far as the sugar companies are concerned.

● (1420)

The contract terms offered by the company to Alberta producers last year were deemed so unrealistic that, for the first time in some 60 years, they resulted in farmers not planting sugar-beets. It is hard to convey what that means. It takes me back to my childhood in southern Alberta when this industry was always there as a stable influence if all else failed.

In addition, the growers have not yet received a stabilization payment for 1983, which has contributed to further uncertainty and real hardship for individuals.

Throughout the past year the government has studied a number of options. One of the most recent options to be discussed at some considerable length in recent weeks would involve the equivalent of a floor price for imported sugar.

As honourable senators will know from questions that have been asked repeatedly in this chamber, many deadlines have come and gone since last September. Sugar policy and stabilization payments are two completely separate things but they have become mixed together and the grower has seen neither. Expectations have been raised and then lowered. The anxiety among growers has increased with the passing weeks.

The future of this industry poses difficult questions and decisions for everyone concerned, including the government. Unquestionably, everyone will have to give a little if this industry is to survive. It is a classic case of a Canadian industry that has contributed long and successfully to the stability and the prosperity of areas of this country which have depended heavily on agriculture for their economic base. It is a crop that our climate supports and it is a crop that our farmers produce very well indeed.

It is now an industry under threat, at least in my part of Canada, at a time when our communities have already been savaged by drought, by grasshoppers, by cutworms and by a wet, cold harvest of whatever there was to harvest. It is also happening at a time—and I can personally attest to this—when warm winds are blowing over our drought areas in mid-January, prompting new fears of another dry growing season to come, which is almost too much for the farm community to contemplate at this time.

With all this, must we add to it the end of the sugar-beet industry and all that it implies for the economic and social well-being of Canadians in the areas concerned?

Honourable senators, I suggest that there is no more time for talking. It is now a question of political will. This debate has been remarkably free of partisan sniping. It has been too complicated and too critical an issue for political games. To date, the growers themselves have responsibly resisted pressures to take the kind of dramatic action that makes the national news, but leaves all of us with some uneasy feelings and questions as to whether the tactic of noisy demonstration is now to become the routine method of getting action in our democratic political process.

As the opposition, there is little more we can do in the way of encouragement or constructive pressure. However, at least I and perhaps some of my colleagues will keep on to the end until some kind of action is taken.

However, the focus now shifts. Tomorrow, party caucuses take place on Parliament Hill, and on Thursday, there is another cabinet meeting. Honourable senators, I urge my friends on the government side of this house from every province to use all of their eloquence, their skill, their influence and their powers of persuasion to persuade their colleagues from the Prime Minister down that a decision must be made at once. Win or lose, for the farmers involved, after months of patience, uncertainty itself has become the issue.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak for too long. However, as a senator from British Columbia, I would like to say to Senator Fairbairn that I have been tremendously impressed with the case that she has been making for a long time on behalf of the sugar-beet growers and the sugar-beet industry in general.

I do not need to tell honourable senators that the farming community in general in this country is in deep trouble. In my home province, the ranchers are in deep trouble. In my conversations with them over the last little while, we have discussed the problems of the sugar-beet industry and I want to say to Senator Fairbairn that there is a tremendous amount of support within the province of British Columbia amongst the farming community and the people in general for the case that she has put forward.

The points that Senator Fairbairn has made that have impressed me are, first of all, that some 1,400 producers have been involved in the industry, some of them for up to 90 years and, in the prairie provinces and particularly in Alberta, for up to 60 years.

A few days ago, I was talking with a rancher in the Cariboo area and at that time I asked him how things were going for him and he told me that, personally, he was not too bad but he said: "I would not be telling the truth if I said everything in my life was well because I am just about to lose my ranch, my land and my cattle. The bank is about to move in."

Honourable senators, that is what is about to happen to these 1,400 sugar-beet farmers and their families and the more than 3,000 people who will be thrown out of work as a result of the procrastination and vacillations of this government in not dealing with the sugar-beet policy and in neglecting to tell the farmers right away where they stand.

● (1430)

There is some urgency, as Senator Fairbairn has pointed out, because they must know the answer soon so that they can prepare the ground for planting. Farming today is a complicated process; farming does not mean getting a few seeds together and planting them in the ground. It is a highly sophisticated and scientific endeavour today.

The people involved in farming are very good at what they do. As I have often said about farming families—and not just sugar-beet producers, but farming families in general—they are the salt of the earth; they are tremendously loyal; they are tremendously competent; and they are tremendously good Canadians.

It is important that this government give them an early answer regarding the sugar-beet policy so that they can get on with their lives with some kind of certainty.

Honourable senators, ten years ago I undertook an extensive amount of research on sugar-beets. I became involved in that because many native people in various parts of the prairie provinces were harvesting sugar-beets, especially in southern Alberta. I first became involved because I was concerned about the wages of these native people and the working conditions they were confronted with. I found that the farmers were tremendous people. They gave good responses to the cases made on behalf of the native people.

I also went so far as to look at the possibility of utilizing some of the lands that were lying dormant on Indian reservations on the prairies for farming. I think this country should have a larger sugar-beet industry. Occupying 10 per cent of the market is not good enough. There is room for more production. Why should we import 14 per cent of our requirements from South Africa? I think that is appalling. I think there is a great deal of room for the future development of a sound industry, an industry that would take up more of that market.

Right now that is not the urgent question; the urgent question is for this minister and this government to give those farmers an early answer so that they can go on with their lives.

I thank honourable senators for their attention.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the plea made by Senator Fairbairn was certainly quite moving. I commend her for being such a worthy representative of the sugar-beet industry of her region of Canada, as she has just shown by her remarks.

Of course, New Brunswick does not have a sugar industry as such. Still some of Senator Fairbairn's comments did remind me of some experiences I had as a member of the other place when a different industry—the eastern Canada potato industry—would come knocking at our door. God knows the number of days and evenings—I would not say agonizing, but sometimes sleepless nights—spent trying to find a solution for the potato industry which is left to the ever more abrupt vagaries of the market place.

I am convinced that potato growers are not indifferent either to the plight of sugar-beet producers in western Canada or Quebec.

As Senator Marchand pointed out, I notice what seems to be, a priori, deliberate procrastination in the government's answers, at times a cavalier attitude in light of the kind of answers given to Senator Fairbairn over the many months she has raised the issue in this house.

Sometimes I wonder whether the government in office is naturally wont to forget all about the agricultural sectors which are in trouble at this time. This is a very bad year for the potato industry and the sugar-beet industry. Perhaps you will recall how the government reacted last year when I rose in this house to plead the case of the potato industry which was expecting the government to deliver a lot more than pious wishes full of good will. In the end such wishes did precious little to solve the basic problems of that industry.

Honourable senators will recall as well—and I say this to illustrate my earlier remarks about the rather peculiar tendency of this government to forget all about agricultural problems—that one of the first moves of this government soon after being swept into office was to abolish a royal commission of inquiry into the potato industry.

Today, potatoes from New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and other places in Canada can be bought for peanuts, if I may put it that way, well below the production cost. They sell for less than the cost of transportation, what it costs to transport New Brunswick potatoes to the market in Montreal, Toronto or elsewhere. The situation is desperate.

In my brief intervention today I want to focus on the problem and fully endorse the remarks of Senator Fairbairn as well as the supportive comments of Senator Marchand.

This question should not be the exclusive concern of those senators who come from sugar-producing regions. It is much more complex and much more basic, affecting as it does other agricultural sectors in Canada. If that is the way they are going to deal with the sugar-beet industry, I have to wonder just how far the government is prepared to go after deciding to stand pat or let the situation deteriorate in other agricultural sectors.

I am not indulging in petty politics, and I did understand the remarks of Senator Fairbairn. There can be no question of retaliating. There is a basic problem. The way this government tackles those problems is the exact opposite of the approach of the previous administration. It is its choice, its decision, fair enough! But the problems remain unsolved. No matter where we come from in Canada, whatever region we may represent, we have to be concerned about this trend.

Before leaving last Thursday Senator Fairbairn again raised the question. I have the impression that she must be sick and tired of rising in the Senate and asking the same question, if not day after day it has to be at least once a month and sometimes week after week.

Honourable senators, there is still hope. Before leaving us for other climes, Senator Roblin said: "One of the special obligations that I shall be leaving with Senator Doody is to take care of my honourable friend's concern regarding sugar-beets, because if I were to add up the number of times that she has asked a question on this matter it would amount to a considerable number." Our only hope lies in Senator Roblin's statement, in which he said before leaving Canada on the weekend that he would ask Senator Doody to reply.

Today, therefore I urge Senator Doody, who like myself and other senators, comes from one of these disadvantaged areas, to examine the problem forthwith and prevent further deterioration of the situation.

I realize he is not a member of cabinet like the Leader of the Government in the Senate, Senator Roblin. However, we all know how the political system works. If you want to buckle down to a task, if you want to urge colleagues to support your arguments and go ahead full speed, there are ways of opening doors and making people understand.

I urgently ask Senator Doody to give particular attention to the concerns of Senator Fairbairn, who speaks on behalf of farmers who no longer know where to turn.

I have been through these situations and I know what she is talking about. I can assure Senator Fairbairn that she has and will have my support for any action to help deal with this serious problem.

Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, at the beginning of this debate, Senator Doody indicated that it might be useful if longer advance notice could be given so that more senators could participate in some of these emergency debates. However, as Senator Corbin has just pointed out, this subject is hardly a new one to the Senate because it has been brought up on many occasions and has been the subject of many questions. The problem is that answers have not been forthcoming and that is why we are now at the point that we have an emergency before us.

I should like to point out that this is a much more serious problem than it might seem at first glance. I do not think the sugar-beet industry is one which immediately springs to the minds of most Canadians. However, just recently, there has been a great deal of discussion about an oil refinery closing in the province of Quebec. It has become a major issue. That represents a small number of jobs by comparison to this industry, even in the province of Quebec. When the sugar-beet industry is operating at a normal rate, it has some 450 growers in the province of Quebec; 450 growers in the province of Manitoba; and 640 growers in the province of Alberta. These are the people who produce the beets. In other words, something of the order of 1,500 growers.

You might well say that these people will grow something else. In certain years they can, but in other years they cannot. Upon those growers depends a tremendous number of other jobs. In the province of Quebec, a plant processing the beets employs a large number of workers. The same applies to the provinces of Manitoba and Alberta. These three plants employ workers who depend on them for their jobs and if the plants close, then these people will be out of work.

In addition to that, one must consider all the back-up services, that is, the people in the implement business and the related jobs. The beet industry is a heavy consumer of labour and personnel. It is a major Canadian industry.

The problem is that for the past year we have been trying to get a decision from the government and have been unable to do so. This is why we are now faced with this serious emergency in the industry.

Two issues are to be considered. The government says that they are related and, in a sense, they are. Two decisions are required. I will deal first with the simpler one, one that can be cured by money, and that is a stabilization payment which is owed to these growers relating to their 1983 crop. Honourable senators, I am not talking about last year's crop or that of the year before, but the 1983 crop. The growers have not been paid their stabilization payment.

Honourable senators, this has been a traditional payment and does not result from a new policy. This policy has been in effect for years. Going back to 1968, the government has consistently—when the final price was too low, which, admittedly, is not the case every year—paid a stabilization payment. The last payment made was in 1982. It amounted to $10.42 per ton. The payment for 1983 has not been made and the growers have been expecting it. They have based their operations on this final price which comes out of a negotiation with the sugar companies and depends on the retail price of sugar. That amount is due. The question has been asked repeatedly in the house, and the government keeps on putting it off.

As Senator Corbin has indicated, as recently as last Thursday the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that Senator Doody would give us the answer this week. That is my understanding of what he was saying, and I am hopeful that the answer will come.

There is, however, a much greater problem relating to the continuation of this industry, which depends on government policy. The government recognizes that, because, on March 13 of last year, the Minister of Agriculture issued a press release stating that he had asked his colleague, Charles Mayer, Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, to initiate a consultation with Canadian sugar-beet growers, processors and the provincial governments of Quebec, Alberta and Manitoba. In that press release, he stated:

Serious problems within the industry prompted this action . . . I'm sure a thorough review of the situation with each of the partners involved will be of great assistance.

The press release concludes by stating that, on the basis of these industry-wide discussions and meetings, Mr. Mayer will make his recommendations to Mr. Wise.

Mr. Mayer has had his consultations. We were told that a decision would be made by the government in September. Since that time, we have been asking for the decision. The growers have been asking for a decision, and no decision has been forthcoming.

The reason for the urgency is that the growers must now decide if they are going to plant beets this spring or not. They cannot defer that decision until next June. They must start the process now. In fact, it is late now. They should have had the announcement last September so that they could have planned their work last fall, prepared their land for the planting in the spring, prepared their rotation plans for their crops and had their machinery ready for the spring planting. Although it is late, it is still possible for the government to announce its policy and for the industry to go ahead.

Honourable senators, this is no idle threat. It is simply a matter of whether the industry is going to continue or not. We started asking questions in this chamber on April 1 of last year—and I refer you to the Hansard of that date. At that time, we asked the government what they were going to do about the sugar-beet industry. No decision had been made at that point. It was not until after persistent questioning that on or about April 18 the government made its announcement that it would support, in conjunction with the provinces, the beet industry.

What happened last year? A late announcement was made on April 18. By the time the whole process was developed and the growers knew for sure what their position was going to be, it was about May 2. Manitoba fared best because it lost only about 10 per cent of its production. The plant carried on, 10 per cent of the growers dropped out, but the balance produced. In the province of Quebec, two-thirds of the growers did not grow beets last year. It was too late for them to plant. Unsure of the price, they did not grow beets. As a result, last year the plant in Quebec worked at about one-third capacity. There were a whole lot of workers in that province who had no work because no decision had been taken. In Alberta, the situation was worse. The growers decided that they could not afford to grow beets and, accordingly, there were no beets grown in Alberta last year. The plant was closed and remained closed throughout this year, which meant that approximately 150 jobs were completely lost.

Honourable senators, that is exactly what we are facing now. We have the experience from last year to go by. One plant closed completely and an entire province grew no beets. Quebec had only one third of its normal production, while Manitoba enjoyed only 90 per cent. This year, if no decision has been taken at an appropriate time—which is now, admittedly, late, but still in enough time—then there will be no production in any of the provinces. The three plants will be closed next year and the growers will not be in the beet business.

That is why an emergency exists at this time. I repeat that this is not a new issue. It has been brought up in the house frequently, but a decision has simply not been taken. This problem involves a large number of jobs. It is not just a sideline industry, it is a major employer of people, directly involving some 1,500 growers plus all of the attendant jobs elsewhere in the industry. That is why I say to the Honourable Senator Doody that we need a policy. The growers need a policy statement and the matter cannot wait. If it does, we will experience what we did last year. That is why I commend the Honourable Senator Fairbairn for having brought about this emergency debate. It is my hope that the government will react to it. As Senator Fairbairn has said, the caucus meetings of all parties will be held tomorrow, while Thursday is the day on which cabinet meets. That must be the day of decision or this industry will close out.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I should first like to comment on the thoughtful presentations made by all who have participated in this debate. I particularly want to thank Senator Fairbairn for raising the matter once again. She has spoken with care on a matter that is important not only to her native province of Alberta and my native province of Manitoba, but to the entire country.

Honourable senators, the government is acting to address the concerns raised by all of those affected in this particular area. The government must proceed carefully to ensure that the interests of sugar-beet producers, sugar refiners and Canadian consumers are protected.

In March of last year, as has been pointed out by Senator Molgat, the Minister of Agriculture appointed the Honourable Charles Mayer, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, as the minister responsible for assisting sugar-beet growers in planting their 1985 crops.

Shortly after his appointment, Mr. Mayer announced an $8 million assistance program to sugar-beet producers. That was the government's immediate response. A promise has also been made to develop a new national sugar policy. I am sure that everyone can imagine that such a task is by no means a simple, clear-cut or easy one.

The world sugar industry is suffering from large surpluses. These are created by the various policies of the major producing countries. In turn, prices are very low for the approximately 15 per cent of the sugar that is traded on the world spot market.

Canada is one of the victims of this situation. A very fragile and complex industry exists in Canada—fragile because a small increase in world production has the potential to break our producers, and complex because there are so many components in our whole system.

On April 18 of last year, Mr. Mayer announced the funding package. Following this, he immediately initiated consultation with the industry in the hope of creating a more durable, long term approach.

In July of last year a big step was taken in this direction when the minister held a major consultative meeting with sugar-beet and corn producers, refinery people and provincial government representatives. As well, briefs were submitted by consumer groups.

Allow me, for a moment, to tell honourable senators what is at the root of the problem. Competing countries who have been subsidizing their producers are responsible. Canadian sugar-beet growers are not inefficient—far from it. But as the only unprotected growers in the world, they simply cannot compete.

[Senator Molgat.]

In 1973, the federal government of the day in its wisdom actually lowered the protective tariff on sugar imports. While that government made the domestic market environment worse for our growers, other countries have implemented protective policies. For instance, the U.S. is offering producers a loan rate of 18 cents per pound of raw sugar cane. The EEC, meanwhile, guarantees producers an intervention price of 17.5 cents U.S. per pound on domestic requirements.

Not too long ago—in the early 1980s, as a matter of fact—Canadian farmers were able to make ends meet growing sugar-beets. I am certain that, in the near future, they will be able to do so again.

Of course, when considering a national policy, we have to consider all sides of the question and make certain that all concerns are fairly dealt with. Points raised by the producers, sugar refineries, industrial sugar users and, indeed, consumers must all be weighed.

This government recognizes how essential an industry sugar production and refining is. As Senator Molgat has ably pointed out, there is a large number of jobs involved in the refining end of it alone in three important regions of this country. Sugar is found in the vast majority of processed food products. In fact, Canadians consume more than 40 kilograms of sugar per capita. Sugar and sugar preparations account for about 2.5 per cent of our total expenditures for food consumed at home. That does not include the vast quantities of hidden sugar we buy when we buy processed food.

This government is mindful of the pressures facing the sugar-beet growers. Because the Minister of State for the Wheat Board understands these pressures, he is attempting to develop a proposal. He intends to announce his plan as close as possible to his target of the end of this month.

The minister is aware that sugar-beet farmers must take care of their seeding arrangements, their fertilizer and chemical plans and other seeding requirements very soon. The announcement of the minister will be made well before the one-year deadline that he announced last April.

I will say, in conclusion, that this government has made great progress in this area over the last 10 months. Discussions have been taking place. At 3.15 this afternoon, the growers will have met with a representative group of the government caucus. I suggest, honourable senators, that the government has taken a serious look at the sugar-beet industry. It is my hope that all of those affected can look forward to a national sugar-beet policy very soon.

Senator Molgat: Would the Honourable Senator Nurgitz permit a question? Was he stating, on behalf of the government, that there will be a policy announcement before the end of this month, recognizing that this is the 28th of January?

Senator Nurgitz: No, I did not, nor am I proposing to speak for the government. I indicated that it was my hope that an announcement would be made shortly.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a few comments to make in support of Senator Fairbairn. As a representative of a neighbouring province, I want her to know how much I am impressed, as are all honourable senators, with her continued interest in the problems of sugar-beet farmers. I rise to speak not just for sugar-beet producers but for the entire agricultural industry. In so doing, I put forward the problem of the sugar-beet producers as a symbol of the malaise of the agricultural industry as a whole. Thousands of farm families, including those of the sugar-beet producers, are faced with almost insurmountable problems. Those families are located in every province of Canada. As a senator from Saskatchewan, I am well aware of the seriousness of the troubles facing these producers. The grain, livestock and other agricultural producers face a very grim outlook. Nature has not co-operated; prices are often below the cost of production, and debt servicing charges present a burden that often cannot be met. Sugar-beet producers need a national policy, but so do the producers of other agricultural products. The entire industry needs that sort of national policy, which has not, I suggest, been forthcoming from the present government.

● (1500)

In conclusion, may I say, in supporting Senator Fairbairn, that I speak for farmers everywhere, who desperately need direction and assistance. Perhaps I can conclude my remarks by repeating an old story about the farmer in Saskatchewan or Alberta who was fortunate enough to win either Lotto Canada or the Lotto 6/49 and became an instant millionaire. Someone asked him what he was going to do with the money, and he replied "Well, I really don't know. I think I will just keep on farming until it is all used up."

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to thank my colleagues for their assistance, and I now move, with leave, that this motion be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

NOTICE OF MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, January 30, 1986, I will move:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, may I make one comment on Senator Kelly's notice of motion? I do not have any intention of questioning it. I simply wish to point out what I believe has been the recent policy of the Senate in terms of committees and the budgetary problem. When this motion has been dealt with, perhaps Senator Kelly will be able to give the Senate some idea of the budgetary implications of this particular project. Obviously we have a bulk vote for committees, and in fairness to the other committee chairmen and the work they have to do, it might be appropriate for us to have some idea of what expenses might be involved in connection with this suggested committee, in terms of the global budget.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEAT IMPORT ACT

TABLING OF REPORTS

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government. The 1983 and 1984 reports of operations under the Meat Import Act were tabled in the House of Commons on January 21, 1986 and in the Senate on January 22, 1986. Section 7 of the act provides that:

As soon as practicable after the 31st day of December in each year, the Minister shall prepare and lay before Parliament a report of the operations under this Act for that year.

My question is: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government ask the minister responsible for this act why it was not practicable to table the 1983 report until more than two years afterwards and the 1984 report until more than one year afterwards, when section 7 was very explicit?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): It would seem to me that there was probably more than one minister—indeed, more than one government—involved; but I will certainly undertake to try to get the information.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: moved the third reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if Senator Nurgitz is simply moving third reading but is not going to speak to it today, then I will move the adjournment of the debate and will speak to it tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, for the second reading of the Bill C-84, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as honourable senators know, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee did a pre-study of this bill back in December. I should like to refer to the report that was issued by that committee. The first matter discussed by the committee was the capital gains exemption. As honourable senators know, there is a new capital gains exemption which will eventually amount to $500,000. I should like to quote from the committee's report which, in turn, quotes the Honourable Michael Wilson, in his budget speech of May 23, 1985. Mr. Wilson said:

If we are to stimulate the creation of new business and the expansion of existing ones, we must increase our investment in productive activities. We are major savers, but too few of us are willing to invest a part of our savings in new ventures. It is through capital investment that new ideas get implemented, new activities are generated and new jobs are created.

Further on he says:

I want to encourage risk-taking,

My objection to the proposals in the budget is the fact that they do not achieve the objective stated by Mr. Wilson. It would have been very easy, in my submission—perhaps not easy but possible—to have provided that this exemption did not apply to foreign investments and did not apply to such things as works of art, for example, even though purchased in Canada and which may be the work of a foreign artist.

So far as capital gains on U.S. real estate is concerned, the argument is that it is already taxed in the United States and by the time it gets up to Canada and one gets the credit for the tax paid in the United States, there is not much capital gains tax payable in Canada anyway.

So far as other assets in the United States are concerned, the department more or less said, "Well, it is just too complicated, and it is too easy to get around." The act has 100 pages devoted to capital gains, which is amazing. It is very simple. To begin with, there is an exemption up to the amount of $500,000 eventually, but 100 pages are taken up to plug possible loopholes and so on. It is my submission that the government should have applied itself, even if it took an additional five pages or so, to attempting to restrict the exemptions in order to achieve the purpose desired by Mr. Wilson as he claims in the speech that I just read. The committee said in its report at page 39:6:

The Committee is not convinced that the reasons given for extending the exemption to dispositions of foreign assets are enough to justify giving the exemption such broad application. The Committee recommends this measure be given close scrutiny to determine whether investment in Canada will in any way be discouraged by allowing the exemption to apply to foreign assets. If so, the exemption should be limited accordingly.

My criticism of those comments is that they are rather mealy-mouthed.

• (1510)

I would like to refer to another article that appeared in the Financial Post of November 30, 1985. It reads:

Finance Minister Michael Wilson's $500,000 capital gains exemption is meeting strong opposition from one group that has much to gain from it—the country's tax practitioners.

They will earn hefty fees from the fancy tax planning the exemption will spawn. But even so, many of the 1,500 accountants and lawyers attending last week's Canadian Tax Foundation conference here criticized the proposal as ill-conceived and poorly designed.

They now think it likely to spawn dozens of new tax avoidance schemes that could lead to pressure for big modifications to exemptions or some sort of substitute.

Willam Lawlor, a national tax partner with Ernst & Whinney, sparked the debate—which spilled over into hallways and hospitality suites—by saying the exemption "will have a disastrous effect structurally on the tax system."

Later on in the article, it reads:

In Quebec City, a team of federal finance officials listened intently as Ernst & Whinney's Lawlor itemized a long list of tax-saving schemes which could be spawned by the exemption—and would in no way contribute to investment or job-creation.

Further on in the article, it reads:

Eventually, Lawlor predicts, the exemption will be abandoned as unworkable.

And still later, we read:

Donald Huggett, national tax partner, publications, with Coopers & Lybrand, sees the introduction of these self-cancelling measures as “an exercise in futility and stupidity.”

Huggett suggests the government write off the experience as “a terrible mistake,” and scrap or delay both the minimum tax and the capital gains exemption.

Incidentally that exemption will cost the government $550 million in 1985 and $700 million in 1986. I can recall that one of the members of the committee—I believe it was Senator Olson—pointed out that the measure would not affect him because he did not intend to sell any of his assets upon which he might be considered to have earned a capital gain. That comment points out the fact that the exemption may not be for the benefit of the living, but for their descendants. If you do not sell your assets in your lifetime, ordinarily there is a deemed realization upon death and the capital gains tax is paid at that time. However, because of this provision, there would not be any deemed realization of profits of up to $500,000 and thus the benefit would go primarily to heirs.

The next point that I would like to discuss is the surtax on income. The committee merely draws attention to the result. It points out that this measure, the surtax which applied partly in 1985 and then in 1986, is expected to bring in revenues of $235 million in 1985 and $500 million in 1986. In fact, it does not produce as much money as will be lost in 1986 through the capital gains exemption.

The next item is the de-indexing of tax brackets. As pointed out by the committee, the budget proposes to reduce the effective indexation commencing in 1986 by limiting it to any consumer price index increase in excess of 3 per cent. On the basis that we will have inflation of at least 3 per cent, there will be an automatic increase in taxes each year. In my opinion this is a rather sneaky way of increasing taxes. If the government wishes to increase taxes each year, it should do so directly in the budget and through a tax bill, not automatically in this fashion. We went into this matter in 1972 when indexing was first brought in. At that time everybody agreed that the most equitable and proper way of going about it, if the government needed more money, was to increase taxes.

The Child Tax Credit is also discussed in the report. I am in favour of the increases in the Child Tax Credit. To me they make sense because, in effect, they benefit the poor rather than the rich. Certainly, I approved of it at the time the Liberal government introduced it in 1978. Although it has increased substantially, it is not to be indexed after three years. Senator Tremblay pointed out in his speech and included tables to show that when the Child Tax Credit was brought in the Family Allowance was reduced from $308 per year to $240 per year, which is a more substantial reduction in the Family Allowance than is proposed in the Family Allowance bill, which merely provides for de-indexing.

The next item is the Child Tax Exemption. As far as I am concerned, this exemption should be abolished completely. It is a very regressive tax expenditure. The rich benefit from it far more than the poor. By 1989 the government intends to reduce it to an amount equal to the family allowance. What that means is that from then on the family allowance will be tax free. This, again, is a regressive measure because it means that the rich will pay no tax whereas the poor will pay tax. It should be abolished completely.

The small business investment measures are referred to on page 13 of the report. I would like to read several passages from the report dealing with small business investments by deferred income plans:

Draft amendments to the Income Tax Act and Income Tax Regulations were released on November 1, 1985 to encourage deferred income plans to invest in small and medium-sized businesses. The amendments will permit RRSs and RRIFs to invest directly in qualifying small businesses and to allow all deferred income plans to channel such investments through certain partnerships and trusts. Pension funds will also be able to channel their small business investments through special exempt corporations. In addition, deferred income plans will be allowed to make $3.00 of additional investment in foreign property for every $1.00 of investment in qualifying small business. The maximum amount of additional foreign property that may be made available will be 20 per cent of the investor's total assets. To the extent that additional foreign investment is made, less money will be available for investment in Canada.

I should point out that at the present time, pension funds are allowed to invest 10 per cent. My reaction to that last comment in the report is that I do not think any reputable pension fund manager is about to invest in a small or medium-sized business because he will be able to invest more outside of the country. He will make his individual decisions based on the merits of that individual investment. When he makes that investment, all this bill is doing is committing him to take some more money out of the country.

I was skiing over the weekend and while going up on the tow I spoke with someone who manages a large pension fund and is in charge of U.S. investment. He told me that there had been absolutely no interest generated within the pension fund business by that provision in the act. He said that no one will make investments in a small or medium-sized business because they think they can then invest more outside of the country. He told me that most people would like to have the freedom to invest more than the 10 per cent. After he had told me that, I took the trouble to telephone the president of a company that manages a couple of billion dollars worth of investments in pension funds, and he confirmed what I had been told. Therefore, I think that it is ineffective. It is not something really to worry about because I do not think anyone will pay too much attention to it.

However, what does worry me is something else in the report, and I will read again from it:

It is also to be noted that such investments will result in deferred income plans acquiring assets of a non-liquid nature. This is a departure from policy expressed heretofore that such plans, and RRSPs in particular, should serve to provide individuals with funds to meet their needs in their retirement years.

For a large pension fund to buy non-liquid assets is not a great problem as long as it does not amount to too much, because they have many years and many other assets, so that it would only be a very small proportion of their total holdings. However, for someone who is relying on his Registered Retirement Savings Plan for his retirement income and must invest that money in an annuity before his 71st birthday, I think it is dreadful to permit these people to put the money into non-liquid assets. That is not what RRSPs were created for and that should not be permitted.

The report then goes on to say:

The government will be aware of the necessity to monitor the consequences of this as it applies to the amount of money available for Canadian investment.

I point out, of course, that there may be less because for every dollar you invest in Canada, three dollars go out of the country:

Notwithstanding the reservations expressed above, the Committee supports the attempt to encourage investment in small and medium-sized businesses.

I just want to say that I, personally, do not agree with that conclusion. Because of the reservations and because of what I have already said, I completely oppose this rather gimmicky way of trying to encourage investment in small and medium-size businesses which will not prove to be effective, in any event.

In that connection, I would like now to read from the Globe and Mail of Monday, December 23, 1985. This is an article by Dennis Slocum. In that article, he says:

One of Canada's largest venture capital companies, Ventures West Technologies Inc. of Vancouver, has told Ottawa that the rules would kill the Canadian venture capital industry.

And here he is referring to the rules in the new Income Tax Act:

Intelligent venture capital investing would become impossible because safeguards built into the legislation would prevent legitimate deals from being made, the company's submission says.

In urging the Government to kill the proposed legislation, Ventures West also said the concept of linking small business investment with increased scope for foreign investment is unworkable. "There is no feasible or effective way to tie the foreign property allowance and small business investing together . . ."

Later on, in the same article, he said:

Marc Vaillancourt, president of VCI Management Inc. of Montreal, a venture capital investment adviser, said Ottawa's proposals would probably reduce the flow of funds going to small businesses. The winners would be accountants and lawyers, he said.

I noticed in today's Globe and Mail a headline: "Money managers' opinions split over which markets will be best." The article says:

Money managers are divided over whether to stick with Canadian equity markets in 1986 or go direct to U.S. and European markets for the action.

So it is not considered generally that it is a great advantage to be able to invest abroad. There is a difference of opinion on that.

The final point that I would like to comment on is the retroactivity provision in the bill, and that is referred to on page 16 of the report under the heading "Retrospective Legislation":

The Bill proposes to implement certain changes in the Act as of midnight May 22, 1985, notwithstanding the fact that the Budget Speech was delivered at 4:30 p.m. E.D.T. May 23, 1985. It had become standard practice heretofore to introduce legislation effective midnight the day of delivery of the Budget Speech.

Later on, the report says:

The Committee is strongly of the view that the retrospective provisions of Bill C-84, referred to above, constitute an extremely bad precedent. The Committee therefore recommends that the government give immediate consideration to proposing an amendment to this Bill to change the effective time of any amendment from midnight May 22, 1985 to 4:30 p.m. E.D.T. May 23, 1985.

Mr. Wilson, the Minister of Finance, having read the committee's report, wrote to Senator Murray, the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on December 18, 1985, and I will quote very briefly from that letter. He said:

I realize that the effective date chosen for these measures, and many other measures in my budget, differs in timing from previous budgets.

Later on, he said:

While I recognize your point as valid in a pure policy sense, I believe that the temptation to ease past the afternoon deadline would be irresistible especially where, for example, only the execution of an otherwise unenforceable document is required.

Finally, he said:

In view of the above, I believe that the approach taken in my budget and in Bill C-84 is a reasonable one. However, I understand your criticism and you may be assured that, in the future, whenever special measures like this may be necessary, taxpayers will be warned in advance that budgetary measures may be effective on budget day.

In reply to that letter, Senator Murray wrote to the minister on January 17, 1986. I would like to quote, in part, from that letter. He said:

You have suggested that some taxpayers may be tempted to treat transactions as having taken place prior to the 4:30 p.m. EDT deadline when, in fact, they were completed later. Our tax system presumes honesty on the taxpayer's part and this is reflected in the taxpayer's Bill of Rights, brought in by our government. There is always a possibility that taxpayers will try to cheat the system, but such people could just as easily cheat the system by backdating transactions to May 22, 1985. In any case, if the Department of National Revenue is of the view that the taxpayer has effected a transaction after the deadline, the burden of proof will be on the taxpayer's shoulders to show otherwise.

You indicate in your letter that in future you will, when announcing the date of the Budget Address, state that budget measures may be effective on budget day. This policy seems to me to be fair and reasonable. Taxpayers would then be on notice that if they wish to avoid retroactive legislation, they would have to complete transactions before budget day.

Later on, Senator Murray also said:

I share your concern that Bill C-84 be passed expeditiously. It was with this in mind that the Committee met on three occasions before Christmas to pre-study the Bill. Within a few days, the Commons will have passed the Bill and it will be presented formally to the Senate. I note from news reports that you will be bringing in a new budget next month. That being the case, and in order to expedite passage of Bill C-84, could you not undertake to act in your February budget to correct the retroactive provisions in Bill C-84 by making the measures in question effective 4:30 p.m. EDT May 23, 1985?

This would protect the integrity of our system for amending tax legislation, and I feel the risk of taxpayers falsely maintaining that they completed transactions while the old rules were in effect seems worth the price.

I do not believe that Senator Murray has received a reply to that letter or the undertaking that he required. That is the last matter that was dealt with in the report.

● (1530)

Several groups were invited to appear before the committee last December. One of those groups said that they did not have enough time to prepare a submission; another group put in a written submission but said that they would like to discuss the legislation with the members of the committee. They have indicated a desire to appear before the committee, so I suggest that in order to hear from those witnesses the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, before Senator MacDonald rises to close the debate, I have a few things I should like to say in my capacity as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

I can confirm what Senator Godfrey has just said, and against the possibility that the bill would be referred to the committee today, I have tentatively scheduled a meeting of the committee for 3.30 tomorrow afternoon. I have arranged to have present representatives of the Canadian Insolvency Association and the Canadian Bankers' Association. Their concerns are well known to the members of the committee and the Senate. As a matter of fact, when we conducted the pre-study of this bill prior to the Christmas recess, we had before the committee a brief from the Canadian Insolvency Association. Since that time we have received a brief from the Canadian Bankers' Association. In any event, they wish to have representatives appear before the committee, and we have arranged to hear from them tomorrow afternoon if the bill is referred to the committee today.

I may say that when the subject matter of the bill was referred to the committee on November 28, we did get in touch with a number of organizations which we thought might wish to make representations to the committee. Those organizations included the Canadian Manufacturers Association, the Canadian Bar Association, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, the Canadian Tax Foundation and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, all of which declined to appear before the committee for one reason or another. Senator Godfrey alluded to the fact that one of those prospective witnesses, the Canadian Manufacturers Association, wrote to the committee stating that there was simply not enough time provided for them to prepare for such an appearance.

I must say that when we made the initial approaches we set no deadlines on any of those prospective witnesses; we simply asked them whether they wished to be heard. In the case of the Canadian Bar Association, they indicated that they would not be undertaking their legislative review until February and would not, therefore, be able to appear before that time.

In any case, I did want to defend the committee against any suggestion that we had moved too quickly with this legislation. The subject matter of the bill was referred to the committee on November 28; the committee met on December 4 to hear from the officials of the Department of Finance; the committee met again on December 12 to hear from lawyers in private practice who had indicated an interest in appearing; and, as I said, we had before the committee the brief from the Canadian Insolvency Association.

I should also say that the concerns expressed by Senator Godfrey today were, I think he would acknowledge, canvassed quite thoroughly in the committee. I need not, I think, go into detail on each of those concerns. There was the matter of the capital gains exemption and its application to investments abroad. The committee accepted the explanation that was given by officials as to the administrative difficulties of exempting investments in foreign countries from this measure. Senator Godfrey thinks that it would have been easy to exclude them and, at the same time, to exclude such investments as works of art. Those who have to draft the legislation and administer it were not as sanguine as he is about that.

In any case, there was a policy reason which was stated by the minister during his budget speech, and that is that he wanted to let the investor choose where to invest; he did not want to further distort the tax system, as he said, by measures that tell Canadians where and how to invest. In any case, as the department pointed out in the celebrated scenario of Florida condominiums, and things like that, there is certainly no incentive here to realize a capital gain by the sale of such assets because the foreign tax would be applicable anyway, and there would not be much to be gained by using the provisions of this legislation in that way. The officials also pointed out that there was a problem in that Canadian individuals could form corporations to purchase assets outside of Canada and then subsequently dispose of the Canadian corporation instead of the foreign assets.

In any event, the committee reached a consensus on this matter, and the consensus was that the government and Parliament should monitor this provision to see how it affects Canadian investment. Senator Godfrey says that that consensus of the committee was a rather mealy-mouthed one. He does not share the consensus of the committee, but as I have had occasion to remind him once in the past, consensus does not cease to be a consensus simply because he is not part of it; consensus does not necessarily mean that the committee was unanimous on the point, and I acknowledge cheerfully that it was not, there being at least one dissenting voice, his.

Again, he does not agree with the provision that the government believes will encourage investment by pension funds in small businesses. The situation is that for many years pension funds have been able to invest up to 10 per cent of their total investments abroad. They have been seeking for many years to have that maximum 10 per cent lifted. The government, on the other hand, has been trying to encourage the tapping of these pension funds for investment in small businesses, and the government feels that by requiring pension funds to invest $1 in certain qualifying small businesses for every additional $3 that could be invested abroad there will be an incentive for those pension funds to invest in small businesses. Again, Senator Godfrey does not like that particular measure, but the committee reached a consensus that, notwithstanding his reservations, and the reservations expressed by others, this is worth trying on behalf of the small business sector of this country.

With regard to retroactivity, the situation is as Senator Godfrey described it; the only undertaking I have been able to obtain to date from the Minister of Finance is that in the future when he announces the date for the budget address he will put taxpayers on notice that some of the provisions may be retroactive to midnight of the budget day.

These are matters that I am sure will be canvassed somewhat further by the committee, but I wanted to take the occasion of the debate to say that the committee has canvassed the issues quite thoroughly in its pre-study.

[Senator Murray.]

• (1540)

I may also say that he quoted some criticisms from the various tax practitioners who were, in fact, heard before the House of Commons committee in December. The people from Coopers and Lybrand, one of whom Senator Godfrey quoted in his speech, appeared before the House of Commons committee on December 12. At that time, representatives of the Canadian Tax Foundation were in attendance.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on the bill for the moment except to observe that I thought Senator Godfrey broke some new ground in Liberal policy this afternoon by advocating the outright abolition of the Child Tax Exemption. I do not know what to say about that matter on behalf of the Conservative government.

Senator Frith: That you do not know what to say is a bigger first!

Senator Murray: I would assure Senator Godfrey and the Senate that, as father of a young family, that suggestion cuts me to the quick.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald (Halifax): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator MacDonald speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator MacDonald (Halifax): Honourable senators, I have little to add to the remarks of Senator Murray, except to congratulate Senator Godfrey on his thoughtful remarks, some of which will meet with little disagreement from me.

I am aware of the active role he played in the pre-study of this bill and I gather that, since there is a disposition to refer the matter to committee, there will be a further opportunity to speak to it then or during the debate on third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".— (Honourable Senator Graham).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, with your permission, before Senator Graham speaks on Bill C-70, I should like to clarify a few points concerning some of the figures I used in my presentation of the bill.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tremblay: As I said in my presentation last Wednesday, I was surprised by some of the figures I submitted to you concerning the proportion of families which would profit fully from the new régime of child benefits, so much so that I asked that the data be re-examined to make sure that no incorrect conclusions were drawn.

In this regard, additional survey information was considered, and it is fairly obvious that one of the figures I presented—I am referring to the 49 per cent—over-stated the case, although it is not exactly clear to what extent.

None of the data available can give a precise answer to the number of full beneficiaries. Tax file data gives an upward bias regarding the number of full beneficiaries; whereas, other statistics present a downward bias.

The best estimate, I am told, after having looked at a wide range of data, is that 30 per cent of families will profit fully from the proposed change in child benefits over the next four years. However, I am told that this estimate is a conservative one.

It also appears that another 30 per cent of families will benefit somewhat from the new system over the next four years. This is a medium-term view of the changes. The greatest positive impact of the changes occurs in the first year. It is for that year that the proportion of families benefiting fully could be as high as 56 per cent.

I must add that none of those figures, or any of the other figures I have read, should be considered to be the last word on this matter. They are all subject to error. I have attempted to present them in such a way that no misleading impression will be given, and it is for that reason that I have asked permission to make this statement.

In conclusion, I would add that it is clear, however, that the general conclusions I submitted for your consideration are still valid.

Honourable senators, I thank you very much for allowing me to make that clarification.

While I am on my feet, I should like to ask your further indulgence in order to answer a question raised by Senator Frith concerning the sources of the data contained in the four tables which were published in the Debates of the Senate of last Thursday.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I have a full page and a half of notes giving those sources or references. Again, if honourable senators agree, instead of imposing on you by reading those notes, I would suggest that I table them and ask that they be printed in the Debates of the Senate. Then Senator Frith can use them as he sees fit.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See Appendix "A", p. 1901)

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I want to begin by thanking Senator Tremblay for his new analysis and his clarification, as well as for the time he took to provide such an elaborate analysis of the situation so far as he saw it when he introduced the legislation last Wednesday. We certainly appreciate the sincerity of his remarks today.

As well, I want to commend Senator Robertson who spoke on this matter prior to the Christmas break when she advocated new approaches.

• (1550)

Honourable senators, with respect to the charts and tables which Senator Tremblay had attached to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of last Wednesday, I would also ask permission to have attached as an appendix to the proceedings of this day three tables, to which I will make reference later in my remarks.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(See Appendix "B", p. 1902.)

Senator Graham: Bill C-70 represents one of the most difficult pieces of social legislation to come before this chamber since my arrival here in 1972. On the one hand, we have a government which is presumably preoccupied with taking what it considers to be significant steps to deal with a mounting deficit, and, on the other, we have thousands of Canadians, speaking on behalf of millions of their fellow citizens, who cry "foul" and who accuse the government of bad faith and of broken promises. That the federal deficit must receive proper attention is not in debate, at least as far as I am concerned; the question is how and when will that be done?

The principal intent of Bill C-70 is to trim the cost-of-living increases in the family allowance cheques by amending the Family Allowances Act of 1973 as outlined by Senator Tremblay. The 1984 monthly payments were $29.95 per child, increasing to $31.27 in 1985. The increase of $1.32 per month over the 1984 payment was approximately 4.4 per cent, which was commensurate with the then current rate of inflation. That change took place under full indexation. However, as is proposed in the bill now under consideration, in this year and the years following, family allowances are to be partially indexed. The government will no longer adjust the level of family allowances to fully reflect changes in the cost of living. Real values will be subject to the vagaries of inflation. Partial indexation of family allowances turns out to be an instrument of redistribution, a cost cutting measure for deficit reduction, or both.

Many witnesses representing many concerned groups from across the country appeared before the House of Commons legislative committee on Bill C-70. We are told that there were close to 150,000 individual petitioners opposing the legislation and over 100 groups appearing on Parliament Hill. Not one single witness, with the exception of those appearing on behalf of the Department of National Health and Welfare, supported the proposed bill. On the contrary, witnesses have denounced the bill as being callous, insensitive, burdensome and unfair. In compelling and, at times, very emotional tones, spokespersons of groups from every region of Canada cited many ways in which this legislation will negatively affect families, especially those in the lower income levels.

Bill C-70 directly reduces the real income of recipient families by ignoring the full effect of price increases on families. As the bill stands, family allowances will be indexed by the CPI less three percentage points. This implies that if the CPI rises by 3 per cent in any year, the family allowances will not be increased and the real value of the family allowances in that year will be reduced by the level of the inflation. Furthermore, since family allowances are taxable, they are designed to provide their greatest benefits to poor families. These, however, are precisely the families hurt the most by partial indexation or de-indexation.

If I may, I will quote from Terrence Huntley, the Executive Director of the National Council on Social Development. When he appeared before the committee of the other place, he said:

Because family allowances are taxable, the net reduction falls more heavily on low-income people than on those who are already paying half of it back in the form of income tax. And since families with children tend to be in the lower income ranges, the aggregate income of the proposed cuts is highest in the low-income categories . . . of the $228 million to be saved, roughly through the de-indexing by 1990, about $172 million or 75 per cent of the amount will come from families with below average incomes; 25 per cent in total comes from families with above average incomes.

According to the Ottawa Citizen of September 27, 1985, the Department of Finance estimates that inflation will be roughly 3 or 4 per cent a year during the next several years. Under this scenario, the same newspaper points out that the impact on the family allowances will be tantamount to a freeze in benefits.

Honourable senators, statistics show that poverty is much more severe among single parent families than among the elderly. This fact was expressed by Monique Simard of the Confederation des Syndicats Nationaux, or the CSN, in her presentation to the House of Commons legislative committee. She feared that, and I quote:

The impact of Bill C-70 on single parent families will be more dramatic, because the poverty rate for these families is much higher than it is for two-parent families.

Given those statistics, it is fair to say that children of single parent families headed by women would be hurt the most by

[Senator Graham.]

Bill C-70. The bill will only serve to continue the trend of increasing the percentage of children living in poor families.

According to the budget papers of May 23, 1985, the saving to the government by partially indexing the family allowances is approximately $15 million in fiscal year 1985-86 and $40 million in 1986-87. The manner in which these figures is regarded is, I suppose, open to conjecture. It may depend on how directly one may be affected or on how much empathy one might have towards those least able to defend themselves. There are those who contend that these savings are insignificant if applied to the $34 billion deficit, or if compared to the amounts earmarked for the benefit of multinationals, corporate take-overs, bank bail-outs or tax benefits for the rich. But regardless of your view, it is wrong, terribly wrong, to fight these battles on the backs of the poor and the disadvantaged.

A few people suggest that indexation of the family allowance has been an increasing financial burden to Canada. Such a suggestion is not accurate. Mr. Huntley, whom I quoted earlier, stated that as a result of the decreasing birth rate in Canada, the program costs have dipped from about 1 per cent of GNP in the late 1970s to about six-tenths of 1 per cent now, even with full indexing maintained. In her presentation to the committee, Patricia Gibson of the Vancouver Status of Women noted that, and I quote:

Twenty years ago in the midst of what seems in retrospect an economic boom, the family allowance payments represented 6.1 per cent of total federal expenditures, and . . . this figure has dropped to 2.4 per cent.

Neither the size of the possible savings from partial indexation nor the size of the percentage of federal expenditure on family allowance is that overwhelming to justify partial indexation as a deficit cutting measure. Clearly, the government could have elected other options in this regard.

But if the government insists on cutting the deficit, what are the alternatives? As just one example, let me compare the aggregate effect of the proposed changes in the child benefit package to the changes in the capital gains exemption. By as early as 1990-91, the Department of Finance has estimated that the new package of child benefits will yield net savings of more than $500 million. By startling contrast, the Department of Finance has also estimated that by 1990-91, the Government of Canada will be losing $1.25 billion per year to the proposal to exempt the first $500,000 of capital gains from taxation. This comparison, I suggest, indicates a gross inconsistency in the government's alleged commitment to do more for those most in need.

• (1600)

Joan Ann Gordon of the Quebec Voice of Women suggested other options, as follows:

The government gives away $80 million for high-income persons investing in RRSPs, $1 billion to big oil companies, plus $900 million for the richest depositors in the banks that went bankrupt. Then the government has the gall to ask women to make sacrifices in the name of fiscal responsibility. Balance those expenditures against the cruel reality of welfare mothers starving themselves to feed their children, and you have our definition of obscenity.

Honourable senators, many of the groups appearing before the committee were angry, and they were disappointed that the government had broken its promises to them. The government would have the public believe that revising the social programs was necessary to redirect any money saved to the neediest. For example, in the Speech from the Throne, opening the First Session of the Thirty-Third Parliament, on November 5, 1984, the government made the following statement:

My government has high priority measures to support and strengthen the Canadian family, which is the cornerstone of our society.

The Honourable Jake Epp, Minister of National Health and Welfare, made a similar statement in the House of Commons on November 15, 1984. He said:

It is my role as Minister of National Health and Welfare to put forward signals and initiatives which will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before.

Those statements, honourable senators, and the intent of Bill C-70 are clearly in contradiction. Bill C-70 not only reduces the value of the family allowance by restricting its indexation, but all of the proposed government measures underscore the selective nature of the benefits by increasing the tax credit from 1987 and by lowering the tax credit cut-off point, thereby making a large number of middle-income families ineligible.

There are those who will argue that the increases that might be gained in the total child benefit package as a result of increases in the Child Tax Credit, will be offset by the partial de-indexing of the family allowance. This analysis is supported by a number of groups, including the government-financed National Council of Welfare, which group is concerned with the gradual erosion of child benefits as a result of the budget.

In a report released last summer, the National Council of Welfare pointed out that after 1990 even the poorest families stand to lose child benefits, and in future, fewer and fewer families will be eligible for Child Tax Credit.

The Child Tax Credit, of course, is a significant component of the child benefit package, and people have asked, "What is the difference between family allowance and Child Tax Credit?" The difference is significant and it is well worth noting, as reflected by the views of Ms. Adams, Co-ordinator of the Alternatives for Single Parent Women. She said:

Family Allowances are delivered on a monthly basis. Many families depend on and budget for that monthly cheque. Though it is small, it is the difference between undernourishment and nourishment.

We have heard much discussion of how the two programs—the family allowance and the Child Tax Credit—will complement each other and thereby eliminate the inequities created by the de-indexation of family allowance. This argument does not take into account the timing of the respective decreases in the family allowance and the increases in the Child Tax Credit. For example, the minister chose to decrease the family allowance in January 1986, even before the House of Commons had a chance to vote on Bill C-70.

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Graham: Even before it was sent to this chamber—

Senator Frith: Shame!

Senator Graham: —the cheques for January 1986 went out in the new amount. Undoubtedly—and it will be interesting to find out—the cheques for February have already been printed in the new amount—another example of this chamber's being ignored.

We have heard from those speaking in favour of the bill that the Child Tax Credit is being increased by $70. But what none of those people has made clear is that this increase will not be received until April 1987—some 14 months from now. Quite simply, a family will lose the benefit of indexation for 14 months, while awaiting the compensating increase. I might add that all families, regardless of income, will experience that loss.

The effects for 1986, for a family of two adults and two children, can be seen in Table 1—and I apologize for its being available to honourable senators only in English at the present time. The table clearly indicates that by tampering with the family allowance and the Child Tax Credit systems, families with incomes of less than $10,000 stand to lose $17 in 1986 alone. That group, as indicated earlier, is the group to experience the greatest loss in benefits.

A second argument has been made that the changes in the family allowance, the Child Tax Credit and the Child Tax Exemption will result in a fairer distribution of benefits. Table 2, which honourable senators have, indicates that after four years the cumulative benefit for families with incomes of less than $10,000 is $38—that is the cumulative benefit over four years—or $9.50 per child. All other groups are net losers.

The disturbing aspect of this is that the latest poverty line figures indicate that a family of four with an income of between $19,000 and $20,000 per year is living in poverty. Under the new proposal, the government plans to withhold money from families living below the poverty line.

One of the readily accepted myths in our society is that with universality indexed programs benefit the rich more than the poor. Once again I suggest that this is simply not the case. Table 3 indicates that of the $49.5 million which will be saved through de-indexation of the family allowance in fiscal 1986, approximately 54 per cent will be saved at the expense of families with incomes of less than $30,000 per year. Even more distressing is the fact that 34 per cent of the savings will be at the expense of families living below the poverty line.

In the 1987 tax year, when the Child Tax Exemption will be lowered, the poorest families will once again be hardest hit. That will occur because the reduction in the exemption will be applied to all incomes. This means that in 1987 the poor families' exemptions will be reduced by exactly the same amount as those of the rich families.

Honourable senators, according to Claire Bonenfant of the Federation des Femmes du Quebec and spokesperson for the Coalition for Family Allowances, the de-indexation of family allowance, added to the reduction of exemptions for the Child Tax Credit, will result in the withdrawal of $175 million from Canadian families in 1986, and almost $2 billion between now and 1989—and those figures, she reiterates, do not take account of the other tax increases announced by the present government in its most recent budget.

I believe also that it is important to note that there is a psychological component of the family allowance program that has received little attention. To this government, obviously and sadly, family allowance is just a matter of dollars and cents; but to the vast majority of the women who receive the monthly cheque, it means more than that. It means pride in their role as mothers; it means self-worth and a recognition of motherhood by society.

I want to quote, for example, Ms. Adams of the Alternatives for Single Parent Women, who stated:

Family Allowance is the sole consistent economic recognition of the contribution of all mothers in society. It avoids the social stigma involved in receiving benefits based on one's position.

● (1610)

Let me quote a personal account of the psychological effect of the family allowance on mothers as given by Ms. K. Marshall of the National Action Committee of the Status of Women. This might help to illustrate how deeply mothers feel about the family allowance. She said:

The Family Allowance cheque was extremely important to me because it was the one sum of money I could spend on the children at my discretion, and even more so it was the one cheque coming into the house that was in my name. It gave me a feeling of worth and that what I was doing was important.

I have another quotation. Another aspect of the family allowance program worth noting is indicated by Ms. Dawne Peterson, who is the Southern Vice President of the Saskatchewan Action Committee of the Status of Women, who said:

—it was implemented as a statement about what we as a society value. It was not a means only to help the poor; it was not welfare and it was not charity; and we should not reduce it to that. The Family Allowance says that we as a people value our children, and acknowledge and support those who care for them. As soon as we remove that concept of universality, we say to most families that they are on their own and to the remainder, that we are just giving out another form of welfare.

Honourable senators, the universality issue is as important as the psychological and monetary values of the whole child benefit package. Many of the witnesses who came before the committee considered the intent of Bill C-70 to be clearly opposed to a statement made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Jake Epp, in his discussion paper, published in January 1985, regarding universality. He said:

The principle of universality is fundamental to our social security net. Its integrity must and will not be called into question.

And yet, many of the arguments presented point to the contrary. To some women's groups there is a fear, real or apparent, that in due course the universality of family allowance may be abolished. For example, the Confederation des Syndicats Nationaux fears that:

—even if a so-called universal program is not actually eliminated, its scope may be so much diminished that it becomes a mere hollow shell to all intents and purposes.

The real future value of child benefits is now unknown, since the level of benefits depends on the rate of inflation. With full indexation, families at least have information on the expected value and, hence, the purchasing power of the payments, which is a condition necessary for good management of their allowances. It is important to point out that if the family allowance is frozen at the current level indefinitely, more low-income Canadians will fall below the poverty line as they see their real incomes fall year after year. The plight of those families presently under the poverty line will be exacerbated.

Honourable senators, I am the first to recognize that the burdens of governing are awesome. The responsibility to bring expenditures in line with revenues is challenging and very tough. The checks and balances rest with the highest parliamentary authority in the land. However, those who aspire to that challenge and those who seek to have responsibility, once having received and accepted the mandate, have no greater responsibility than to try by every reasonable means to assist and protect those who are most in need. As I suggested earlier, people are beginning to ask, after an unhappy experience with respect to Bill C-26—the bill to de-index the Old Age Security payments—whether Bill C-70 is not another edge to the wedge.

In a land as big, as rich and as powerful as Canada, a land which prides itself on the best social programs in the world, I have to ask: Are we sending out new signals to Canadians that we really want smaller families? When considering this bill the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology was told by representatives of Family Service Canada that the choice of raising children in today's society is one which is made with a great deal of deliberation. In that same testimony, Trevor Williams, Executive Director, Family Service Canada, told of a discussion that day on the way to the Senate committee hearing with a woman taxi driver who suggested that if witnesses from Family Service Canada wanted to demonstrate to the Senate just how significant the problem was, senators should be taken down to the low income housing projects on the nineteenth of each month to see how many mothers are standing in lobbies waiting for their family allowance cheques. They wait in the lobbies because they desperately need the money. Those moneys are spent buying essential things for children.

Honourable senators, I have talked to many social workers and mothers around the country who suggest that many people may not think that the difference of 3 per cent is very much, but to the 712,000 families caring for one million children who are living at or below the poverty line, it means so much it is hard to imagine—nourishment, warmth, basic necessities. We need constant reminders that those of us in the comfortable pew have a responsibility to those less fortunate. We cannot afford to push poor people and their children further into ghettos. We must learn to share in greater measure and we must learn that real sharing goes beyond sharing something that we or others do not need.

The sacred word in this modern society is efficiency, and no matter what values we hold dear, they are too often sacrificed in the interests of a nation's gross national product or whatever yardstick is used to measure our relative prosperity. It is not so much a problem of efficiency and production as it is a problem of distribution. It is not a problem of the creation of the wealth, but a problem of the large minority of the poor.

As I said earlier, many people feel strongly that Bill C-70 is another edge of the wedge, another blow against those safety nets which were assembled in this country over a period of 50 years, safety nets that were assembled even at times when the leadership of our country cried for sacrifices to save freedom, with the promise that the new age and new system would help save us from a return to the hungry thirties and all that that meant.

I respect both Senator Tremblay and Senator Robertson for expressing a different view as to how best to proceed in this very critical matter. They support the government position. They are trying to achieve admirable objectives with a different approach. I agree with Senator Robertson that the time is long overdue for new approaches, but I do not see Bill C-70 as a proper step in that direction.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, this is my first opportunity to say a word of thanks to Senator Finlay MacDonald for the kind and gentle words he said about me in this chamber. As I rise to speak about this bill, I have a deep concern. I shall not go into any figures. There have been enough and it will take honourable senators a long time to digest them. Actually, they are rather impressive. The last thing Senator Graham said was the point with which I intended to finish my speech. We need a new beginning.

This debate is about universality. It involves the future of the social security net. I feel completely involved because we as a Liberal Party built that net.

● (1620)

In consequence, I oppose this bill, because the great Canadian dream does not provide for gift bags. As a boy, I remember I was rather impressed with a man named Samuel Gompers. The name may not register with you, but he was a great labour leader who organized the women and the immigrant workers in New York at the time. He was an honest man and a good man, but a hard man to bargain with, and I remember someone who had bargained with him for a long time telling me that they said to Mr. Gompers: "Sam, tell us, what do you want?" Mr. Gompers replied: "Sure, I want more and more, period." That was the way he carried on during the time that he was in charge, and he got more and more.

I protest whenever there is even the slightest attack made upon the social service network in this country, because it is essential to our social security for the future, as I will indicate as I go along. Even those who are in the lower income brackets who will have their loss made up by Child Tax Credit gains are affected. It is the beginning of the end for the baby bonus as a significant social instrument. The baby bonus was "mother's money" and those of you who would support this bill would do well to remember that there are a great many mothers in this country who will remember that they were deprived of that money. Month by month and year by year, its relative value and importance will fade.

For most of my adult life, I have done my best to advance the welfare and betterment of ordinary citizens. To be fair, I would say that our system is enlightened and non-discriminatory, but it could certainly be better. I am the first to admit that our system is far from perfect. We have worked to make it better, and we have succeeded. In my humble opinion, it is very good indeed. In the five years since the present system was established, I have risen two or three times to say that we need to change the system; that it is not working; that there are too many cracks in it and too much overlapping. It was hard for me to condemn it entirely. But I resist the effort to do away with the baby bonus. In fact, I will vote against it.

The security system that we have today in this country is not a sacred cow that must never be touched under any circumstances. But when we attempt to diminish it, either in substance or in principle, we must be careful to do it without doing damage to the whole structure as we see it.

Let me put forward a view that I am sure you have not heard around here for quite some time. I would like to discuss the system from three points of view: The system from 1900 to 1930; the system from 1930 to date, and what the future has in store. In those early days, we gave relief in accordance with the Poor Laws of Britain. By the standards of the day we were poor, but we were rich in values and home life. Many people were born poor; they lived poor and they died poor, but life was tranquil. We were proud of our community. My view of the first 30 years of this century is not comprehensive because I came along after that. The burden of relief was carried at that time by the churches. They continued giving relief and looking after the poor, as becomes good people, until almost 1930. At that time, like the rest of us, they ran out of money and they could not do much more. However, at that time they were joined by a voluntary group, 70 per cent of whom were women. This group has been the strongest link in our culture today. That tradition has become stronger and stronger throughout the years and has improved with the new immigrants who have come to this country.

It is a fact that at one stage we eliminated poverty. However, quite properly, we changed the definition of "poverty" as the GNP rose. We have given people financial security within our means but a revolution in expectations has forced us to aim much higher. At one time, I knew poverty when I saw it. The poor had shabby clothes; their shoes were worn out; they looked hungry and they hardly had a place to sleep. That kind of poverty does not exist today. Today we call it destitution, and I might say that there is not too much of that in this country.

Poverty today, therefore, is relative poverty. Today we compare the standards of the poor with the standards normally enjoyed within the general community. We call it poverty but, in actual fact, it is as high as the lower living standards in all countries except the United States and Sweden. We expect our people to have a pretty decent kind of living standard.

There will always be people who are poor relative to the average Canadian, and there will always be people who will advocate that they ought to enjoy a better standard of living. When the depression came, I was mayor of a municipality and, at that time, all mayors had a small fund for what they called "relief". Most of the time, if you got into difficulty you found a job for a man and, if you could not do that, you found a job for his son or for his daughter. In any event, there was always something one could do and there was help from almost every direction. I would remind honourable senators that we introduced the welfare system as an emergency measure. It was an emergency measure then; it is an emergency measure today and it is the best fireman we have. It is a revolving door; they go in and out. They may be on welfare for three months, off for six months, and back on it for four months. It has served us very well.

● (1630)

Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the costs were divided between the provinces and the Dominion. It seemed to be working very well, then suddenly this government changed the rules and decided to give a total grant. I said in this house that we should not accept that, but the provinces were anxious to get the money because they were using part of that money for purposes other than welfare. The result was that they were unable to increase the welfare allowances when they should have been increased.

We have 20 pieces of social legislation operating in Canada at the present time. Some of them are overlapping; some of them are contradictory; a great number of them should be eliminated. But they, within them, contain the material from which a social security system can be better built for tomorrow. We must remember this; our welfare system did not just happen, we built it from the beginning. We did not inherit one bit of it. The building was from two levels, the provincial and federal levels, and sometimes they overlapped, but in any event, the system that we were building was like Topsy, it just happened. It was pragmatic; we met this need, we met that need. They may have been related needs, they may not have been related needs, but over the years we built up a system that is serving this country well. All in all, it is as good a system as there is in the world today. Our Medicare certainly stands out as a diamond.

[Senator Croll.]

Well, how did we get to universality? We began with the Old Age Pension in 1927. The government passed it and it was subject to a means test, which we immediately said was a "mean" test, which it was. It was not given to just anyone over a certain age. It was not like education for children, police protection and postal services.

We were pretty cheap in increasing it. It was at $20 a month in 1927, and it was 100 per cent federal then. Then, in 1931, it was split—50 per cent federal and 50 per cent paid by the provinces. In 1943 it was $25. In 1944 it was again set at $25; in 1947 it was set at $30, and in 1949 it was set at $50. We were having a difficult time. The demand was fairly heavy because the old in this country were fairly poor.

The government finally decided that it had to do something and universality became a national issue. The government appointed a joint committee of Parliament which commenced sitting in March and finished in June. There were 52 sessions, 38 of which were open, 14 of which were closed. There were all sorts of opinions; there was no unanimity. The Department of Finance was against it and sent along a couple of witnesses. I will not tell you their names because there are still people around who will remember them.

But soon we began drifting, debating and scrapping among ourselves and we could not get anywhere. It was then decided to form a special committee consisting of Donald Fleming for the Conservatives, Stanley Knowles for the CCF and myself for the Liberals. We were asked to reach a conclusion. We argued, we pleaded amongst ourselves, we went on day and night, but we just could not reach a unanimous conclusion.

I was then told to approach Stanley Knowles to see if he would go along with a suggestion. The chairman of the committee, Jean Lesage, told us that the government would not impose universality by a vote, by numbers alone, that it had to have some allies.

After a discussion I made an offer and it was discussed. Stanley Knowles and I came up with an agreement. It was $5 we were to increase it by at that time. We brought that suggestion to the committee and each and every member of that committee was asked in alphabetical order to accept it, and it passed unanimously. That was an important matter because this embraced the notion of collective responsibility for the disadvantaged. We took a class of people and decided that they would be a special responsibility, and we followed that up with Medicare and family allowances. They are all in the same class.

But I cannot tell you how important this was to the rest of our system. I omitted to mention, honourable senators, that after the legislation was in place it was reported that thousands of older Canadians right across the country would not accept the money. It was finally suggested that the Prime Minister and his wife should accept this additional amount of money, and that was the end of the problem. Most of these people looked upon this as charity and would not accept it. When I lived in Toronto, I can remember an incident where my mother signed an application, but my father refused to do so. He said: "I have four boys in the family. I have educated you and you are all doing well. I am not going to let you put me on charity. Charity I give, but I do not accept." That was the spirit of the people.

● (1640)

I agree that unrevised public policy is likely to grow weak with age, unable to attack problems necessarily unforeseen when those policies were new and young. Progressive reform is essential under a stable democracy. We have accomplished much, but that was yesterday's work; there are still many disadvantaged in this country.

We never promised a millenium in one generation, but we promised we would continue to fight until we got what we thought was social justice.

Universality has had an effect on family allowances. It has had the effect of bringing people closer to the government. For some, this was the first cheque they had ever received from the government and they received it on time. Everyone was treated equally. The lady upstairs and the lady downstairs received the same cheque. The chauffeur and the bank president received the same cheque. This was a new concept which was very well accepted. The last attack made by this government on universality late last year is one that they wish they had never made.

What do I have in mind when I speak of tomorrow? Where are we going with our system? All of our provinces now have some programs in place. However, we are now facing the twenty-first century and we must be prepared to change. We have only one course to follow, and that is to introduce the guaranteed income. Some of you were here 15 years ago when we introduced our famous report on poverty in which we recommended the guaranteed income. That was the first time that concept was considered.

Donald Macdonald, who conducted one of the better studies that have been undertaken, made certain recommendations.

I am sure all of you in this chamber have heard about the Fraser Institute. It is considered to be a conservative institute. I do not know whether it is Conservative politically or not, but it certainly is in its economic views. When I attended the annual meeting of that institute, I had the privilege of sitting rather close to the table. When the chairman read the report and put the question, "All in favour?" he happened to hear me say that I was against the adoption. He then announced to the meeting that everyone was in favour of it except Senator Croll. In that institute's October issue, it recommends the guaranteed annual income and suggests it is the only possible way to deal with the problems of tomorrow. The think tanks around here have been recommending the guaranteed income except that they have called it "negative income tax." It sounds better at the boardroom table if it is referred to as "negative income tax" rather than as "guaranteed income."

When we first formulated these policies, we did not have any precedents upon which to base our decisions. However, now we must stop, think and consider what will be the ultimate solution to this problem. If it is decided that the guaranteed annual income offers a tremendous opportunity, we do not have to make it available to everyone on Monday morning. We now have experience behind us. The Senate undertook a study of old age pensions and brought in a report recommending that the age be reduced from 70 to 65, year by year. To the credit of the Leader of the Opposition who was the then minister, he accepted that recommendation and made it possible.

Perhaps we should implement the guaranteed annual income by stages with the elderly being the first in line. There are over 400,000 elderly women in this country who need some form of assistance. They are in real poverty. There are fewer men who find themselves in the same circumstances. Of course, there are those who are always in trouble.

Mr. Macdonald, in his report, had this important comment to make. He said:

We have some very screwed up welfare systems. We do some awful things to people.

For example, if a person who is head of a family of four chooses to work full time at minimum wage, he's considerably worse off than if he faked an injury and stayed on social assistance.

● (1650)

Then there's the single mother on mother's allowance who gets a job, even part-time, and then loses a dollar of her assistance for every dollar she earns.

There's a real penalty for people who make themselves work.

I believe that the guaranteed annual income is at the stage of being a closely held doctrine but is not yet, perhaps, a sacred trust.

Honourable senators, something else happened which bothered me a great deal. I thought that we went through a shameful performance when paying out money recently to the depositors of two Canadian regional banks. One depositor had $1 million in one bank and $1 million in another bank. Do honourable senators know how those million dollar deposits come about? No? You never had a million dollars? Well, I have not, either, but I know how it works. The man who has a million dollars calls a broker and says, "Joe, I've got a million dollars. Can you get me three points?" I do not have to tell honourable senators about points; you get them on the football game, that is how you get points. At any rate, Joe says, "I'll see." He calls back and says, "Yes, I can get you three points." The man with the million dollars asks, "Are they good?" The broker says, "A Canadian bank—could you do any better?" Then he deposits the million dollars. That man is a gambler, yet we voted to tax families which earn $14,900 in order to pay him out. That was a shocking performance and I was ashamed of myself.

This government gives out $11 billion in aid to business—billion, not million—$50 million goes to American Motors, $22 million goes to General Motors—poor old General Motors—and $20 million goes to Mitel, to name just a few. I should have thought that the government would be able to shave off a percentage point here or there without having to pay off the deficit with the money we are taking from these children.

Honourable senators, I have been following humanitarian affairs for 55 years municipally, provincially and federally, and I have been disappointed. When I was bounced into the Senate, I took advantage of the opportunity that is presented here. At this stage of my life, where my life expectation is five minutes or five seconds or whatever the good Lord gives me, I am convinced that we must continue to try to improve the lot of the unfortunate. What other imperative can mean so much to the nation's future? Honourable senators, a Liberal Party established our social security system after bitter resistance. It appears that the Liberal Party must return to its first principle in order to revitalize and improve the system to cope with changes in it. I repeat that I object to this bill because I dream of a better world for the disadvantaged. I am confidently hopeful that, in time, that will come about.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

Table 1

Generally speaking, the data in this table come from the legislation itself or from the budget papers.

Table 2

The data concerning the consumer price index come from Statistics Canada which publishes them on a regular basis.

The rates of family allowances according to the 1973 Act which appear in column (3) are the results of my own calculations where I applied the indices in column (2).

The actual rates in column (4) were provided by the research service of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

As to columns (5) and (6), they are also the result of my own calculations and of the application of the rule provided in Bill C-70.

Table 3

The data in Table 3 are projections resulting from the application of the full indexation rule, or from the moderate indexation rule, or from information contained in the budget papers tabled by the Minister of Finance. The comparisons between the old and new systems are based on a projected 4 per cent increase in the consumer price index every time the index had to be used.

Table 4

This table uses data already appearing in Table 3; it only includes family allowances and the tax credit, but in column (3) and column (6) it adds the difference between the old and the new systems, which gives column (7) where we find the net gain resulting from "losses" and "gains" under the new system for the two types of child benefits considered.

(1) Excludes Child Tax Exemption as it remains unchanged in 1986.

(2) and (3) Calculated on the rate of inflation of 4% as at October 31, 1985.

Note to the Table

In 1986 all families regardless of income will lose benefits. Because Child Tax Credit benefits are not received until April of the following tax year no benefits will accrue to families in 1986 under the proposed changes. For example in April 1986 those families eligible for the full refund from the Child Tax Credit will receive a proposed $384 per child.

60,000	1048	1051	921	841	764	1175	(411)

(1) Includes family allowances, child tax credit and child tax exemption. The credit appears in the year in which it is received.

(2) Assumes a rate of 4% indexation per year which is applied to the family allowance and the child tax credit. Does not adjust for reduced child tax exemption which will begin in the 1987 taxation year and will effect incomes in excess of $10,000 by reducing the amount of the combined benefit.

Note to the Table

With the exception of the families with incomes below $10,000 per year all families will be net losers as a result of the proposed changes. Although the changes were designed to benefit families with lower incomes the only beneficiary group (those with incomes of less than $10,000) will realize only a four year accumulated increase of $76 (or $19 per year). This is $9.50 per child per year.

Over $80,000	- 0.9	2
Total Reduction	$ - 49.5 M	100%

Average Family Income (1984) $35,853

(1) Estimates reproduced from the Canadian Council on Social Development.

Note to the Table

A common misperception about universal application of social programs is that well off families are the major beneficiaries of these programs. The Table clearly indicates that only a small portion of the savings to be realized by the de-indexation of Family Allowance will be recovered from those families with high incomes. Almost 66% of the savings will be realized at the expenses of families with incomes of less than $35,000 per year.

RULES OF THE SENATE

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND RULE 67(1)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, February 4, 1986, I will move:

That Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out paragraph (n) and substituting the following:

“(n) The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to agriculture and forestry generally, and the Canadian Wheat Board.”; and

That the following new paragraph be added immediately after paragraph (n):

“(n.1) The Senate Committee on Fisheries, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to fisheries generally.”.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, does the Deputy Leader of the Government have replies to the questions I asked a few days ago respecting the problems that will arise out of the severe decline in international oil prices? When I asked these questions of the Honourable Senator Roblin, he indicated that the government was monitoring the situation with a “watching brief,” that some consideration would be given to the matter by the government, and that an announcement would be made as to what the government intended to do to protect Canada’s interests, particularly as they concern a number of projects that would be significantly affected in this situation.

I hope the deputy leader can give us some answers today because we are told that the liquefied natural gas project on the northern coast of British Columbia to supply liquefied natural gas to some Asian markets, particularly Japan, for the next 20 years has now died. In the first instance, this project which was to have a capital cost of some $2.3 billion followed, of course, with several hundred millions of dollars of gas sales every year, now appears to be in jeopardy. I wonder if the deputy leader might give us some indication of what action the government intends to take to save this and a number of other projects such as Syncrude expansion and other enhanced oil projects in western Canada.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that Senator Olson’s questions have been brought to the attention of the government by Senator Roblin, and I will try to chase down answers for him.

The concern of government is obviously a great one, but there is nothing unusual about the fact that some of these projects may be delayed. I remember when the honourable gentleman who is asking the questions was responsible for the mega-projects in Canada, and came into this chamber with an absolutely inspirational list of programs that were to take place almost immediately. I remember listening with great enthusiasm to news of the Lower Churchill development, which was to be Newfoundland’s part of the program. Oil prices, certainly at that time, may or may not have affected the Lower Churchill development, I do not know, but in any event the project was never developed. The same applies to the liquid natural gas operation in British Columbia. The honourable gentleman suggests that that has now died. It would seem to me that, in fact, it has been moving along very slowly and, if not dying, is at the moment in an advanced state of illness and has been that way for some time. I think it was in 1980 that that project first raised its head in this place, and presumably also in the corporate world. However, there never appeared to be any great progress towards the implementation of that program, desirable though it certainly is. It seems to me that the latest information I had was that the Japanese, who are the potential customers for that gas, were looking for a price on the gas that would be tied to the world oil price, giving them the best of both worlds, and I can well understand the reluctance of private industry to enter into such an agreement.

In any event, I would be only too happy to attempt to chase down a more concrete answer for the honourable gentleman, and I will do it as quickly as I can.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. I would like to compliment the Deputy Leader of the Government on his ability to drag red herrings across the route as we talk about this matter. The people out there would like to know what the government intends to do, if anything. If the government does not intend to do anything except, as Senator Roblin has said, watch the situation, then at least they should say that. However, I was told that the government was looking seriously at the situation and contemplating some action in the interests of the economy of western Canada. If that is not so, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would say so; if not, could we get some answers? I would remind the deputy leader that we do not need answers three or six months later. The action that is taking place is occurring now, and there are very important projects that are in jeopardy as a result of inaction by this government. I hope that the acting leader would like to give us an indication that he intends to give some replies.

Senator Doody: I think that the honourable gentleman knows as well as I do that the government is certainly interested in these programs and projects and is certainly watching the situation. Senator Roblin has already given that assurance and I think that the honourable gentleman should believe that that would happen.

With respect to something more concrete or something more definite, I will certainly try my best to get it for the honourable gentleman. As for a red herring, far be it from me to drag a red herring into this place or into any other place.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if we could perhaps have a little more specific timing as to when we can expect an answer. I heard the same reply last week, I heard it a month ago and I heard it six or eight months ago on such things as drought relief and certain other matters that we raised at the time. However, this is now a very serious matter for what we think is an important sector of the economy, and perhaps the honourable leader would like to give a little more specific answer so that we can have some assurance that this government is indeed taking the problems and the situation generally seriously.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am absolutely revelling in the implied compliment in the suggestion of Senator Olson that I, on the second day of my acting leadership, can get from the government a definitive answer that members of the government were unable to provide during the eons and eras that the honourable gentleman has implied have passed since the question was first asked. I thank him very much for his generous compliment and can only tell him it will happen "soon."

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, it is, of course, clear that both the acting leader and the Leader of the Government in the Senate last week gave an undertaking in response to a request that I made that they should be prepared to give information this week.

● (1410)

Senator Doody: I think I missed part of the substance of the question. Did the honourable senator say the leader and the acting leader both gave an undertaking that they would provide that information this week? I will have to look that up and ask my friend the ventriloquist; I don't remember mouth-ing those words at all.

Senator Olson: I remember his head nodding in the affirmative.

Senator Doody: That may have been ennui or fatigue; it certainly was not acquiescence.

Senator Phillips: Whose head was nodding?

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the statement attributed to the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) that individual Japanese-Canadians whose properties were confiscated during World War II will not be compensated financially is the government's policy.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I believe I read the same newspaper article the honourable senator has read. I will try to find out if, indeed, the comment was made by the minister. If it was made by the minister, I assume it must be government policy. But, in any event, I will try to find out if the attributed statement is accurate.

Senator Haidasz: Would the acting leader also find out whether the two months' time limit imposed by the minister for the National Association of Japanese-Canadians to make up their minds about this matter is also government policy?

Senator Doody: I will do that.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate a question arising out of a debate which took place in the Senate yesterday. Can the deputy leader give honourable senators the assurance that the views expressed in the debate yesterday on the sugar-beet industry have been conveyed to members of the cabinet so that they will have those views before them when they meet tomorrow?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That has been done. The arguments made here yesterday will, no doubt, reinforce the arguments that have already been made. I can assure the honourable senator that these representations have been passed on to the minister.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. We raised this matter last week. Senator Fairbairn and I specifically asked when an announcement was going to be made respecting a sugar policy so that the farmers and the processors would know in time to make arrangements to seed a crop for 1986.

The acting leader will recall that no crops were seeded last year primarily because there was no announcement made in time by the government, notwithstanding the fact that since

May 25 of last year the government promised that there would be a policy that the producers and processors could rely on.

We are running out of time, so would the acting leader assume the air of urgency that is inherent in this, because if the producers do not know within the next few days, they will not be able to make arrangements to seed a crop this year?

Senator Doody: I can assure the honourable gentleman that the urgency has been conveyed by various people other than the honourable gentleman. I congratulate him on getting his comments in on yesterday's debate. I appreciate the fact that he was not present yesterday, but I will make absolutely certain that the comments he has made today will be included in the text the minister will study.

I thank him once again for reminding us of the urgency. I will do everything I can to help impress or reinforce the urgency of the situation on the authorities concerned. I can assure the honourable gentleman that they are aware and that they are working on it, but I have nothing further to add at this time.

Senator Frith: "Senator Doody for leader!"

STATUS OF WOMEN

ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—RESTRICTION OF SPOUSES' ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: The Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate may recall that last year we had a discussion in this chamber about the apparent violation of the rights of the spouses of military personnel raised by the Organization of Spouses of Military Members. We are reading again these days that the same group feels itself to be in jeopardy, yet we still have had no responses from the government concerning the rights of those military spouses, or their activities. I wonder if he could tell us when we will be hearing the responses of the government to those concerns.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly make an inquiry to find out what has happened to the answers if, indeed, they have been prepared. I have not seen them, but I will certainly look into the matter and try to get the information as quickly as I can.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PRODUCT INSPECTION STANDARDS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not know why, but I am tempted to try my luck with Senator Doody. There is something in him that inspires confidence.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Corbin: We are both from eastern Canada and have a fundamental understanding of the concerns of the people and of the problems in the area. Therefore, I will reiterate a question I put a number of times, without much success or progress being made, to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

[Senator Olson.]

Is Senator Doody in a position today to inform me if decisions have been reached or if, indeed, some significant progress has been made in dealing with the matter of a policy for the inspection of fish and the quality of fish put on the market as a result of the St. Andrew's tuna incidents of last year?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I certainly want to thank Senator Corbin for his remarks at the beginning of his question. I think it was the red herring that was raised earlier that inspired his confidence in me. He knew that fish was part of the topic.

Honourable senators, I do have some information on that matter. It is presently being typed up in my office. I should have something to lay before the Senate tomorrow. Whether it will be big enough, long enough and wide enough to suit the honourable gentleman, we will find out tomorrow. I will have something for him then.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—REFERRED BACK TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the third reading of the Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census".—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I hinted yesterday, inquiries have disclosed that some witnesses from the Atlantic provinces, who did not do so previously, would now like to make submissions to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I hold no brief for them one way or the other as to why they did not want to appear earlier, although I would point out that a lead story appeared in a Halifax newspaper either yesterday or the day before to the effect that this bill is unfair to the Atlantic provinces or, at least, to some of them. That may have triggered the interest of these two witnesses, one of whom phoned the committee clerk and the other who sent a telex.

The evidence the committee heard from Mr. Hamel was to the effect that he was thinking in terms of the end of this month as a time that would enable him to set in motion the many procedures that have to take place, and that a delay of week or two to hear these two witnesses would not seem to be out of order. In fact, their interest and their own request to attend, it seems to me, would make it reasonable for us and certainly desirable for us to have this bill returned to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs so that it may hear any other witnesses and any other representations and report back before we deal with this bill at third and final reading.

Honourable senators will remember that there is, in our view, a real responsibility on the Senate on this particular point. It was clear from the evidence that was heard immediately after second reading that the House of Commons passed this bill, as we know, under circumstances of closure. The justification for this bill given by Mr. Hnatyshyn and by those who supported it in the House of Commons was that it was based on sound principles of representation by population. We have to remember that at the time of Confederation it was the very principle of representation by population that led to the establishment and formation of the Senate, and that the Senate was brought into existence to try to represent regional interests that were not based purely upon population. Honourable senators will remember that at the time of Confederation the Atlantic provinces would probably not have gone along with Confederation if it were not for the existence of the Senate and its structure as an institution that was not formed solely on the basis of representation by population.

● (1420)

For those reasons, therefore, I believe that the committee should hear these representations and any others that would seem to be appropriate. The committee will make the decision in that regard. I ask the Senate to agree to sending this bill back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for that purpose and for its report before giving it third reading. I have not had a written motion prepared, and I apologize for this but I was otherwise engaged. I will, however, see that such a motion is prepared if honourable senators cannot agree to what I have suggested.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I suppose that it will come as no surprise to honourable senators to learn that I am not at all enthused at the prospect of sending this bill back to committee. It has been reported without amendment. That it should now proceed to third reading is the accepted procedure, at least it has been since I have been here. The history of this piece of legislation would indicate that there was ample time for all of those interested in making representations to do so. At this point, to create such a precedent—quite apart from the consideration of this particular bill—would seem to me to be dangerous.

Bill C-74 was introduced in the House of Commons in September of last year. Prior to that time, however, on June 11, a white paper had been circulated by the minister. Surely, if these ladies or gentlemen from the Atlantic provinces wished to make representations, they had ample time in which to do so. The bill was given first reading in the House of Commons on September 16. It received second reading in October. It was studied in committee from October 10 to October 20 and was in the report stage in the House from November 26 to December 6. It received third reading on December 6, after which it came to the Senate.

In this chamber it was debated as usual, after which it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and was studied during two meetings. I attended both of those meetings, as did other honourable senators, and at no time was there any inclination, in my judgment, to push the thing through, to cut off debate or to deny the right to call witnesses. As a matter of fact, at the end of the second meeting Senator Nurgitz asked quite clearly whether there were any further witnesses to be called or whether honourable senators wanted to look further into the particular matter. As I recall it, nobody raised any question or objections at that point, so the bill was duly reported to the house by the chairman of the committee and was accepted by the house.

We now learn that there is a motion that the bill be sent back to committee. If it is the will of the Senate to do so, obviously that is what is going to happen and we would not interfere with that. I do not think that a motion to that effect is necessary at this point. If honourable senators want the bill to go back to committee so as to invite these two ladies or gentlemen from the Atlantic provinces to make their representations, then that is obviously what is going to happen. I wonder, though, whether there will ever come a time when we can put a cap on this sort of thing. There surely must be a time frame in which we have to operate. We simply cannot let these things go on forever. If two people somewhere in the country express an intention or desire to appear before a committee, will we automatically reopen the proceedings? That seems to me to be a bit wrong.

Having said that, I will certainly accept the will of the Senate, and ask for the co-operation of honourable senators in dealing with it as expeditiously as possible. As Senator Frith has said, we have been told by Mr. Hamel, the official responsible for the implementation and administration of the act, that "the end of this month"—I believe those were the words he used—would give him a time frame in which he could get all of the various stages—it is a complicated procedure—in place before the next election.

Senator MacEachen: It seems unlikely.

Senator Doody: It seems unlikely—that's right. Obviously he has a crystal ball.

Senator Frith: You tell us that date, and we might be able to tell you the other one.

Senator Doody: That's even more complimentary than Senator Olson's comment. With that in mind, I would seriously ask honourable senators to try to deal with the bill as quickly as possible, and return it to the chamber in order that we can deal with it. I well appreciate the interest and I know that honourable senators are sincerely concerned. However, I would ask the committee, and other senators who are interested, to try to get the bill back to us as quickly as possible.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, that this bill be read the third time now.

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C., that this bill be not now read the third time but that it be referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further consideration.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to and bill referred back to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—
(Honourable Senator Bonnell.)

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on second reading of Bill C-70—although, from the hand that I received from the Deputy Leader of the Government, he may have thought that I was going to propose that he become the new Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Doody: I thought you were supporting the bill.

Senator Bonnell: Sometimes I think that he would do a much better job than the present leader. I would like to see him at least placed in the cabinet so that he could get those government answers out to us quickly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me first say that it is very difficult for a young senator like myself—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Doody: You mean mentally.

Senator Bonnell:—mentally, physically and actively, to follow such a distinguished senator as Senator Croll, who knows the history of the social sciences and social welfare of this country and who yesterday gave us such an excellent historical background to this subject. I sometimes wish that I were old enough to have been there with him, as he sat with those distinguished gentlemen of the past, persuading them to place this social legislation on the order papers of the various federal Parliaments. Then, in the next moment, I was wishing that I was young enough to be cut off from the Family Allowance and to be de-indexed, so that I would be able to look to the future and perhaps travel to the moon in a much safer space capsule than the Challenger that met such a tragic end yesterday.

I should like to congratulate Senator Croll on his remarks. As in years gone by, he walked again with the workers rather than drive in a big car.

An Hon. Senator: General Motors.

Senator Bonnell: General Motors, yes.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

An Hon. Senator: And Ford.

Senator Bonnell: And Ford, yes. Again he stood up for those people in need, for the poor, and showed that he was on the left wing of the Liberal Party, and a true Canadian Liberal.

It is also difficult for me to follow such a distinguished senator as our past President, Senator Graham, who gave such a distinguished speech in connection with this bill and covered most of the things that I myself would like to have said. Far be it from me to repeat what Senator Graham has said. It is all there in the Debates of the Senate. I want to congratulate Senator Graham for an excellent speech on behalf of the people in need in this country. I also want to congratulate Senator Tremblay on his very informative remarks in explanation of the bill. I thought it was apropos that he was given a second chance to backtrack and to change his mind and change the figures. Perhaps it is because of that fact that I decided that I should say a few words in an attempt to change the mind of the Government of Canada—change the mind of the Minister of Finance, and change the mind of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

• (1430)

A very short time ago the Government of Canada prepared a book called, "Child and Elderly Benefits Consultation Paper." It is dated January 1985. In this consultation paper the Government of Canada gave us an indication of some options that it thought it had with respect to family allowances. It also gave us some options on what it thought it might do for the senior citizens of this country. Let me quote from that consultation paper put out by the government. The government proposed what it would do. It said this:

—the government has come to a number of conclusions bearing upon, and limiting to some degree, the range of choice available.

It goes on to list those conclusions. So, whatever happened as far as changes to the social programs of this country were concerned, these conclusions were not to be tampered with. According to the Prime Minister these conclusions of the Government of Canada, which were basic regardless of what other changes may take place, were sacred trusts. The first one is, "The foundation of both these systems"—that is the Family Allowance benefits and benefits to senior citizens—"is their universal base payments." That is the very first one—universality. The sixth one is:

Changes in these programs which may result from this review should improve benefits of those most in need.

The seventh one is:

Any net savings which may then remain, whether resulting from reductions in expenditure or additional revenues, should be applied to other priority concerns in the social affairs envelope. No such savings should be transferred to deficit reduction.

Honourable senators with that type of "sacred trust," with that type of definite government policy given to us in January 1985, with these conclusions that must not be touched, we now find ourselves with this legislation before us. That is why I thought that I as one who believes in giving a new government with a large mandate an opportunity to do its thing should stand in my place and tell the people of Canada that this is the type of government they have today, a government that makes these types of commitments on paper in January 1985 and then, in January 1986, does completely the opposite.

Senator Frith: And makes the changes in advance. Treachery—sheer treachery—

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the thing we have to think about—

Senator Frith: —to put it euphemistically.

Senator Marshall: Don't you talk about changing minds.

Senator Bonnell: —is, can the government of this country be trusted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Bonnell: Can the Prime Minister of this country be trusted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

Senator Bonnell: Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare of this country be trusted?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Bonnell: Can the Minister of Finance of this country be trusted?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: Let the record show that the "Nos" got louder each time.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I believe the records will show that the people of this country will look at the trustworthiness, the integrity, the leadership, the word of the leadership, and the dependability of that leadership and that these matters will become an issue in 1988, 1989 or whenever we go back to the people of Canada.

Senator Haidasz: Out they go!

Senator Bonnell: The other thing that brought me to my feet is the fact that we are here today debating Bill C-70 when there is no real need to be here at all, because Bill C-70 has now taken effect. The Government of Canada took upon itself to de-index the Family Allowance without the approval of Parliament. Way back on June 15 in 1216 at Runnymede on the Thames in the time of King John when the Magna Carta was signed, we fought for the right of Parliament to be supreme and for this sort of thing not to happen, and we won. Yet, in 1986 this government takes 93 cents each month from each child receiving the Family Allowance in this country, without the approval of Parliament.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: The least it could have done was to hear the voice of Parliament and wait for the consent of both houses and for Royal Assent before carrying out its fateful deed.

Senator Haidasz: That is the proper way.

Senator Bonnell: It is with that in mind that I thought last December, as we were listening to the testimony of witnesses during the pre-study, that we should rush the hearings on this legislation and get our report in, so that when the bill came before this chamber we could pass it so that the government could carry out its will or the will of Parliament. I did not want to be the only one in all of Parliament obstructing this legislation. I have since found out that all that effort did not mean a thing. We could have listened to all the people who wanted to be heard. We could have given them that opportunity because the government would overrule Parliament and cut and de-index the Family Allowance to take the 93 cents a month away from the children of this country under the program.

• (1440)

Honourable senators, I have not been on my feet very often during this Parliament because I felt that the people of Canada had spoken on September 4, 1984. They wanted a change in direction; they wanted a change in government and they wanted a change in leadership. They certainly got a change. However, every time this government makes a mistake or they want to do something that was, perhaps, bad in the past, they say, "The Liberals did it." Honourable senators, I do not care whether the Liberals did it or the NDP did it or who did it. If it is wrong, it is wrong and the people want a change and they want it done right. It is an excuse to say that the Liberals did something, whether it was the six-and-five program or something else. That is immaterial. Perhaps the Liberals made mistakes. I would be the last one to say that the Liberals did everything right. I certainly did not agree with everything they did, but they did a lot better job than is being done today, and whatever the Liberals said, they stuck by it and you could trust them.

Honourable senators, today the trust has gone. You cannot trust the leadership of this country today. One day certain things are said, and if someone comes along and says, "Good-bye, Charlie Brown," then tomorrow it is something else. There is no trust. There is no real direction; there is no real leadership. On one day they say that whatever funds exist in the social security package they will put back into the social security package. Yet, when I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare in committee: "What do you intend to do with the billion dollars that you are saving on the backs of the children between now and 1990?", he replied: "We are going to help to pay off the debt." Honourable senators, that is just the opposite of what they said in the blue book; just the opposite of what they told us in black and white was a sacred trust in January of 1985.

Honourable senators, I do not know where I should start or where I should end on debate of this bill but, without going into detail, my friend has given us a table which we can all read, and we can see quite clearly how the children are losing. Senator Tremblay has given us some figures which illustrate the changes that have been made, and let me tell you there is approximately $1 billion which will be saved by this program between now and 1990; saved on the backs of the children of this country. There are 1,200,000 children in this country who are in need; they are living in poverty. These same children cannot, as did the senior citizens, demonstrate on Parliament Hill; they are too young. These same children cannot speak in Parliament as I am doing because they have not reached that stage in their development. They cannot speak for themselves; they need someone to speak for them. These same children cannot go out and vote against the government because they are not old enough. These children that we are now taking advantage of have no one to work on their behalf or to fight for them unless there are people such as we who are here in this upper chamber, giving the legislation sober second thought. Half of the members of this chamber were probably born with a silver spoon in their mouths. People like that do not really understand poverty. They really do not know what it is like to be poor or what it is like to look forward to that Family Allowance cheque every month.

There are mothers in this country who wait for the 20th day of each month in order to get that Family Allowance cheque, and now it is about to be de-indexed. Those mothers wait to receive that cheque in order to buy bread or milk or shoes. They wait for that cheque to take their child to the skating rink or to pay dues for their child in order that he might become a member of an organization such as the Boy Scouts. Many mothers look to that money to help pay their food bill. By the 20th of the month, many of them have run out of money and have nothing left with which to buy food.

In the meantime, we sit here saying to ourselves, "It cannot be that bad." Let me tell you, it is that bad. In fact, it is worse than that. Many of these mothers have no husbands and head single-parent families. Many of them cannot go out to work because they have children to look after at home. If they do go out to work, they must pay babysitters, and all of them are living in poverty. A good 40 per cent of these children, as I said, are members of families with only one parent and the Family Allowance cheque is very important to them.

Honourable senators, let me tell you that the Family Allowance cheque comes on a certain day each month and the mothers know that. They get to their mailboxes and pick up their cheques because the cheque is in the mother's name. Some families have husbands and fathers who are alcoholics and who abuse the family funds, but the mother knows that the Family Allowance cheque comes on that date. That cheque, which is in her name, will pay for groceries or shoes or whatever.

We have been told that these people will receive more money through the Child Tax Credit. Honourable senators, I say to you that the Child Tax Credit comes a year later. By that time, these children could be dead of starvation because they have had to wait a whole year. Also, no one knows what date that Child Tax Credit cheque might come, and there is no guarantee that the mother will get that money. The husband might take it for himself.

Senator Frith: Most of them don't pay taxes, in any event.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: If they do not pay taxes, they still get the cheque, providing they fill out an income tax form. Honourable senators, I wonder if you have ever realized how complicated that income tax form has become. There are very few people who can figure it out. I would venture to say that amongst the highly-paid people in the Senate and the great scholars in the Senate, I am sure that very few of you can do your own income tax because you have a difficult time understanding the form. You probably get an accountant or someone else to do it for you.

Senator Haidasz: Yes, and pay $300 to have it done.

Senator Bonnell: Yet you expect this poor, single-parent mother to fill out her income tax form in order to obtain her Child Tax Credit. Let me tell you that a good 20 per cent of the Inuit and Indians in this country never fill out an income tax form because they do not understand it. Therefore, they never get the Child Tax Credit. Let me tell you that a good 10 or 15 per cent of the mothers in this country never get the Child Tax Credit because they do not know how to fill out the form. Many of them do not even know about the Child Tax Credit. Let me go a little further and say to you that even those who do know about the Child Tax Credit cannot fill out the form and many of them go to one of those agencies to have it filled out for them, and are charged 25 per cent of the gross. Others need the money so quickly, they cannot wait for the rebate so they go to one of these dealers, who also takes a percentage, and they end up with approximately 80 per cent of what is coming to them.

• (1450)

But the Family Allowance cheque comes, regardless, on the 20th day of every month, and the mothers and children of this country want that cheque. They want it indexed, and they need it. They were promised that they would get it and they were promised that it would be universal.

Let me talk about universality. Universality means that everyone receives the benefit. If Family Allowances are not pegged to the cost of living, those cheques will be worth little or nothing in a few years. I say that because the cost of living is going to go up. This is the first step in the destruction of universality, and the first step in the destruction of the Family Allowance system in this country. We should look after our children and ensure that they get proper nutrition so that when they grow up they will be productive citizens.

It would be bad enough, honourable senators, if it were only the Family Allowance payments that were being cut, but the government is also cutting back on transfer payments. We can say: "Great, the federal government is cutting back but the province will give us more." The province cannot give more because the transfer payments to the provinces are being cut by the federal government. The federal government is cutting back on health care payments to the provinces, on educational grants to the provinces, and on the welfare grants to the provinces. So, the provinces are in a squeeze themselves and cannot help these poor mothers and children who are living below the poverty line.

At the same time that these cuts are being made, the Government of Canada is increasing the costs of all other things these people need. For example, it has put an 11 per cent tax on a chocolate bar. The poor kid who has had his Family Allowance payments de-indexed, has had his Medicare services cut in half, has had his educational opportunities reduced, is now paying an 11 per cent tax on chocolate bars. Even medical supplies are being taxed, as are drugs. Products are now being taxed that were never taxed before. Everything is being increased to 11 per cent from 10 per cent. So, the cost of living will go up. While all this is happening, we are being told that we should have trust in this government.

The only opportunity these kids have for a little recreation is to go out to one of Canada's national parks, to a place where they can enjoy the nature trails, the birds, the bees, the beaches, and learn something about natural history. But what did this government do? It doubled the entrance fees to our national parks. The poor little kids cannot go to those parks without being taxed by the government.

To further hinder their opportunities to visit our national parks, the government has increased taxes on gasoline. Gasoline has gone up by approximately 20 cents a gallon since September 4.

So, here we are, honourable senators, trying to balance the budget of this country on the backs of our children—

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: —on the backs of our one-parent families, on the backs of those who are in need and who live in poverty, on the backs of those who least can afford to give. For what? To give others a raise in salary just last week well above that which is needed, with others receiving a thousand dollars a day in salary, with others getting their bank investments paid off to the tune of millions of dollars, and others receiving big tax rebates. This government is taking 93 cents a month from the 1.2 million children who are living in poverty so that the rich can be richer.

All this has been done without the approval of Parliament; all this has been done without our consent, without our consultation, without even the consent of the members of the House of Commons, the elected representatives of this country.

If we slow down passage of this bill we will hear, "Those appointed senators are slowing down the legislation." Well, the appointed senators are not slowing anything down. It is time that we, as senators, referred this bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to give the mothers of this country an opportunity to be heard, to give the ministers of social services from the provinces of this country an opportunity to come forward and tell us how much this is going to hurt them, because the extra burden will be on their taxes. Let the municipalities of the country come forward and tell us how much it will hurt them, and let us take as much time as required, because we will not be hurting anyone since the government has already made the adjustment. There is no rush now. We have the opportunity and the time; it is our duty as senators to give sober second thought to this legislation and to hear the concerns of the people of this country.

So, honourable senators, I suggest that we refer this bill to the appropriate committee and not go any further without giving those affected an opportunity to at least be heard, even if we cannot change things.

I thank honourable senators for their attention.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-76, respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners.

He said: Honourable senators, Toronto Island Airport serves a large general aviation community and a limited number of commercial air services, one of which uses Toronto-built Dash 7 and Dash 8 aircraft. In following this bill through the other place I was surprised to learn, as many senators already know, that Toronto Island Airport is the ninth busiest airport in Canada. It is strategically located on land owned by the City of Toronto, the Toronto Harbour Commissioners and the federal government.

Until June of 1983 the airport was operated by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners on behalf of the City of Toronto. The lease between those two parties expired at that time—June of 1983—and in the absence of a new operating agreement, the possibility existed that the airport could have been closed.

With this in mind, and in recognition of the vital role of Toronto Island Airport in the Toronto area aviation system, the federal government of that day entered into a 50-year lease agreement—in June, 1983—with the City of Toronto and the Toronto Harbour Commissioners to ensure that the airport would continue as an important airport in the Toronto area for general aviation and limited commercial air services.

Negotiations leading up to the signing of the long-term lease were protracted, due in part to the environmental concerns raised by representatives of the City of Toronto. Through the good faith of all parties, a lease was finally negotiated that ensured the ongoing operations of the island airport while, at the same time, establishing certain conditions to meet the environmental concerns.

● (1500)

Bill C-76 should be viewed within the context of the terms and conditions of the lease agreement signed by the three parties in June of 1983. Primarily, this bill is designed to enable the Toronto Harbour Commission to implement its obligations for the operations of the airport contained in the lease agreement. Specifically, the City of Toronto insisted that certain conditions be included in the lease to prohibit, for instance, jet aircraft or aircraft generating excessive noise as a prerequisite to the City entering into the agreement.

A former Minister of Transport, on behalf of the federal government, agreed to Parliament's amendments to the Toronto Harbour Commissioners' Act to give effect to these conditions. Such amendments do, among other things, provide the statutory authority to allow the Toronto Harbour Commissioners to make by-laws to prohibit jet-powered aircraft, et cetera.

The federal government has also invested capital over the last few years and has planned further expenditures to upgrade the airport for general purposes. These expenditures were recognized by all parties as necessary to address problems of deterioration.

The start-up for construction has been noted in recent press reports. It should be noted that a majority of these projects is directly related to safety; for instance, a $3 million expenditure for a new control tower.

I should like to stress that these expenditures have been and will continue to be carried out within the terms of the lease agreement.

Bill C-76 also includes an additional amendment at the request of the City concerning the appointment of commissioners by the City to the Toronto Harbour Commission. The amendment will allow for members to be appointed by the majority of the city council without nomination by the executive committee. This will bring the City's commissioner appointment process into line with City appointments for other agencies and commissions.

In conclusion, honourable senators, in recommending Bill C-76 for your approval, I point out that the federal government is fulfilling its obligations under the lease agreement for the Toronto Island Airport. The amendments are fundamental to the proper execution of specific terms and conditions of the lease. They have the full support of the City of Toronto and the Toronto Harbour Commissioners. I commend Bill C-76 for your approval.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Stollery, debate adjourned.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): moved the second reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving second reading of Bill C-82, to amend the statute law relating to the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax, I would like to outline the measures involved in this legislation and to comment briefly on the major clauses in the order in which they appear.

The bill before us amends the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act to implement the fiscal measures announced in the Western Accord signed on March 28, 1985, and the budget of May 23 with respect to the PGRT. It contains four significant changes to the PGRT. The amendments will:

1. phase out the PGRT by December 31, 1988;
 2. provide for offsetting the tax by unused exploration and development income tax deductions;
 3. allow for elimination of the PGRT on new production or major new oil and gas projects; and
 4. reduce paper burden and accounting costs for thousands of individual Canadians receiving oil and gas revenues by allowing a $10,000 revenue deduction.
- Finally, the bill will eliminate the incremental oil revenue tax.

The most important change in this bill is the complete phase-out of the PGRT on all production of oil and gas by the end of 1989. The bill provides for the following statutory rates to be applied to conventional oil and gas production from the present level of 16 per cent: in 1986, 13.33 per cent; in 1987, 10.67 per cent; in 1988, 8 per cent; and in 1989, nil.

A separate statutory rate phase-out schedule is provided for synthetic production, in recognition of the higher costs and risks associated with this type of production. The rate for 1986 will be 12 per cent; for 1987, 8 per cent; for 1988, 4 per cent; and for 1989, nil.

The PGRT regulations will continue to allow a resource allowance of 25 per cent for conventional oil and gas and 50 per cent for synthetic oil. These resource allowances reduce the statutory rates to give effective rates over the next three years of 10 per cent, 8 per cent and 6 per cent for conventional oil and gas, and of 6 per cent, 4 per cent and 2 per cent for synthetic oil.

Honourable senators, in order to stimulate activity immediately, the bill allows for a full PGRT exemption to be available for new wells that are drilled after March 31, 1985. In addition, enhanced oil recovery projects, including water floods, are provided with new incentives that will result in a more favourable treatment during the remaining years of the PGRT. These projects will be able to choose to exempt their incremental production from the PGRT after March 31, 1985. Major new energy projects will also be able to apply for PGRT relief.

This bill introduces an important new feature which will allow corporations to make use of their unused income tax deductions stemming from new Canadian exploration and development expenses, against PGRT liabilities. This feature will be effective in 1985 and will allow for 30 per cent of the value of new unused exploration and development deductions to be applied as a credit against the PGRT. As a result of this new feature, consequential changes to the Income Tax Act are included in the bill. These consequential changes include a new tax under Part IX of the Income Tax Act which will recapture this PGRT credit when the exploration and development expenses are eventually used in the computation of Part I income tax. This ensures that a double deduction against both the PGRT and income tax will not be possible.

Another amendment in the bill introduces a new measure of importance to many Canadians. This measure will remove the burden of the tax for several thousand Canadians who have small amounts of royalty income from oil and gas wells by introducing a $10,000 annual deduction for individuals, starting with the 1986 taxation year.

Finally, honourable senators, Bill C-82 eliminates the incremental oil revenue tax by repealing this tax on production after 1984.

Honourable senators, having reviewed the basic measures included in this bill, I will briefly outline the major clauses.

Clause 1 introduces definitions for new production and synthetic oil production needed respectively for the implementation of the PGRT exemption for new production and for computing tax payable for synthetic production. Clause 1 also repeals definitions with respect to the incremental oil revenue tax.

Clause 2 is a principal amendment which repeals the incremental oil revenue tax for production after 1984.

Clause 3 introduces four amendments: first, to allow for royalties, currently taxed under Division II of the act, to be taxed, effective 1986, under Division I of the act; second, to exempt individuals from PGRT on up to $10,000 of production and royalty income; third, to implement the exemption for new production; and fourth, a technical change to allow a deduction in respect of undelivered petroleum or gas. This last amendment permits an intended deduction which was previously denied due to a technicality.

Clause 4 is a principal amendment which introduces the exemption for new production.

Clause 6 introduces the rate structure to implement the PGRT phase-out on Division I income.

● (1510)

Clause 7 introduces the PGRT offset credit. In other words, 30 per cent of designated unused Canadian exploration and development income tax deductions can be applied as a credit against the PGRT payable.

Clause 13 discontinues the taxation of production and resource royalties under Division II of the act for Canadian residents. Such royalties will now be taxed under Division I. This clause also provides the rate structure to phase down the PGRT with respect to royalties.

Clause 16 introduces amendments to the Income Tax Act to implement the PGRT offset mechanism. Clause 19 allows taxpayers, when calculating their income tax, to deduct amounts previously designated for PGRT offset purposes. However, when such a deduction is made, a special tax at the rate of 30 per cent is imposed under clause 24 to recapture the credit previously allowed under the PGRT offset mechanism.

Honourable senators, Bill C-82 contains 26 clauses. I have described only the main or principal clauses, although those remaining contain consequential amendments. The subject matter of this bill was examined by means of a pre-study in committee. I therefore commend the bill to honourable senators for second reading.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wish to commend Senator Doody for his presentation of Bill C-82, to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. From listening to him, I felt that his presentation was in strange contrast to the debate on the Family Allowance bill, which is also under consideration by this house. Bill C-82 provides assistance in the approximate amount of $4 billion to an industry which, in this country, is dominated by the multinationals. It would seem that we have to take money from the children living in poverty in order to pay for legislation such as this.

In any event, I commend him for his presentation, which outlined the basic measures and technical provisions of the bill. With those comments, I would adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of Wednesday, January 22, 1986, moved:

That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after rule 77(7), the following:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Does this motion apply to witnesses appearing before the committees?

Senator Frith: Yes, it does.

Honourable senators, my comments on this motion will fall under three headings: First, the framework and the spirit of the motion; second, the reason why I am making this motion and my comments in support of it, which will fall under two subheadings, the question of health and the question of simple discomfort; and third, a brief reference to one precedent on the subject.

Honourable senators, speaking first on the framework of the motion, I wish to make it clear that the spirit of this motion is not antagonistic to the freedom of those persons who wish to smoke. I was once a smoker myself and I enjoyed it. I was lucky enough, however, to give it up. Although I tried several times to do so, initially I was giving up something that I wanted to do and, therefore, failed. That was a good illustration of Mark Twain's comment to the effect that, "Giving up smoking is easy—I have done it hundreds of times." Eventually I decided that I did not want to smoke any longer. That, however, does not mean that I am proselytizing or suggesting by this motion that other senators or persons must quit. I mention "other persons" because, in answer to a question, I stated that I believed that this motion should apply to smoking by anyone in committee meetings.

I repeat that I am not suggesting that anyone should give up smoking. I have simply moved that smoking should not be permitted in Senate committees. Therefore, because I am not proselytizing, I hope that I will succeed in persuading smokers to support this motion out of consideration for non-smokers, and based on the evidence that I will present in support of the motion.

Why should smoking be prohibited during meetings of Senate committees? Honourable senators, the first subheading under this second heading is: "For reasons of health." Here I refer to the health of the non-smoker. Smokers may decide for themselves whether they wish to give up smoking because it does or does not menace their health. I only ask the smokers to consider the effect of their smoking on non-smokers. There is evidence of that effect which I wish to put on the record, because I think that all honourable senators are entitled to have a case made out in support of the motion. As honourable senators might know, there is considerable scientific evidence to support the conclusion that smoking is dangerous to the health of non-smokers. I will make reference to two or three sources in support of that proposition. The first is the evidence that was given before an arbitrator in a recent case involving the Public Service Alliance. Honourable senators may have read the conclusion of an arbitrator that the provisions of the Dangerous Substances Safety Standard apply to a part of a collective agreement relevant to that case. The evidence establishes the existence of a statistically significant relationship between exposure to passive smoke, as it is called, and the incidence of lung cancer. The issue dealt with in that particular arbitration is relevant, but I do not mean to dwell on it. I will simply share with honourable senators some of the evidence upon which it was based.

I have here the decision made by the arbitrator. The file number of the case is 166-2-14734 and the style of cause is entitled: The Public Service Staff Relations Act, before the Public Service Staff Relations Board, between Peter Wilson, grievor, and Treasury Board, Health and Welfare Canada, employer. By way of an aside, it is ironic that the Department of National Health and Welfare should have been involved in such a case as the antagonist to the griever. The hearing was conducted before Walter L. Nisbet, Q.C., Deputy Chairman.

I want to share with honourable senators some comments which provide an evaluation of the evidence. Those comments appear at pages 169 to 176 of the decision. At page 170 the findings are as follows—and I am referring to paragraph 129:

● (1520)

Is tobacco smoke (or its constituents) "a dangerous substance" within the meaning of the Standard? The expert witnesses called on behalf of the griever referred in their testimony to results of recent epidemiologic studies—

I take it that the root of that word is "epidemic"; but I will not dwell on that.

—some of which establish a statistically significant correlation between exposure to passive smoke and the incidence of lung cancer. In particular, Mr. Repace referred to a 14 year prospective study of 91,540 non-smoking Japanese wives conducted by Hirayama which showed that wives whose husbands smoked either less than a pack of cigarettes daily or more than a pack daily had respectively one and a half and two times the risk of lung cancer of women whose husbands did not smoke.

I suppose that another conclusion one could draw from that would be that one should not marry Japanese men who smoke. But that was not the conclusion that was put forward. I know that many of these statistics give rise to other possible inferences. I remember that on one occasion, when appearing before a jury and when statistics were not going well for me, there was reference to a study made of fleas. A scientist managed to train fleas. He had a control group of 100, and if he put one of the fleas in one hand and said "Jump," it would jump onto the other hand.

Senator Doody: It sounds like the honourable senator's caucus when they were all saying "No" in chorus.

Senator Frith: Really? Then you will like the rest of the story. I don't quite catch that. I am trying to make the point that there are many inferences to be drawn from statistics—and there is one that you have drawn. The rest of the statistics are as follows. He then took a control sub-group of 50 and removed their hind legs. He found that when he took that control sub-group, whose hind legs had been removed, and he said "Jump," they did not jump. His conclusion from that research was that when you remove the hind legs of a flea, it becomes deaf.

I know that other conclusions can be drawn from some of these studies. However, that was the conclusion that was drawn here, namely, that there was a clear effect on the health both of those who were smoking and on non-smokers who were exposed to the effects of smoking.

Senator McElman: Was that 91,000?

Senator Frith: It was 91,540.

Senator Molson: Were they smoking tobacco?

Senator Frith: Yes. I am grateful to the honourable senator for affording me the opportunity to make that clarification. There was also a study of the effects of both voluntary and involuntary smoking on some 5,210 middle-aged persons, conducted by White and Froeb. The conclusion was:

—that chronic exposure to tobacco smoke in the work environment harms non-smokers and significantly reduces small airway function to the level of smokers of one to ten cigarettes a day.

The testimony was that:

—although the quantitative estimates he presented should be regarded as preliminary and subject to confirmation by further research, the epidemiologic evidence suggests—

And this is rather chilling:

—that passive smoking is responsible for about one-third of the annual lung cancer mortality among U.S. non-smokers. He said passive smoking appears to pose a public health risk in the U.S. larger than the hazardous air pollutants from all regulated industrial emissions combined . . . As a result of earlier research he conducted, Mr. Repace had concluded that ambient tobacco smoke imposed significant air pollution burdens on non-smokers.

[Senator Frith.]

He said exposure of non-smokers to indoor air pollution from tobacco smoke has recently become a public health concern for several reasons: (a) such exposure is widespread; (b) studies of the effects of tobacco smoke on smokers world-wide have implicated it as the most important cause of lung cancer; (c) the existence of a threshold for carcinogenesis is doubtful; (d) there is disturbing new evidence of lung cancer and other serious health effects in non-smokers exposed to ambient concentrations of tobacco smoke.

Continuing:

Dr. Rickert testified on behalf of the grievor that there are many carcinogenic chemicals contained in tobacco smoke, including beta-naphthylamine and 4-aminobiphenyl for which no threshold limit values are established by the American Conference of Governmental Industrial Hygienists.

The following is important, with reference to this motion:

This means that there is no safe exposure to them. He said that tobacco smoke is a complex mixture of pollutants and when there are two or more hazardous substances which act upon the same system their combined effect rather than that of either individually should be given primary consideration, i.e., the effects are to be considered as additive. If the ratios of pollutant concentrations to its threshold limit values summed over all relevant constituents exceeds unity then the threshold limit value of the mixture is considered to have been exceeded. He pointed out that when he applied the threshold limit value mixture . . . to tobacco smoke he obtained the results reported in Table 7—of this document. This danger has been known for some time, and attempts have been made to solve it by ventilation. I quote further:

Dr. Rickert said that ventilation was more important than the number of cigarettes smoked. He agreed with Mr. Repace that ventilation is the most important factor in assessing indoor air pollution caused by ambient tobacco smoke. However, Mr. Repace indicated in his testimony that in order to reduce the risk to an acceptable level the ventilation rate would have to be increased to a completely impractical degree.

It means that ventilation certainly does not solve the problem. Continuing:

After reviewing the afore-mentioned epidemiologic studies in the paper titled "The Health Risks of Passive Smoking, The Growing Case for Control Measures in Enclosed Environments" which he authored with others, Doctor Lefcoe stated:

These investigators concluded that chronic exposure to tobacco smoke in the work environment is deleterious to the non-smoker and significantly reduces the function of small airways.

Honourable senators, I commend to you paragraph 133, which follows, and which refers to some exhibits. I will pass on to Dr. Sterling, in order to present the other side of the case. He testified for the employer. He said that in his opinion there was not sufficient evidence to convince him of the conclusions that I have just read into the record. But, in fairness, I must say that Dr. Sterling admitted that he had not done any of his own research on the health effects of passive smoke on humans, and his views were based simply on his criticism of the other studies—the ones to which I referred. The arbitrator, for that reason, said:

In my view, Dr. Sterling's testimony, insofar as it is in conflict with the testimony of the other expert witnesses, must give way to that testimony.

That is item number one. I have a couple of other references that might be persuasive. One is a statement by a medical doctor connected with occupational and environmental medicine, and an organization referred to as Environmental Improvement Associates. I refer to that, because in our committees, being aware of this problem, we have tried the use of filtering devices. Therefore it seems to me appropriate, as part of my case in support of the motion, to say something about the effectiveness of those devices. This is what Elaine B. Panitz, M.D. has to say about that:

• (1530)

Smoke (both mainstream and sidestream) is a complex mixture of gases, liquid droplets, and solid particles dispersed in air. The gases remain in air until fresh air pushes them away. The droplets and particles are of a fine enough particle size to remain in air for a long period. Eventually they stick to walls, clothing, hair and any other surfaces in the environment.

That means that for those of us without very much hair it clings to the surface uncovered by hair. She goes on to say:

Various "air cleaners" have been proposed to cope with smoke indoors.

We have all seen these devices in our committees.

An electrostatic precipitator removes droplets and particles (.01 to 0.40 microns in size) from air with high efficiency. Since some of the gases of smoke stick to the droplets and particles, these are removed by the electrostatic precipitator also. Unfortunately, more than 90 per cent of tobacco smoke is made up of gas molecules that are so tiny (.0002 to .01 microns) they cannot be removed by electrostatic precipitation. Equally ineffective are "ion generators"—

Which, I believe, is what we have.

—which purport to remove particles, but not gas molecules, from air.

Among the gases found in tobacco smoke are carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, nitrogen oxides, ammonia, volatile N-nitrosamines, hydrogen cyanide and cyanogen, sulfur compounds, nitriles, hydrocarbons, alcohols, aldehydes, and ketones.

Senator Phillips: Ketones?

Senator Frith: I thought that the ketones would get to Senator Phillips if nothing else did. Dr. Panitz goes on to say:

These chemicals have been implicated in the development of lung disease, heart disease, and cancer in humans. In terms of immediate symptoms, these gases (especially carbon monoxide) have been strongly associated with nausea—

Perhaps this is some justification or explanation for some of the behaviour in our committees when people are smoking there.

—dizziness, headache—

Senator Doody: Definitely headache.

Senator Frith: Get this one:

—loss of memory—

Senator Phillips: How many years did you smoke?

Senator Frith: Here's one, and if I am looking at Senator Phillips, it is purely coincidence:

—difficulty in concentration—

Senator Doody: It is just a coincidence.

Senator Phillips: It is merely the fact that you are bored.

Senator Frith: And now he can look back at me, because it says:

—and other psychomotor functions. Unfortunately, current technologies such as electrostatic precipitators and ion generators can not remove these gases. The only practical way to deal with the accumulation of toxic gases is to remove the source—eliminate smoking in confined spaces.

That is one of the reasons that I think we should not permit smoking at committee meetings.

Senator Doody: Perhaps the chamber is the only place where smoking should be allowed.

Senator Frith: It would be less of a threat to health to smoke here than to smoke in those confined spaces.

Senator Phillips: Is that a compromise?

Senator Frith: No, but make us an offer.

Another reference I have deals with some conclusions in a study in the New York State Journal of Medicine dated July 1985. That is fairly recent. The article is by Mr. Repace, who was one of the witnesses at the hearing, as honourable senators will remember. The article deals with an indoor air quality standard for ambient tobacco smoke based on carcinogenic risk. This is a health-based standard. My quotation can be found at page 382 of the journal. It reads:

A health-based standard of 0.75 $\mu\text{g}/\text{m}^3$ (daily average) for respirable particulate matter from ambient tobacco smoke in the workplace appears to be necessary to reduce carcinogenic risk to nonsmokers to acceptable levels. However, to attain such a standard, complete physical separation of smokers and nonsmokers on separate ventilation systems, and prohibition of smoking in the workplace appear to be the only feasible alternatives for reducing the lung cancer risk from passive smoking to below the maximum risk considered acceptable by the standards of federal regulatory agencies for carcinogens in air, water, or food.

That is what I have to say about the health risk. I want to reiterate that I do not want any of what I have said to be taken as a reproach to smokers or that smokers are knowingly threatening—

Senator Doody: You are not threatening to eliminate smokers, just smoking.

Senator Frith: Precisely.

Senator Doody: Eliminating smokers is phase two!

Senator Petten: Give him time.

Senator Frith: But I do not want smokers to feel that in reading all these somewhat frightening statistics I am suggesting that smokers are knowingly or maliciously inflicting such health risks on their colleagues. I simply bring it to their attention, as well as to the attention of non-smokers, to persuade them that—

Senator McElman: I am glad you gave us that explanation.

Senator Frith: So am I. I make it for the reason that I mentioned; namely, that I think this question of health is a matter for consideration for all honourable senators, be they smokers or non-smokers.

I have referred to the New York State Journal of Medicine and the fact that there is no apparent way to solve the problem other than to simply eliminate the source; namely, smoking.

I have two other short comments to make. One, for such use as it might be since, obviously, it is not a reason in itself—it is only something that is relevant to the question—is that in the United Kingdom smoking is not permitted in committees. My reference is May's Parliamentary Practice—20th Edition at page 672. It is also interesting in that it points out the company that smoking prohibitions keep. It reads:

Rules of debate. The rules observed by the House regarding order in debate are followed in a standing committee, as also are the rules relating to the preservation of order, decency, and harmony among the Members.

I take it that is a useful description of a reason—

Senator Doody: Is non-smoking enforced as stringently as the harmony part?

Senator Frith: I do not think that it is a matter of enforcement. Rather, harmony is the objective, the motivation.

Senator Doody: Ah.

Senator McElman: And an antidote against loss of memory.

Senator Frith: Exactly, against loss of memory, loss of concentration and other ambulatory functions.

Senator MacEachen: And nausea.

Senator Frith: And all others of the same genus. May continues:

Accordingly, members of a standing committee address the Chair standing, and may not refer to other members by name—

That does not apply to us.

—or smoke or read newspapers unless relevant to the bill before the committee—

Senator Phillips: I agree with that one.

Senator Frith: How about this one:

—or attempt the solution of crossword puzzles—

Senator Phillips: Sometimes they may be more interesting.

Senator MacEachen: That is not in May.

Senator Frith: Yes it is, and I am not through yet. That is what I was talking about when I mentioned the interesting company that non-smoking regulations keep. May goes on to say:

—or listen to radios or distribute propaganda literature or bring refreshment into the room.

Senator Phillips: Oh no, there goes coffee at committee meetings.

Senator Doody: No more coffee.

Senator Phillips: No more free lunches for you.

Senator Frith: So, for whatever help that might be, honourable senators, I add it to the underpinnings of the case I make for this motion.

● (1540)

I have already made a plea for unanimity. I hope that all honourable senators will support this motion, which is simply to prohibit any smoking during Senate committee meetings. I may also say that I support and agree with the experienced senators, such as Senators Molson, Roblin and Molgat and others, who feel proud, as I do, of the fact that we conduct our proceedings in the Senate and in its committees with a minimum of rules; in other words, we are not anxious, normally, to provide black letter prohibitions or directions for the conduct of Senate business, be it in the chamber or in its committees.

I have noticed that concern has been shown, since the evidence has become more widely recognized, for the danger of smoke to the health of non-smokers, and for the comfort of non-smokers, by many senators who are smokers. They have stopped smoking during committee meetings or, at least, have reduced the number of cigarettes smoked.

It may be that the solution is not to amend the Rules of the Senate, but simply to accept this as a tradition or have some undertaking or understanding that we will simply not permit smoking during committee meetings. It can develop as a precedent and a tradition rather than as a black letter rule. But it seemed to me that to use that method to bring about the result was not possible without at least suggesting a rule change. It may be, as I have said, that we do not need to change the rules, but if we do, then I ask all honourable senators, smokers and non-smokers, to support this motion.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators will recall that on a previous occasion I have given the Senate the benefit of my views on televising proceedings. I am sorry I did not agree with that because I would like to have a video tape of the speech just made by the Honourable Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: I will repeat it.

Senator Phillips: I would have him sit in a corner and listen to it again.

Before replying fully to the honourable senator's remarks, I should like to have the benefit of reading his speech in Hansard, because when giving very scientific descriptions of his experiments with fleas, I had a feeling he was calling Liberal senators who serve on various committees fleas. I am sure I must have misinterpreted him.

Senator Frith: I think you are on safe ground there.

Senator Phillips: I should like to have the benefit of reading his long and rather tiresome speech before replying. So, honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

YOUTH

ABOLITION OF KATIMAVIK—MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER RULE 46(g) FOR THE PURPOSES OF RAISING A MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the Orders of the Day, I move, pursuant to rule 46(g):

That the Senate adjourn for the purposes of raising a matter of urgent public importance concerning the youth of our country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, yesterday the youth of our country was both shocked and appalled at the news that the government had signed Katimavik's death sentence.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Hébert: I was still in shock when I wrote an open letter to the Prime Minister, hoping to make him change his mind. I am an incorrigible optimist. I have faith in man . . . Well, honourable senators, I thought I would let you be the first to know the contents of this letter, this message in a bottle, as it were . . .

Prime Minister, I was very sad to hear about your government's unfortunate decision to do away with Katimavik, a non-governmental organization—financed by the Department of the Secretary of State—which offers the only national youth volunteer service in Canada. My disappointment is not about the fact that, together with many eminent citizens of our country,—from all parties!—I helped to the best of my ability to build a Katimavik that this year will be celebrating its tenth birthday. That does not matter so much—big boys don't cry. I am sad and disappointed on behalf of the 20,000 young Canadians who have been able to take advantage of this program and their 20,000 families who are grateful for what happened to their son or daughter. Recently, a father wrote me the following, and I quote: "I was absolutely desperate when I saw my son without a job, without any motivation to get an education, just drifting through life. After Katimavik, I hardly recognized him he had changed so much. He is working, he has gone back to school and wants to make something of his life. Thank you!"

● (1405)

[English]

In 1985-86, for the last time, 2,000 young Canadians, equitably selected from across the whole country and constituting a cross-section of the various ethnic groups and social classes, will have benefited directly from Katimavik for a period of nine months.

These young people will acquire working methods that are new to them; learn a variety of trades; and discover of fresh motivations that will give direction to the rest of their lives. To varying degrees, they will become bilingual. For the first time in their lives, thanks to their warm reception in those communities who appreciate their contribution, they will understand that society does not reject them and that there is a place for them in the adult world.

In addition, these 2,000 young people will gain an in-depth acquaintance with three different regions of their vast country, one of the three being French-speaking. They will become truly integrated, working with the population on community projects; fraternizing with the local young people; and living for some weeks with a family in the community.

As each group of 12 participants is, in itself, a cross-section of Canada's socio-demographic reality, young people who would otherwise never have met will have the opportunity of forging what promise to be life-long friendships. How promising for the future of Canada—this country which suffers from "too much geography" but where the problems among regions and linguistic groups dissolve automatically as soon as individuals have a chance to really get to know each other.

Do you realize that, Mr. Prime Minister?

The achievement of Canadian unity will always be a challenge for the federal government. The only effective way is to ensure an ever-increasing number of personal contacts and bonds of friendship among young Canadians. For those who are older, it is often too late! In this, Katimavik has been a resounding success for the 20,000 young participants who have been through the program up to now. If that number were increased appreciably over the coming years, we could be sure that Canada would become a model for the rest of the world; a fraternal people living in peace and harmony. Do we have the right, on the pretext that times are hard—and how hard they are for the young!—to pass up this marvellous investment in our future?

[Translation]

And, Mr. Prime Minister, what about the thousands of youths who have already applied for the 1986-87 program and to whom you have just said: "No. It is over! Reducing the deficit is more urgent than giving hope to a few thousand youths a year . . .". Mr. Prime Minister, try to imagine their disappointment, their frustration, not to mention that of their parents and of the 150 towns and villages in Canada that looked forward to their voluntary work to carry out community projects which are deemed essential.

[English]

Honourable senators, I will now give you just a few figures. In over nine years, the Katimavik groups have carried out community work projects in at least 1,500 towns and villages, penetrating the most isolated corners of every province, not to mention the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Overall, this means that perhaps 10,000 other individuals took part directly in the programs. They range from mayors, municipal councillors, priests, ministers, managers of co-ops, directors of YMCAs, hospital personnel, those working in homes for the handicapped, and so on—in short, the most dynamic citizens of these 1,500 communities.

Thanks to the young Katimavik volunteers, they have been able to carry out projects which would have been impossible without this contribution of free labour. I am referring to projects such as the restoration of historic buildings and the planting of trees etc. One million trees were planted between May 6 and May 12, 1984. They were also involved in the de-pollution of streams; the development of parks; the ecological trails; the transformation of former schools into community recreation centres, and so on, all of this in addition to the time—25 per cent of it—devoted to social work in hospitals, homes for the aged, centres for the handicapped, et cetera. Again strong bonds were created between the sponsors and the groups of participants with whom they worked for nine months.

[Translation]

In short, people are enthusiastic about Katimavik youths but, since yesterday, they are furious as a result of your government's untimely decision!

● (1410)

[English]

Furthermore, Katimavik is a program that is unique in the world, being one of which Canadians are proud, and justly so. It is the envy of a large number of foreign countries—among them, for example, Australia, Ireland, Indonesia, the Philippines, India—all of which are envisaging the creation of their own programs based on the original model of Katimavik.

On the occasion of the Versailles Summit Meeting, President Reagan expressed a desire to organize exchanges between the young people of his country and Canada. His personal representatives, quite naturally, got in touch with Katimavik, and since 1983, Katimavik has had an exchange program with the California Conservation Corps, which has been very successful.

Further, following long consultation with Katimavik, Mayor Edward Koch of New York last October launched a New York City Demonstration Project, largely inspired by the Katimavik program.

Another example of the international recognition given to Katimavik was the honour it received in June of last year at the United Nations in New York when it was awarded the United Nations Environmental Program Medal in recognition of its outstanding efforts with respect to the protection of the environment.

[Translation]

Mr. Prime Minister, they say—and this is nothing to be ashamed of—that you want to be loved. That is why I have a hard time understanding a decision that will bring down on your head the reprobation of tens of thousands of Canadians who will never forgive you for this, never!

Your minister, the Secretary of State, seemed to be an intelligent and sensitive man. I think he felt pretty miserable yesterday afternoon when he had to announce this incredible decision to me, as well as to the President of the Board and the Director General of Katimavik. I got the impression that he was reluctantly carrying out someone else's orders, and that if you asked him, maybe . . . after all, in the heat of battle, governments sometimes make hasty decisions, and there is a certain dignity in admitting one's mistakes.

I feel I must give you some advice . . . I suppose you will say you do not expect good advice from a Liberal senator, regardless of his lack of partisanship. Nevertheless, I would like to try. My advice is as follows: Before declaring that your government will not reverse its decision, consult with your members. Your own members! Unlike your ministers who are far more absorbed by the business of government, they remain closer to the realities of daily life. Everyone of them knows at least one young person in his riding whose life has changed, thanks to Katimavik. Many have had a chance to appreciate the extraordinary work accomplished by these young people in a municipality in their constituency.

A few hours ago, I took the liberty—John Turner, will you ever forgive me—of speaking to five or six of your members. They all said they were astonished and shocked at the decision to get rid of Katimavik. In fact, it was the first news they had because they were not aware of what had happened. I don't know what the others think, but I am optimistic. So, Prime Minister, how about a step in the right direction, a truly democratic gesture: Ask the opinion of your members, these men and women who know what is going on in the real world . . . I am sure they will tell you that Katimavik must continue to exist.

Hurry, because from now on, I am going to be an indefatigable lobbyist. I will follow your members around like a lovesick swain. I will tell them about my passion. I will implore and beseech and coax them. I will wear them down. They will realize I have no political ulterior motives, that I will fight until my dying breath, because I firmly believe with all my heart that Katimavik must continue to offer hope to 2,000 young Canadians every year, or better still, 10,000 or 50,000.

I asked your minister, "Do you have a better idea than Katimavik up your sleeve? Do you have a program that will provide an even better response to the deepest aspirations of young Canadians?"

He answered: "Out of the ashes of Katimavik another program will rise." I said, politely, that did not sound very convincing.

"Are you one of those people who think Katimavik costs too much?" I asked again.

"Indeed I am," your Minister answered, "19 million for 2,000 young people."

Wrong, wrong, wrong! I agree that $9,450 per participant for nine months may seem like a lot of money. A student costs about the same, a soldier $17,500, while an inmate in a penitentiary costs $26,000, and so on. To calculate the true cost of a Katimavik participant, we should subtract what some of these young people would otherwise cost the State in unemployment insurance benefits, welfare, and so on, and subtract as well what our young volunteers contribute to their communities. A recent study made in September 1984 by an independent firm, Econosult-Lavalin, established that in the last four years alone, Katimavik participants had set up extremely useful projects worth more than $60 million.

"What young people want," said your minister, "are real jobs."

I agree! I could not agree more. Ideally, we should create 750,000 jobs for 750,000 young people who are now unemployed, while there are also 750,000 adults who have a right to work. But that is impossible, even if we doubled the deficit. Until the economic situation gets better, we will have to live—what a shame—with an outrageous number of unemployed youths. What remains possible and essential is at least to offer alternatives to unavailable jobs, and Katimavik happens to be one of those alternatives, one which for nearly ten years now has had overwhelming support in this country.

Mr. Prime Minister, I do not really know you. Like all Canadians I watch what you do. You often irritate me, but now and then I can hardly resist your seductive approach, and so I tell myself: "Well now, the man has his faults, but his heart is in the right place." Right now that is my only hope: You are generous and, with a smile on your face, you will say: "My government did take a somewhat hasty decision. The Secretary of State is making a scientific assessment of Katimavik. We will wait for the results of that assessment before making a decision about its future. At least, the thousands of young Canadians who were looking forward to Katimavik projects this year will not be disappointed." "Thank you!" Those are the two words you will hear from everywhere, the appreciation of young Canadians who will be grateful to you because they will not have to join the ranks of the "lost generation," the appreciation of their anxious parents and of the mayors of 150 Canadian communities who welcome the contribution of our young volunteers.

Mr. Prime Minister, that is what you have to do if you want people to like you!

Sincerely yours.

[Senator Hébert.]

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Your Honour, I believe that the mover of the motion, in accordance with our normal procedure, now has leave to withdraw the motion if there is no further debate on it.

Senator Hébert: Honourable senators, I now move, with leave, that this motion be withdrawn.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

STUDY OF SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-67 AND BILL C-68—
COMMITTEE REQUEST FOR AUTHORIZATION TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, January 30, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-67, intituled: "An Act to amend the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act" and the subject-matter of Bill C-68, intituled: "An Act to amend the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and the Criminal Code" recommends that it be empowered to adjourn from place to place in Canada for its examination of the aforementioned legislation.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 4, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

YOUTH

KATIMAVIK—CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Acting Leader of the Government. I believe that all honourable senators share a sense of shock, a sense of loss, a sense of sadness and, perhaps, a sense of shame upon hearing of the cancellation of the Katimavik program, which has just been revealed to us in such an eloquent way by Senator Hébert.

By way of a brief preamble, I want to say that I share the views of Senator Hébert and I hope that all honourable senators will join together in convincing the government—especially the Prime Minister—that this is a program which has served Canadians, particularly young Canadians, very well in the past and that it should continue to do so in the future. I have personally visited Katimavik projects in many parts of the country. I have had an opportunity to share with young people the satisfaction that they have experienced in some of the excellent projects they carried out. We have all seen the beneficial effects that the program had on thousands of young Canadians.

I ask the Acting Leader of the Government whether he was aware that this announcement was forthcoming. Is the program beyond salvation? Was its cancellation the result of a deficit-cutting measure or did the government determine that it was a program which was no longer useful?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I know very little about the rationale involved in this decision. I understand from Senator Hébert's statement that it was, indeed, part of the cost-cutting process of government. I would have to refer to the minister responsible to try to provide other information to the honourable gentleman.

Senator Graham: I presume that this announcement comes as just as big a shock to the Acting Leader of the Government as it does to all honourable senators in the chamber. Would he determine the reasons for the cancellation of the Katimavik program? Would he determine what sort of consultation took place with the Katimavik officials, with a representative group of those thousands of young Canadians who have benefited over the years from that program, and, indeed, with members of Parliament, even of his own party? What alternatives can be brought forward with respect to Katimavik? Will the deputy leader also undertake to bring to the attention of the Prime Minister the concerns of members of this chamber with respect to the cancellation of that great program?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice and try to get as much information as I possibly can, as I indicated a moment ago. As for bringing the concerns of the members of this chamber to the attention of the Prime Minister, I think that Senator Hébert's open letter will express them a great deal more eloquently than I can.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS—COST AND SCOPE

Hon. Stanley Haisdasz: Honourable senators, I would like to ask of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate: In view of the fact that the government has extended to June 30, 1986, the term of the Deschênes Commission of Inquiry into possible Nazi war criminals still living in Canada, would he inform this chamber as to how much it has cost the taxpayers to conduct that inquiry from its beginning to the end of 1985 and what funds have been approved for the commission to continue its inquiry from January 1, 1986, to June 30, 1986?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice.

Senator Haisdasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the Government of the U.S.S.R. has refused to meet the conditions set out by Justice Deschênes with regard to questioning witnesses and other people in that country who apparently have information on the so-called Nazi war criminals in Canada, would the deputy leader inform this house as to whether the government thinks it is worth while for the commission to pursue its inquiries outside Canada?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I shall take that question as notice as well and shall obtain whatever information I can.

YOUTH

CANCELLATION OF PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, following on the comments of Senator Graham, I, too, was amazed to learn today that the life of Katimavik was about to come to an end. As honourable senators know, a special committee of this house will be reporting at the end of next month as a result of public hearings on the question of youth and employment across this country.

I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate will, at the very least, try to persuade his colleagues in the cabinet to withhold cancelling programs such as Katimavik and perhaps others until the government has had an opportunity to read the committee's report.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I indicated to Senator Graham, I shall attempt to get whatever information I can, including the rationale behind the government's decision to abolish this particular program. I have no idea of the content of the report. I have not seen it. As to whether or not I can influence the government to withhold its decision, I have some reservations. However, I shall express the wishes of Senator Fairbairn in that respect.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

PRODUCT INSPECTION STANDARDS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I wish to follow up on a question I put to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate yesterday and simply ask him, since he knows what I am referring to, if he has any new information today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some information on the St. Andrews tuna situation. I do not think that it is very new, but I am only too happy to pass it along.

● (1430)

On December 19, the minister responsible tabled in the House of Commons an extensive statement on measures taken to ensure the quality of Canadian canned fish. He stated at that time that the quality of fish products in Canada must be above reproach and that he would take immediate measures to assure Canadian consumers that the quality of every Canadian fish product shall be beyond question. He initiated at that time a comprehensive review of all procedures, quality standards and regulations pertaining to inspection and approval of canned fish products produced or sold in Canada and announced that, if necessary, he was prepared to introduce amendments to the Fish Inspection Act and to strengthen the Department of Fisheries and Oceans inspection practices.

Honourable senators are, of course, aware that the tuna incident reflected on the perception of the fishery standards in Canada generally—and to what degree we do not know—and he was concerned, of course, that the sales of other canned fish products such as salmon, crab, trout, et cetera, could very well be affected. Therefore the minister implemented the following measures immediately. He ordered the meticulous examination of all canned tuna products produced in Canada and presently on shelves in Canadian stores. He ordered that samples of canned tuna products being packed in Canada be withdrawn from retail shelves and distribution centres across Canada. He ordered that the lot numbers of products on the shelves or in inventory are to be checked against the lot numbers that were recalled in September of 1985 and that legal action would be initiated, if warranted. He has ordered that steps be taken to ensure that the quality standards for canned tuna meet or exceed those in effect prior to June, 1985.

Instructions have been given to the officials to implement immediately new inspection procedures, ensuring that samples are drawn and analysed from every production lot of canned tuna at the plant of origin. An immediate and detailed review of the inspection procedures and standards applied by the

[Senator Doody.]

Department of Fisheries and Oceans officials at the Star-Kist plant over the past three years has begun.

On January 9 the minister announced that, in accordance with his statement of December 19, federal fish inspectors are sampling and analysing canned tuna products in Canada now in warehouses and retail outlets. Products failing this rigorous examination process are being removed from distribution and detained by the department, while those confirmed as meeting Canadian standards are being returned to the market forthwith. Consumers will thus have the assurance that the Canadian canned tuna they purchase complies with the national standards for quality.

To facilitate the work of his inspectors, the minister is requesting the co-operation of all tuna brokers and retailers and this, of course, will help ensure that acceptable product is returned to the market within the shortest possible time. All cans being detained are also to be checked to ascertain whether they are from production lots recalled in September and December of 1985. To date, no new cans from these recalled lots have been found in distribution.

With regard to the rejection of the further 49,000 cans of Star-Kist tuna submitted for inspection during the first week of January, we are told that the tuna in question was inspected in accordance with established measures and procedures that apply equally to domestic and imported products, and was found to be unacceptable in terms of odour and flavour.

The minister also announced that Dr. Alex Morrison, head of the Food Science Department of the University of Guelph has agreed to head up a detailed review of inspection procedures and standards applied by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans officials at the Star-Kist plant in St. Andrews, New Brunswick over the past three years. Dr. Morrison is one of Canada's foremost food scientists. The minister has said that the measures taken should not only ensure that Canadian consumers maintain confidence in the federal inspection system, but should also help to rebuild the good reputation of the St. Andrews tuna canning plant and reinforce the positive quality image of the Canadian fishing industry.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is now awaiting Dr. Morrison's report. In addition, the joint industry-government body appointed when this issue first came up is continuing to meet. The government is working towards re-establishing confidence in the product of the St. Andrews plant for the future health of the industry. The Star-Kist company has not informed the government of any plans for prolonged closure of the St. Andrews plant.

Honourable senators, that is the information I have on the situation up to date. I should add that I note this morning in a newspaper article that some 3,000 tonnes of frozen product has been shipped to Cuba and Europe for processing. That, to me, is not very encouraging in terms of a very fast re-opening. I might say that that plant has been opened and closed again since the incident, and I know this must have a devastating effect on the morale of the community and on the employment rate in that part of the country. It is a situation that I am not completely unfamiliar with. I might say to honourable senators that these one-industry towns are all very vulnerable.

I regret that the information I have is not more encouraging, but that is all that was available to me at this point.

Senator Corbin: I would like to thank Senator Doody for his prompt action in answering my inquiry of yesterday. It is much appreciated.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, in view of the prompt response to Senator Corbin's question, I am prompted to leap to my feet immediately to ask Senator Doody whether he has any word for us on the future of the sugar-beet industry as a result of any cabinet considerations today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Unfortunately, senator, I do not. I made some inquiries this morning and requested that I be given some information for this afternoon in anticipation of such a question. Unfortunately, I was not able to secure anything, but I will try again tomorrow.

YOUTH

CANCELLATION OF PROGRAMS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, as were my colleagues, I am absolutely shocked to hear about the cancellation of the support of the federal government for the Katimavik program. Since the government is prepared to cut from the programs this jewel that gives some measure of support to Canadian youth who have few opportunities to learn about this country, I would like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate what other programs in support of youth are about to be cut.

Specifically, since you are obtaining information on other things, can you tell us what will happen to the Minister of State for Youth programs? Can you tell us whether there are any plans to cut student loan programs, or if there are any plans in terms of cuts with respect to the summer programs? Can you also tell us whether any of the other Secretary of State support programs to volunteer groups across the country such as the Youth Parliament and the various youth associations are also to be cut?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): To the best of my information, no other cuts are forthcoming. Certainly, I have not been informed of any.

As to what will happen to the Minister of State, I have no idea. I did not know the minister was in difficulty. In any event, these programs are not being cut any further than the present announcement, to the best of my knowledge.

Senator Marsden: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I think it is quite clear to all the members of this chamber that you were not aware that Katimavik was about to be cut. I must say that it has certainly come as a real shock to all of us, and so it is conceivable that there may be cuts in programs that you have not yet heard about and I hope that you will make your best efforts to discover whether there are consultations under way for such cuts.

Senator Doody: I would be the first one to modestly admit that there are indeed things going on in this country that I am not aware of.

Senator Frith: What?

Senator Doody: I know it is a shameful thing to admit, but there it is.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES

DE-INDEXATION—PETITIONS AGAINST BILL C-70—NUMBER AND DISPOSITION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: I have a question with respect to a matter of which the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate may also not be aware. I should say at this time that I appreciate the fact that he is aware of most things that are happening in this country by the manner in which he so capably serves this chamber as Deputy and now Acting Leader of the Government.

I would like to ask a question relating to Bill C-70. Would the Acting Leader of the Government determine for us how many individual and group petitions were received by the Prime Minister objecting to Bill C-70? Secondly, how many of those petitions were presented to the House of Commons and what ultimately was the disposition of those petitions?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is my honourable friend referring to the situation as of the current date? I will certainly ask for the information he has requested.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. While you are obtaining the information about these petitions, I wonder if you could tell us, of the number of those petitions presented by the Prime Minister to the House of Commons—if indeed there were any—what proportion of those petitions by Canadians who added their voice against this change to Bill C-70 were, in fact, heard in the House of Commons?

Senator Doody: I am sorry, I am not sure I quite follow you.

Senator Marsden: I quite understand. I did not put that question very well. I apologize. Let me try again. If the Prime Minister received more petitions than he presented in the House of Commons, I would like to know what proportion of the actual number of petitions were presented to the House of Commons in relation to the number he received altogether.

Senator Doody: I will try to find that out.

ENERGY

OIL-PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can give us a report today on what the government intends to do with respect to the energy projects that are being cancelled or put in jeopardy day by day. I asked him this question yesterday and, indeed, sometime last week, but, as the honourable senator knows, Senator Roblin gave an indication that they were watching the situation. I wonder if the government has decided to do something a little more positive than just watch.

• (1440)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I can only say that, obviously, the government is most interested in seeing that as many of these projects go ahead as possible. I do not think it is a situation that the government can control completely at this point or at any point. I know the honourable gentleman opposite has had more experience in this particular field than, perhaps, any of us here. As I mentioned yesterday, he had great hopes for a tremendous number of "mega projects" as he used to call them. We all looked forward to them with great enthusiasm. I sincerely hope that, during the current economic era, we can see a greater success ratio than we have seen over the past few years.

The LNG situation in western Canada was limping along for some time and has now fallen through. They just cannot reach an agreement, which is viable or reasonable, with the potential customers. Some of the other programs and projects that are on the books, I imagine, would depend, to a large degree, on the oil-price situation.

Senator Olson is as aware or perhaps more aware of the volatility of that situation than any of us. There is a level below which oil prices cannot go and still make some of these projects viable. The current price, I think, is getting close to that level, but, fortunately, at least in the case of Hibernia, it has not reached that level, and I hope it never will.

The current oil-price situation may not be a permanent one. I suspect that it will not, but what the time frame of the decline will be I honestly cannot say and I do not think anyone can. It may be months and it may be a matter of some years.

In any event, to respond to the question concerning what the government is doing about the situation, other than looking at it, I would respond by saying that I can assure the honourable gentleman that the government is very concerned about it and will take every step that it possibly can, short of direct intervention, to make sure that these situations are approached in a positive fashion and that help will be forthcoming to the private sector, because it is a private sector situation.

Senator Olson: The honourable acting leader finally got around to giving us some partial reply, but, as I understood him, he really did not say anything.

Senator Doody: That is what I tried to do.

Senator Olson: I suspected that is what he tried to do.

Senator Doody: It is called "survival."

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that we can report to the people in the industry and, particularly, to people whose jobs are directly dependent on this, that the only action they can expect from the government is that it will refrain from making any predictions and will sit back and watch and that is all that can be expected from this government.

Senator Doody: The honourable gentleman can speak to the representatives of the industry at any time he wishes and he can tell them anything that he sees fit. The situation is evolving day by day, and I am sure it will change day by day. As much as we can, we will try to keep the gentleman up to date on it, and he can convey the appropriate messages to whomever.

Senator Olson: Trying to keep us up to date is not comforting to people whose jobs and whose whole incomes are in jeopardy. Whether they are representatives of the industry or those who pretend they represent the industry is of no great concern to me. In fact, there are several thousand people whose jobs and livelihoods depend on whether or not the government is going to govern or if it is going to simply sit back and watch and try to keep me up to date from time to time. That is pretty cold comfort if you are anticipating a complete loss of the economic sector involved as a result of this.

I would hope that the honourable deputy leader would not try to confuse the issue still further. I am asking him directly and as simply and clearly as I can if the government has any plans or has any interest in making some plans other than sitting back and reporting on watching.

Senator Doody: I do not contemplate the closing down of an entire industry sector, as the honourable senator has suggested. I can assure him that that is very unlikely to happen. I can also assure the honourable gentleman that the government is quite concerned and interested, and, if anything of interest develops, the information will be passed along.

Senator Olson: As has been indicated, a Syncrude project cannot, obviously, go ahead without prices somewhere in the $25-per-barrel range. Indeed, several other large extraction plants from the tar sands and the upgrading of the heavy oil require price levels somewhere in the $22-$25 range.

Are we to take it from the government's reply, and since there is no action by the government, that those projects are going to either die or remain in jeopardy?

Senator Doody: I would not draw that conclusion.

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, my question is also related to the energy sector of our economy, but to the extent that it concerns the retail level.

The Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate will know that after some weeks of questioning and pressure the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Honourable Pat Carney, has changed her original answer and has decided to write to the oil companies in Canada to see if something can be done to give the consumers of Canada the benefits of the rapidly falling price of oil on the international market so that these reductions would be reflected rapidly to the retailer and to the consumer at the gas pumps.

Would Senator Doody undertake, on behalf of this chamber, to ask the minister to table the letters which she has addressed to these companies and, also, to table the answers that will be given so that senators and Canadians in general will be aware of not only the request but of the answers given by these oil companies?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly ask the minister for these documents. Whether they will be forthcoming or not, I cannot make that commitment, but I will certainly ask for them.

Senator Lefebvre: I thank the honourable gentleman for that answer. I am glad he will follow up my request. I believe the majority of senators and, indeed, the majority of Canadians are anxious to get answers, because it is very noticeable that, in this country—as was mentioned by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources—it seems to take anywhere from 60 days to 90 days for the consumer to benefit from a lowering of prices while just across the border, apparently, in a few days a downward cycle is reflected in the price to the retailer and to the consumer. Would the honourable deputy leader also ask for answers on this particular aspect?

Senator Doody: To make sure I understand the senator correctly, would he like a comparison of the Canadian and American retail marketing systems?

Senator Lefebvre: Yes. I think all Canadians would be interested in knowing why it is that in a much bigger market it takes only a few days to reflect prices at the pumps, particularly on a downward trend as is happening now, and that in a much smaller market in Canada, which is ten times smaller, it can take from 60 days to 90 days. I think there is a general interest among Canadians to find out why it takes much longer in this country, in a smaller market, to reflect prices than it does across the border in the U.S. where the market is ten times greater.

Senator Doody: I will certainly try to get that information from the department.

The honourable senator and I attended a meeting this morning in which we heard some statistics and explanations from a member of the industry. I believe, however, that the honourable gentleman is asking for a departmental explanation, and I will certainly try to get that for him.

PARLIAMENT

CAUCUS ROOMS AND MEMBERS' OFFICES—ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Could the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate assure this chamber that no longer does the Deputy Prime Minister bug the Liberal or the NDP caucus, as he admitted he did in the 1960s? He listened every Wednesday and he heard "word for bloody word" what was said. Can the acting leader assure us that the Deputy Prime Minister, or other members of the government, are not bugging the NDP caucus meeting rooms, Liberal caucus meeting rooms or private rooms?

• (1450)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I was not aware of the fact that the Deputy Prime Minister had bugged any rooms; in any event, if he did, one could certainly not entrust secrets to a better man—I am sure there would be no leaks.

In any event, I will certainly ask him to please cease and desist, if he is still up to that sort of thing.

I am not saying for a moment that he ever was—

Senator Olson: He admitted he did.

Senator Doody: Senator Olson has said he admitted that he did. Well, everybody needs a hobby, I suspect, but that one does seem to be a bit peculiar.

Why he would want to know what was going on in either of those two caucuses baffles me. But in any event, I will certainly pass the request on to the honourable gentleman and ask him not to do that again.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is not that I do not want the Deputy Prime Minister to do it again, I do not want anybody in Canada to do it again. I particularly want to know if it is now being done unbeknownst to us, because, if it is, as far as I am concerned, someone is breaking the law. I have my doubts whether someone who appears to have broken the law should be a Privy Councillor, and I have my doubts whether that person should be in the cabinet entrusted with the portfolio of Minister of National Defence because the nation's trust is placed in the man who holds that position.

I should like to be assured—and I know the acting leader cannot do it, but I ask him to look into it—that my office is not being bugged, and the Liberal caucus room is not being bugged every Wednesday, by the government.

The Deputy Prime Minister has admitted that he did that; that admission is on tape. I want to make sure that he has stopped, and that nobody is breaking the law of Canada by bugging my office or the Liberal caucus.

Senator Doody: I sympathize with the honourable gentleman's dilemma, but I am not sure I know what it is he wants me to do. I cannot give the honourable senator an assurance that nobody is doing that in Canada. Perhaps we could ask the Internal Economy Committee of the Senate to conduct a sweep of the offices to determine if any of these listening devices have been planted. I certainly would not object to that.

I do not imagine that there is any listening device planted in my office because I cannot imagine anyone having the time or energy to listen to the conversations that go on there. Nevertheless, if honourable senators want their offices swept, that request can be made.

As for a guarantee that nobody in Canada will ever do that, I do not think the honourable senator can really expect me to guarantee that. I cannot certify that some 20 million-odd Canadians are not malicious or mischievous. I do not think I am in a position to state that.

Senator Olson: Tell us about the Deputy Prime Minister.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am not asking him to guarantee that nobody in Canada is going to do that; I understand that that is impossible.

I want to be told that the government is not doing that; I want somebody in government to say that it is no longer its policy to listen every Wednesday to what is taking place in the Liberal caucus room and in the NDP caucus room "word for bloody word." That, as far as I am concerned, is a criminal offence, and I should like to be assured that this does not happen in this Parliament. I should like to be assured that this government's policy is not to bug caucus meetings. I want this matter brought to the attention of the government and I want an assurance that it is not this government's policy to bug the offices of senators.

Senator Doody: I will certainly pass the request on to the appropriate authorities. I do not know what we can do. In the meantime, I guess we will have to be very circumspect. I will do what I can for the honourable senator.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, my question is for the Acting Leader of the Government. I should like the acting leader to inform this chamber if any investigation has been made by experts to ensure that the present electronic communications system in the Parliament Buildings and the telephones are not susceptible to eavesdropping.

Senator Doody: I really cannot answer that question. Once again, that can be referred to the Internal Economy Committee so that proper assurances can be received from the people responsible for the installation and maintenance of the systems.

Quite honestly, that has not crossed my mind, but perhaps one of the Senate committees could look into the matter when discussing the communications, or lack thereof, that we have in the building at the present time.

CAUCUS ROOMS—ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING—PRIME MINISTER'S REACTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if while making these inquiries the Acting Leader of the Government will ask, in view of the admissions made by the Deputy Prime Minister of his really unbelievable behaviour, whether the Prime Minister has asked for his resignation.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I certainly have no intention of asking the Deputy Prime Minister for his resignation.

I may be brave, but I'm not that brave.

Senator Frith: I only wish you had the power to do so. Because, knowing the sense of propriety and the strong moral fibre of the Acting Leader of the Government, I am sure he would ask. But that was not my question.

Would the acting leader find out if the Prime Minister—about whose moral fibre I do not make any comment—will ask for the Deputy Prime Minister's resignation?

Senator Doody: I will certainly ask—but from a distance!

Senator Frith: Perhaps over a bugged telephone.

[Senator Olson.]

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. H. A. Olson: I wonder if I could ask the Acting Leader of the Government a question pertaining to the relative value of the Canadian dollar in the international market. I do so knowing that while they were in opposition, every Thursday afternoon for several months he and Senator Murray asked questions about this. Therefore I know that he had a great interest in it. I hope that that interest has been maintained, because today the dollar hit an all-time low in relation to the American dollar—in fact, it has been doing that for several days. But at 1.45 this afternoon it hit an all-time low of 70.15 cents. I am wondering what the government intends to do about the harmful effects this might have on inflation and other economic indicators.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice and try to get an answer for the honourable gentleman. I do not have an answer to that question with me.

Senator Olson: I thought the honourable gentleman would have an answer because in days gone by he was well versed in this subject and made recommendations to the government as to what it ought to do. He dealt with this on at least a weekly, if not a daily, basis.

Senator Doody: But I discovered after a while that that was completely futile because the government did not listen to me anyway.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to remind the Acting Leader of the Government of a series of questions which I addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate some time ago with respect to Raoul Wallenberg, who, by resolution of both houses of Parliament, was made a Canadian citizen.

I wanted to know whether the Canadian government, through the Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Ambassador in Moscow, had communicated to Mr. Wallenberg that he is now a Canadian citizen and, secondly, whether the Government of Canada had made representations to the authorities in Moscow with respect to this Canadian citizen.

I think this is a very important question not only in itself but because there is a motion on the order paper in the Senate with respect to the proceedings on the day on which the Senate was urgently recalled to pass the resolution making Mr. Wallenberg an honorary Canadian citizen. That motion has been stood at the request of Senator Macquarrie, but in due course it will come up and it would be helpful for me to have answers to those questions before that time.

In any event, I think we ought to know whether that resolution passed by the House of Commons and the Senate was an empty gesture, or whether the Government of Canada has taken it seriously and has followed up to advance the interests of that new honorary Canadian citizen.

I am really asking the acting leader whether he can try to get me the information which I had asked for previously.

● (1500)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make every effort to get the information for the honourable senator.

PENITENTIARIES

CANADA-ALBERTA AGREEMENT AND MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I wonder if I might make an appeal to the Deputy Leader of the Government for the tabling in this chamber of an agreement between the Government of Canada, as represented by the Solicitor General, and the Government of Alberta, as represented by the Solicitor General of Alberta, concerning certain undertakings with respect to corrections in Alberta, as the Canadian government seeks to abandon its responsibility with respect to inmates and have them moved into provincial institutions; also the copy of a letter of intent between the Commissioner of the Correctional Service Canada and the Deputy Solicitor General of Alberta—again with respect to some pretty fundamental changes in regard to corrections in that province, again where the Canadian government seeks to abandon its responsibilities with respect to the National Parole Service, as it destroys that service in the province and again compartmentalizes efforts in the province and destroys the national aspect of parole supervision in Canada.

I have asked for these on two occasions, and I again appeal for those documents to be tabled in the Senate as quickly as possible.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will certainly make an inquiry of the appropriate department and try to get them for the honourable senator.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—
(Honourable Senator Marsden.)

[English]

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to yield to Senator Rousseau.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Yvette Rousseau: Honourable senators, the main issue underlying this measure concerning the de-indexation of family allowances is nothing other than the objectives of the government in its efforts to change only one of the elements of the federal system of benefits—reduce the deficit and lessen the role of the State.

My remarks today will focus on those objectives which, in my opinion, will hardly be achieved through this measure, but on the other hand the bill will have a strong impact on many families.

I would also suggest that the government, intent as it is on setting its financial house in order through this piecemeal reform of social programs, has simply missed an opportunity to revamp the entire social security structure.

The economic and social costs of de-indexing family allowances will definitely be higher than any tax gains that can be expected. That is one of the main reasons why we must speak out against this piecemeal reform of the family allowances system. The first consequence of this measure will be still more poverty for families and, of course, for women and children who consider family allowances as a necessary source of income. A great many of them impatiently wait for this federal government cheque to buy essentials.

The other consideration we must keep in mind is that, for most women, this cheque in their name is the only income they can call their own. In that respect, I think the government is on the wrong track, and shows how little it understands and appreciates matters concerning women.

Family allowances are paid under a universal program from which all mothers benefit no matter what their income may be. For those mothers whose family income is enough or more than enough, the de-indexation of family allowances will not make much difference.

Naturally, as they are less dependent on family allowances to purchase the necessities of life, they will be marginally less affected by this de-indexation. The same cannot be said about the families for whom family allowances represent a large part of the income, for instance, women with a low family income.

In addition to the direct impact of de-indexation, we have to remember that, since these benefits are included in taxable income, women with a high enough income receive in fact family allowances which are lower, in any case, after taxes.

In summary, not only does the bill penalize women, but it penalizes the disadvantaged. This bill is selective because it is mainly and nearly exclusively aimed at women, and it is essentially regressive because it will affect women with lower incomes more than others.

In principle, unless there are major reasons to justify it, I believe that we should oppose any bill which is overly selective, relatively discriminatory and clearly regressive.

The major reason involved by the government to support this legislation was that it would reduce the federal deficit.

In my opinion, it is impossible to state with any certainty that the federal deficit will be substantially reduced.

It is even possible in view of the interrelationship of both federal and provincial social programs, that the costs of certain federal programs will decrease like Family Allowances, while those of certain provincial programs will increase. As far as I know, the policy of the federal government is not to reduce the federal deficit by increasing that of the provinces or of local welfare organizations.

If the aim is indeed to reduce the deficit, why not maintain indexation and modify the tax tables to recover from taxpayers in higher tax brackets a major part of the amounts necessary to support this program, or at least the equivalent of de-indexation?

In the final analysis, honourable senators, I cannot understand the motives of this government in continuing to support such a bill. The need to review family assistance programs, and more comprehensively, income security programs in Canada, to make them more effective and provide incentives to work is a fact that few people would dispute. Unfortunately, what is being suggested has nothing to do with such a comprehensive approach to the issue. It points to a piecemeal approach.

This band-aid approach surprises me all the more since, in its working paper of 1985, this same government seemed to be committed to a global approach under which all family assistance programs, of which the main ones are family allowances, the tax credit and the child tax exemption, would be reviewed.

Various options were then being considered. One was to maximize the assistance to low income families. Moreover, to assess the net impact of the various options, it was proposed to take into account not only the direct income transfers, but also the effects of the tax system as well as the mutual impacts of the various programs.

Without supporting the options which the government considered in his January 1985 consultation paper entitled "Child and Elderly Benefits", I must say it was a positive effort in that it addressed the issue as a whole.

With this document, the government wanted to help Canadians participate in the consultation process and set out the principles. What has been the result of these great intentions and principles? I believe precious little, honourable senators. The main budgetary and legislative measure resulting from this long process will be the de-indexation of family allowances.

All in all, the government's performance will show only a lack of initiative and originality in its effort to develop a federal social security package which is better and more efficient. Although we are told that the debate is not closed, the fact remains that the government has failed to launch a substantial debate on the issue of social and income security programs.

I think that this government could benefit from the experience of previous governments. It would also be well advised to study the findings of the Macdonald commission which provided worthwhile indications as to the comprehensiveness of social programs, and I quote from volume 2, page 803.

Rationalize the family-benefits system by redirecting money from the child tax exemption either to the child tax credit or to the Family Allowance and by adjusting the tax-back rates on those programs so as to ensure a uniformly progressive benefit system;

Generally, the Commission believes:

... that the provision of a Universal Income Security Program with relatively low guarantee levels and tax-back rates is an appropriate long-term goal for the Government of Canada and the provincial governments to pursue, in order to reform the current income-security system.

The government will introduce shortly a new budget. I am sure that Canadian men and women are impatiently looking forward to it, for they know quite well that this budget will reveal the government's real intentions. If the 1986 budget is in line with the previous budget, the Canadian people will have no difficulty understanding toward what sort of society we are moving. I thank you for your attention.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, for the second reading of the Bill C-82, intituled: "An Act to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act".—(Honourable Senator Hastings).

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I should like to address Bill C-82, if I may. As Senator Doody correctly indicated, it brings into effect one of the provisions of the Western Accord, primarily that portion of it which does away with the petroleum and gas revenue tax. In generally supporting that, I follow one of the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, which studied the National Energy Program in detail and which actually reached the same conclusions as those of the government to relieve the oil companies of paying that tax at this particular time. This comes as a direct result of conditions in the energy world. As was explained here today by Senator Doody and Senator Olson, that is an ever-changing world—one which requires corresponding changes in policy. The energy environment is unpredictable and has the habit of changing quickly, as is evident from what has happened since the National Energy Program was put into place in 1980.

If I had one criticism of the National Energy Program, it would be that it did not provide for change and that it locked us into high priced oil. There were times when we heard of $30, $40, $60 or even $80 oil, but the conditions which brought about a shortage of high priced oil in 1982 have since changed to result in a surplus of low priced oil. Unfortunately, the policy was not capable of reflecting that change quickly. It is interesting to note that we are legislating today provisions which may soon be outdated, when we consider the recent drop in price from $34 to $24 U.S. a barrel and considering that there is every indication that that price on the spot market will fall to under $20 U.S.

In light of these circumstances and conditions, we are prepared to support that provision of the bill that is before us today. Nevertheless, one cannot help but view with concern the disappearance of the policy of Canadianization. It does not seem to be one of the paramount goals of the present policy. We had in place a regime which brought about one of the largest oil discoveries in the Beaufort Sea, the Amauligak well, which would appear to have resulted in the discovery of one of the largest pools of oil on the North American continent. That came about as a result of the worthwhile provision of the petroleum incentive payments, and at least three Canadian companies have participated in that particular project.

One cannot help but view with concern an article which appeared in the Calgary Herald, which predicts that Canadians will no longer participate in the same way. I quote from this article:

Alberta oilmen expect the exploration frontier regions will no longer be the grant-laden playgrounds for smaller oil companies.

Instead, the Arctic and the offshore will become the stomping grounds of multinational companies seeking reward money under the new federal policy replacing the Petroleum Incentives Program.

With a week of new government policy digestion under their belts, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada is maintaining a stony silence while junior and mid-sized companies are still wearing down pencils assessing frontier activity under a new fiscal regime.

But a general consensus is emerging that development in the North and offshore East Coast will be left primarily to major oil companies while the junior independents retreat from their frontier supporting role to the relatively quick money of Western Canada.

It seems to me that the policy of Canadianization is still worth while and that it should not be abandoned. Our Arctic and eastern offshore areas should not be left to the benefit of the multinationals.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact that in past years we created a Canadian drilling capacity on the east coast that could search for and find oil, under similar circumstances, on the same level as any multinational company. That is a Canadian effort and it is one of the worthwhile goals that was set and attained under the National Energy Program. I think it is important, too, that we see whether the multinational oil companies will live up to their promises to be a driving force in the Canadian economy. At the moment, we do not know the extent to which those oil companies will be able to keep their promises about reinvestment and job creation. They promised a great deal in that search for decontrol. We have now created an environment of decontrol as they requested, except that it is at a time when we have an excess supply of oil rather than a shortage. The oil industry will now have an opportunity to deliver on those promises.

• (1520)

As I said, we are in a period of changing circumstances and conditions with respect to energy policy. Your Energy Committee intends to monitor those changes on a day-to-day basis in order to put in place a long-term Canadian policy with respect to energy, a policy that will be able to react to those changing circumstances on practically a daily basis. We are endeavouring to approach with the same diligence some of the most significant long-term issues that face Canada's energy policy today. I refer to issues such as security of supply, which continues to be our most important consideration. We cannot afford to become complacent and to find ourselves again at the mercy of foreign suppliers. Other issues of importance are jobs, the availability of Canadian resources to all Canadians and the many other issues which directly touch on our economy and the welfare of all Canadians. Your Energy Committee intends to keep those goals in front of it, as we are doing now in our study of the pricing and distribution of gas both on the domestic market and the foreign market, and the production and marketing of crude oil on the Canadian market and foreign markets. With those remarks, honourable senators, I am pleased to support the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody. As he indicated, the bill received advance study by the committee as well as study by the committee on energy, and I see no reason for it to go to committee.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of the bill under rules 28, 29 and 30.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I simply want to thank Senator Hastings for his remarks and to move second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

DIVORCE ACT (BILL TO AMEND)
DIVORCE BILL, 1985
FAMILY ORDERS AND AGREEMENTS
ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved second reading of Bill C-46, to amend the Divorce Act; Bill C-47, respecting divorce and corollary relief; and Bill C-48, to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to speak to Bills C-46, 47 and 48 together, and I am sure that my counterpart on the other side would like to do so as well.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, these three bills have been dealt with as a package in the other place and were dealt with in our committee in the same way. I think that we should give leave to Senator Nurgitz to speak to the second reading of these three bills at the same time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am pleased to speak to these measures at second reading. I am sure that honourable senators are aware of the reference that was made in this chamber to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to pre-study these bills. I am sure that all of you have read with great interest the Eighth Report and Ninth Report of that committee.

Senator Frith: On our side we speak of little else.

Senator MacDonald: I couldn't put it down.

Senator Nurgitz: Then perhaps I do not have to say any more.

The matters of divorce, corollary relief and enforcement of maintenance orders are priorities of this government and this fact was outlined in the Speech from the Throne. I should mention in as non-partisan a fashion as I can that the previous administration introduced in May or June 1984 legislation—perhaps not in an identical form but in a similar form—dealing with the same problems. I should like to mention as well the fact that the committee recommends in both the Eighth Report and the Ninth Report that it has reservations about the legislation in some instances and that it made some very serious and effective suggestions to the minister. Some of those suggestions—

Senator Frith: Found favour.

Senator Nurgitz: Found favour, yes. I do not know whether it is the fact that the suggestions were so good or that they were explained so well to the minister by the committee, but he had the wisdom to accept some of them. Some of the topics, if they found their way into the considerations of the House of Commons committee, certainly did not find their way into their recommendations. It was not until our committee dealt with them that they were brought before the minister.

[The Hon. the Speaker:]

With regard to divorce reform and Bill C-47 specifically, I want to express the appreciation of all honourable senators to Senator Neiman and the committee for having taken the time and made the effort to hear a number of witnesses, specifically witnesses who had tried in vain to be heard by the committee of the House of Commons. It was the approach of our committee to try to get the views of people who had not been heard by the Commons committee. We heard testimony from a large number of witnesses and from a wide sample of knowledgeable people in this area of law. They all informed us of how they perceived the proposed legislation. I think it is fair to say that, on balance, reform of divorce law and the introduction of the corollary relief sections were well received.

I want to say a few words about the concerns expressed in our reports which were tabled in the house on November 28, 1985. The first concern was over jurisdiction, specifically clause 3, which requires that a spouse be ordinarily resident in a province for one year prior to being in a position to file divorce proceedings. It was our committee's suggestion that the time be decreased. That is, it took the view that the requirement to be in the province for an entire year could cause hardship. For example, a couple living in Newfoundland moves to British Columbia in search of work. A dispute arises and the wife goes home to Newfoundland, all the way across the nation. She would have to wait for one year before she could commence divorce proceedings or before the Newfoundland courts could have jurisdiction. We attempted to convince the government that it should reduce that period to six months, because we anticipated the practice of forum-shopping arising. That is, we might have what occurs in other jurisdictions. I do not know whether it is appropriate today, but at one time there was the view that in the State of Nevada, United States of America, one could get a divorce easily.

Senator Frith: The jurisdiction was easy because residence and time were all you needed.

● (1530)

Senator Nurgitz: Of course, and on one occasion I was just passing through one of the cities of that state and was keen to see why it worked so easily. I went into the courtroom and sat there and when they called the case, what I would call a "professional landlord" appeared. He was put into the witness box and took out a little book and said: "Yes, Ann Jones rented accommodation at my rooming house on such and such a date,"—which was six weeks and one day earlier—"and I issued receipt number 47 to her for the rent." I suspect that he had a three-room rooming house but, that morning, he testified in approximately 15 cases. So that is how they establish jurisdiction. I am not sure that the people stayed at that rooming house, but that was all the proof that one needed.

In any event, anticipating the argument that the government might make that there would be forum-shopping if we had too short a period, and that in some provinces, not through dishonest effort but simply that some judges would start applying the law differently from the way it was applied in other jurisdictions, that people would tend to move if it was made convenient and find an easier forum for their problem, whether it be a husband or a wife, we thought that six months would be too long for someone who was just looking for an easier court system and easier rules. However, the government has argued that, since the courts dealing with divorce generally are creatures of the provincial authorities, and certainly are administered by them as they are responsible for the administration of justice under federal and provincial laws, in order to ask the court for relief or divorce, there must be some connection between the spouse seeking the divorce and the court empowered to grant it. Reducing that time frame could still ensure that connection, we thought. However, it would also allow for harassment by one spouse who simply wanted to move away to cause difficulties. These were the arguments presented to the minister.

There was also the argument made that with mobility in many job fields that, for example, miserable husbands might move off to make it more difficult for their wives to seek redress.

Moreover, reducing the residence requirement within a province, if it were to be done, would need to be accompanied by a parallel reduction of the same requirements to recognize divorces granted by other countries, and that was perhaps a more compelling argument. Otherwise, Canada would be accused of applying double standards: one for its own residents and another for residents of other countries.

Given the number of situations that such a reduction in residence requirements would help, balanced against the possibility of artificially conferring a far-distant court with jurisdiction on divorce just for the sake of harassment by a spouse, it may not be desirable to pursue such an amendment. In any event, that was not found to be acceptable by the government.

In relation to the grounds for divorce, that is, marriage breakdown and possible evidence of adultery and cruelty, our proposal was that once the year had passed we wanted a spouse to be able to use the ground of marriage breakdown and the one-year separation only. In other words, to take the adversarial aspect and conflict out of the problem. Frankly, I personally had a view that was, as I recall, different from that of the other members of the committee. I was of the view that no matter how the divorce was framed, if a year had passed between the time of the separation and the time of the hearing, judges should grant a divorce only on the grounds of marriage breakdown. However, that view was considered by my colleagues on the committee to be at variance with their view. Their view was that if a divorce was commenced more than one year after the separation, the ground of one-year separation only could be used.

The minister has rejected that on the basis that it would have defeated one of the reasons why adultery and cruelty as proof of marriage breakdown had been retained. He said that, for moral or religious reasons, a spouse may wish to ask for and obtain a divorce for adultery or cruelty because he or she has been victimized by the other. This is a policy which is questioned by many, including members of our committee, but we can accept that the alternative of a one-year separation is attractive enough that it will convince many spouses to rely on it.

Concerning clause 11, our proposal was that support issues regarding children should not be a bar to divorce between parents. Our international obligations are to the effect of providing for children on divorce. The bill does this. The government has accepted our proposal and, therefore, this bar to divorce has been eliminated. If parents cannot provide for their children in this country, as has been talked about at great length in this chamber within the last two days, we have a social security system that will tend those who cannot be looked after by their own parents.

However, I should mention that when dealing with this matter the House of Commons has not extended the same protection of staying the proceedings until arrangements for the support of a spouse are made. It was argued that it could ultimately result in spouses, legitimately not in a position to provide support possibly for a long period of time, being denied the right to a divorce. This would result in different standards for the rich and the poor. We must confess that this is an argument that probably does have some merit.

In relation to clause 16 and its possible ambiguity, an appropriate amendment has been adopted by the House of Commons as we had suggested.

Senator Frith: What was the subject matter of clause 16?

Senator Nurgitz: Clause 16 related to custody orders. You will recall that we had some considerable debate on that.

When we come to clause 17 and the requirement that there be a "change" of circumstances to allow a variation of time-limited support orders, the government did not support an amendment to expressly permit an application for a variation order in the situation where there has been no change in the circumstances of the applicant spouse, as was anticipated at the time of the making of the order. Here we are talking about a situation where the time is about to run out on a time-limited order and where there has been no change in circumstances. The question is, do you then say, "Instead of it being a five-year order, the order will run indefinitely."?

Leaving the bill in its present form provides for greater certainty to both spouses. The only situation in which a variation would be permitted would be if there had been a change of circumstances. The courts have already determined under a similar provision that where a dependent spouse has honestly tried to change his or her circumstances and failed for reasons beyond his or her control, that spouse can obtain a variation and continued support if it is reasonable.

What we had proposed would have specifically cured the problem of a dependent spouse who had honestly tried to change his or her circumstances but could not. The disadvantage, however, was to open the support provision to abuse by a spouse who had not fully tried to change the circumstances. It would also allow for variation until employment is actually found which, in turn, could put the entire responsibility for employment conditions on the ex-spouse providing support. It may be abusive in the case of a short-term marriage, I'm afraid.

With regard to clause 26—that is the provision of the bill allowing the Governor General-in-Council to make regulations for carrying out the purposes and provisions of the act—when this matter was before the committee, I had been urged, as joint chairman of the Regulations and other Statutory Instruments Committee, to deal with the minister on the basis of not having that kind of provision on the grounds that we now have far too much legislation where the Governor-in-Council can pass regulations for doing this, that or the other. In fact, I am pleased and proud to say that our committee was able to convince the minister that the divorce registry, as contemplated in the act, should be established by statute and not by regulation and is now fully covered in the bill.

Divorce allows remarriage. Statistics indicate that most divorced people actually remarry. I do not recall the statistic at the moment, but it is approximately 70 or 75 per cent.

● (1540)

During consideration of this bill, not so much before our committee but certainly before the House of Commons committee, representations were made concerning barriers to remarriage which may apply to persons of certain religions. They were not referring to civil divorce, which we are addressing here, but to the fact that, in some faiths, there is a requirement for a religious divorce before one can remarry in that house of worship or in that faith. Those representations were made very late. In fact, I recall no such representations having been made to our committee, but they were made both to the minister and to the House of Commons committee. The representation was made that where one spouse refuses to co-operate in the obtaining of religious or church documents, a divorce ought not to be granted to that person.

Honourable senators, this is a complex matter. As I indicated, it was raised at a late stage. There are some concerns on constitutional grounds and others as to how this matter ought to be addressed.

The Minister of Justice in the other place, speaking on third reading of the bill just the other day, has undertaken to deal with this matter expeditiously. He has instructed his officials to establish some consultative process with representative groups. He has assured the House that the government will give sympathetic and careful consideration to this issue and that an equitable solution will be found, if at all possible, and as soon as possible.

Accompanying the divorce bill is proposed complementary legislation: the Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Bill. This bill provides two remedies to assist in combatting the national scandal of an 80-per-cent default rate on support payments. Regrettably, that is a Canadian statistic. The bill also provides for assistance in locating children abducted by non-custodial parents, as well as children hidden from access parents by the custodial parent. The poverty, the material and emotional misery caused by these support and custody battles necessitate the federal government's acting to assist in the enforcement of corollary orders. This is the goal of the new enforcement bill.

The bill provides for the release of limited information from designated information banks of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of the Department of Employment and Immigration to trace a missing spouse or child where there has been a breach of a support or custody order. As well, it provides that federal moneys, such as income tax refunds, may be garnisheed where support payments are in default.

Honourable senators, I am sure all honourable senators will have read the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and will have noted that, while the committee did not oppose this legislation, it did indicate that there were some concerns expressed by the Privacy Commissioner and others. It also indicated to the government that this ought to be monitored carefully.

This bill, like the divorce bill, was reviewed by our committee. The Minister of Justice, in his speech to the committee on December 3, 1985, spoke to the concerns the committee raised in its report. With regard to the release-of-information remedy, the bill strikes the appropriate balance between the need to provide effective assistance to enforce corollary orders, on the one hand, and on the other, the need to protect the right to privacy of the individual.

I will not review in full the protections provided in the bill, but I do wish to highlight a few. Information can be released only to enforce corollary orders and for no other purpose. Only information banks of the Department of National Health and Welfare and of the Department of Employment and Immigration can be searched. Only the address of the missing person and the name and address of his or her employer can be released. In most instances a court order is required. The information can only be released to a court, a police force or a provincial service authorized by law to enforce corollary orders.

The information will be released under the terms of an agreement to be signed with the provinces, which is still being negotiated. The agreement will provide safeguards to ensure the information is only used to enforce corollary orders and for no other purpose.

Regarding the garnishment of federal moneys, this process was designed to provide the creditor spouse with a remedy which reflects that available under provincial law against third parties such as an employer of the debtor spouse. In other words, we are saying that the old notion that Her Majesty the Queen in right of Canada cannot be named in the garnishment order for the purposes of enforcement of maintenance orders no longer applies. That will no longer be the case. Garnishment, therefore, is obtained pursuant to provincial law. The bill has been drafted to accommodate the variations that exist in provincial law in this regard. The federal government will respond as promptly as possible, and the garnishee summons will bind the designated federal moneys for at least one year.

The new enforcement bill also provides a balanced approach to meeting the widespread problem of support default and the urgent problem of children missing, contrary to a custody order or access right.

The government has foreseen the need to evaluate the impact and effectiveness of the bill, and the preliminary work for such an evaluation by the Department of Justice has already begun. In this fashion, the government will discharge its responsibility to ensure that the legislation and the services provided under the legislation accomplish the intended goal of enforcement of corollary orders.

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs conducted a very detailed study of the five major recommendations. Two have been completely accepted and a third has been accepted in part.

Together, Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48 provide a new foundation for federal family law. They deal with an unfortunate social reality in a modern and humane fashion and will, I believe, prove to be progressive in their operation.

Honourable senators, I urge passage of these bills.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

CENTRE BLOCK—REMOVAL OF PORTRAITS OF BRITISH PRIME MINISTERS—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Hicks, calling the attention of the Senate to the removal of the portraits of former British Prime Ministers from the sixth floor of the Centre Block of the Parliament Buildings.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, perhaps I can dispose of this inquiry by making only a few remarks in closing the debate.

I still stand by the observations I made in the beginning. I think our heritage and traditions are improved by exercises such as that of hanging the portraits of the British Prime Ministers, up to the present time, somewhere in this building. I think the corridor on the sixth floor, leading to the Parliamentary Restaurant, was a very good place, indeed, for them. I am sure a great many of us have not only amused ourselves but added to our knowledge of history by looking at those portraits as we were making our way to or from the Parliamentary Restaurant.

My good friend, Senator Corbin, thinks that the positioning of these portraits was inappropriate. I can understand that different Canadians place a different kind of emphasis on the heritage which has led to the development of Canada and to the development of the characteristics of this country. I am one who acknowledges to the full the contribution that Canadians of French expression or French background have made to this country. Indeed, I can claim at least three ancestors of Acadian background myself, so I do not feel that I am completely out in left field in this respect.

Nevertheless, we must recognize that, so far as our parliamentary institutions are concerned, they primarily owe their existence in their original form and in their present form to those customs and traditions which we have inherited from the Mother of Parliaments at Westminster, to which we owe, indeed, our parliamentary system.

• (1550)

Indeed, our parliamentary system—and this applies, interestingly enough, to the one province in Canada which is of primarily French origin, and that is the province of Quebec—and the legislatures of the provinces of Canada are largely modelled upon the procedures, traditions, forms and formalities of the Parliament at Westminster. For that reason I do not think it inappropriate for us to acknowledge, as we did for so many years, the Prime Ministers of that Parliament at Westminster by having their photographs hung in the corridors of this Parliament. However, I have made my point and I do not think I need say much more.

There are two points that require some comment. I do not know whether it was Senator Corbin who suggested this, or whether it was a suggestion of the Parliamentary Spouses' Association, but someone suggested these photographs be replaced with photographs of Canadian Prime Ministers. Well, that is unnecessary. There are oil paintings of every Prime Minister of Canada displayed more prominently in some part of this building than the corridor on the sixth floor leading to the Parliamentary Restaurant. So, it is not necessary for us to duplicate those portraits by having photographs of Canadian Prime Ministers in the place formerly occupied by the photographs of the British Prime Ministers.

The second point that I should like to comment upon is the observation that was contained in the remarks of my friend, the Honourable Senator Corbin, and that is that we might leave the photographs of the good British Prime Ministers there. I think he singled out Prime Minister Churchill as being one whose photograph he would be glad to see left in a prominent place in this building.

I do not want to be one of those on the team that has to decide which British Prime Ministers were the good ones and which were the bad ones, any more than I would like to be on the team that had to decide which of the Canadian Prime Ministers were the good ones and which were the bad ones; though that may very well be an exercise in which Senator Corbin and I could quite readily reach agreement. No, I do not think we could select what either Senator Corbin or myself regard as being the good Prime Ministers, excellent though I believe our judgments are, whether we are talking about British Prime Ministers or Canadian Prime Ministers.

Honourable senators, I have recorded my views. I do not think this is a matter on which the Parliament of Canada is going to stand or fall, but I think it is a pity when we remove these little evidences of our heritage from the building in which so many of us spend so much of our time.

I close by reminding honourable senators once again of the words of the Honourable Joseph Howe who put this matter so well when he said:

A wise nation preserves its records, gathers up its muniments, decorates the tombs of its illustrious dead, repairs its great public structures and ever fosters love of country and national pride by perpetual reference to the sacrifices and glories of the past.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in his comments the Honourable Senator Hicks alluded to the fact that I may have been motivated to make the comments I did about the removal of the photographs of the British Prime Ministers by ethnic considerations.

That was not the basis of my motivation; in fact, I made no such comment in that respect. I thought I had addressed the question on its own merit. Therefore, I would not want my position to be misrepresented. The fact that I am a French Canadian has not, in any way, shape or form entered into the comments I have made, and I do not see why the honourable senator would make comments that allude to the fact that I am a "Canadien". I was not motivated by that fact when I spoke on this matter at all.

I should now like to make a suggestion to the honourable senator, if he is open to compromise. At Government House we have entered, in chronological order, the names of all of the former Governors of Canada, beginning with the French régime, following right through to this day, and one day the present Governor General, the Honourable Jeanne Sauvé, will also have her name inscribed on those wooden plaques. If indeed the object of Senator Hicks is to retain the mementoes of the past, and to retain the photographs of the former British Prime Ministers, would he not agree that we should also, if they are available—and I am sure they are available from the French Public Archives, the Canadian Archives, the Province of Quebec Archives, and perhaps even in some of the Acadian Archives at the University of Moncton—display portraits of the French King's First Minister along with the British Prime Ministers? Would Senator Hicks not see that as an accommodation that would please everyone in this country? If we are to go back to the roots of our history, let us go back to the very deep roots of our history.

Having said that—and before Senator Hicks answers—I think that does nothing for the native people of this country, those who were the first inhabitants of the country we both occupy as French and English, along with all of the other ethnic populations that have come to this country and made it the great country that it is today.

So, following up on the comments of Senator Hicks, I make those suggestions. I would be interested to hear his response.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I do not want to prolong this debate indefinitely. Senator Corbin has raised a number of points to which I should like to reply, and I will try to do so very briefly.

[Senator Hicks.]

First of all, the reasons that he imputed to me were what he inferred from my remarks and were not explicitly stated by me nor were they explicitly meant.

I certainly accept his statement that he was not at all motivated by what he called "ethnic considerations" in the remarks that he made. That is neither here nor there. The second point he made—actually, it was the third one—was that we might have, at some suitable place, the First Ministers of the regimes in France. I think I made it sufficiently clear why I felt that the British Prime Ministers, in the Parliament of Canada, deserved a place which could not be afforded to the Prime Ministers of France—because it was the Parliament at Westminster from which we derived our parliamentary institutions, and, insofar as this Parliament is concerned, I think we would look to the Parliament at Westminster rather than the Quai d'Orsay in listing the progenitors, if you like, of our system here in Canada.

• (1600)

My final point in connection with Senator Corbin's remarks is an interesting one. It is the reference that he made to the Governors General of Canada beginning with the French regime. May I point out to him—and I am now referring to the list of Governors General that is posted in Rideau Hall—that they do not begin with the beginning of the French regime in Canada. The French regime in Canada began in Acadia in Port Royale and the first Governor of Canada was an Acadian. He was not the Quebecois who became the Governor of Canada in 1608, but the Governor who became the Governor of Canada in 1605 at Port Royale; and if we are going to put it in the record of our history, then we should start there and not with the Governors that formed what became la belle province de Quebec some three years later.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a brief question for Senator Hicks. Knowing that Mrs. Hicks is an active participant in the Parliamentary Spouses' Association, which caused this whole matter to come to a head, and knowing the honourable senator's opposition to their particular action, I wonder whether he can inform the Senate whether this has had any serious, adverse effect on their relationship.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I am glad to inform the chamber, if it is relevant, that my wife and I are still living happily together and, indeed, she is in the gallery at the present moment.

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I would be sorry to augment the sadness of my respected friend, Senator Hicks, but he will surely recall that in the East Block, on the main stairs, we had portraits of all of the Governors General of the English regime. They disappeared. I think that is sad, and I agree with the honourable senator's sadness at the disappearance of the link with our foundations.

Senator Hicks: I thank the honourable senator and will make only one concluding remark. When it comes to the recording of our history in this respect, those honourable senators who have been fortunate enough to be invited to Government House in Halifax will know that there is posted there a list of all of the Governors of Acadia beginning with the French Governors of that land commencing in 1605 in Port Royale. So, in Nova Scotia, we do begin at the beginning of our history and we acknowledge that the beginning of our history in this respect is derived from those hardy and intrepid French settlers who first came to the land of Acadie.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: May I inform honourable senators that if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

HEALTH

ILL EFFECTS OF SMOKING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the ill effects of smoking to smokers and non-smokers alike.—
(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, this order has been standing in my name for some time. After the excellent presentation, dissertation, or whatever, given by Senator Frith yesterday—

Senator McElman: Never mind the editorial!

Senator Petten: Thank you, Senator McElman. After hearing Senator Frith's excellent dissertation yesterday, I shall not take part in this debate at present, and I would make the suggestion that if no other honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate, we could consider it as having been debated. If any honourable senator wishes to speak, I am sure that he or she can follow Senator Phillips on the motion placed on the order paper by Senator Frith yesterday.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: No. Honourable senators, I am not quite sure what Senator Petten is trying to accomplish. Is he suggesting that we close the debate on Senator Frith's motion? Would he mind repeating what he said?

Senator Petten: I was not making a statement as to what should be done. I made the suggestion that if no other honourable senator wished to take part in this particular debate—

Senator Doody: Not Senator Frith's motion.

Senator Petten: Not Senator Frith's motion. If no other honourable senator wished to take part in this debate—motion 19 on the order paper—but they wished to speak on this particular subject, I am sure he or she could do so on the motion that Senator Frith placed on the order paper yesterday. I merely made that suggestion.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, this inquiry was initiated by me. Senator Hays indicated at one time that he might wish to make an intervention on this subject. Also, I should like to conclude this debate myself. Therefore I move the adjournment of the debate in my own name.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, January 28, 1986, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, I am sure that all honourable senators are shocked at and abhor the incidents of terrorism, whatever the cause espoused or the location of the incident. I am sure each of us recalls with horror and sadness the slaughter of young and innocent people in those mindless terrorist incidents in the Rome and Vienna airports at Christmas; the grief and anger of Mr. Edward Leonard of Alberta over the death of his wife and infant son in the EgyptAir hijacking; or the despair and bewilderment etched in the face of Mrs. Marilyn Klinghoffer as she was assisted from the "Achille Lauro", the site of her husband's brutal execution.

• (1610)

Like most Canadians, however, I suspect we still tend to be complacent about terrorism. Terrorism is something that happens elsewhere—in Beirut, Italy, Germany, Israel, Northern Ireland, South Africa—and is directed at someone else—at the U.S. or Israel, at a rival religious faction or at an unpopular foreign government. Even in those rare instances when Canadian nationals are involved, the site of the incident is usually outside Canada and the unfortunate Canadians are implicated only as innocent bystanders. Terrorism has not yet infected the Canadian body politic and remains something quite at odds with Canadian history and "the Canadian way." But terrorism has touched Canadians and Canada, abroad and at home.

Honourable senators, let me run through a brief chronological catalogue. We all recall the incidents in the early 1970s of bombings, kidnappings and murder perpetrated in Quebec by the FLQ, leading ultimately to the use of the War Measures Act for the first and only time during peacetime. I think we all recognize that the War Measures Act was and continues to be an inappropriate mechanism to deal with the problem of domestic or international terrorism.

More recently, since 1982 there have been three attacks on Turkish diplomats here in Ottawa, allegedly by Armenian terrorists. Several lives were lost, injuries sustained and property damaged. These incidents led to claims by the Turkish government that Canada had not provided adequate security to Turkish diplomats in Canada.

In October 1982 members of a terrorist group were arrested for their part in bombing the Litton Industries plant outside Toronto. This incident followed several other bombings and arson incidents perpetrated by the same group in British Columbia. In April 1985 an Armenian group paralyzed commuter traffic in Toronto for days with a threat to blow up a portion of the Toronto Transit Commission subway lines. There were attacks on the Indian Consul General's offices in Vancouver and a personal attack on the Indian chargé d'affaires in Winnipeg. These incidents prompted the Indian government to complain formally about the Canadian government's "lenient attitude" towards terrorist groups.

Also in 1985, a bomb planted on a CP Air flight from Vancouver exploded, killing two baggage handlers in Tokyo. Three hundred and twenty-nine people died on Air-India flight 182 originating in Toronto, likely because of terrorism. One hundred and eighty-two of the victims were Canadian—90 of them children. These two aircraft incidents prompted claims by the Indian government that Canada is "soft on terrorism"; that Canada was becoming a haven for terrorists and that Canada was a significant source of funding for terrorist groups. Incidentally, if terrorism was in fact its cause, the Air-India crash gave Canada a lamentable distinction: flights originating in Canada have been implicated in over half of all the deaths attributed to acts of terrorism against aircraft—over half.

Several weeks ago the government put extraordinary security precautions in place in airports in Toronto, Ottawa and Montreal to guard against a threatened terrorist incident. The incident proved to be a hoax, but demonstrated our increasing exposure and vulnerability to such threats. On January 21 the Romanian consulate in Montreal was attacked by a gunman, seriously injuring a Romanian national inside.

A recognized Canadian expert, Nicholas Stethem, maintains that Canada is not immune to terrorist activities. Although violent actions to date have been the exception, several international terrorist organizations are active in Canada in fund-raising, low level political activity in expatri-ate communities, intelligence gathering, and, in some cases, weapons procurement. There is no reason for Canada to be exempt from terrorism, and we are not. Canadians have no right, therefore, to be complacent.

I am not an alarmist, honourable senators, but I speculate that terrorist activities based in or directed against Canada could well increase.

For example, the Canadian government's recent decision to join the U.S. in sanctions aimed at Libya, which I personally support, could well raise Canada's visibility in the eyes of pro-Libyan terrorist groups and increase Canada's exposure as a potential target of terrorist actions. We need to be particularly concerned about this eventuality when one realizes that the nations that took sanctions against Libya over the Rome and Vienna incidents constitute a small group: the United States, Canada and Italy. Recently, the European Community has come out in support of a joint embargo on arms sales to Libya. However, this does not change my point: Canada has enhanced its visibility on this subject of terrorism.

I can only speculate, but the threatened terrorist action against a Canadian flight to the United States on the 18th, 19th and 20th of January probably had a ring of truth because of the alleged involvement of Libyan nationals. Furthermore, the incidents of international terrorism are multiplying at a horrendous rate. In 1984, the last year for which figures are available, there were 1,925 recorded victims of terrorist actions; that is twice the total for 1983. I expect that we will see even grimmer figures for 1985, especially if the Air-India crash is proven to have resulted from a terrorist's bomb. Terrorism is becoming more frequent, more international, more sophisticated, more indiscriminate and more brutal. There is no particular reason for believing that Canada will be immune from this increased threat. In fact, because of our proximity to the U.S., the opposite could well be the case.

My concern is that Canada could become the focus of more terrorist activity or the haven for terrorists wishing to take action against the United States or against their opponents in Canada. Our problem is that we do not really know much about terrorism, and I think we should know more.

We do not know enough about the extent to which terrorist groups are locating or have located in Canada, and I think we should know more. I do not think we know enough about the actions Canada can and should take or is taking to combat international terrorism. I think we should know more.

The role of the media has also been the focus of comment and concern. I quote from a recent article by Michael R. Marrus, published in the January 21 edition of the Toronto Star. He says: "Without electronic coverage of their horrors, it seems unlikely that many terrorists would think their savagery worthwhile."

Another commentator on the subject, Walter Laqueur, referring to television coverage of terrorist activities, calls terrorists "the super-entertainers of our time."

In the fight against terrorism, what should the role of the media be in reporting terrorists' threats, in being used as a conduit to communicate terrorists' demands and propaganda, in reporting on terrorist incidents and in assisting in the resolution of terrorist kidnappings, hijackings or whatever?

Without media coverage—particularly television coverage—I suspect that the frequency and perhaps even the brutality of terrorist incidents would decrease. But in curtailing or regulating media coverage, we face a fundamental conundrum posed by the basic and inalienable freedom of speech and association. A similar conundrum would occur should the Canadian government wish—as the Reagan administration has done for Americans—to restrict Canadians from travel to or working in certain terrorist “hot spots” around the globe. But without these kinds of powers, how can the Canadian government be expected to protect adequately its citizens abroad? This is another area that, I believe, deserves study.

Honourable senators, I have thought a great deal about this issue over the past several months. As I am sure you have, I have been shocked and disgusted by the escalating terrorist violence and the indiscriminate slaughter of innocent people. I wonder if Canada knows enough about terrorism and its role in and impact on Canada. I wonder if the Canadian government is in a position to protect itself and its citizens adequately against terrorists' outrage.

There will be a problem of definition. What constitutes “terrorism” or a “terrorist act”? Given the range of terrorist activities, a definition is difficult. I suggest, however, that we not get bogged down in that discussion now. I think that that could well be left to the committee that I propose.

I recognize the concerns of some of my colleagues about the extra financial burden imposed on the Senate by such a committee. My deputy leader assigned to me the responsibility to deal with this question to some extent at this time. In a general sense, such preoccupations are legitimate and we should each be concerned about cost, about efficiency and about economy. At the appropriate time, however, the Internal Economy Committee of the Senate will be able to review and approve the committee's proposed budget. In our concern over cost, however, we should not lose sight of our priorities. Currently operating in the Senate are special committees on youth, national defence, and a joint committee on Canada's international relations, all of which are very important and very worth while. However, I think we have to ask the question: Should they be more worth while than an examination of the impact of terrorism on Canada? I hope we never reach the point in this chamber of first come first served, where worthwhile inquiries are postponed or go by the boards because there are several other special inquiries under way.

• (1620)

About the only way I can deal with this next matter, since the committee does not exist and, therefore, has not met to discuss the way in which it would carry out its business, to respond to my instructions from Senator Doody is to say that I am advised that a committee of this size, functioning across the time frame suggested in my motion, would be able to complete its task at a cost that should not reasonably be expected to exceed $175,000. Of course, the committee itself would have to decide, but it is my view that it would not need to travel, that its work could be done here in Ottawa. There is extensive research information on terrorist activities abroad, in Western Europe and in the Middle East, that can be examined and considered here. There is no need to travel there. There is a substantial number of men and women in Canada who have examined and written on the subject extensively and who could be invited—and I think that they would be pleased to accept—to appear before the committee in Ottawa. Therefore, I believe that the costs can be contained within reasonable limits. I point out that the government apparently spent several millions of dollars over a reported terrorist threat in January that turned out to be a hoax. Was that additional expenditure worth it? Of course it was. There was really no choice. I think we should keep this in mind when considering the need for the committee we are discussing today.

In my view, if the committee I propose helps us better to combat terrorism, saves one life or avoids a repetition of the Air-India crash, our time, energy and other resources will be well spent. That is what the proposed special Senate committee on terrorism is all about. I hope that honourable senators will support the creation of this committee in response to what I feel is an imminent and most serious danger.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, while I support the motion by Senator Kelly, I do not rise at this time to speak in general support of the creation and activities of this committee. I rise merely to make a few remarks about his concern about the cost of such a committee. Frankly, I am appalled that we give any consideration at all to matters of this kind. Here we are, one of the two arms of the Parliament of Canada. If there is something that we should do, we should not have to base our decision on whether it is going to cost another $100,000 or another $500,000 or another $1 million.

I ask honourable senators to consider the budget of Canada. We need only to look at the alacrity with which the present Government of Canada found hundreds of millions of dollars to pay to the depositors of two banks which failed recently. Most of this money will go to large corporations and a great many of them are not even corporations domiciled in Canada. I do not know how we can take ourselves seriously in this chamber if we are going to concern ourselves over the trifling costs of operating a committee such as the one that Senator Kelly has proposed.

I had intended to make this speech or similar remarks in relation to some other mercenary attitudes toward the cost of running the Senate. I am almost tempted to say it is no wonder that some people do not take us very seriously if we concern ourselves more with the legitimate expenditure of a few thousands of dollars in a matter like this than with matters which enable members of this chamber to perform our duties as we see them and to get on with performing the functions which we believe we can do well and which we believe ought to be done.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate, but I am not sure that I have anything further to say about the matter.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 4, 1986 at 2 p.m.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Lowell Murray, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Tuesday, February 4, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-84, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act" has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, January 28, 1986, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment, but with the following observations:

Source Deductions

The Committee has received submissions from the Canadian Insolvency Association and the Canadian Bankers' Association with respect to Clause 118 of the Bill which creates a separate trust for amounts deducted and withheld to be remitted to Her Majesty and creates a prior charge for such amounts.

The Committee, in its Twelfth Report, supported these proposed measures noting that employees of bankrupt firms would not be prejudiced as they would get credit for amounts deducted or withheld when computing their taxes.

However, practical problems have been brought to your Committee's attention with respect to the government's priority. If it were to become evident that there would not be sufficient funds in a bankrupt firm's estate to meet the government's priority and to cover a trustee's fees and expenses, trustees would refuse to administer the bankrupt estate. There would be no mechanism to collect remaining accounts after the Crown is satisfied; there would be no one to safeguard creditors' rights; and there would be no one to look for fraudulent preferences and other improper transactions.

The Committee also notes the Report of the Advisory Committee on Bankruptcy and Insolvency dated January 3, 1986 which has recommended that the priority of the Crown should be totally abolished and that all claims of the Crown should rank in the same priority as unsecured creditors.

The Committee questions whether it is proper to introduce these amendments while amendments to the Bankruptcy Act are under consideration. The Committee hopes that the concerns raised before us will be addressed in the review of the Bankruptcy Act.

Retroactive Legislation

The Committee was of the view that the retroactive provisions of Bill C-84 noted in its Twelfth Report constituted an extremely bad precedent.

The Committee has expressed particular concern to the Minister of Finance regarding the effective date of the new provisions affecting lease-inducement payments. In response to the Committee's concerns, the Minister has undertaken to propose an amendment to the Income Tax Act which would exclude from the new provisions lease-inducement payments received under a written agreement made before the May 23, 1985 Budget was tabled. At the time of announcing the date of a budget, the Minister of Finance has also undertaken to inform taxpayers that budgetary measures will be effective at midnight of the day before the budget unless otherwise stated in the budget.

Deferred Profit-sharing Plans

The Profit Sharing Council of Canada has brought to the attention of the Committee a technical problem arising from Clauses 55 and 83 of the Bill. The problem relates to the taxation of unrealized gains accumulated while shares of an employer corporation are held in a deferred profit-sharing plan and which are delivered to a withdrawing member who makes an election pursuant to sub-section 147(10.1) of the Income Tax Act. Under the pre-budget rules, such gains were not taxed until a member disposed of the shares and then the gains were taxed as capital gains. However, Clauses 55 and 83 of the Bill operate in such a manner that a disposition of such assets held on May 22, 1985 would result in any gain being taxed fully as income.

This result was unintended and the Committee is pleased to note that the Minister of Finance has undertaken to introduce amending legislation with retroactive effect at the earliest opportunity.

Respectfully submitted,

LOWELL MURRAY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator MacDonald, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, and before putting it I am happy to say that he is in that position at this time based on his many years of experience.

I have been informed that today the Canadian dollar, in relationship to the American dollar, hit the all-time low of 69 cents. This wallowing in despair is, I suggest, caused by instability. My question is this: In view of the undoubted experience of the Honourable Deputy Leader of the Government in this chamber in financial matters, what steps is he taking to advise the government to remove this instability?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I want to thank the honourable gentleman for his very complimentary preamble, and I want to congratulate him on his appearance. He looks the quintessence of good health and we welcome him back to this chamber. I am glad to see that his concern over the state of the Canadian dollar has not in any way diminished his good health and his customarily admirable presence.

Having said that, I want to assure the honourable gentleman that the government is doing everything that it possibly can under the circumstances. I have not been privy to the discussions, as the honourable gentleman might have suggested, so I really am not in a position to say what specific steps have been taken at this time. I can only say that I will make the appropriate inquiries of the ministry so as to provide an answer to my friend.

Senator Sinclair: By way of a supplementary, there has been a lot of conjecture on what has caused this drop in the value of the dollar. If mine is the correct view—that is, that the reason for the very low value of the dollar is because of instability in the Canadian economy—then there is a need for action to be taken with regard to this matter. That instability covers a very large spectrum. It goes through the mining sector, through the forestry sector, through the oil sector and through that sector concerning the government in respect of matters of economic advancement. I suggest, honourable senators, that the government is required to take positive action in some, if not all, of these areas. I hope that the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate will undertake to impress upon his colleagues the need for action now. I hope that he will not suggest that we wait until the budget comes down.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I am not in the business of dealing with speculation or conjecture. Knowing as little as I do about economics—which I suspect I have in common with most of the Canadian community—I would suggest that there is a variety of theories that can be put forward, one of which the honourable gentleman has just described as destabilization. I would suggest that the state of the deficit has a great deal to do with this situation. In trying to deal with that, I think that the government is taking a positive step towards stabilizing the situation. I feel positive that the economy, in many ways, is responding.

I will not go through the litany of job creation, drops in the interest rate, drops in the rate of inflation or increases in the number of those employed. I simply want to assure the honourable gentleman that the government is dealing with this matter as best it can at the present time.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I agree that the deficit is a factor in the destabilization. The last budget, for which my friend speaks, was one of increasing taxes and one which has not affected the results. The deterioration experienced at the end of the year has continued apace in terms of the value of the dollar in trading communities of the world. I hope that, having gone the route of increased taxation, the forthcoming budget will indicate massive reductions in expenditures.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The Acting Leader of the Government has indicated that the government, and I quote him, is doing “as best it can” in dealing with the situation. Since the acting leader has just indicated that he does not engage in conjecture, I wonder if he could tell us what is included in those things that the government is doing.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I indicated a moment ago that the government is directing the country on an economic course that will improve conditions generally and, at the same time, will reduce the deficit. These are the steps that are necessary to try to stabilize the situation in Canada and restore confidence in the international marketplace. I do not think that that would come as any surprise to the honourable gentleman. Indeed, I am surprised that he has not realized that himself by now.

Senator Olson: I am following a line of questioning in which the Honourable Acting Leader of the Government is an expert. I hope that both he and Senator Murray, who have displayed a keen and abiding interest in matters of this sort, are maintaining that interest. It is fairly critical to a number of Canadians. Therefore, I wonder whether he could give us something more specific than this sort of waffling or withdrawing from the substance of the matter. Are there a few positive steps that the government is taking, because I know that the Acting Leader of the Government likes to talk in those terms rather than the wistful things that he has said up until now.

● (1410)

Senator Doody: I do not think that "wistful" is the correct word; nevertheless, I recall very well the period of time in this place that the honourable gentleman is referring to, when questions were constantly asked of government ministers by the then opposition, and, try as I might, I cannot recall getting very specific answers to any of these specific questions. I will go back and check Hansard to see what positive steps the minister responsible for economic development at that time gave us as examples of government action in this regard, but, off the top of my head, I cannot recall any at this time. I have answered the honourable gentleman to the best of my ability. I will take the matter up again with the ministry and will try to find something more specific for him.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, if the Acting Leader of the Government has answered to the best of his ability, then I am afraid he will get a fairly low score in terms of ability, because there has been no answer at all.

The other point that I believe should be made at this time is that I believe the Canadian people are more interested in what is happening now, in what action the government is taking, than making a review of the history of the questions that were asked under different circumstances some time ago.

May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government if he can give us an indication of what, if any, positive steps the government is now taking, from the point of view of producers, with regard to the international oil prices that have been falling significantly since the last Question Period—that is, if the government has any interest in this from the producer's point of view.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, first let me deal with the preamble. The historical interest in the Canadian dollar was not raised by me. The honourable gentleman raised it on Thursday, when he spoke of Senator Murray's interest and mine; and he has raised it again today. I thought, in all fairness that I should take note of the interest.

Senator Olson: I asked whether you had any interest in this matter.

Senator Doody: That is right, and the interest is still there, believe me. On the question of whether the government is interested in the declining oil prices, from the producer's point of view, certainly the government is interested in the declining oil prices, as, indeed, is everyone in Canada. What has not been established to date is whether we are looking at a long-term trend or whether it is a temporary blip. Will a volatile market start to rise again in one month's time, two month's time, or tomorrow? Someone was telling us recently—I believe the honourable gentleman was at the same meeting—that in one transaction a cargo of crude changed hands something like 98 times as it crossed the Atlantic from the North Sea. That market is so volatile at the present time that I would suggest it is extremely difficult for either government or industry to try to anticipate what will happen within the next few months. I would suggest that the interest is certainly there, but what the government can do about it at the present time, I am not in any position to say.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I presume that answer means that the government intends to continue its watching brief, and nothing more.

Senator Balfour: That's your opinion.

Senator Frith: The government is monitoring the situation!

Senator Doody: As Senator Frith says, the government is monitoring the situation.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO IRELAND— ALLEGED PARTISANSHIP OF APPOINTEE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government on the status of the new Ambassador to Ireland, Mr. Dennis McDermott.

Senator Frith: His Excellency!

Senator MacEachen: I regard that appointment as a fait accompli.

Senator Frith: That's the nicest thing you can say about it.

Senator MacEachen: I regard any ambassador as a representative of Canada and wish every ambassador success in the performance of his work for Canada. However, I want to know whether the normal proprieties which govern the behaviour of Canadian representatives abroad apply to Mr. McDermott, or whether there have been special exceptions made in his case which would exempt him from observing the normal proprieties of his office?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at this point I really cannot say, but I shall certainly make inquiries for the honourable senator.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, so that the inquiries will be complete, I would like to give the Deputy Leader of the Government the reason I ask the question. Following the announcement that Mr. McDermott had been appointed as our representative to Ireland and after describing himself in an interview as the official representative of Canada to Ireland, he then engaged in that same interview in partisan political discussion. It is understandable that he would praise his new masters. He showered praise on the Tory Party and took the occasion, as he has done so frequently in the past, to kick hell out of the Liberal Party.

Senator Phillips: Oh, no!

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator MacEachen: Is it now policy that an ambassador can engage in such conduct? I am serious about this matter. Does Mr. McDermott feel that he can continue in this way, or should somebody in the government draw to his attention that now that he is speaking for Canada, he only opens his mouth when he is told to do so by Joe Clark?

Senator Frith: And shuts it as well.

Senator Doody: I undertake to pass the honourable gentleman's concerns on as well.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, they are more than concerns.

Senator Perrault: You bet they are.

Senator MacEachen: They are very substantial questions. Is it now possible for a Canadian ambassador to engage in partisan politics? Does Mr. McDermott's behaviour, following his appointment, of discussing political parties, their merits and their demerits, constitute appropriate behaviour?

Senator Perrault: Of course not.

Senator MacEachen: I want to know whether he has received an exemption for this behaviour or whether he has been rebuked for it. If Mr. McDermott is to carry our support as the representative for Canada, we expect him to follow the proprieties. Furthermore, does he intend, as the official representative of Canada in Ireland, to act as the President of the Canadian Labour Congress?

Senator Perrault: Good question.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Deputy Leader of the Government for his willingness to carry my concerns to the authorities, but I would ask for information, first, on whether it is now appropriate for Canadian ambassadors to engage in partisan political attacks on any political party in the country and, second, is it possible for a Canadian ambassador to still maintain an important job in Canada while he is the ambassador for the country to another country?

Senator Doody: The short general answer is, as the honourable gentleman knows better than I, that it is not appropriate for any appointed official to undertake the sort of comments or sort of actions described by the honourable senator. As for the specifics of the case, I have to admit that I am not familiar with them and that I shall have to make inquiries.

PUBLIC WORKS

CLEANING SERVICES—POSSIBLE LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, we have been reading in the press about the apparent determination of government to lay off 270 cleaning workers who are in the federal domain. As far as one can determine, there seem to be two purposes: first, to reduce the income of this group of Canadians by between $2 and $4 per hour by contracting out the work at minimum wage; and, second, according to Mr. John Gordon of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, to reduce the level of cleaning services available in federal buildings. Will there be a third purpose to this as well? Can the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us, please, what proportion of these 270 cleaning workers are women?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot, but I undertake to find out.

Senator Marsden: I wonder if at the same time the deputy leader would determine what proportion of those being laid off are over 50 years of age?

Senator Doody: Over what age?

Senator Marsden: Fifty.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

PARLIAMENT

CAUCUS ROOMS—ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING—APOLOGY BY DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. In connection with the apology that was offered by the Deputy Prime Minister, Mr. Nielsen, in the other place yesterday, I think we were all under the impression that it referred to an incident which had occurred in March 1966. However, I watched Mr. Nielsen on television last night, and he excused himself by saying that this was an incident that had occurred 25 years ago.

My question to the Deputy Leader of the Government is to ask if he will inquire from Mr. Nielsen whether his arithmetic is really that bad in that he is incapable of subtracting 1966 from 1986, or whether he was referring to another incident of eavesdropping that occurred 25 years ago that we have not yet heard about.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly make the appropriate inquiry, Senator Godfrey.

Hon. Keith Davey: I would like to ask the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the apology made by the Deputy Prime Minister yesterday in the other place applies equally to those senators who are now in the Liberal caucus and to those who were, at the time of the incident, members of the Liberal caucus either as members of the Senate or as members of the other place.

Senator Doody: Since Mr. Nielsen did not specifically call me to tell me exactly to whom the apology was made, I can only assume that it was offered to all of those who were affected.

Senator Davey: The references that I read in the House of Commons Debates were to the effect that the apology was made to members of the House of Commons. I would be grateful if the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate could find out for us whether the apology does, indeed, apply to the particular senators to whom I referred.

Senator Doody: My recollection was that the apology was made to those people who felt that there was impropriety, or words to that effect. It would seem to me to be a pretty general, carte-blanche apology. Whether or not that is so—

Senator Davey: Then it does apply to the senators as well?

Senator Doody: I would think so, yes.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, as one of those who, presumably, was overheard, I would like to ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. Now that the Deputy Prime Minister has told the House of Commons that he engaged in this kind of activity on one or more occasions, would the deputy leader undertake to ascertain for us the period during which this activity took place for which the Deputy Prime Minister has seen fit to render an apology?

Senator Doody: I will certainly make an inquiry, senator.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—DISPARITY IN CRITERIA FOR PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS AND BEEF PRODUCERS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government which arises out of an announcement made some two weeks ago with respect to an acreage payment to certain grain producers who have suffered crop failure. That payment amounted to as much as $150 million but worked out to approximately $5 or some small unknown amount per acre.

Would the acting leader inquire as to why the criteria used for payment to beef producers in so-called drought areas were different from those used as the basis for payment to grain producers. In other words, why did the Minister of Agriculture tell the beef producers that, because the drought area was a very broad one, as long as they had beef cattle within that drought area, they would be paid on a per-cow basis? However, when it came to paying the grain producers, that same minister said that the payment to them depended not only on the crop failure in 1985 but also on the necessity of having had previous crop failures, and that one of the factors for deciding whether or not the grain producers would be paid would be the average yield of grain within a particular rural municipality, which would be, namely, an area of 18 miles square which comes to 324 square miles.

I know that the Acting Leader of the Government will understand that, within many of those municipalities which were barred because the average yield was somewhat above the criteria that were set, there are many grain producers who have suffered an absolutely total crop failure but who are not eligible to receive one dime out of this program because of the average yield within the rural municipality.

I ask the acting leader why there are two policies adopted by the same government. I ask him, and I do so seriously, and I think he will look into it seriously, to bring to the Senate the rules that a producer in these municipalities that are not eligible but who, in fact, has had a crop failure, must follow to make an appeal to the tribunal. I ask him to try to find out—and this is a serious and important question—the rules that will be used to judge the application of a producer who has had a crop failure, who is in desperate need of money, but who is being barred because neighbours in a given municipality had a better crop.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for his question. Quite frankly, I am not familiar with the details of the subject, but I will certainly undertake to get those details from the minister.

Senator Argue: Many of these people are in a desperate financial situation. Just before coming into the chamber today I read a letter written by a woman living in Saskatchewan. She said in that letter that they are being foreclosed, that they are not only losing their own farm but also the father's farm because it was put up as collateral, that they desperately need money but that they are barred because other areas of the municipality fared much better.

I put it to the deputy leader and to the government that the government should be able to do better because the criteria used for the payment to the beef producers—the criteria, not the amount—were satisfactory criteria and were supported. So, what can be done to make it possible for those people who had a crop failure to be paid? Will the acting leader find out when those people can appear before the tribunal?

Senator Doody: I shall do that.

YOUTH

KATIMAVIK—CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: My question is for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am holding a copy of Quorum in my hand, and at page 12 there is a headline from the Montreal Gazette that reads: "Don't kill Katimavik jobs program, board begs PM."

By coincidence, on the same page there is an article from La Presse, with the following headline, which I shall translate: "Photos in a Tunnel in Ottawa." The Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse, the article says, announced yesterday that an old and abandoned railway tunnel would be refurbished at the cost of some $2 million to $3 million to be used as a contemporary photography museum.

I consider myself a serious amateur photographer and, therefore, in principle, have nothing against contemporary museums for photography, but it seems to me rather a strange coincidence that a week following the announcement that Katimavik's throat would be slit the government finds money to allocate to a new contemporary museum for photography.

Is this being done at the expense of building bridges between youth in Canadian communities and between youth and their future?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my understanding is that Katimavik has been cancelled as a cost-saving measure by the government. I know of no relationship between it and the suggested contemporary museum for photography which the Honourable Senator Corbin has described. I have been given no indication that the two are related in any way. As Senator Corbin has said, the museum of photography is probably a very worthwhile operation. Frankly, I know very little about it.

I can only say, as I said in the beginning, that this is in no way tied to the decision to cancel Katimavik.

AGRICULTURE

AVAILABILITY OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE TO AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS PROCESSORS

Hon. Hazen Argue: I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate based on an announcement made on Saturday by the federal Minister of Transport, the Honourable Don Mazankowski, in which he informed the country that a $50 million, five-year agreement to provide financial assistance to Alberta farms that process agricultural products has been signed by the federal and provincial governments.

● (1430)

My question is: Is this kind of subsidy or program available to other provinces? Are there any negotiations now going on between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan aimed at providing this kind of incentive for firms that wish to establish agricultural processing industries in Saskatchewan?

My next comment, I am sure, is news to no one. It is that the treasury of Saskatchewan has a difficult time competing with the treasury of Alberta in providing subsidies either to the agricultural industry or to other industries that wish to locate in Saskatchewan.

Would the Deputy Leader of the Government inquire as to whether this type of program is available to other provinces and whether there are any negotiations going on today with the Government of Saskatchewan so that in my province we may have the benefit of such a policy?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will take the question as notice and obtain the information for the honourable senator.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is a week today since we had our emergency debate on the future of the sugar-beet industry. I wonder whether Senator Doody has received any information from his friends in cabinet as to their decision on a national sugar policy, stabilization payments and the whole bag.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank the honourable senator for the question. In anticipation of it, I phoned the minister's office just before entering the chamber. Unfortunately, I received no information.

Senator Olson: That is terrible.

Senator Frith: I wish the record could show that you were embarrassed.

PETROLEUM AND GAS REVENUE TAX ACT INCOME TAX ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved third reading of Bill C-82, to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act and the Income Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled, "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to defer to Senator Le Moynes.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, throughout this debate on Bill C-70 I listened with great admiration and, I confess, sincere envy to several outstanding speakers, such as Senator Rousseau, whose impassioned and moving plea was inspired by heart-felt and ungrudging experience of the harshness of the status of women; such as Senator Croll, who once again, with his truly prophetic sense of urgency, drew our attention to the obligations which flow from social justice; such as Senator Graham, with his rigorous and direct logic, with his telling data; and such as Senator Bonnell, so intensely existential, so eloquently clinical in his description of the very serious matter under consideration. The substance of those presentations was authentically Liberal and, in my judgment, they rank among the noblest lessons of humanity ever heard in this place.

It behooved Senator Tremblay to open the debate. He did so in such a way that, for a moment, I was taken aback. I would imagine that such free-flowing and captivating discourses were heard frequently in the Justinian court. Be that as it may, I must pay this homage to my subtle colleague: I would indeed believe him quite capable of convincing the Devil himself to ponder and to entertain some sober second thoughts. Unfortunately, my colleague belongs to the Devil's party and, apparently, he is doomed to remain ever unrepentant! As I rise to speak after so many magnificent interventions, no wonder I do not feel totally self-confident.

Honourable senators, there is nothing new I can add to the data and figures so expertly presented and analyzed by my colleagues. My modest contribution will therefore be to set forth our position in the Liberal tradition, very briefly. I will refer to our thinking or mentality, and to one specific authority.

The theme of fear was explicitly or implicitly recurrent in the remarks of the Liberal speakers who rose before me. It echoes the clearly expressed apprehensions heard by the Senate committee on social affairs.

The fear of being unable to cash in the small family allowances which poor families have come to expect each month at the same date. The fear that this small cheque might not come because it has been lost or stolen. The fear, bordering on ferocious anxiety, which so many recipients, most of them single mothers, feel when, on the appointed day, they keep an eye out for the postman. The fear that they might be deprived of this necessary and ever insufficient money, for too many of them the only source of personal income. The fear that the allowance might be decreased by arbitrary action of the state, supposedly to curb inflation or reduce the national deficit. The fear that the allowance might eventually be deferred pursuant to some administrative rationalization—that mirific euphemism which covers any and all cut-backs made at the expense of poor people in particular and wage earners in general.

Fernand Céline said: "The poor are exact." They are impatient as well, which may sound scandalous to some people, but Moses says so in a spirit of sovereign charity in Deuteronomy, chapter 24, verse 15. The impatience of the poor was assumed by Moses, by the prophets, and by Christ. Whatever any poor person needs, he or she needs it right away, be it 50 cents or $50. And in the case of family allowances which the poor need, the impatience is that of life itself striving to survive in poverty and seeking to sustain other dependent lives so that such small lives might at least be lesser blessings rather than outright maledictions.

As I speak in these terms, I draw inspiration from remarks we heard last week, and I rely upon one of the leading masters of Liberal thinking and action, Mackenzie King. The parallel which naturally stems from my reflections faithfully mirrors the sound vitality of Liberal thinking and the permanence of our party's social traditions.

[English]

Honourable senators, the Liberals inherited from Laurier's successor a particular empathy for the weak and the poor, an empathy overpowering enough to overcome, through the temptations of the years, the constant reluctance and the stubborn resistance of selfishness, a common malady right or left, so that the country was gradually endowed with a most humane and advanced social régime. In a book unjustly forgotten, and mocked, especially by those who never read it, Mackenzie King wrote on the social question with an extraordinary depth of feeling and a truly prophetic authority. One can find ample matter for meditation and ample cause for uneasiness in Industry and Humanity, published in 1918.

[Senator Le Moyné.]

Given our current preoccupations, King's treatment of the theme of fear is truly uncanny in its actuality. A lot indeed has happened for our betterment since his time, but certainly not enough to prevent all possibility of regressions. In that respect, the desire to abolish the principle of universality in the realm of social welfare is a most ominous symptom. Let me quote King who wrote:

There is legitimate fear where, as respects work done, compensation is wholly inadequate and insufficient to sustain life. This is the case in the sweated trades, where men, women, and children, through extreme necessity, ignorance, incapacity, or other cause, sacrifice vitality to industry, and well-being to rapacity.

● (1440)

Quoting further from Mackenzie King:

There is legitimate fear where, despite willingness to work, work is not to be had.

Identical fears among the youth of Canada have just been exacerbated through the mindless abolition of the Katimavik program. I trust that Senator Hébert will have more to say about that iniquity.

To quote Mackenzie King again:

There is legitimate fear where, through sickness and invalidity, the capacity to earn is gone, and hard won and scanty savings of months, and often of years, become drawn upon and exhausted. He who has never endured impaired health, where all else is dependent on health, can know nothing of the terrors of this fear.

There is legitimate fear where age is confronted with the alternative of poverty or dependence. Such is the case where the stress of competition drives the weak and infirm to the wall; where employers, because of compensation laws and the risks of industry, refuse employment to men of years; where increasing cost of living and diminished earnings make adequate provision for age impossible apart from constant employment.

There is legitimate fear where a woman is suddenly left without support for her children.

Yet again he says:

... there is legitimate fear where the privation consequent upon unavoidable loss of work is aggravated by the necessity of extra outlays. Such is the case where to a woman engaged in industry, or in the family of any worker, a child is born, and domestic happiness is clouded by uncertainties of employment and health;—

—this should be underlined in red and blue:

... and the habit of saving menaced through inability to protect small sums previously set aside.

King then proceeds to show how these fears have been alleviated to a certain extent through legislation concerning minimum wages, maximum hours, unemployment insurance, health and invalidity insurance, old age pensions, widows' and mothers' pensions, maternity benefits and so on. As we all know, family allowances were added in due time.

It is now the intention of the government to grind down the indispensable small sums, so pointedly noted by Mackenzie King and by so many of his followers, so opportunely assured, up to now, by the family allowances program.

Previous speakers have clearly shown how illusory is the justification of replacing somehow, eventually, the present allowance by a tax credit, a measure which would never amount to any significant saving for the state unless the government intends to reduce by all possible means the pain in the neck and in the pocket of the high cost of a comprehensive and universal social welfare system like ours. The Tories must dream of leasing everything from the holy private sector, just like their counterparts down below who are giving away health care to big, delicately altruistic outfits, and who entertain the idea of selling the Capitol, the White House and other similar joints, and then saving money by leasing them back. The Pope and Mitterand should be offered some really good bargains, on account of their vast real estate holdings. And why not give away by contract the very administration of the country, so that bungling ministers could be fired, so that everything could be ruled by a single rule, that of the sacred bottom line? By this attitude the government betrays what any psychiatrist would call a "complex of the small profit." By delaying the payment of the prestations, it would cruelly flout the legitimate fear and the legitimate impatience of the poor. Using almost the same words as those of Deuteronomy, King writes tersely:

Labour has to be fed, and cannot wait.

It is easy, honourable senators, to discern the poor through the word "labour." Well, all of us here, we can wait; capital can wait and industry can wait, because affluence means much more than money. It also means alternatives, opportunities, detours, fences, trenches, buffers, dodges, and all sorts of time-generating devices and pleasant waiting slots; whereas the poor are relentlessly pursued by a hostile time and run down to exhaustion. The ghost of King will, no doubt, have forgiven me a little paraphrasing.

May the government relent. May the government decide to maintain the full amount of the family allowances with their full indexation, and their present calendar, in deference to the most noble tradition of the land. It would be such a memorable and generous gesture; it could start the growth of a lot of badly needed political hay, or, according to the other usual vulgar metaphor, it would be worth a lot of wanting political mileage. Too late, saints and sinners, too late: the government would lose face. But, my word, that should not be much of a problem, since nothing is left of its face but a pair of ears!

On motion of Senator Turner, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE ACT (BILL TO AMEND)
DIVORCE BILL, 1985
FAMILY ORDERS AND AGREEMENTS
ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

On the Orders:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-46, intituled: "An Act to amend the Divorce Act".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-47, intituled: "An Act respecting divorce and corollary relief".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Neiman is not able to be here today. I believe that Senator Bélisle is ready to make an intervention on this subject. Therefore, we yield to Senator Bélisle.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Frith for giving to me the opportunity to be heard today. Before beginning my discussion of Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48, I would like to compliment the sponsor of these bills, the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for a very good presentation of a difficult situation. He has done his best to convince us that the government is doing the right thing. Unfortunately, he did not sway me.

Honourable senators, I would like to speak on the subject of Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48, to amend the Divorce Act and on important related matters. I understand the policy behind the proposed amendments to the Divorce Act. I realize that using the fault grounds of adultery, cruelty and the like in order to get a divorce may make a bad situation worse. Allowing a man or a woman to accuse a spouse of misconduct in the marriage may intensify the tension between them. It may well hurt their children, either directly, by bringing them into the court process, or indirectly, by having to face the effects of additional quarrels over which parent acted well or acted badly.

Nevertheless, I believe that the policy behind these amendments is far from complete. For that reason I cannot, in all conscience, support these bills.

The constitutional power which underlies the Divorce Act is a power over not only divorce but marriage and divorce. I do not quarrel over the right and, indeed, the obligation of the federal government to develop laws which make the process of divorce more humane—which allow a couple to dissolve their marriage with as few obstacles as possible—once it is established that it is not possible for them to live a life together. However, together with the obligation to make divorce more humane is the obligation and the responsibility—and I do not hesitate to call it a moral responsibility—to recognize and support the marriage bond and the duties that arise out of marriage. I do not see the bill as accomplishing this.

First, the bill proposes simply that a couple who have been separated for one year shall be allowed a divorce. There are no new provisions to ensure that they have made a real attempt at settling their differences, at trying to make their marriage work. The old reconciliation provisions have been kept—namely, clause 9 of the bill—but they are inadequate. It is not enough to ask a lawyer to discuss the possibility of reconciliation with his client. A lawyer has been trained to carry out the wishes of his client, not to change them through counselling and persuasion. It is far too late to have the issue of reconciliation brought up at the divorce hearing. Moreover, what is to happen, what serious thought can be given to reconciliation, when there is no judge, when a court administrator takes over the role of a judge, which the new bill will permit?

Finally, the bill would dilute such effect as the present law has in the area of reconciliation, by allowing those involved in the court process to focus on the settlement of claims between the two parties on the ground that there is no prospect of reconciliation. Certainly marriages can die; but it is the job of legislation to try to ensure that they live, and not simply to assume that they are dead.

In 1983 the divorce rate in Canada, as measured by Statistics Canada, was 371.3 divorces per 1,000 marriages. There are some who say that this figure is too conservative and that the actual rate for the years 1980 to 1984 was closer to 50 per cent. Official divorce statistics record only legal divorces. Sociologists have estimated that there may be at least as many separations as legal divorces. This suggests that the rate of marriage dissolution could be twice as high as the official statistics indicate. Because no legal document is required to separate from a spouse, the government cannot keep statistics on separation rates. In the United States, according to all recognized statistics, the divorce rate was 60 per cent in 1984. In Sweden it was 61 per cent. Those figures do not tell the whole story. Statisticians in California, for example, claim that the trend in that state is for all marriages contracted now to end in divorce. If we allow couples to divorce after one year of separation, without ensuring that they have done all they can to fulfil their marriage vows, we will surely see these kinds of figures in Canada.

Marriage is a relationship which involves many responsibilities, chief of which are one's obligation to one's children, to raise and educate them to the best of one's ability. But there are also responsibilities which husbands and wives have toward each other. It is still the case today that many wives do not have an income of their own, nor do they have any means of earning a decent income, because they have spent much of their time raising children or making a home for their husbands. Divorce may remove the only source of support for those women and their children. As most women's groups have pointed out—the National Action Committee on the Status of Women; the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, whose job it is to advise the government on matters which concern women; and the National Association of Women and the Law—this is a second area with which the bill fails to deal in any adequate way.

The bill does provide guidelines for determining support orders for women and children, but those guidelines reveal no policy. Instead they would change the present law for what may be the worse. They would allow judges at their discretion to make support orders which would cease after a certain amount of time and which could not be renewed. What will happen when such an order is made on the ground that a wife ought to be self-sufficient in, say, three years, and that wife has no job in three years? Is she then to go on welfare?

What will happen to the family if the husband becomes involved with another woman and has more children? What is the government's position on where his obligations lie? The bill says only that an order can be changed to recognize the disadvantages that result from marriage breakdown, or to relieve grave economic hardship. This is not policy. It is an abandonment to the judges of what is properly legislative responsibility.

Finally, as women's groups have also pointed out, the issue of support is bound up with the issue of enforcing orders for support. The best information we have is that two thirds of all support orders have not been fully complied with and that in one third of those cases the supporting spouse has not made a single payment. In many cases he has left the area where his wife and children live, and not infrequently he has left the province. Present laws place a large part of the financial burden of finding the defaulting spouse and enforcing support order on his wife—the person least able to bear this burden.

How are those women and their children to be helped? Certainly the bill contains no provisions which deal adequately with the problem. Yes, the government tells us that under the bill judges would be able to use the husband's property as security for unpaid support. But it is not clear whether his wife could force a sale of the property to recover money for herself and her family. I know that in Ontario this is about to be remedied; but Ontario is only one of the ten provinces and two territories—and, what is even more important, how many families own enough property for this provision to make a difference?

I know that the federal government will answer all of my criticism by saying that it cannot develop effective policies regarding conciliation, enforcement of support orders, and perhaps even support itself, without consultation with, and the agreement of, the provinces. If that is so, the government must do this first and then present us with legislation. The government must understand that constitutionally and morally divorce is bound up with the responsibilities of marriage. Divorce legislation cannot be piecemeal. It must cover a range of issues connected with the family and the duties that this institution embodies—duties which are its great strength. No matter how beneficial Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48 may seem to be, the benefits can only be short-term. The problem of divorce demands a long-term solution.

I oppose Bills C-46, C-47 and C-48 because, in many ways, to me they represent an abdication of responsibility with respect to the family.

In the same context—namely, the role of the government and Parliament in preserving the family—I wish to raise another important matter, which is the government's obligation to respond to problems raised by the development of such human reproductive techniques as artificial insemination, test tube fertilization and embryo implantation. These techniques would allow reproduction to take place independently of any relationship between a man and woman and even independently of a woman who is the genetic mother of the child. Of course, these techniques enable a couple who could not otherwise have their own children to participate in the process of creating and bearing a child, and they hold great promise in this regard.

● (1500)

However, they may be used in ways which will dehumanize this process and destroy the family as the institution primarily responsible for our children, and so, our future. I am referring to the possible consequences of sperm and egg banking. I am also thinking of sperm banks in connection with advances in human genetics which are bound to come, advances which may tempt us to breed certain kinds of humans as we now breed certain kinds of animals. Recently Dr. Patrick Steptoe, the same English scientist who developed the process of test tube fertilization, announced that they are very near to being able to identify the sex of the human embryo within five days of fertilization. "Once the test is perfected," said Dr. Steptoe, "we can immediately tackle some of the sex-linked diseases and we should be able to eliminate some of them." He added that the test would also enable parents to choose the sex of their children. First we eliminate diseases, then we choose whether we want a boy or a girl. What will we choose to do next?

We are human beings. We are not cattle. We are not race-horses. As individuals and as a species we have the potential to develop in a variety of ways and to benefit from our diversity. We are only human; we are not gods. We do not have the foresight to determine who is fit to be born and who is not, or whose intellectual or physical capacities and characteristics should be passed on and whose should not.

I do not have answers to all the questions raised by the new technology. I do stress that we as a society must soon begin to develop answers through our institutions and especially through our legislation. This is not an area for a policy of laissez-faire. I call on the government to come forward with policies and, again, I require that it develop policies which will preserve and strengthen the family. More specifically, I have a recommendation with respect to sperm and egg banks. They must not be left in private hands. We do not want or need a market in human reproduction, a market to cater to our vanity and our whims by storing only the genes of those with a certain IQ, or those from certain families, or those who have performed such and such deeds. The government must regulate these banks. I understand that the government has been studying recommendations to this effect since 1981. I hope that it will present us with legislation, or encourage uniform provincial legislation at the earliest possible date. I hope, too, that the government, as our representative and our leader, will be humble in its regulation. It must be ever mindful that the purpose of all this technology is not to create a test tube super race, but to enhance the social institution that has furthered and benefited us for so long.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, the research carried out by the former Government of Canada on divorce is insufficient. The present government had to review everything. Some of the amendments proposed in Bill C-47 need further study. In particular, the government must examine the analyses and evaluations made in other countries, such as in the United States where no-fault divorce is a fact of law.

The facts which seem to come out of the research carried out where no-fault divorce exists are as follows. An example is the 1969 Family Law Act of California. Contrary to the notion that no-fault divorce will reduce legal costs, which is at the basis of the wish to amend the Canadian legislation, the facts show that California couples have paid more to get divorced since the law has been changed. The hard debate has simply been deferred to the second round and the costs are proportional.

Contrary to the notion that no-fault divorce will reduce conflicts between spouses, which is another reason given by the government to amend the legislation, the facts show that the separation is not as civilized as we want it to be. Once more, in most cases, the crisis is simply deferred and made even more bitter and more costly in all aspects.

Many surveys show that quick and easy divorce has a serious chain reaction effect. Psychological research points to the same conclusion. Easy divorce reduces the will to look actively for answers to solve normal conflicts in the life of a couple.

Young people find it hard to believe in an institution which the state views so lightly. Quick and easy divorce creates a cynical attitude towards the institution of marriage among young people. This could seriously affect their personal life.

Honourable senators, the right to have a mother and a father is one of the basic rights of a child. This right is closely related to the development of his own personality. By introducing no-fault divorce, and thus making divorce a private matter, is the state not leaving children on their own? Does the modern state not have the duty to protect, by appropriate legislation, the right to have parents which, after the right to life, meets the most important need of a child, as stated in clause 6 of the Universal Declaration of the rights of the child?

[English]

Honourable senators, before closing these remarks, I would bring to your attention the great amount of research that was done by a very able reporter of the Ottawa Citizen, Mr. Greg Weston, in the five full-page articles of January 20, 21, 22, 23 and 24, 1986. I hope some senators have read that report. It is the first time in my 23 years in this august assembly that I have seen such a well-researched report. Let me say to you that the public has been greatly enriched by the service rendered by this reporter on this very important piece of legislation, namely divorce.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

THE HON. BILLIE MILLER, MINISTER OF EDUCATION, BARBADOS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to call your attention to the presence in the gallery this afternoon of a very distinguished visitor to our country, the Honourable Billie Miller, the Minister of Education for Barbados. Ms. Miller is visiting Canada on official business. She is presently engaged in discussions with the IPPF, Western Hemisphere Region. I understand that she will also be meeting with CIDA officials and with the Honourable Joseph Clark. I take great pleasure in welcoming her to the Senate, particularly in light of the fact that her cousin sits here with us in the chamber.

Last year, I had the extreme good fortune to visit Barbados and sat at dinner with the honourable minister. I had a delightful meal and enjoyed pleasant conversation. I wish her well. I hope her stay here in Canada is an enjoyable and productive one.

She is accompanied by His Excellency the High Commissioner for Barbados, Mr. Whitehead, and Dr. Hernan Sanhueza, the Regional Director of IPPF, Western Hemisphere Region, whom I also welcome.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, intituled: "An Act respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners".—(Honourable Senator Stollery).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I do not think that Senator Stollery will be able to deal with this matter this week. I hope to intervene in this matter tomorrow, so perhaps the debate can be adjourned in my name.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

[Senator Rh]

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATED CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, on Thursday last, I intervened on this matter largely because of a point arising from the mover's concern about the cost of establishing a special committee to inquire into this matter. At that time, I completed the remarks that I wanted to make which, as those of you who were here at the time will recall, were that the Senate should never allow its activities to be circumscribed or inhibited because of the cost of servicing a committee if that committee is established to do a worthwhile job. That was the point that I wanted to make. I did not speak, nor do I intend to speak, on the substance of the motion and therefore I give way to whoever wishes to follow me in this debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

STUDY OF SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-67 AND BILL C-68—
COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN FROM PLACE TO PLACE

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented in the Senate on 30th January, 1986.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, in moving the adoption of this report, I would like to make a couple of very brief comments. The report deals with the reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs of Bill C-67 and Bill C-68 for pre-study. These bills deal with the Penitentiary Act and the Parole Act, and specifically with those matters relating to the entire early-release system that operates within our penal institutions dealing with both parole and mandatory supervision.

We have now received briefs from the inmate committees of three penal institutions, namely Drumheller in the province of Alberta, Prince Albert in the province of Saskatchewan and Stony Mountain in my own home province of Manitoba. Incidentally, these three institutions are representative of the system since one is a minimum-security institution, one is a medium-security institution and one is a maximum-security institution.

In view of the fact that the committee has received these briefs, it was their view that the committee would do well not only to visit those institutions to meet with the inmate committees, but also to meet with the staff, that is to say, the wardens and deputy wardens and others involved in the administration of the penal system.

While the report indicates that there would be perhaps as many as five members of that committee travelling, after discussions with our chairman, it now appears that perhaps the number would be three or four. We are hoping that, in each instance, a member of this chamber from the province involved will be in attendance during those visits.

Senator Hastings, who has a great interest in this subject, will be travelling throughout with the committee.

I commend the entire report and its substance to honourable senators and say that I think this is the kind of work that Senate committees ought to do. In other words, to go out into the field and learn first-hand what it is that we are dealing with, and while this is a monetary matter, I assure all honourable senators that the amount which it is expected will be spent is well within the budget of the committee. I suspect that, by the end of the year, the committee will not have spent 50 per cent of the budget that it sought and received from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I would point out to honourable senators that this is a committee that is very mindful of costs and is, in fact, frugal in its spending of public funds.

I urge the adoption of the report.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I listened with attention to what Senator Nurgitz had to say. Although I have not participated in this aspect of the committee's work as closely as, perhaps, some of my colleagues have done, I know that what he says is correct. I want to underline the fact that our colleague, Senator Hastings, as Senator Nurgitz has said, is very deeply interested and very well informed on this subject. He is unable to be here this week since he is away on parliamentary business, but I know that if he were here, he would want to support this motion and would urge us to support it also. For that reason, I support the motion of Senator Nurgitz and suggest that we adopt it immediately.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

BOARD OF GRAIN COMMISSIONERS

TERMINATION OF APPOINTMENT OF MEMBER—STATUS OF CHIEF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate which arises out of recent action, presumably, by the cabinet, namely the passing of an Order in Council to fire from her position Dr. Beth Candlish, a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners. I want to ask the acting leader when that was done, and on what grounds.

Dr. Beth Candlish, with a PhD in Animal Nutrition and Biochemistry, is probably one of the most qualified persons to sit on a public board in this country and I would like to know why she was singled out for attack. I would like to know whether she was acting in an incompetent way or whether she was doing anything that would reflect on her work. In other words, was there any cause or reason for her firing?

I would like to say to honourable senators, in order that they will have this information, that Dr. Beth Candlish has an excellent standing and commands great respect in the agriculture industry for the work that she has been doing as a member of the Board of Grain Commissioners. I say to you that this firing calls into question the government's attitude to this board, because the responsibility of this board is the grading system for western grain, the integrity of that grading system and, yes, the integrity of the marketing system.

I would also like to inform honourable senators that there is a suspicion held by some very important people in the grain industry in western Canada that this firing is part of a plot by the Conservative government to allow into the system large quantities of dwarf varieties of wheat and other lower quality grains with a resultant reduction in the high standard of grain quality going into the marketing system. There are elements that have a vested interest in tearing down this kind of excellent system and I am absolutely appalled that a government should single out this woman and fire her. I think it is a reflection on women generally and I feel the women in this country should be up in arms about this matter. I would like to have some kind of explanation as to why this action was taken.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly make every effort to obtain the information the honourable senator has asked for.

Senator Argue: When the acting leader is obtaining that information—it will be interesting to have it—would he determine if there is any truth to the rumour that Del Pound, the Chief Commissioner, is going to be fired, too, and if so, is he going to be fired because last fall he took a very strong position against the reduction in grade standards and the action that allowed the door to be opened wide to dwarf varieties and inferior grades?

I ask that because the very basis of the successful functioning of the overseas market for Canadian grain is based on our grade standards. I hope I can get the assurance from the government that Del Pound is not to be the next one to receive the political axe from this government.

Senator Doody: I will take that as notice as well.

STATUS OF WOMEN

AFFIRMATIVE ACTION LEGISLATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, last weekend we were treated to the spectacle of our Minister of Justice making some inappropriate remarks, for which he has already apologized, concerning his willingness to eavesdrop. Today we are treated to the spectacle of the Minister of Employment and Immigration promising, apparently, to intimidate corporations if they do not comply with proposed legislation introduced by the minister in the House of Commons, and which legislation is so vague and toothless that it would be impossible for any employer, union or worker, to figure out what they should do. I should like to know if it is the policy of this government to govern by intimidation.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I do not think it is the policy of this government or the previous government to govern by intimidation.

I understand there is a law on the books governing the conduct of companies in these situations, and I think it is quite reasonable for a minister, of whatever stripe, to insist that the law be followed, and I think it is the minister's duty to see that it is followed.

Whether there are some deficiencies in that particular statute or not, I am not in a position to comment on, but I find nothing objectionable about a minister telling a corporation, a group or any citizen that the law must be followed.

Senator Marsden: I wish the minister had told people that the law had to be followed. I quite agree with you when you say that that is the appropriate way to govern, but, in fact, the legislation—which has not yet been passed—does not make it possible to follow the law. It is not possible to follow the proposed law.

The minister has said—at least the newspaper articles have stated this—that she will “publicly embarrass them if they do not produce results.”

I wonder if you can tell us whether it is the plan of this minister to follow in the footsteps of her colleague and apologize for her statement.

Senator Doody: I am not convinced that the minister has anything to apologize for at this point. I heard the senator quote a newspaper article alleging that the minister said this and so about a law that has yet to be passed. I cannot comment further on that particular question.

Senator Marsden: It is precisely because the law has not been passed that makes this, in my opinion, such an outrageous statement for a minister of the Crown to make.

The minister goes on to say that there will be stringent monitoring requirements. Can the acting leader tell us how the minister plans to monitor these companies? That, of course, is not spelled out in the legislation, the discussion paper, or anything we have heard so far.

Senator Frith: A wire-tap, perhaps?

Senator Doody: I cannot answer that question. I really do not know what the monitoring process will be, but I will certainly make an inquiry if the honourable senator wishes me to do so.

Senator Marsden: I would be most grateful if you did, and also if you provided any other clarifications that might be forthcoming about the plans of this government, through exposure, to publicly embarrass rather than operate by the rule of law.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government. I wonder if the acting leader could do something about providing answers to questions that we have asked in the past.

I, for example, asked eight questions that the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate took as notice and promised sincerely to provide responses to on an as-soon-as-possible basis. One of those questions was asked as long ago as April 23, 1985; one was asked on June 11, 1985; one on December 17, 1985; one on December 18, 1985. As for the others, I guess I can be a little more forgiving because they were all asked in January, but even for those there has been sufficient time for replies to have been given if the Leader of the Government and his office were really seeking those replies. I think it reasonable to say that replies to those questions could have been given by now.

● (1410)

I would ask him nice and gently—and persuasively, I hope—to see if he can use his powers of persuasion to get answers to these questions. I will send him a list of the unanswered questions, if he so wishes.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I was going to ask the honourable gentleman if he could let me have a copy of his list. I would certainly find that useful.

I appreciate his gentleness and I am swayed by his persuasiveness.

Senator Olson: I should like to add one point and that is: He may take the position that time has overrun some of these questions, and assume I would find an answer in newspapers or some other source. However, as far as I am concerned, such responses would be unsatisfactory. I asked these questions of the Leader of the Government and I think that he and the departments to which he makes the references should afford me the courtesy of accurate replies directly from them rather than through an interpretation by some reporter.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I do not have a list since I have only one question to which, as you know, I am impatiently and anxiously awaiting an answer.

Could Senator Doody enlighten us today if there has been any progress whatsoever concerning the question of the future of the sugar-beet industry, and the national policies or stabilization payments for 1983?

I understand that the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board, who has been in charge of this issue, may be leaving for a while next week which adds to the urgency of receiving some indication now.

Senator Doody: I appreciate the honourable senator's question. I am afraid that I am in the same position as I was in yesterday. I was unable to obtain any information for her, but I will continue to press the ministries involved and, hopefully, this embarrassment will cease shortly and I will be able to provide the information.

Senator Fairbairn: I will give the honourable senator every incentive he needs to keep pushing.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, may I join with Senator Olson in the gentle nudging of the Deputy Leader of the Government? I, actually, have precedence over him since I have two questions on the order paper, one of which goes back to March 19 of last year, to be found at page 657 of the Debates of the Senate, and the other on June 13 of last year, to be found at page 1021.

I would appreciate it if the deputy leader could also move those along.

Senator Doody: I will do what I can.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, there is some suggestion by officials of the American government that they would like to create a nuclear disposal dump in North Dakota, south of my province, Manitoba. I believe there is a possibility that that situation could affect the water sources running into the Red River flowing into Canada, which, of course, would be a disaster. Would the Deputy Leader of the Government look into this serious matter and bring us up to date on what is taking place?

This matter is of concern to all citizens in my province, not only those directly affected by potential water pollution. I am sure it is also a concern of the people of North Dakota. Could the matter be looked into seriously?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I shall certainly make every effort to obtain an answer for the honourable senator.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-84, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act".—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald (Halifax): Honourable senators, I move third reading of this bill.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to rise on a point of order on Order No. 1 before the question is put.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: You may do so now.

Senator MacEachen: I regret that I have risen to impede, in a sense, the eloquence of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), but I can assure him that my point of order relates to what I consider to be a principle of parliamentary procedure which I have contemplated raising for some time. I raise the question today because of the importance of Bill C-84 and because I had attempted to follow the progress of this bill not only in the House of Commons but also in the committee of the Senate. I know that this bill received pre-study by the standing Senate committee and I believe that the printed proceedings of the pre-study were available to all honourable senators. I was interested in the representations that had been made by various groups, when the pre-study was undertaken, to the effect that insufficient time had been granted to them to appear in the course of the hearings on the pre-study of this bill.

Subsequently, of course, the Senate gave the bill second reading, and the committee did hear a limited number of witnesses. I have no complaint about that. I wanted to examine the evidence that had been given in that limited hearing by those witnesses.

I asked my office to call the clerk of the committee so that I could have sent to me a copy of the evidence which was taken by the committee and which has not been made available in printed form to any honourable senator. I then learned—it may be inaccurate, but that is the information I received—that the printed evidence will not be available for at least two weeks.

Honourable senators, we are faced with this major tax bill of great importance and we are being asked to proceed to the final stage of the bill without having available to us in printed form the evidence that was taken in committee. I have attempted, in the short time at my disposal, to look into this matter from the point of view of the Senate. I discovered that this is not a new problem and that, as far back as 1975, the late Senator Benidickson, for example, raised a point of order on a bill and made a very strong plea that the bill not be proceeded with until the rules had been complied with and all honourable senators had a printed copy of the evidence which had been taken by the committee. His words are as follows:

I attempted to obtain today a copy of the proceedings of the meeting of the National Finance Committee which was the basis of the Senate study on the supplementary estimates . . .

Later on, he goes on to state:

. . . but I still have not received the committee evidence from a week ago and I did not take notes at the time.

In order to deal properly with the bill, he felt it necessary to have the printed evidence. I am in somewhat the same situation as that faced by Senator Benidickson and, I am sure, many other honourable senators, when dealing with bills. It is for that reason that I raise the point of order.

In the House of Commons, it would be unthinkable for a bill to proceed to third reading, for example, if any member wanted the printed evidence and that evidence were not available. I can cite discussions in the House of Commons. Indeed a former member of the house who is now sitting on the front bench—namely, Senator Olson—participated in one of these procedural arguments in which he supported the view very strongly—later supported by the Speaker of the House of Commons—that it was customary that the printed evidence be available to all members before a bill goes to third reading or to the relevant stage.

● (1420)

Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that, from my point of view, I find this practice unacceptable. I believe it is very unsatisfactory that honourable senators should be asked to deal with the third reading and to get the printed evidence—which is the only official account of what has happened—two or three weeks later. In fact, I am told that currently printed evidence is made available in the House of Commons within two to four days of the committee meetings. I am also told that in the Senate the printed evidence is made available only within two to six weeks. I do not stake my seat on that evidence, if it were possible to do so, but that is information that has been given to me. I do not believe that the precise dates are important. What is important is that members of the House of Commons do receive the printed evidence, and if they do not have it they refuse to deal with the bill. The Speaker supports the move, and custom supports it; and I believe the same practice, if insisted upon, would have to prevail in this chamber.

I am not blaming anyone for this because, as has been stated, I believe it has prevailed in the past. In other words, I am not blaming the government. But I am asserting that, from my point of view, it is unsatisfactory to be asked, as a senator, to deal with a bill of this major importance and not to have available the printed evidence taken by the committee—a very important committee.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: What is the point of receiving the printed transcript of the evidence two weeks or four weeks from now? It will have no effect on the legislation. It will have no influence on how we deal with the legislation. Its only purpose will be archival—

An Hon. Senator: That's right.

Senator MacEachen: —and the purpose of sending bills to committees is to have evidence and to have the consideration of that committee, which is then made available to all senators.

When I first came to the Senate, I was astonished that in most cases a bill received very little consideration in the chamber itself. I was astonished that there would be a mover of the bill from the government side and usually one spokesman from the opposition. So the chamber itself gives limited consideration to bills in the Senate. Of course, it is evident that the major consideration of bills is undertaken in committees and that that consideration is then available to the Senate as a whole, which justifies and supports the very limited treatment and consideration given to a bill on the floor of the Senate chamber itself. But that justification disappears if the consideration of and the evidence given to the committee are not available to all honourable senators. I am not sure how far I shall go on this point with respect to this bill. However, I ask the government not to proceed with third reading of this bill until it ascertains for us when we can have the printed evidence. Can the production of that evidence be accelerated so that it is available in time to give this bill early passage? Certainly it would satisfy my concerns.

Of course, there is another point which, in a sense, modifies my concern about this bill, and that is that the bill has been pre-studied. That evidence is available in printed form, though the evidence taken in committee subsequent to second reading is not available. I note that it is customary to use what used to be called the "blues" in the House of Commons. From time to time I have done this, but I find it very unsatisfactory because they are difficult to work from and they have all sorts of editorial changes. More importantly, they have no official status, none whatsoever. If one picked up the draft report of the proceedings of a committee and attempted to read them in the Senate, it would have absolutely no status, no more than one's notes taken during the course of a committee. That is another drawback. However, the most telling drawback is that the evidence should be available to every senator because he or she has to take the responsibility of voting for or against this bill. No senator has delegated that responsibility to a committee. Of course, it can be argued that not every senator may want to look at that evidence. That argument is irrelevant from my point of view. It is the right of the Senate and the right of each senator to have the printed evidence. Again, I ask that the bill not be proceeded with today pending some investigation as to when the printed evidence of the committee proceedings will be available. Perhaps there is some information that will help to facilitate further proceedings on the bill.

Having said that with respect to this bill, I want to advise the Deputy Leader of the Government that I shall be taking a very stiff view in this regard on a number of bills. One of them is Bill C-70, the Family Allowances Bill, which has not yet been sent to committee. Ultimately it will go to a committee and witnesses will be heard. I do not think that the Senate should be asked to pass this bill at third reading until every senator has had an opportunity to hear and to read the evidence presented in committee. It would be shameful if we passed a bill reducing the benefits to the families of Canada when an opportunity had not been given to each and every senator to consider the evidence. I take the same attitude with respect to the Representation Bill. Please do not ask me to facilitate the passage of that bill unless I have had an opportunity to read and examine all the evidence. I advise my colleagues of my intentions at this moment so that it will not come as a surprise or be viewed in a confrontational way at a later time.

● (1430)

I have thought about this matter for quite some time and decided I would raise it now for procedural reasons, and for reasons of logic. It is my opinion that I did not come to the Senate as a legislator to receive a lesser service than I received in the House of Commons, where I could obtain the evidence of a committee in a matter of days. Here in the Senate it is a matter of weeks, and I think we should be treated in the same manner as is the House of Commons. We too are legislators and I would say to honourable senators that if we do not respect our function, who else will?

I regret that it happens to involve this bill, Senator MacDonald, but it is a hugely significant bill and I think the point must be made. It is my hope that the government will not press for third reading until we have had some further clarification as to when we may receive the printed evidence.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, in the short time I have been in this chamber, I too have noticed the slowness with which reports of committees come to us and have always assumed that there must be some kind of logical explanation that makes the situation unchangeable. I sympathize with the Leader of the Opposition in this regard. He indicates that this bill, of course, has had extensive pre-study and, not being totally familiar with the procedure in this chamber, I am at a loss to know whether he is now making a case for the speeding up of the printing process as a general point of order, or whether he has a hang-up on this particular bill, important as it is.

While my honourable friend has referred to the "blues" as not being an accurate record, I would have assumed he could have used at least some of that information to continue the debate on third reading with respect to the subject matter of this bill. If I am incorrect in that assumption, I would defer to our leader to elaborate on this matter, or to the chairman of the committee.

I cannot comment on Senator MacEachen's earlier remarks regarding witnesses not having an opportunity to be heard since I do not know what he is alluding to in that regard.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in response to Senator MacEachen's voiced concerns, I can well appreciate his position. It has impressed me, not only today, but over the past seven years, that this was the custom in this place. It has been my experience, however, that whenever I have wanted to study the contents of a series of hearings by a committee, I have asked for the transcripts and they have always arrived very promptly, although I certainly would agree that they are not nearly as efficient or as worthwhile as the printed copies of the proceedings.

Honourable senators, I would like to have the opportunity of referring this matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration since that is where the matter really must be looked at. It is not a government measure. In other words, the government has not dictated the length of time that it takes to produce Debates of the Senate or committee minutes or anything else for that matter. It is obviously the business of the Senate itself. If the Senate wishes to produce minutes in six weeks, eight weeks, three days or twenty-four hours, I presume that the Senate has the authority so to decree, and if that is the wish of the Senate you will find me an enthusiastic supporter of that action.

However, what I do find a little disquieting is that at this stage of the parliamentary process we should be called upon to perhaps delay Bill C-84 and also bills C-70 and C-74. These are all important measures in the government's legislative calendar and I would be disappointed if we took longer than was absolutely necessary to deal with them. I know that Senator MacEachen is saying that they will be dealt with as soon as the proper instruments are available to deal with them. I appreciate that, but I would ask honourable senators, if it is their intention to institute a new system of printing and presenting reports of proceedings of committees, to refrain from making these three bills the victims of the implementation of that new policy. The present situation has been going on certainly as long as I have been here, and presumably a long time prior to that, according to the quotation that we heard earlier, so in agreeing to stand Bill C-84 for today, I would ask honourable senators to think in terms of gradualism, rather than an abrupt cut-off of the business of the Senate, in trying to correct what Senator MacEachen points out is an obvious deficiency in the process. I would hate to have the Senate placed in a position of having these three bills used as an example to demonstrate a shortcoming in the Senate's procedure over the past number of years.

I simply bring that to the attention of the Senate, and, as we try to investigate with the staff methods and means of speeding up the process of printing and presenting the proceedings, I would ask Senator MacEachen whether it is the intention of the opposition to hold up these bills until that situation corrects itself, or can we look forward, perhaps with the help of the transcripts, to examining the evidence in the study of Bill C-84. Certainly, the pre-study of that bill is not at issue here. In other words, honourable senators, perhaps we can use the transcripts for the purpose of studying these bills while we try to find a way of rectifying the situation in the long term.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps I could make a suggestion that might be helpful. The alternatives that present themselves are that either we insist on getting the official version before we proceed with these bills or we deal with the bills on the basis of the transcript "blues" or "daily copy," as I think it is sometimes called, and, in the meantime, have the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration look at the whole question. It seems to me that, this being Wednesday, the government might make an inquiry in the meantime about these periods that Senator MacEachen referred to. Senator MacEachen has told us that the information he received was that normally they are produced within a period of two to six weeks. It might very well be that that can be accelerated.

In other words, I would recommend, in order to help the government deal with these bills more quickly and still maintain the principle raised by Senator MacEachen, that the Deputy Leader of the Government look into the question and perhaps advise us tomorrow what the response is as to the possibilities. I know that there are problems in printing and in translation, but the deputy leader may be able to tell us a little more about the present state of affairs and what is possible with respect to these three bills.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I might say that I agree with Senator Frith's suggestion. I had every intention of making that inquiry. However, knowing what little I do about the workings of this place, it seems to me that if the norm today is two to six weeks, then to ask the staff to change that system to two to four days—in other words, to ask them to change the system that quickly and to that degree of efficiency may be asking a little too much. This is why I have asked for some generosity in dealing with bills C-84, C-74 and C-70.

Perhaps I am anticipating a problem that is not there. Perhaps when I speak to the staff this afternoon, they will tell me that there is no problem; that they can produce the printed copy in two days, as we are told they do in the House of Commons. If that is so, then obviously we do not have a problem. However, if that is not the case and they tell me it will take X number of days or weeks or months to bring in new equipment or hire extra staff, or to do thus and so, I am simply asking for some consideration for the on-going legislation while we are attempting to put this into effect.

Senator Frith: I am saying that we are interested in that consideration, but let us find out the facts in the meantime.

Senator MacEachen: I think in the course of my remarks I suggested that the Acting Leader of the Government might make inquiries as to whether it would be possible to have the printed proceedings, for example, later this week or early next week on this particular bill. That would certainly be of great assistance. Once a report has been made, then one can deal with it; it is only a matter of standing it for a day or so with respect to this bill.

● (1440)

What I said, in a sense, was said in an effort to be helpful, because it is absolutely clear that there is a list of priorities, and that the Senate is at the bottom of that priority list. If these priorities were rearranged, then it would be possible to produce the printed proceedings, particularly the printed proceedings relating to these bills, without undue delay.

I have tried to avoid putting the deputy leader in an impossible position by saying: "Well, today, we are going to insist." However, I am giving him notice that I am going to be very tough, particularly with respect to the Family Allowances Bill and the Representation Bill.

That puts the authorities—the Printing Bureau and others—on notice to rearrange their priorities so that when the evidence goes in it will be given prompt attention, and that they will not churn out everything else and then pick up the Senate's work and say: "Well, now it is the Senate's turn because we have nothing else to do." I think that if we put some pressure on and said: "Look, if you can do it for the House of Commons, you can do it for us, and if there is to be a choice to be made, then choose some of these important proceedings for the Senate and get them back to us," we would see results.

I have avoided saying, honourable senators, that I will do this as a matter of routine; I am just saying that my patience is a bit frayed at the lack of service, and I am, I must say, somewhat degraded at the knowledge that the period for printing of committee proceedings is two to four days for the House of Commons and weeks for the Senate.

May I say, honourable senators, that Mr. Lambert, the former Speaker of the House of Commons, complained on one occasion that the House of Commons had to wait six or seven days. He complained and no one found that unusual, so why should we not complain and make sure that we get the printed proceedings in a timely manner?

I am giving the authorities—whatever that term means, but there are "authorities"—notice that the priorities ought to be rearranged or there will be difficulties.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, while I agree with my leader that it is vitally important to receive these printed proceedings, I should like to ask the Acting Leader of the Government to make sure that translation of the proceedings is done well also.

My speech of November 7 was translated from French to English. That translation was so poor that not only did it not do justice to my speech, but in fact it made a mess of it. If we are receiving secondary help from the Secretary of State for translation services in this house, then I think we should look into that situation and make sure that we get accurate translation and timely printing of the proceedings in both official languages so that we can refer with confidence to either version when we wish to do so.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with respect to the allegation by prospective witnesses that they did not have time to prepare themselves for committee meetings, I can only repeat what I said the other day; that is, when the bill was referred to the committee for pre-study, we called a number of organizations that we believed had an interest in making representations to the committee. We invited them to appear, but they declined to do so, pleading lack of time. We did not set any time limit on them, we did not give them any time frame within which they were to appear.

In any event, the committee reported on its pre-study. The Christmas recess intervened, the bill came to us officially from the House of Commons and was referred to the committee. Again we made a series of telephone calls to the same people inviting them to appear. Most of them declined to do so. Two of them did appear, however, the Canadian Bankers' Association and the Canadian Insolvency Association.

It is to their testimony before the committee, and particularly at one session of the committee, that the Leader of the Opposition is referring when he demands the printed proceedings of the committee.

I may say that what he calls the "blues", the unedited transcript of that one meeting, are available. I have that transcript on my desk and it is available to other honourable senators who may wish to peruse it while waiting for the printed version from the Printing Bureau.

It is true that there are priorities. I am informed that the standing order at the Printing Bureau is that the House of Commons is always to have priority. I cannot resist expressing the thought that that probably harks back to the days when Senator MacEachen was running the business of the House of Commons.

[Translation]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to echo the remarks of Senator MacEachen. I consider the current practice to be rather disconcerting. To begin with, I am prepared to take my work seriously. I cannot possibly sit on all Senate committees, but before I have to decide whether to support or reject a bill in this house I would like to have an opportunity not only to listen to the speeches delivered here in the Senate but also to be able to refer to the transcript of evidence heard at the committee stage.

A few minutes ago Senator Doody suggested that this question or problem—he considers it as a problem, and he is right—be referred to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration for consideration.

In my opinion, this question does not require committee consideration. It is rather a question of attitude on the part of Senate employees.

I have a serious grievance, honourable senators. Last summer when the Special Committee on Youth held hearings we had to wait during part of June and all July and August before we were even able to get the official report of the committee which had travelled from one end of Canada to the other to gather evidence from young Canadians and other people concerned about that problem. I repeat, it is a problem of attitude on the part of Senate employees.

Some of them are excellent, others not so good. To think that the printing of evidence gathered by a committee could take three whole months, is unacceptable.

It is as if the staff consider that when both houses have adjourned, the senators are off on holidays, nobody works.

This particular problem is serious, so much so that when we began to draft the report of the Special Committee on Youth we members of the committee did not yet have the transcripts of proceedings. This situation is totally unacceptable.

Some committee clerks do their job and make sure that we get the official debates printed in both official languages within a reasonable time.

Today I received in my office the official report on the proceedings of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, Issue No. 36, a sitting held on Wednesday, January 22 last. Today is February 5, so it did not take all that long to get it. Why should that process take weeks and weeks more in other committees? Is it a question of staff? Is it a question of broken down word processing equipment or the total lack of it? I have no idea.

Senate employees should pass the word around: some senators do take their work seriously. There should be no need to raise such a question on the floor of the Senate. We have the proof that some committee clerks take their job seriously and see to it that official reports are printed on time, whereas others manage to make the process last indefinitely.

I fully agree with Senator MacEachen. The excuse that the "blues" are available does not satisfy me. The "blues" appear in the original language of delivery, English or French. The blues do not include the translation.

Pursuant to the Official Languages Act I claim the absolute right to have the official reports of the Senate committees in the language of my choice. Only the official reports of the committees meet that right.

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, you have heard the information that was requested by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. Is it your wish now that this bill, Bill C-84, be not read a third time until the printed committee proceedings are provided?

Senator Doody: With respect, Your Honour, I believe it was agreed that the order should stand until tomorrow, at which time I would provide a report informing the Senate of the printing situation. At that time, I believe we will decide whether this bill shall be read a third time then or some time later.

It is my understanding that the order is to stand until tomorrow.

Senator Guay: With appropriate translations!

Order stands.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—
(Honourable Senator Turner).

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak on second reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act. Let me say at the outset that it is difficult for a young guy like myself, a member of the gang from the other side of the railroad tracks, to follow a distinguished senator such as Senator David Croll, one of the fathers of the Canadian safety net. I wish to take this opportunity to thank the senator for his remarks which were welcomed by the little guy, the workers of our Canadian society. I also want to congratulate Senators Robertson and Tremblay for their informative remarks in their explanations of Bill C-70. Yesterday Senator Le Moyne certainly spoke on behalf of the residents, French and English, of his great, beloved la belle province de Québec. In addition, Senator Graham did a superb job, as always, speaking for the underprivileged kids of the maritime provinces; yes, and of all of Canada.

Senator Bonnell went back over 45 years and made a thought-provoking speech, with old-fashioned soap-box oratory, which sinks in deep and helps the people of the day reflect and come to the conclusion that a wise decision was taken by the opposition senators to walk up the road of life alongside the workers of this great country, Canada. These are the real people, the real workers, the people who make the wheels of industry turn. These are the people who put in far more than they take out and, when they do take something out in the form of old age pensions, veterans' pensions, family allowance benefits and, yes, if they are unemployed, unemployment insurance and welfare, those cheques are cashed each month because the majority of recipients live from cheque to cheque and from week to week. The money goes back into the economy, thus making the wheels of industry turn.

Churchill once said that democracy is not the best form of government, but there is none better to replace it. Yes, honourable senators, I believe that his remarks were true. Government of the people, by the people and for the people. This sentence has a nice ring to it.

When one looks at the list of organizations which have made submissions regarding this bill, one will come to the conclusion that a great many people are interested in family allowances. They are opposed to Bill C-70. Surely, these leaders are speaking out loud and clear on behalf of millions of Canadians, the workers who are singing the same tune in unison, which is, "Leave my family allowances alone."

Honourable senators, this government, whether in the Senate or the House of Commons, is not listening. This is not a form of government of the people, by the people and for the people. Is this the sacred trust that the government of today talked about during the past election campaign? I think not.

Honourable senators, I look back through the pages of Canadian history as one who went through the dirty thirties when there were no social benefits and no safety net. The only benefit was called "welfare." The unemployed worker laboured for his welfare by shovelling snow in the winter and cutting weeds in the summer.

At the close of World War II, the government of the day took steps to set up a social safety net for all Canadians, and the family allowance was introduced to our Canadian way of life in 1944.

Canada's social security system consists of a multitude of programs established at various times, serving distinctive objectives and relying on both direct cash transfers and indirect transfers achieved by the operation of the tax system. Individual programs could thus be examined at two levels: First, they can be assessed with respect to their achievement of specific program-related objectives, and these objectives can be evaluated in the light of current social conditions; and, second, the role of programs within Canada's social safety net can be assessed and the possibility that a rationalization of programs could enhance the effectiveness of the system itself can be examined.

My following remarks focus specifically on the development and current status of family allowances and on the recent controversy concerning the program. Emphasis will thus be placed on the first two kinds of discussions just outlined. It will be seen, however, that the evolution of family allowances has, in some instances, been closely tied to developments in the adjacent segments of the social security net and that decisions about the future of the family allowance are dependent on global judgments about the operation and effectiveness of Canada's social security system.

Therefore, I wish to talk about the original Family Allowance Act after 1944 which provided for monthly payments funded out of general government revenues to all families having children up to the age of 16 and either attending school, if eligible, or, unable to do so on medical grounds. Payments varied according to the age of the child ranging from $5 per month for children under five to $6 for children aged between six and nine, to $7 for children between ten and twelve and to $8 for children between thirteen and fifteen. In addition, payments were made on a sliding scale which reduced the size of the payment for the fifth child and additional children in the family. This was intended to allay the concern that the program would encourage larger families.

The family allowance program was Canada's first universal social security program applying to all members of a defined democratic class, irrespective of need. It thus departed from precedents established by earlier federal programs, such as the old age pension program of 1927, which involved the means test—and nobody liked the means test—and the downward adjustment of benefits in relation to income from other sources. The family allowance program also represented a dramatic increase in the social security expenditures of the federal government. Its anticipated initial cost of $200 million a year exceeded all welfare expenditures by all levels of government in Canada during any typical year in the second half of the preceding decade. Although its precedent-breaking characteristic might suggest otherwise, the family allowance program was not a response to intense public demand. A poll of late 1943 found public opinion close to evenly split on the desirability of such a program, and the issue attracted little public attention until the government announced its intention to proceed with the act and the program. The family allowance was thus not a product of public demand but of other factors.

● (1500)

One central factor was the concern for the well-being of Canada's children, the future Canadians, which drew force from income and nutrition studies done during the 1930s and early 1940s. These studies established that even during conditions of wartime full employment only 43.7 per cent of the wage earning families outside the agriculture sector had sufficient income to ensure a nutritionally satisfactory diet, and that Canada had the highest infant mortality rate of any Caucasian country in the British Empire. These and other concerns were set out and addressed in the Marsh report of 1943, a study which addressed the anticipated social problems of post-war reconstruction with proposals for the creation of an extensive net of social security, health care and income supplement programs aimed at satisfying the basic needs of all citizens and avoiding the stigma traditionally attached to welfare awarded on selective criteria.

A second and equally prominent factor was the widespread concern during the war years that the return to peace would be followed by an economic slump and a reappearance of the problems of the 1930s. The newly fashionable Keynesian economics prescribed public sector spending as a way of maintaining purchasing power and, hence, consumer spending in the economy. This general reason for initiating major public spending was supported, in all probability, by some specific reasons.

It had been suggested that Mackenzie King saw family allowances as a means of responding to criticism that wartime wage control left unskilled labourers with less than a living wage while avoiding the general rise in prices which it was feared would result from the lifting of the wartime controls. It has been claimed that Mackenzie King hoped that the Conservatives would oppose the program and thus provide him with an issue on which to fight the forthcoming election. The strength of the considerations just outlined and, perhaps, the political difficulties inherent in opposing programs involving universal benefits caused King's political expectations to be belied in the House. The Family Allowance Act, after encountering mild Conservative opposition at first reading, received the unanimous support of the House at second reading.

For almost three decades following its establishment, the family allowance remained virtually unchanged. In 1949, the provision lowering benefits to large families was removed and, in 1957, the benefit for children in two of the four age categories set out in the act was increased by $1 per month. In 1964, the Youth Allowances Act was passed, which, in effect, extended the family allowance to those youths aged 16 to 18.

While inflation steadily eroded the significance of benefits for individual families, increases in the number of families entitled to receive benefits resulted in a steady expansion in the size of the program. In 1951, the average family allowance per child was equivalent to approximately 2 per cent of the average monthly family income while, by 1961, it was equivalent to only 1.5 per cent and, by 1971, to 0.75 per cent. At the same time, the number of families entitled to the family allowance rose from 1,910,192 in 1951 to 2,602,930 by 1961 and 3,024,423 by 1971. Government spending on family allowance underwent corresponding increases, from about $320 million in 1951-52 to just over $554 million in 1971-72.

The recent evolution, comprised of a number of factors, combined to make family allowances and social policy in general issues of high priority with the federal government in the early 1970s. In 1968, the Economic Council of Canada published findings which revealed disturbing evidence of the persistence of poverty in Canada and which received extensive media coverage. It was found that 27 per cent of the population lived in poverty and that 68 per cent of poor families were headed by workers, which focused attention upon the newly recognized problem of the working poor, as we now call it. These findings were supported and amplified by the reports of the Special Senate Committee on Poverty and the Castonguay commission in Quebec. The latter report added force to initiatives already under way in Quebec to assert provincial control over social security and to establish a comprehensive and integrated system to replace the patchwork quilt of federal programs.

These initiatives were a major factor, after 1969, in federal-provincial constitutional negotiations and ended in an impasse between Quebec and the federal government at the Victoria Conference of 1971. In 1970, in response to both the federal-provincial considerations and evidence raising doubt about the effectiveness of existing social security programs, the federal government proposed a federal income security plan which would do away with the universal family allowances and would replace them with a sliding scale of payments designed to support the income of low income families. Legislation was introduced in 1972, but the proposal attracted heavy criticism from the media, the public, particularly women who would have lost their cheques, and the opposition, and the legislation was allowed to die on the Order Paper after second reading.

[Senator Turner.]

As honourable senators may recall, during the election campaign of 1972, politicians going from door to door would hear people saying to them, "Get out of my back yard. You are the guy representing the government that wants to get rid of the family allowances. Well, I will vote another way this time." It was a big issue in that election campaign of 1972.

In 1973, a much more ambitious global review of security programs was undertaken, with the declared objective of comprehending the whole sweep of social security policy and achieving the kind of integrated social security system which would best serve the needs of the Canadian people. Many of the more sweeping proposals of the review, such as a guaranteed income for those unable to work and a multipronged employment strategy, either did not result in the legislation or were casualties of the fiscal restraints of the late 1970s. Proposed changes in the family allowance program were, however, implemented.

The result was a new Family Allowance Act of 1973, which governs the family allowance program as it operates today. Under the 1973 act, a parent or guardian who is wholly or substantially maintaining a dependent child under the age of 18 becomes entitled to an allowance average of $20 per child, nearly three times the average of $7.71 per child which was paid under the old act in its final years of operation. Furthermore, the new act provided for the annual adjustment of allowances in January of each year according to changes in the cost of living. The act enables each province to vary allowances by age of child or family size, as long as average total payments in that province remains equal to the federal rate over a four-year period and subject to the provision that the lowest provincial payment must be at least 60 per cent of the standard federal rate. In addition, the act provided for the payment of special allowances for children maintained by welfare agencies, government departments or institutions. Allowances also became taxable at that time.

Down through the years, with certain exceptions, we have seen the regular operation of provisions of the 1973 act. In 1976, as a result of fiscal restraint, the cost of living adjustment of the allowances was suspended for one year. In 1978, in concert with the introduction of the refundable Child Tax Credit, benefit levels were cut from an average of $26 per child to an average of $20 per child, which then became the figure subject to indexation in the following years. Indexation of the allowances in 1983 and 1984 was limited to 6 per cent and 5 per cent respectively in accordance with the federal policy of fiscal restraint announced in late 1982.

Expenditures involved in the operation of the family allowance program rose dramatically as a result of the benefit increases provided for in the 1973 act. The combined cost of family allowances and youth allowances in 1972-73 was approximately $630 million, while the program established by the new act, which combined those two allowances, cost $1,798,476,000 during its first year of operation in 1974-75.

With the exception of 1979-80, when the benefit reductions of 1978 caused total expenditures to decline, the trend in family allowance expenditures has been steadily upward since the implementation of the 1973 act.

The expenditures in recent years are as follows: In 1980-81, $1,851,000,000; in 1981-82, $2,020,000,000; in 1982-83, $2,231,000,000; in 1983-84, $2,327,000,000; in 1984-85, $2,429,000,000. We must not forget that this money goes directly into the economy of the country and makes the wheels of industry turn.

It is noteworthy that cost increases since 1974 have resulted from the indexation provision of the new act rather than from increases in the number of eligible children. While approximately 3,343,000 families, containing 7,248,000 children received allowances in 1974, 3,645,000 families, containing only 6,826,000 children, received allowances in 1981. By 1984, the number of both eligible families and children had declined further to 3.5 million and 6.6 million respectively.

While raising costs, despite the declining number of children, the indexation of allowances has successfully countered their erosion by inflation. As a result of the 1973 act, average allowances per child rose from an equivalent of less than .6 per cent of average family income to an equivalent of over 1.5 per cent of average family income. They fell to about 1.4 per cent of average family income by 1978, likely reflecting the growth of incomes rather than any ineffectiveness of indexation. The indexation in 1978 caused allowances to fall to about one per cent of average family income.

For 1985 the average benefit per child is $31.27 per month or approximately $375 per year. This benefit is received in eight provinces, while two provinces—namely, Quebec and Alberta—have taken advantage of provisions of the act enabling variations in the distribution of benefits within provinces. In Quebec higher benefits are delivered as the number of children in a family increases up to three, while in Alberta benefits rise as the ages of eligible children rise.

I should now like to talk about the issues and the controversies. Like some of the original objectives of the family allowance, controversies over its inception have today a distinctly archaic flavour. For example, it was initially feared by organized labour that the allowance would weaken union bargaining power and serve as a substitute for higher wages, while others argued that allowances would encourage larger families and, in particular, transfer money from Ontario to Quebec, where larger families were more common.

The universalism of family allowances also attracted criticism. Charlotte Whitton, at the instigation of the Conservative Party, prepared a summary of social security proposals, including those of the influential Marsh report, which argued that cash allowance to all families, rich and poor, were wasteful and that the emphasis should be on the extension to those in need of services in the fields of health, education, housing and the protection of children, as well as on the maintenance of adequate wage levels.

While the subject of heated discussion at the time, that point of view, it has been seen, was not productive of significant opposition to family allowances in the House. Following its inception, the family allowance program rapidly ceased to be a significant focus of social policy controversy. This was likely due in part to the shift of popular attention to other programs launched in future years, and also to the effect of other program spending in combination with the non-indexation allowance benefits and causing family allowance costs to diminish steadily in importance as a component of national social security spending.

The major controversy about the program first arose in the early 1970s. A number of studies conducted in the late 1960s and early 1970s had uncovered disturbing evidence of the persistence of poverty in Canada, particularly within a newly identified group—the working poor. It was found, for example, that the portion of the family income received by the poorest 20 per cent of families had actually declined during the 1960s from 6.6 per cent in 1961 to 5.6 per cent in 1971 and that certain groups, such as single parent families headed by women, had failed to benefit from generally rising incomes during that decade. At the same time, social security expenditures had increased at an unprecedented rate, from under $4 billion by all levels of government in 1963, to over $11 billion by 1972.

An early response of the federal government to findings such as the foregoing, as they had begun to emerge in the late 1960s, was a white paper entitled "Income Security For Canadians", released in November 1970. The paper recommended changes to the whole income security system and particularly to a universal program such as family allowances and old age pensions, in order to redirect the emphasis of the system, so as to ensure the greatest concentration of available resources to those with lowest incomes.

It was recommended that existing family allowances and youth allowances be scrapped and replaced with a selective system called the Family Income Security Plan, which would provide maximum income supplements to the 20 per cent of Canadian families in poverty, as well as smaller income supplements on a sliding scale which would reduce them to zero when family income exceeded $10,000.

During the election campaign of 1972, this issue came up at every door where the wife and husband had a small campaign. The message was loud and clear: "You are the dirty so-and-so who is going to take away my family allowance. No way, sir. You tell your government and the cabinet that this is my cheque and no one else's, and I want it." The ensuing debate in many ways anticipated the character of more recent controversy about family allowances. While opinion polls demonstrated that the proposal had reasonably broad public support, it aroused intense opposition from recipients of allowances and from defenders of universal programs. It was argued that the family allowance frequently provided women raising families with their only source of income not dependent on their spouse. It was also argued in terms reminiscent of the Marsh report that only universal programs could enable recipients to avoid the long-standing social stigma attached to dependence on public charity. This argument was supplemented with objections to the administrative complexity and associated arguments that a selected program would be cumbersome and costly. Reluctant all-party agreement on a modified proposal involving increased benefits to low-income families was obtained in 1971, but the resultant bill died on the Order Paper later that year. After the 1972 election, during which Liberal candidates directly experienced the opposition of family allowance recipients and which resulted in a Liberal minority government dependent on the support of the NDP, the plan was not revived. The Honourable Marc Lalonde, the then Minister of National Health and Welfare, made clear the primary reason for the change:

... It's a reaction to the ... voice of the electorate ... It's clear that Canadian housewives attach a lot of importance to that Family Allowance cheque, and there was a lot of resistance to the idea that ... about half of them would be losing that allowance ...

● (1520)

This message can be heard today. It can be determined from what I have said so far that reform, when it came in 1973, preserved the universality of family allowances and provided substantially increased benefits which were also, at that time, indexed to the cost of living. The major controversies which emerged in subsequent years of Liberal government resulted from suspension or restriction of the indexation provision of the 1973 act. The implementation of the federal government's six-and-five restraint program which restricted increases in family allowances to 6 per cent in 1983 and 5 per cent in 1984 produced considerable discussion in the House and in the Senate on its effects on allowance recipients. During debate in the House on Bill C-132, which amended the indexation provision of the Family Allowances Act in accordance with the six-and-five formula, supporters of the government stressed that the amendment left the principles of universality and indexation intact and that an increase in the Child Tax Credit, also proposed by the government, would compensate middle and low income families for reductions in allowance benefits.

Members of the opposition registered diverse objections to the bill—in combination with the tax credit—ranging from the argument that since its net effect on the national disposable income would be negligible, its net effect on inflation would also be negligible, to arguments that the tax credit would only help those sufficiently well off to pay income tax and that the bill unjustly identified the mothers and children of Canada as the culprits in inflation. It was argued, as well, that the bill attacked the social security net as we knew it and represented, therefore, an erosion of the principle of universality, that it affected women, both in needy families and those who might be kept in a state of personal poverty within affluent families, by reducing the one cheque that comes in their name, and that any reduction in benefits in conditions of high unemployment and inflation was unacceptable.

The principle of universality was widely invoked during the debate on Bill C-132. During the course of the debate both major parties stood accused of seeking the abandonment of universality and both indignantly denied the charge. While the persistent reference to universality was, no doubt, partly a consequence of convictions held by some members that any reduction in universal programs was tantamount to an erosion of the principle itself, it also resulted from the fact that doubts about the principle had come to be widely, if sometimes surreptitiously entertained. The Liberal Minister of Finance had been quoted in the press in November 1982 as rejecting the view that the universal social programs were a cornerstone of Liberal social philosophy and as affirming that Canadians were ready to forgo the universality of family allowances. Participants in the debate were also reminded of the number of influential Conservatives who had publicly declared their scepticism about the value of a universal family allowance, and that the news media, during the period of the Conservative Government in 1979, had carried reports of the demise of the universal family allowance.

Partisan exchanges within the House during the 1982 debate did not, however, elucidate the basis for private doubts which may have been emerging concerning universality, nor did they subject the principle to serious analysis. Discussions of the principle itself reiterated, instead, long-standing defences. It was argued, for example, that a universal program preserves the dignity of the recipient of the social benefits, that people are not divided into givers and receivers, and that therefore the stigma and the sense of alienation from society which results from this distinction is avoided.

The accession to power of the new Conservative government in 1984 was accompanied from the outset by renewed expressions in the House of concern about the fate of universal social programs, including the family allowance and by renewed debate elsewhere about the merits of universality. Outside the House, advocates of the urgent importance of the national deficit reduction targeted universal social programs as the major area of potential expenditure reduction. A study published by the C.D. Howe Institute in August, 1984 argued that the effectiveness of the social safety net could be enhanced while costs could be reduced if net benefits were more closely related to the income levels of recipients. It was argued that the most effective deficit reduction strategy would not involve a direct attack on universal social programs but rather a more effective use of the tax system by recovering benefits from those not in need of them, as well as overall tax increases.

Other voices unequivocally opposed the continuation of existing universal programs. In October 1984, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association proposed termination of the existing universal security programs, the institution of a guaranteed minimum annual income and an overhaul of the tax system. In September of the same year, the director of the Fraser Institute recommended the cancellation of universal family allowances and other universal programs. The National Citizens' Coalition has also been reported as favouring the cancellation of universal programs on the grounds that only this approach can allow the provision of adequate assistance to those in genuine need.

At the same time, voices were raised in defence of universal programs. The president of the National Action Committee on the Status of Women argued that the family allowance, while small and eroded by inflation, remained the only economic recognition given by society to women engaged in full-time child raising and, thus, provided the only money they ever received into their own hands. The Executive Director of the Canadian Council on Social Development argued in favour of the maintenance of the universal benefit structure because of its effectiveness in avoiding social stigma and the administrative complexity associated with selective programs. It also called for the taxing back of benefits from the affluent and the closing of tax loopholes favouring high income earners. We hear the same message today.

● (1530)

The National Anti-Poverty Organization and the National Council of Welfare have been reported as favouring essentially the same approach. More recently, the Canadian Association of Social Workers and La Confédération des Organismes Familiaux du Québec have added their voices to those championing the retention of universal family allowances, with the secretary-general of the latter declaring that any incursions by the government on the universality of allowances would be considered an anti-familial gesture by members of the association.

During 1984, a number of opinion polls were conducted to determine public reaction to the possibility of cuts in universal programs, or to their elimination. A poll conducted in May of 1984 revealed that a substantial majority of those interviewed favoured both the reduction of social benefits to high-income earners and the institution of a guaranteed minimum wage for all Canadians. A poll conducted by Goldfarb Consultants of Toronto in September 1984 portrayed Canadians as being 86 per cent in favour of cutting social benefits to the affluent. In other words, those with family incomes of $40,000 per year or more. More recently, a Gallup poll conducted in December 1984 found that 75 per cent of Canadians would support increasing the family allowance but restricting its benefit to those in genuine need.

Renewed public attention to the general issue of universality and social benefits, and specifically to the value of family allowances, in the fall of 1984 was due, in part, to what were widely perceived as ambiguous, if not clearly ominous, signals from the government. The government's clear commitment to deficit reduction, combined with the announcement in the Speech from the Throne that child and elderly benefit programs would be studied, resulted in early questions about the maintenance of universal programs. Responding to a specific question about the family allowance on November 9, 1984, the Prime Minister rejected suggestions that a program involving means tests was in the works, but went on to express doubts about the fairness of social programs providing benefits to people making $500,000 a year, and affirmed, as a principle, that those most in need should get more from the government. The issue of universality was addressed at greater length six days later by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. After rejecting conceptions of universality entailing benefits to all from all programs, or equal after-tax benefits to all recipients of a given benefit, the minister offered the following as a "workable" and "fair" definition of universality.

... that all individuals in the group designated for assistance should receive benefits. At the same time, however, the value of those benefits should surely be greatest for those with the greatest need and least for those whose needs are the least.

The issue of family allowance received intermittent attention in the House during ensuing weeks. The next major discussion, however, occurred following the release of the government's consultation paper on child and elderly benefits on January 28, 1985. The paper affirmed the principle of universality but raised the possibility of a surtax on family allowances going to high-income families. It also proposed two options with respect to the revision of benefits. Under one option the family allowance was to be cut by approximately one-third, but changes to the Child Tax Exemption and tax credit would have raised net benefits for families with incomes under $10,000 per year by an average of $175 while causing net benefits to decline above income levels of $28,000. Under the second option, in which the family allowance was retained intact, families earning less than $10,000 would have gained an average of $358 in benefits, while benefits would have fallen for those earning more than $23,000.

Discussion of the paper involved objections to the modesty of benefit increases, objections to the effect of proposals on modest-income families, affirmation of the government's commitment to universality, assertions that the proposals would hurt the middle class more than the rich, contrary assertions of their redistributive effect, and assertions of the inadequacy of the proposals in light of the needs of single-parent families. The recurring themes of opposition to the proposals were: They offered inadequate increases to genuinely needy families, and they reduced benefits to lower middle-income families who could ill-afford such reductions.

The consultation paper was referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs which heard witnesses in March and issued a report in April of last year. The report affirmed a series of basic principles including: The universality of family allowance in recognition of the social importance of child-raising; the progressivity of after-tax benefits; reduced benefits as income levels rise; the need for increased benefits to genuinely needy families; the adjustment of benefits to reflect changes in the cost of living—commitment to full indexation was ascribed only to the NDP—the sharing of costs among all segments of society rather than families alone, and the undesirability of a surtax on family allowances.

The next major development within the House was the presentation of the budget of May 23, 1985. With respect to family benefits generally, the budget announced an increase of $140 in the Child Tax Credit combined with a lowering of the income threshold at which the tax credit begins to diminish, and a reduction, beginning in 1984, of the standard child tax deduction. While these changes increased the level of benefits to low-income families, it was proposed that indexation of the family allowance itself, and of old age pensions, be applied only for cost-of-living increases over 3 per cent per annum, which will cause the real dollar value of the allowances to decline by that amount beginning in 1986.

Proposed restrictions on the indexation of old age pensions and family allowances became a major public issue during the weeks following the presentation of the budget. Negative public reaction to the partial de-indexing of pensions, combined with sustained outcry in the House, eventually resulted in the abandonment of this initiative by the government. In the case of family allowances, objections were registered both during debate on the budget and in a steady succession of questions which continued until the House rose at the end of June. It was argued that the government proposals represented an implicit attack on the principle of universality; that, in combination with tax increases, they placed the burden of deficit reduction on the backs of the poor, and that they were inconsistent with earlier government proposals and with the Prime Minister's personal views, as expressed in the book Where I Stand, and that they subsidized the rich at the expense of the poor.

Pressure from within the House was supplemented more recently by pressure from outside. As the summer began, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women—an umbrella organization for more than 380 women's groups across Canada—announced plans to launch a national campaign of petitions against the government's family allowance proposals. Thus far, the government has responded to criticism of the partial de-indexation of allowances by stressing that universality of the program is maintained and that, in concert with other family benefit-related budget proposals, the budget will achieve net increases in benefits received by those families in genuine need, and the urgent need for reduction of the deficit.

Honourable senators, Canadians are in agreement with the analytical conclusions at the outset of my speech that the family allowance can usefully be considered both as an individual program and as a component of Canada's extensive social security net. While the following will raise issues relating to each of these levels of analysis, it will be argued that the second level has now become unavoidable if persuasive conclusions are to be drawn even about single programs. Canada's social security net has evolved over a span of more than 50 years, and incorporates programs possessing clearly disparate objectives and strategic assumptions. The assessment of programs now requires renewed attention to fundamental systemic purposes.

● (1540)

Considered individually, the family allowance program presents a paradox. Its original objectives have come to be of largely historical interest, while its contemporary objectives are by no means clear, yet it is passionately defended by a clientele of recipients, women's advocates and others.

One of the central objectives of the original programs—the prevention of economic depression—is of doubtful relevance to the conditions of inflationary recession which have prevailed in Canada until recently, nor has the remedy of massive government spending increases been widely advocated as a cure for recent recessionary tendencies. The other original objective—the provision of minimum physical necessities—addresses an element of the persisting problem of poverty. Acute physical privation, however, no longer threatens Canadian families as widely as it was seen to do in the late 1940s, as is reflected in the emphasis on minimally acceptable general standards of living in modern definitions of poverty itself.

[Senator Turner.]

Justifications of the family allowance now imply, as has been seen above, a diversity of possible objectives and in some cases have a distinctly improvised quality. It is widely—and plausibly—argued that benefits provided by the allowance remain of critical importance to Canada's poor, and are inadequate in relation to the needs of poor families. The recent report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs, for example, suggests this view by juxtaposing information on current benefit levels—$375 per year per child—with estimates of the costs involved in child-raising, currently between $2,438 and $4,266 per year, depending on the age of the child. This argument, however, substitutes a more ambitious objective for that under which the family allowance program originated, which was only to support the provision of the basic necessities of life. The new objective remains unclear in assertions routinely made about the allowance that benefits are paltry and need to be enlarged.

It is also argued that the family allowance is the only monetary recognition of the value of child-rearing provided by society, and may provide needed personal funds for the wives of affluent, but ungenerous, husbands. These arguments imply a second objective for the allowance, namely, to benefit mothers rather than children. Furthermore, as belatedly improvised defences for a long-standing program, they have yet to be systematically articulated and justified. Should society provide monetary recognition for child-rearing while allowing other socially beneficial private activities, such as exercise and fitness, to go unrewarded? Also, is society obliged to compensate for the stinginess of affluent husbands, in cases where they provide wives with insufficient personal funds? This consideration, it should be noted, is mitigated by the recovery of benefits from affluent families by means of taxation, which permits the allowance to serve as an intramarital transfer rather than a transfer of public funds to the wives of the affluent.

The two general objectives just discussed are clearly distinct. If the program is to serve both, then its adequacy under existing benefit levels in serving either can only be the more questionable. The central point which emerges here, however, is that the program cannot be adequately justified, or persuasively criticized, except in reference to clearly-defined objectives. In the absence of these, the family allowance will remain, as it has sometimes been portrayed to be in the national media, as a “motherhood” issue, dominated by emotional and symbolic considerations.

A second basic issue relating to the family allowance is that decision-making about the program is inextricably bound up with broader decision-making concerning the social security net as a whole. The much-debated universality issue serves to illustrate this point.

The basic case for universality in social security programs rests on the idea that a social stigma is attached to the reception of public assistance, and that the sense of self-worth of recipients can most effectively be safeguarded by programs in which no distinction is made between the needy and others. This claim rests on the assumption that contemporary public attitudes towards the recipients of social benefits are akin to those of a hundred years ago towards charity cases and may, itself, simply be wrong. If it is correct, or if emphasis is placed on the subjective experience of recipients, this argument would seem to have far-reaching implications for social programs. If it applies to family benefits, then for the same reasons it applies to all social security programs. Its logical conclusion would be the rationalization of allowances, and other programs, within a guaranteed national income scheme providing, without stigma, a minimally-acceptable standard of living to all Canadians.

There are also a number of supplementary arguments supporting universality. It has been argued, first of all, that the tax system provides an administratively simple mechanism for the recovery of benefits conferred by universal programs upon the affluent. The recovery in taxes, in 1984-85, of approximately 20 per cent of the $2.437 billion spent on family allowances, is indicative of the current use of the tax system in this manner. The fact that the benefits of nominally universal programs are currently recovered, at least in part, from the affluent, and could readily be fully recovered, has led to the conclusion that universality has come to be a largely symbolic, if not spurious, issue. The real issue, it is claimed, is now the level of after-tax benefits and their distribution. A second argument in favour of universality is that the administrative complexity, and associated costs, of selective programs frequently absorb a significant portion of the money they save in comparison with universal programs.

A study sponsored by the Ontario Economic Council in the late seventies estimated that, in 1976-77, the administrative costs of the federal family allowance program were $10,896,701, or approximately .55 per cent of the value of benefits paid. During the 1960s and early 1970s the administrative costs of needs-tested assistance programs operated by the Province of Ontario were approximately 4.2 per cent of total costs. It can thus be argued that the conversion of the family allowance to a needs-tested program would involve the absorption of a significant portion of hypothetical savings by added administrative costs. This argument has particular weight in conjunction with the one outlined immediately above, concerning the efficacy of the tax system in achieving the practical effects of needs-testing. The central argument against universality derives from the added costs of universal programs, and the unfairness involved in providing social benefits to the affluent, while assistance to the genuinely needy remains, in some cases, inadequate.

It was estimated in 1982 that cutting off the family allowance for the highest earning 25 per cent of families would save some $560 million—although a portion of this would likely be absorbed by higher administrative costs. Aside from cost savings, the adoption of needs-tested family allowances would make this program more obviously consistent with other selective social assistance programs and would, thus, be more compatible with the maintenance of the social security system as it now operates.

This consideration may, in the final analysis, be paramount. Decision-making about the universality of allowances cannot be isolated from decision-making about principles appropriate to the social security system as a whole.

A final recurring issue in discussions of the family allowance is the adequacy of existing benefits. It has been suggested that unless specific objectives of the program can be agreed upon, the identification of appropriate benefit levels will remain impossible. More broadly, the question requires renewed attention to the underlying purposes of the social security system, as you and I know. If it is the purpose of the system to impact significantly upon the problem of poverty, then the widely-acknowledged fact that the proportion of the population falling below accepted poverty lines has actually increased in recent years raises serious questions about the system as a whole and, consequently, about all of its major component programs.

The clarification of the purposes of social security is a necessary first step in the formulation of credible program objectives for transfers such as the family allowance. Without this step, debate about the program, like the program itself, is likely to remain a testimony to the limitations of improvisation.

Honourable senators, during my lifetime, I have been involved in every federal, provincial and municipal election in Toronto, London and other cities and towns since I was 15 years of age. Therefore, I have knocked on thousands of doors and have had the pleasure of talking to the rich, the middle class and the working people who make less than $20,000 per year. This is how one finds out how people live in our Canadian society. You listen and hear how the average Canadian is trying to make his or her way in life by trying to live and pay all the bills on the weekly salary.

Honourable senators, I can say from past personal experience that it is very tough; it is a tough life. I made it to the House. It is almost impossible sometimes to see the light at the end of the tunnel.

Therefore, the more I think about Bill C-70, the more I have to look at the two basic arguments that the government has been using in the House of Commons and in the Senate that the total package of child benefits, FA, CTC and CTE, will compensate for the reduction in the family allowance.

The counter-arguments to that are that the timing of the increases and deductions, that is, the CTC and the CTE, are not being placed in the proper perspective. De-indexing of the family allowance will take place in January of 1986. The increase of $70 of child tax credit will not take place until April 1987, 14 months after the fact. Therefore, families will be 14 months without the compensating adjustment. The lowering of the CTC, the turnover point, will take place in January of 1987. Therefore, all families, regardless of income, will have their family allowance reduced by $30. There will be a net gain only to families earning less than $10,000—all others will lose.

The second argument put forward is that the result of the changes will be a fairer distribution of benefits, that is, that a greater proportion of benefits will go to families with the lowest incomes.

The counter-argument to that is that, in urban centres, families of four with incomes less than $19,500 are living below the poverty line, but the net effect of changes to family benefits will mean a net loss for families with incomes of less than $20,000, which is what most families earn. Therefore, the loss will be experienced by poor families. This is not redistribution. In 1986, more than $16 million will be withheld from families living below the poverty line. To me, as a working guy, this is a disgrace.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, the answer is, yes, we are our brother's and our sister's keeper. Therefore, as one who has watched the families of my former riding grow up, and knowing what financial problems they have endured during their children's growing-up period, I can only suggest that Bill C-70 be referred back to committee for additional hearings so that the representatives of the people's groups—and there are hundreds of them—who are going to be affected by the passage of this bill, may be given their day in the Canadian citizens' court once again.

To me, honourable senators, as Churchill once said, "This is Democracy in Action."

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

DIVORCE ACT (BILL TO AMEND) DIVORCE BILL, 1985 FAMILY ORDERS AND AGREEMENTS ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

SECOND READING

On the Orders:

[Senator Turner.]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-46, intituled: "An Act to amend the Divorce Act".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-47, intituled: "An Act respecting divorce and corollary relief".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada".—(Honourable Senator Stanbury).

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, I need not take very long. The other day you all heard Senator Nurgitz explain these bills and his review of their pre-study by the committee. He did an excellent job and, I think, a very fair one. I believe members of the committee are delighted with the exposition he gave of these bills which we all regard as very important and to which we gave a pretty exhaustive study.

I would be inclined to suggest that we proceed without the bills themselves being referred to committee, but I have had representations from several members of the committee indicating that there are some aspects of the bills that they would like to review briefly. Therefore, if I may, I propose that the bills be referred to committee for study and report.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I have to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of bills C-46, C-47 and C-48.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have no objection to the suggestion made by my colleague, Senator Stanbury. The subject matter of these bills has been exhaustively studied, but I appreciate the tradition of this chamber that, upon second reading, bills are referred to committee.

Having regard to the point of order raised earlier by the Leader of the Opposition, I would point out that more than a month ago the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in this regard was printed in both official languages, distributed and is now available. I am looking at issue No. 29, which was the conclusion of our hearings on that matter.

• (1600)

In any event, there is sufficient time and I would concur in the referral of these bills to committee.

Motion agreed to and bills read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these bills be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bills referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, intituled: "An Act respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I said that I would make an intervention on this bill today, but the material that I wanted to use for that purpose has not yet arrived. I regret to say that I will not be able to speak to this matter—I know how disappointed honourable senators must be—until I get that material.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I express my disappointment and that of all of my fellow Newfoundlanders at the delay, but I certainly accept the reason for it.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 6, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE SENATE

MINUTES OF THE PROCEEDINGS—RECORDING OF CHOOSING OF ACTING SPEAKER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on what I suppose is a minor or routine point of order. In looking at yesterday's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, I noticed that the usual procedure to install a senator chosen by the senators to preside in the absence of the Speaker and the Speaker pro tempore did not appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. Frankly, I cannot remember whether or not the procedure, in fact, took place at that time, but it ought to have. Therefore, if we did follow the usual procedure at the beginning of the proceedings for yesterday, then the following motion and procedure ought to appear. I am reading from the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of November 7, 1985, at page 800 when exactly the same thing took place:

The Clerk at the Table informed the Senate that the Honourable the Speaker and the Honourable the Speaker pro tempore were unavoidably absent.

That is pursuant to rule 10. It then goes on:

The Honourable Senator Roblin, P.C., moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That during the absence of the Honourable the Speaker and the Honourable the Speaker pro tempore, the Honourable Senator Bélisle do preside as Speaker.

Whereupon the Honourable Senator Bélisle took the Chair.

I think that is the procedure that we should follow. I just do not remember whether, in fact, we followed it yesterday, but, in any event, it ought to have been followed and I suggest that the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate should reflect it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, in answer to Senator Frith's point of order, I would like to inform him that when the motion was made by Senator Roblin, which was seconded by Senator Frith, it was intended that that circumstance would prevail for the duration of the session. I could ask the Clerk to confirm whether I am right or wrong on that.

Senator Frith: I certainly did not understand that that motion was for the duration of the session. All that it says, for example, on the occasion to which I have referred, is:

Whereupon the Honourable Senator Bélisle took the Chair.

I hope it is clear that I had no objection to Senator Bélisle presiding at that time. It is true that we have normally adopted the procedure of asking Senator Bélisle to preside in the absence of the Speaker or the Speaker pro tempore, but according to the rules, of course, it can be any senator who can play that role, and that is what I understood our procedure to be. I do not think any order was made for a permanent replacement.

If I am wrong on that point, perhaps we should have a ruling on it. I did not wish, really, to make a very large issue out of it, but, as I understand it, according to our rules, it is either the Speaker, the Speaker pro tempore or a senator chosen by the Senate who presides, and that that is the procedure that should be followed. Therefore I think the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate should reflect that. However, if there is some question about it, then perhaps we should have a ruling on my point of order.

Hon. Charles McElman: On the point of order, honourable senators, I would just remind honourable senators that the practice over the years in this chamber has been very clear: When the Speaker and the Speaker pro tempore are both absent, then on each such occasion the Clerk informs the honourable senators and the honourable senators, at that point, choose a senator to take the Chair. That procedure is followed on each such occasion, and that is the practice that has been followed for many years in this chamber.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, like Senator Frith, do not want to make a major issue out of this. I think that the simplest way of doing this now would be to accept the motion of Senator Frith to correct the record, and then have the Table research the documents to see if, indeed, such a permanent motion had been put and concurred in by this house. My memory does not tell me that that is the case, but I could be in error.

Like Senator Frith, I do not want in any way to intimate that we do not appreciate the job Senator Bélisle has done for us; he has been outstanding in the job when he has taken the Chair in the absence of our Speaker and the Speaker pro tempore, and I want to thank Senator Bélisle on behalf of all senators for the tremendous job that he has done.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Doody: I also hope that he will continue to fulfill that function from time to time.

But, as honourable senators have suggested, the rules of the chamber are clear, and perhaps the simplest way out of the impasse is, as Senator Frith has said, to simply change the record for now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

MINUTES OF PROCEEDINGS—RECORDING OF POINTS OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I now wish to raise another matter quite unrelated, but still dealing with procedure. I suppose I will be asking someone to look into this also, because I had never noticed the point before.

Yesterday the Leader of the Opposition raised a significant and substantial point of order. I have looked at the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for yesterday and that point of order, as such, does not appear in that publication.

I believe in the other place points of order appear in the Votes and Proceedings as well as in the House of Commons Debates. I am not championing anything, but I suggest we might be told whether that is true or not—that is, whether points of order do or do not appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Once again, honourable senators, I think it is a matter of custom here more than anything else. It is rare, indeed, that what is described as a point of order really becomes a point of order, as is the case in the other place and in the legislature of which I was a member prior to being appointed to the Senate. Points of order in this place usually provide opportunities for honourable senators to make statements on particular issues. But if it is the wish of honourable senators to record the points of order in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, certainly that will give a livelier tone to that publication.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, for the moment I should like to have an opinion on the subject. Perhaps the Speaker can give us his opinion, or the Table can give us an opinion, then we can take it from there. I am not insisting that the practice be changed; I simply want to be sure what the practice is.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I understand that points of order are printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings when the Speaker is asked to make a ruling, otherwise they are not, but appear simply in the Debates of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Let us leave it at that for now; I can always raise this before the Rules Committee of the Senate.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Paul David, for Hon. Dalia Wood, Joint Chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 6, 1986

The Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

In relation to its Order of Reference from the Senate dated Wednesday, March 27, 1985 and its Order of Reference from the House of Commons dated Tuesday, March 26, 1985 both relating to the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages of 1984, your Committee recommends that five members of the Committee be empowered to travel to Vancouver from May 20, 1986 to May 27, 1986, and that the necessary staff do accompany the Committee.

Respectfully submitted,

PAUL P. DAVID for DALIA WOOD
Joint Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator David, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FAMILY ORDERS AND AGREEMENTS
ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 6, 1985

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-48, intituled: "An Act to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 5, 1986, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Deputy Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 11, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

THE ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—MARKET INTERVENTION—
ROLE OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate. In connection with the activity in currency markets yesterday, as honourable senators are aware, there was unprecedented action taken on two fronts: first of all, massive borrowings and draw-downs were made by the government in order to increase foreign reserves; and, secondly, there was massive intervention on the exchange market in order to stop the fall of the Canadian dollar and then to increase its value.

My question to the Acting Leader of the Government is this: Was the action taken with respect to the intervention on the currency market the responsibility of the Governor of the Bank of Canada in his capacity as the authority in place to protect the Canadian currency? Was it the governor who was responsible for this particular action?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have received no information to lead me to believe that it was other than the governor of the bank who was involved or whose directions were followed in this case. If the honourable senator wants me to check that so as to be certain, I will surely do so and confirm it at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I thank the acting leader for his undertaking to confirm what he has said; namely, that it was the governor of the bank who took the responsibility for entering the exchange market in such a massive manner. So that there will be no mistake about the intent of my question, what I really wanted to ascertain is whether the governor acted in the normal course or whether he was instructed by the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister to enter the exchange market. I want to ascertain whether he concurred with the advice or the instruction received either from the Minister of Finance or the Prime Minister.

Senator Doody: I really cannot say what the procedure was. The honourable gentleman is more familiar than I am with the esoteric workings of the Department of Finance in its relationship with the Bank of Canada. My experience was in the colonial office of the Government of Newfoundland, and we were not privy to these weird and wonderful machinations.

Senator Frith: Enough of that Uriah Heep stuff.

Senator Doody: But I have no reason to believe that the usual procedures were not followed. Once again, I will ask that that be confirmed.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I just have one other point. Until yesterday, it appeared that the authorities—the governor of the bank or the Minister of Finance—were holding back; that this massive intervention was not taking place as the dollar was declining through the 70 cent level, which led me to inquire whether there was some sudden departure from what had apparently been a relaxed attitude. I wanted to know whether the governor had changed course—perhaps that is not the correct way to describe it. Maybe he was waiting and assessing the situation before he moved, or maybe, indeed, there was a recognition on the part of the government and the minister that something had to be done, and done quickly. Was this conveyed to the governor? That is the kind of question I am asking.

● (1420)

Senator Doody: I know exactly what the honourable senator is saying. There did appear to be an opening of the floodgates, and I can only hope that certain speculators were caught in the flow.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, arising out of the questions in connection with the relationship between the Canadian and the U.S. dollar from the questions put and the answers given by the Deputy Leader of the Government it would appear that the action taken was in the foreign exchange market, first by intervention of the bank and, secondly, by increasing U.S. dollar reserves—which, of course, is a signal that further action might be contemplated.

My question goes further. While this action certainly has brought some stability—and I am informed that in terms of the U.S. dollar today the Canadian dollar is over 71 cents; and I am very happy to see that some stability has been introduced—my point is that experience has shown that that kind of action is temporary and does not touch the fundamental problem on which the instability was resting.

My question is: In view of the answers given, that it was the bank acting in the normal course of its operations, will the government take any specific action to increase stabilization and have a more realistic Canadian dollar relationship?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I tried to answer the stability question to the best of my ability when the honourable senator raised it on the last occasion. I had suspected that it was his concern for the lack of stabilization that may have prompted the action by the Bank of Canada and the federal government—but perhaps that is not so. In any event, the plan of the government is one of strengthening the economy, creating confidence, creating jobs, raising the employment rate, and so on. I went through that for the honourable gentleman a day or so ago. That is the plan that the Minister of Finance has outlined time and time again, and that is the plan that he intends keeping to. It seems to be working. I sincerely hope that it does. Much of the lack of stability, we are told, has been caused by speculation. To deal with speculators, I would suspect that one has to take action such as was taken yesterday. I sincerely hope that some of the speculators, if not all of them, got severely singed in the process. As for the permanent stability of the economy, I believe the Minister of Finance is doing an excellent job, and I am quite pleased with it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have no quarrel with the action taken. I was very happy to see it taken, and I am also happy with the result; but, as I pointed out, that is a pro tem measure, and experience has shown that it will not last too long if the fundamentals are not addressed. My point is that in view of the highly volatile situation, and in view of the fact that the dollar, at 72 cents, 73 cents or 75 cents, is still wallowing in despair, I am wondering whether the government will take at an earlier date some of the action it has promised, having to do with deficit reduction, stabilization of commodity prices, and so on.

Senator Doody: The honourable gentleman has raised a number of interesting points. One is that of the 75-cent dollar “wallowing”. Those of us who come from resource-dependent provinces are not at all unhappy about a 75-cent dollar. I believe that the fish producers, the newsprint producers and the mining companies in Newfoundland get quite a break when they have to export against a 75-cent dollar. So it depends on whose bull has been gored. I am sure there are people in other parts of the country who feel quite differently. I see no “wallowing” in that particular case.

I cannot elaborate any further at this point on the long-term plans of the government. Its program has been laid out and I have been told, as we all have, that a further statement will be made shortly when the budget comes down. When that will be, I do not know at this point. I am sure that when the minister is ready he will tell us, and we will then look with interest to see what the new plans are.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, if we have to wait until the budget before the government discloses how it intends to attack the fundamental problems that are destabilizing our currency, I wonder, if the dollar heads down again after this injection of reserves, whether it will cause the government to bring forth these actions a little more quickly.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the honourable gentleman has a happy facility of answering his own questions. He told us earlier that the government had built up the reserves to signal to the marketplace that they would intervene again if it were necessary. I guess that answers that question. We are talking now about the short-term proposition about which the honourable gentleman has asked. The long-term answer is the financial plan of the government which has already been presented and which will be updated when the budget comes down. These points represent different sides of the same question, and I do not know how long we can bounce it around.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I thought that I had made it apparent in the way I phrased the question that intervention in foreign exchange by the Bank of Canada will have a short-term effect, that the fundamentals to which the honourable senator referred would be addressed in the budget, and I was wondering, if there were a heavy run on these reserves and the dollar started to slide again, whether the government would bring forth these changes which will come in the budget, and to which the honourable senator referred, at an earlier date than is now contemplated.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I really cannot add anything further. I have delivered all the information I have at this point. If the honourable senator would like me to search out something else, I would be happy to try to do so, though I do not think at this point it is possible.

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—REQUEST FOR STATEMENTS OF CHAIRMAN OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA AND MICHAEL McCRACKEN OF INFOMETRICA LTD.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Would the Acting Leader of the Government obtain for interested senators the transcript of a presentation by Ms. Judith Maxwell, Chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, to the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs in which she is reported to have said that, given the economic conditions of the country, the Canadian dollar is substantially undervalued? Would he also obtain, perhaps from the Parliamentary Library or some other source, a copy of the transcript of remarks of Mr. Michael McCracken, head of the economic forecasting and consulting firm, Infometrica Ltd., who has also said within the last day or so that, given the underlying economic conditions of the country, the Canadian dollar should be appreciating, not depreciating, at the present time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, in the interests of the dissemination of unbiased and unprejudiced information, I would be only too happy to do anything I can in that regard.

Senator Sinclair: I wonder if the deputy leader would also search out documents giving contrary views.

Senator Murray: You can do that.

Senator Doody: Give me the sources.

Senator MacEachen: I hope all of that can be done despite the heavy burden on the printing establishment!

Senator Doody: And on me.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, and on the deputy leader.

[Senator Doody.]

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I would like to pursue a different line on this subject. I am not clear on what borrowings were undertaken by the government yesterday. At least, the newspaper reports are quite confusing on the point. There is a reference that there was a fresh borrowing of $2 billion. The Globe and Mail says:

The federal Government also said it had concluded an unprecedented borrowing of $2-billion (U.S.) to bolster its international monetary reserves.

We have $2 billion there, and later in the same article, it states:

Near the end of trading, Mr. Wilson announced a further $1-billion borrowing on the Government's $7.5-billion line of credit with Canadian and foreign banks—

Then there is a further statement that the government issued a $1 billion U.S. Eurobond and it is described as the largest bond issue ever floated by the government.

What I really want to know is whether this is a cumulative total borrowing of $4 billion, or whether there is some mixing up of the same activity which is improperly described. Perhaps the Acting Leader of the Government cannot tell me precisely today. If he can, I would be pleased; if not, I will wait until next week.

● (1430)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): No, I cannot. I had the same problem as did the honourable gentleman. I read the reports and saw the item on television and they are somewhat confusing. There is also a $400,000 amount that managed to get in there somewhere and there is also a Euro-yen offering which I had never heard of before which is also kind of interesting. I have made an inquiry of the department, but up to this point I have not received an answer. I would, therefore, rather wait until the next sitting to give you an answer to that question.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps the acting leader would also make an inquiry as to whether there has been an increase in the bank rate today, and what the result of that is.

Senator Doody: There has been an increase in the bank rate and I am not exactly certain what it is. I have been told that the rate now is 11.47 per cent.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: What do the people in Newfoundland think about that?

Senator Doody: The people in Newfoundland have had very little access to the Bank of Canada for quite a number of years now, and I am perfectly certain they will not start doing so tomorrow.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION OR DIVERSION PROGRAM

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. I would like to know from the honourable gentleman if it is the government's intention to lift the prohibition on camping on the green or in the snow on Parliament Hill.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I, personally, have not prohibited anyone. As far as I recall, the Department of Public Works placed a prohibition last year on that activity, and I will make an inquiry as to what their plans are for the coming year. I was not aware that there was anyone anxious to do that at this point.

Senator Corbin: I know of someone who is, and I will advise you of who it is in a moment.

While the Honourable the Acting Leader of the Government is making that inquiry, and on the assumption that the answer is that we must live with the status quo, would the government consider making an exception for provincial premiers, for example, who might want to camp on Parliament Hill?

Senator Doody: I am not in a position to make exceptions for anyone, but certainly, if my premier wanted to spend some time here, I would offer him the facilities of my home. I would not expect him to camp out here on Parliament Hill.

However, I know that several months ago there was a rather unsightly campsite out in front of the building and at that time I made inquiries as to whether that same privilege could be extended to tourists from my home province since they were objecting to having to pay rent in the outlying areas and then driving into the city. I asked if it would be convenient for those people to pitch tents out in front here, and I was told that it would not be allowed. Therefore I do not know if they would make an exception for premiers in that event.

Senator Corbin: I have some advice for the Honourable Acting Leader of the Government: Perhaps he had better get ready for such an event. I will quote from a story published in the New Brunswick Telegraph Journal of Monday, February 3, 1986, where an honourable gentleman is quoted as having said:

Pressure will continue to be exerted by ourselves, even if we have to camp in Ottawa.

The honourable gentleman who was quoted as having said those words is Premier James Lee of Prince Edward Island. If he is taking that drastic step, I gather that he may not have too many friends in Ottawa.

What Premier Lee is basically concerned about is the fact that Prince Edward Island still has not received any answer as to whether or not the federal government will contribute or, in fact, finance either a stabilization program or a diversion program for the potato growers of that island—and I presume that such a program would apply as well to other potato growers in eastern Canada. I wonder if the Acting Leader of the Government would inquire into that matter.

Senator Doody: I certainly will make an inquiry. I have to commend Premier Lee on his dedication. It sounds as though Prince Edward Island has a very dedicated and conscientious premier.

As for the other part of the honourable senator's question, I will certainly look into the matter.

Senator Corbin: I thank the acting leader for that.

POTATO INDUSTRY—RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION OF INQUIRY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: In view of the fact that the cost of a commission of inquiry into the potato industry would be perhaps but an infinitesimal fraction of the cost of a stabilization payment to potato growers, or the cost of a diversion program, and in view of the fact that we were told in this house last year that the present government, in order to save money, had decided to abolish the Royal Commission of Inquiry into all aspects of the potato industry and that it would take other measures to put some order into that industry, I wonder whether the acting leader would now request of his colleagues that they re-establish that commission of inquiry into all aspects of the potato industry in order to look at the basic, fundamental structural flaws as they now exist. It seems to me that such a commission would be much cheaper than having to go the route of subsidy payments to the growers every two or three years. Last year I predicted that that would happen again in the near future, and I predict that you still have not seen the end of this problem unless you do something basic with the flaws that exist within the industry today. That is my plea to the deputy leader.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly make an inquiry on the senator's behalf.

COMMUNICATIONS

MUSEUM OF MAN—CHANGE OF NAME

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, for many years now I have been wanting to get something off my manly chest and the occasion was offered to me last week due to an announcement that was made by the Minister of Communications for Canada who, incidentally, has been a good personal friend of mine since the days when he was a minister under Daniel Johnson in Quebec and also under Jean-Jacques Bertrand when he was Premier of Quebec in the late 1960s.

The Minister of Communications announced last week that he was appointing a task force to find a new name for the Museum of Man because the word "man" is, apparently, too sexist for a certain category of women who belong to the feminist movement. The feminist movement is a very effective and worthy movement in the world and I am not saying anything against it, but within any such movement we find that there are the extremists: Those who go too far. We find that too in the union movement. The union movement in itself is an extremely good one, but there are union leaders who go too far.

In my opinion, those who wish to change the name of the Museum of Man because the word "man" is too sexist are going too far. They would like it to become a museum of man and woman, perhaps or the museum of persons. I am sorry if my preamble to the question is getting to be somewhat elaborate, but there is a very pertinent question at the end of it.

As I said, this is something that I have wanted to get off my chest for many years. For example, the same group wanted to change the word "chairman". We find in the dictionary that the definition of "man" is a generic term and includes mankind. Perhaps we should not say "mankind"; perhaps it should be "personkind" or something like that. In any event, the species is included in the definition of the word "man", and therefore "chairman" can apply to anyone who is the "président" of a committee of the Senate or of any committee in the world. The phrase is "the Chairman of the Board," not the "Chairperson of the Board," nor is it the "Chairlady of the Board."

● (1440)

If they want to go beyond that, there is an expression which has been used in Sweden over the past few years which can be used here, and that is the term "Ombudsman". That expression has been adopted by the English and the French, although the French might say "Ombudshomme." Perhaps they might say in English "Ombudswoman" or "Ombudsperson," if one extends the logic of this group of people, with whom I cannot possibly agree because I think they are going much too far.

I agree with the feminist movement; I agree with the conference that they held last year in Nairobi; I agree with the speech recently made by our Ambassador to the United Nations regarding a group of feminists who want to promote the cause of women, but I think some of them are going too far.

The word "manager" to these people is not acceptable. If they extended their logic they would say that the word "manager" is too sexist, that we should use the word "personager." There are many other words they would like to change, but I am not going to quote all of them.

If you extended their logic further, they would change the term "horsepower" to "animalpower" because "horsepower" is too sexist. We talk about dog food; well, a "dog" is a male. What are we to then call it, animal food? Are we to do that just to satisfy the appetite of these people?

Honourable senators, I have a great number of friends in the feminist movement—

Senator Nurgitz: Not any more!

Senator Doody: That was yesterday!

Senator Robichaud: I have many friends of the feminine gender, but none in this group is my friend. I would not want one of them to be my friend, nor would I want to be their friend, because I am afraid someone would call me a "homosexual." I would be afraid of that.

An Hon. Senator: That's going too far!

Senator Robichaud: Did I go too far? Well, I can go further. There are many things that I would like to say about this.

I am in favour of the feminist movement, but I am deadly opposed to these exaggerations because they are so flagrant and unacceptable.

[Senator Robichaud.]

I ask the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate to approach the Minister of Communications to tell him to stop wasting Canadian taxpayers' moneys in establishing a committee, a commission or a task force to consider a new name for the National Museum of Man. I hope that that museum remains the "National Museum of Man," and that women will be included because women are included in the expression "man." One definition I received after asking for research was that the word "man" meant a member of the human species, and that a "woman" was a "man" with a womb.

I will not go any further. I simply ask the acting leader to approach the Minister of Communications to tell him to put a stop to this waste of taxpayers' money.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I was going to ask the honourable senator to repeat the question, then I thought that it would be better if I just offered to send the question to the minister and ask him to answer it.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SASKATCHEWAN—PASSAGE OF BILL 144 IMPOSING SETTLEMENT ON GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate and arises from the passage by the Saskatchewan legislature—

Senator Doody: Is it supplementary to that asked by Senator Robichaud?

Senator Argue: No, although it refers to both men and women, without any further elaboration on the point.

The question refers to the passage by the Saskatchewan legislature last Friday of Bill 144, imposing a settlement on the Saskatchewan Government Employees' Union. This bill relates to the imposed settlement of a strike. Its legality, ostensibly, was strengthened—for fear of being otherwise illegal—by invoking the "notwithstanding" provision of section 33 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The passage of this legislation has resulted in a very pertinent article in the Regina Leader-Post by Dale Eisler, in which he states:

Anticipating a constitutional challenge to the legislation based on the right to freedom of association, the government has invoked section 33 of the Charter of Rights to override that right. It marks the first time a province—other than Quebec—has taken the extraordinary step of using the section of the charter that allows provinces to pass laws they concede could interfere with rights enshrined in the constitution.

He goes on to state:

So in essence, the Devine government has come to the conclusion that it is willing to run the risk of possibly denying a constitutional right in order to end rotating strikes by the SGEU.

He concludes by stating:

The question is whether rotating strikes of government employees warrant the deployment of a section in the Charter that was intended for rare and urgent circumstances.

There is also an editorial in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix which reads as follows:

But there is an overriding consideration in the actions the government has taken in this case and one that requires some soul-searching on the part of Saskatchewan residents. It is the government's decision to invoke the "notwithstanding" clause in the charter of rights and freedoms.

Effectively, this suspends the constitution of Canada in this one narrow area. And the example the government has set here, according to some legal opinions, effectively denying one group any recourse to legal challenges in the face of a government dictum, creates a thought-provoking precedent.

Protecting the rights of any one group, be it a union, a business, a visible minority or whatever, is to protect the rights of all. That's the promise of the charter of rights, and it's one not to be taken lightly.

In today's Ottawa Citizen there is an article referring to this legislation, and I quote only one short sentence:

Justice Minister Sid Dutchak, who guided Bill 144 through a two-day emergency session... acknowledged there is great uncertainty regarding the constitutionality of any attempt to end strikes through back-to-work legislation.

My understanding is that the Supreme Court of Canada now has before it consideration of the whole question of back-to-work legislation, this overriding provision, and so forth.

My question to the acting leader is this—and I apologize for such a long preamble: Would the acting leader discuss with the Minister of Justice a suggestion I wish to make, namely, that the Government of Canada, through the Department of Justice, take the initiative and refer this matter to the Supreme Court for judgment as to its constitutionality, particularly because, as I understand it, the way the law is constructed in the country, it is impossible for an individual citizen or group of citizens in Saskatchewan to initiate this appeal directly. I feel that this kind of legislation is definitely a threat to basic rights and freedoms guaranteed by the Charter, and it warrants the most sympathetic consideration by the government and a reference to the Supreme Court of Canada as to its constitutionality.

● (1450)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): From what I can gather from the honourable senator's comments, this sounds to me to be well within the jurisdiction of the Province of Saskatchewan. However, I will make certain that the honourable senator's comments are brought to the attention of the minister, and if he wishes to comment on it, he certainly can.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I am certainly not a constitutional lawyer or any other kind of lawyer, but my understanding is that it is within the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice to refer such legislation to the Supreme Court since its constitutionality is based on the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Therefore, in my judgment the reference question is very much within the federal ambit.

TRANSPORT

RAILWAYS—SHORTFALL IN CN AND CP EXPENDITURES ON EXPANSION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, if I may at this time, I should like to ask another question on another subject. I refer to the very serious shortfall in the expenditures of both the CNR and the CPR on railway expansion in the last number of years and, particularly, at the present time.

It is well known to all parliamentarians that when the Crow legislation was changed the railways gave a solemn undertaking to expend large and well-defined sums of money on railway expansion. A report from The Manitoba Co-operator indicates that for 1986, CNR projected capital expenditures fall short of the $675 million that they had indicated they would expend.

I ask the deputy leader to refer this matter to the Minister of Transport for comment.

I would ask the government to take into account very seriously, when considering possible savings of money—a saving in the amount of the Crow benefit currently being paid to the railways—the situation if the railways fail to live up to the level of capital expansion that they agreed to when they were given these important and costly benefits.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice.

COMMUNICATIONS

MUSEUM OF MAN—CHANGE OF NAME

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Acting Leader of the Government in the Senate supplementary to that put by Senator Robichaud.

I should like to ask the deputy leader if he would indicate in addressing his inquiry to the Minister of Communications that the views expressed by Senator Robichaud are that senator's own views and not necessarily those of other senators, and that I, myself, feel that women, like minorities, have to struggle and have been struggling since 1921 for some sort of equality in order to get their franchise. Now they are struggling to get equal pay for work of equal value. If we can find some terms that accommodate both genders, I think we should not obstruct such a movement.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I can understand Senator Bosa's willingness and even desire to backpedal away from that particular question, but he places me in a rather awkward position, because, if I were to exempt Senator Bosa, in particular, from the question, it would, by implication, seem that the rest of us endorsed it. I think I will just send the question on as it was put unless I receive further instructions.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, I assumed that most honourable senators understood my message. However, if there is any doubt, I would ask the Deputy Leader of the Government to add that I am completely in favour of equality for women in the work force and that I am in favour of women in every respect except when it means changing French and English grammar and vocabulary. Perhaps Senator Bosa has not understood the message, but I am sure that if he reads my remarks he will understand it.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION ASSISTANCE

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I have a question for the deputy leader and I apologize for the brevity of my preamble.

Senator Corbin was kind enough to express solicitude for the Premier of Prince Edward Island coming to Ottawa tomorrow. I would like to say to the minister that the premier has actually been in this city twice in recent times and that we are not at all worried about his suffering from frozen fingers.

But I would like the deputy leader to convey to my old colleague and friend, the Minister of Agriculture, that we are a bit tired of his going back empty-handed in the matter of potato stabilization assistance.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will certainly be pleased to do that. What about accommodations for the premier when he is here?

Senator Macquarrie: He can share my pagoda.

Senator Doody: Thank you.

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I would like to get back on to good, solid, neutral ground and draw to the attention of senators that there are still at least 18,000 southern Albertans anxiously awaiting the word from the federal cabinet as to whether they will have a national sugar-beet policy and whether they will receive their 1983 stabilization payments, the absence of which, in their own words, is being felt by growers who are already reeling under the pressure of their uncertain future.

Honourable senators, I just want to try to show you what 18,000 signatures on a petition look like. I know I cannot present these two volumes in this chamber. The signatures cover both sides of each page.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps you should read the names.

Senator Fairbairn: With leave, I would be prepared to read those names, but it would be much simpler if the Deputy Leader of the Government could put the petitioners out of their uncertainty and anxiety by telling us whether cabinet, this week, has made a decision on these questions of a national sugar-beet policy and stabilization payments.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I regret to inform the honourable senator that I have no further information for her, although I have inquired once again.

Mostly due to the honourable senator's persistence, she can add to that list of 18,000 southern Albertans one Newfoundlander who would love to see this matter concluded.

Senator Argue: We depend on you.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a list of questions which I asked and which remain unanswered. I think Senator Doody and Senator Roblin will be happy to know that they are practically all, through effective sandbagging on their parts, obsolete.

However, I would like to refer to them. The most recent was asked in September of last year and the first one was asked on April 30, 1985, when I asked:

Has the government asked for the resignation of all or some of the members of that board?

I was referring to the board of directors of Canadian National Railways. My question goes on:

If so, can he tell us why such resignations have been asked for, in view of the fact that those appointments are term appointments? Have the resignations been forthcoming, or are negotiations proceeding with reference to those resignations? Also, have any Canadian persons who are eligible been advised that they will be appointed to replace that board if the resignations are forthcoming?

We may be able to find out, just for the interest of historians, whether, in fact, the government did request resignations of the board. That is the only life which seems to be left in that question.

The next question was asked on June 19, 1985, and appears at page 1065 of the Debates of the Senate. I asked if the Leader of the Government would ask the Solicitor General whether or not Corporal Wood, who was appointed to the Canadian Pension Commission, used to be an informer for Mr. MacKay. I suppose there is a little bit of life left in that question, so perhaps the deputy leader could try to breathe some more life into it and into the people who provide the information.

I also asked a question on September 17, 1985, which appears at page 1223 of the Debates of the Senate. At that time I asked if the Acting Leader of the Government would undertake to try to ascertain for us what relationship there was, if any, between the so-called truthful, honourable statement made by the minister and the notice of motion put on the Order Paper in the other place by the President of the Privy Council referring the same questions to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Honourable senators, that CCB bill has been passed, and I believe that question has been sandbagged to death, so we may as well strike it.

The last question I should like to refer to was asked on September 25, 1985, and appears at page 1276 of the Debates of the Senate. It dealt with fisheries. I asked if the Leader of the Government could tell us whether Mr. McCain raised the issue of the million cans of tainted tuna with any members of the government at any time before the program was aired and, if so, with whom.

Although I think there is still a little bit of odour left in that one, I do not think there is much life. I am trying to be helpful so as to allow the Acting Leader of the Government to provide some answers, if he could, at least to those questions. Although I am trying to be helpful, I do not mean to imply that I am happy.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Third reading of the Bill C-84, intituled: "An Act to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act".—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first Order of the Day has to do with Bill C-84. This order was stood yesterday—

Senator Phillips: It was sandbagged.

Senator Doody: —in anticipation of some information on the printing of the proceedings of committee meetings. I can report on the progress of the proceedings respecting Bill C-84 at this time.

I have been told by our ever-helpful and efficient staff that they will distribute to honourable senators on Monday the printed copies of the proceedings of the committees in both official languages. It is my hope that we will be able to proceed with that bill fairly quickly thereafter.

As to the general situation, our people are meeting tomorrow afternoon with representatives of the Translation Bureau and the Printing Bureau to see what can be done about making appropriate changes to the priority list. I have been told that the printing needs of the House of Commons take first priority. Where we stand in the pecking order I have not yet been able to ascertain, but after tomorrow's meeting we will have more information on that. Obviously, we have to impress upon them the importance of the Senate's receiving satisfactory treatment in terms of the printing of these minutes. That is the situation at this moment. I repeat that we will be meeting tomorrow with the appropriate people from the other sectors and that information regarding the committee proceedings on Bill C-84 will be available on Monday.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I thank Senator Doody for his information and for the efforts he has made to meet my concerns. I appreciate them very much, indeed.

In light of the information that he has given—namely, that the printed proceedings will be available on Monday—there will be no difficulty, certainly from my point of view, in giving third reading to this bill on Tuesday.

Senator Frith: Third reading debate, at any rate.

Senator MacEachen: Yes. Third reading debate can start.

Senator Doody: Boy, that was close!

Senator MacEachen: In fact, I have no difficulty with commencing the debate today. I am somewhat penitent in that I have delayed for 24 hours the hearing by honourable senators of the eloquence of the mover of the motion for third reading.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: In summary, I thank the deputy leader for his information and for the receipt of the proceedings on Monday. That will make it possible, at least from my point of view, to give the bill third reading as early as is practicable. I do not think that that will cause anybody any difficulty because, even if it were to receive third reading today, it would not receive Royal Assent in any event.

With respect to the other bills I mentioned, I can only, with the greatest possible gentility, remind the deputy leader that I am quite serious. I am glad that he is taking steps to ensure that we do get the priority which the Senate deserves.

Senator Doody: I thank the honourable senator.
Order stands.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, my colleagues on the government side will no doubt have recognized by now that there is great unhappiness on our side over Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973. The timing, the de-indexing provisions and the broader implications of this bill have received serious attention from several colleagues on this side of the chamber and there is widespread agreement among us that this change of course is not appropriate.

I cannot possibly reach the depths of historical analysis or the heights of expression displayed by my colleagues, and I will not even join in the competition. But I would like to congratulate them and to say what an education, as well as a pleasure, it has been to listen to and read their speeches in this chamber.

My major purpose in speaking on second reading is to take up the kind invitation, offered in Senator Tremblay's speech introducing second reading of this bill, to comment upon the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was entitled "Analysis of Child and Family Benefits in Canada: A Working Document" and, in the course of doing so, to offer some supplementary ideas about what is going on through the changes proposed by Bill C-70, which is, as Senator Tremblay has said in his elegant dissection of the issue, only part of the government's larger scheme of changing the social welfare system as it relates to children and families in this country.

That larger scheme includes some additional legislative changes, one of which we are dealing with concurrently; that is, the Child Tax Credit provisions of Bill C-84. It also involves a revenue grab otherwise labelled deficit reduction.

As honourable colleagues have pointed out, the $49.5 million which the Conservative government will save in 1986 alone, and which is not to be matched by equivalent or greater expenditure on children and families because of the delay in implementation of the Child Tax Credit allowance, is the government's method of collecting tax from children and collecting the most from the children of the working majority, using the mothers as the instrument of tax collection. When provincial governments add on a sales tax, they are accused of taxing the children's candy. But this is a tax on the bread and milk of a great many Canadian children.

In addition to the fact of this year's grab, what is so very distasteful is the pretence with which this act is taking place. On December 27, 1985, the Minister of National Health and Welfare issued a press release with the headline "Increases in Family Allowances." I have here a copy of that press release. If I may be permitted to do so, I will include it in my remarks at this point because honourable senators will be amazed to read it. It states:

Over 3.6 million Canadian families who receive Family Allowances on behalf of 6.6 million children will receive an increase in the new year.

Health and Welfare Minister Jake Epp announced today that effective in January the federal government Family Allowances, paid monthly for children under 18, will rise to $31.58 from $31.27 in most provinces and in the territories. The increase is based on the change in the annual inflation rate in excess of three per cent.

Under a provision in the Family Allowances Act, a provincial government may ask the federal government to vary the rates payable in that province according to the age or number of children in a family, or both, providing the average monthly payment equals the federal rate.

[Senator Marsden.]

This option has been chosen by Alberta and Quebec for 1986.

In addition, the refundable Child Tax Credit for the 1985 taxation year will provide up to $384 per child based on family income. In order to receive the tax credit, parents must file an income tax return even if they had little or no taxable income in 1985.

They have heard from everyone who has spoken in this chamber, both on the government and on the opposition side, that the de-indexing of the family allowance will mean a real loss of income to many families—families which the government does not consider poor. "Twelve per cent of families will lose substantially," said Senator Tremblay in his speech, "33 per cent have losses or gains which are not significant," yet I would ask honourable senators to note that in his announcement the Minister of National Health and Welfare says not a single word about any of this, something which I would characterize as less than honest and a bizarre idea of the gullibility of journalists. Fortunately, none of them seems to have swallowed it. There is not a word in this press release about the losses even to the very rich families of Canada, which one would have thought might reasonably have been mentioned. To borrow the phrase used by the new ambassador to Ireland to describe Conservative behaviour, this is "nauseating hypocrisy."

In effect, the changes proposed by the government move moneys from the nearly poor to the really poor. They do this by lowering the point at which the benefits will be received, by partially de-indexing and by ignoring some of the indirect effects of these changes on family income. Now, I agree with the government that there are all too many children living in poverty in Canada and too many families unable to feed, clothe and educate their children. I agree with the government that it is proper and desirable to re-examine regularly the social security programs of our country to see where they are going and to legislate changes which will benefit those most in need. I believe in reform, as Liberals do. Where I differ from the government is in the government's vision of the problem. I would describe the government's approach to the problem as being technocratic rather than reforming. The government presents tables of income distribution and issues a report which says, in effect, "How dreadful—look at what is happening to Canadians." Such tables have been discussed here. They see a "poor class" of people in Canada. They tell us, as the Prime Minister does so often, that they want to help "the poor." By analyzing our country in this way, the government is creating in its own mind a class structure and a structure of class divisions; and by acting on this image of "the poor" and "the rich"—of which the Minister of Finance suggests there are not enough—they are managing to create a class-divided society.

Allen Gregg recently reported in the national poll for Maclean's magazine that he had found, for the first time in his polling—and I stress that—a feeling of class difference being expressed by Canadians. Now where did that feeling come from, and why this year? People have certainly been poorer before—which, as we have heard, is why the social security net was developed, and why we all deem it so important to maintain. People were worse off during the recent recession than they are now, and when inflation was galloping ahead of the ability of people to live on the family wage, Canadians were very badly off indeed, until the Liberal government intervened to restore some balance. So why should Allen Gregg, who is a first-rate survey analyst, find stirrings of class division in our society? I suggest it is because the Conservative government is having an effect. It is talking about “the poor” and “the rich,” imposing its mental construct, based upon a technocratic analysis, rather than listening to the representations made to it, in the debate on the blue paper and elsewhere, by reformers who understand the diversity, the complexity and the multitude of forms which a low income can take in family life in this country.

The Liberal approach is to examine the needs and problems of individuals and to ask what to do; rights and entitlements established on the basis of being a Canadian take precedence over class analysis. But the Prime Minister has been quite clear about this issue from the beginning. He is interested in class analysis, not individuals; in redistributing income, not in making the system more responsive to people's needs.

The government is getting it partly right. The Child Tax Credit increases slated for next year will be very welcome. I agree with that method of redistribution. But what reveals the essential philosophical and experiential difference between the parties, as we both look at the same commonly-shared problem, is the view that poverty is reflected in federal income tables rather than in examining the life of ordinary Canadians; the view from above, rather than the view from the side; the view of the technocratic fixer rather than the reformer. Which is why, honourable senators, when the blue paper on family and child benefits, which the government produced early in its mandate, came before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for study, we all saw a problem. Here was a government presenting a paper as if it were the only government in the country. The tables deal with federal programs only. When pressed, we discovered from the officials that the provincial governments would gain some real windfalls from some of the proposed changes to family benefits, with absolutely no guarantee, and no attempt at a guarantee—no willingness, even, it appeared from the minister—to ensure that the provinces would pass on those benefits to this “class” of people—to take the Conservative perspective—or the individual Canadian children, women and men in need.

Therefore our committee discussed it, and we looked at this question. The question was: What would be the impact of proposed federal changes on real families in each of the Canadian provinces? Would it make any difference, we wanted to know, if the fact that Newfoundland has the largest average family size in Canada, and Ontario has the largest proportion of childless families, were introduced into the discussion? We had witnesses from Health and Welfare who came to the committee and who were most willing to answer the most complex questions and to produce detailed tables of all degrees of sophistication and analysis—except that they could not tell us what the effect of the government's proposals would be on real families in each of the provinces we represent. To quote that great Harvard philosopher, Tom Lehrer, “‘When the rockets go up’, who cares where they come down? ‘That’s not my department’, said Wernher von Braun.”

But our committee was incredulous. After all, we have had federal-provincial governments working together on social security as long as we have had Confederation. According to Campbell and Szablowski, in their study of the 91 senior bureaucrats in Ottawa, federal bureaucrats consult provincial bureaucrats before they consult anyone at all, including cabinet ministers, the Prime Minister's office, or anyone else. The business community and provincial bureaucrats are their main sources. So we were very curious.

In the end we had to establish our own subcommittee to look at this question of the interaction between federal and provincial benefits and their collective impact on the variety of types of families in each of the provinces of Canada to try to establish how, indeed, changes in federal benefits would have an impact on families with children. That is what this report—which I hope all honourable senators have—does; and that is all it does.

I believe that honourable senators will find the first ten pages of the report to be most useful. They describe a method developed for our committee by the researchers in the Library of Parliament, who worked over the summer and who dug up the most interesting data and devised the most helpful analyses, and to whom I would like to express thanks and pay tribute. Our researchers devised a method to look at the impact of the proposed changes. Honourable senators will recall that we did not have Bill C-70 before us at the time, but only the amounts need to be changed.

Honourable senators will see in the report that we begin by describing a variety of income concepts—because, of course, the tax system is involved. Some child benefits, such as family allowance, are taxable, and so one's income bracket becomes crucial. Various deductions can be made and there are various provincial taxes and benefits in different categories of income. We have invented here a new income concept called “Total Financial Resources” which measures the after-tax and after-benefit purchasing power of families, to see, for example, if the family with six children in Corner Brook would be able to live and be relatively as well off as a family with six children in Montreal, Winnipeg or Edmonton.

We also included in our concept of family and child benefits some federal benefits which the federal government excluded from its blue paper. The deduction for child care expenses and the equivalent to married exemption, which is particularly important in single-parent families, were captured by our analysis. We looked at the after-tax value of each of those benefits.

We then went on to look at the complex and interesting methods by which provinces deal with the family allowance and also with the variety of provincial benefits. Such benefits include health insurance premium assistance—which occurs in three provinces—or shelter and tax assistance plans in three provinces; and we were able to show that since they are directly increased as taxable income decreases, those benefits are adversely affected by either an increase in family allowance payments or a decrease in the child tax exemption. In short, honourable senators, all is not as it looks from Parliament Hill.

The method found on the first ten pages of our report is meant to be available to be used at any point at which a federal benefit is changed. Already we have produced a paper on family allowances, which no doubt will be considered in detail by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology when Bill C-70 is referred to that committee.

The bulk of the report describes how, when that method is applied, families of various types are affected: Single-parent and two-parent families, one-earner and two-earner families, with young children or older children, in each of the provinces of Canada. All types of families are affected, as nearly as we could calculate, based on the information available. The tables in this report reveal in considerable detail what those effects may be. We sincerely hope that each senator will find the report useful in examining the situation in her or in his province, and will alert us to any errors or anomalies. It is meant to be a tool or, as we described it, a working document.

Behind this paper is the reality that our colleague, Senator Turner, described yesterday: The real children and mothers and fathers behind the doors on which he has knocked, and on which so many here have knocked, for so many years—the children and mothers and fathers which honourable senators will also see described in the forthcoming report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth issues—a most complex array of people, who are struggling in a variety of ways to overcome the constraints laid upon them by an unsteady economy, regionalized inequality and a changing labour force. This year, and in the future, the government plans to reduce the benefits to all but a certain category of families, which are described as the poorest families, which increases the burden on the working poor and especially on low middle-income families—who are the majority of families and who, if they are in that income category, are likely also to be in their child-rearing years.

● (1520)

It is the provinces who will have to pick up the slack because, as the economy changes—and we hope it will improve—families go in and out of need for basics in housing, help for their children, help in income and so on. The provinces have been asked already to pick up the bulk of these costs and, yet, federal transfers to the provinces are being reduced, first in the EPF for health and education and in the Canada Assistance Plan. At the same time, since information services are being cut or user fees imposed—very dramatically as in the case of Statistics Canada—we will learn less and less about what is actually happening to families, especially those in need. The provinces are attempting to fill the gap. Premier Peterson of Ontario, for example, has announced recently a $71 million program directed to care for elderly people—another competing priority in our society. We hope that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology will be helped to analyze quickly the impact of federal and provincial changes, to be able to provide a better analysis of their impact on the families of this country. The method here, of course, is impartial and does not deal at all with the basic difference in philosophy of a government of the Conservative stripe or a government of Liberalism. The people choose between those differences.

On our side, we protest against Bill C-70 most strongly. We find it is unfair this year and it will continue to be unjust in the long term. We believe it destroys the confidence of the people of our country much faster than the plight of the dollar will do. This year it takes money out of the mouths of children, and we believe that it will lead to a loss of confidence on the part of Canadians concerned about families, as the move against the old age pensioners reduced confidence in the government. No matter how honourable the intentions of the government may have been in either case, losing the confidence of the people is a calculated risk the government has taken as it has built up its legislative record. We believe that the amendment to the Family Allowances Act, the partial de-indexing, and the relationship of timing between this and the Child Tax Credit increases are not in the best interests of anyone, and we hope that the government will re-consider, at the very least, the timing of this measure.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, intituled: "An Act respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners"—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, following the comments I made yesterday, I regret to advise you that the papers to which I referred have not yet reached me. I will try to deal with this matter next week.

If those papers reach me in the meantime, I promise I will make a statement next week.

Order stands.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—
ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had intended to proceed today. I am not going to do so because Senator Kelly told me that he would be unable to be here this afternoon, and both he and I think it appropriate that he be here.

Senator Doody: He is trying to get a plane out of Toronto Island.

Senator Frith: Perhaps, or to Toronto Island.
Order stands.

HEALTH

ILL EFFECTS OF SMOKING—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Bosa calling the attention of the Senate to the ill effects of smoking to smokers and non-smokers alike.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Haidasz.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I rise this afternoon to speak on a topic which I believe is a national tragedy and, indeed, a national scandal when we take into consideration the extent to which the effects of tobacco smoking, entirely preventable, are doing tremendous harm, both to tobacco smokers and non-smokers. Before I develop the few points that I have in mind, I would like to take this opportunity to thank the Honourable Senator Bosa who, in his speech on January 24, 1985, called our attention to the ill effects of tobacco smoking to smokers and non-smokers alike. He is to be commended for his initiative and for suggesting in his excellent speech many things which, I believe, constitute practical steps that could be taken by us in the Senate, by the federal, provincial and municipal governments and by the rest of the Canadian public. His example was followed in the past few weeks by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, Senator Royce Frith, who moved a motion on January 29 that our rules be amended to prohibit the smoking of tobacco at all meetings of Senate committees. I heartily endorse this motion and hope that we will pass it as soon as possible. It will be a great example for those in the other place. As you all probably know, the Speaker of the House of Commons has already banned tobacco smoking in all elevators and buses on Parliament Hill.

I mentioned that tobacco smoking and its ill effects are both a national tragedy and a national scandal. I say that because of the mounting evidence of statistics from both Canada and the United States available to us. The recent statistics I was able to obtain from the Department of Health and Welfare in Ottawa are those for 1982. They state that in that year alone $7.1 billion was lost to the Canadian economy because of tobacco related diseases. I also learned that the largest part of that figure was due to the forgone income lost because of premature death. It amounts to $4.6 billion. The remainder of the amount consists of hospitalization costs, amounting to $1.5 billion; physician care, amounting to $30 million; disability costs, amounting to $860 million and fire loss due to smoking amounting to $120 million. This total of $7.1 billion refers only to direct costs. This figure does not include the cost of extra pharmaceuticals or costs for the maintenance of fire fighting services. These people tell us that 20 per cent of all fires are said to be due to tobacco smoking.

Also, the illnesses caused by passive smoking or second-hand smoke are costly. There are also added costs for installing proper ventilation systems, or maintaining or improving existing ventilation systems; and then there is the cost of depreciation added to the other costs caused by smoking.

Other striking statistics are that consumers spent $4.4 billion to purchase tobacco products in the year 1982 and that $3.2 billion of that amount went in the form of taxes to both the federal and provincial governments. In spite of all of these costs, the Department of National Health and Welfare has recently spent only $1.5 million annually in their educational programs to dissuade people from smoking. I should add that they have done other things, however, such as putting a warning sign on cigarette packages, but health authorities tell us that this warning is inadequate and that the four alternate warnings that appear on cigarette packages in the United States are far more adequate and, they believe, far more effective.

Meanwhile, tobacco companies are reported to have spent $100 million in 1982 to advertise their products in Canada. What is most frightening are the latest statistics for 1983. They reveal that tobacco-related diseases, which include bronchogenic carcinoma, emphysema as well as coronary heart disease, in 1983 killed 32,623 Canadians. Of those deaths, 20,200 occurred in men and 12,423 occurred in women. The majority of these deaths—25,571—occurred in people over the age of 65 and 7,052 in people under the age of 65. Furthermore, lung deaths due to tobacco smoking in females is increasing, and our epidemiologists in Canada, as well as in other countries, are predicting that lung cancer deaths in women will surpass deaths due to breast cancer—which is the number one killer of women today—before the year 1990. Other statistics available from the Department of National Health and Welfare reveal that in Canadians under the age of 55 who suffered a heart attack, a myocardial infarction or ventricular fibrillation, the cause of death was determined to be the nicotine and carbon monoxide in tobacco, after adjusting for such risk factors as high blood pressure and elevated serum cholesterol.

Honourable senators, these are frightening statistics and that is why they should be described as a national tragedy. The slowness with which governments have moved in this field since 1953, when lung cancer was definitely blamed on tobacco smoking, must be called a scandal. So much of taxpayers' money has been spent in other fields, but when it comes to the deaths of more than 32,600 Canadians due to a preventable factor, namely tobacco smoking, that calls for national concern and national action. I would urge that we proceed as quickly as possible to approve the motion of Senator Frith in order that others may follow this good example.

My second appeal to honourable senators is to become more interested in this very important topic and, by their manners and legislative action, to set a good example to other Canadians.

One of the factors that prompted me to speak today was an incident that occurred when I was flying home last Thursday afternoon on an Air Canada flight from Ottawa to Toronto. The captain of the aircraft announced that we should prepare for landing, buckle our seatbelts and extinguish all cigarettes. At that moment, an Air Canada stewardess lit a cigarette in the service area of that aircraft and kept on smoking, in spite of this warning from the captain and in spite of the lights that were put on by the captain.

Another factor that prompted me to speak on this matter today was an advertisement that appeared in the Globe and Mail this morning by Air Canada, and a special business travel section which appeared in that same edition with respect to the additional services that are being provided for the air-travelling public. Neither in the advertisement for Air

Canada nor in that several-page supplement to the Globe and Mail was there any mention of making available more seats for non-smokers, a sector who are now the majority of the Canadian population. On more than one occasion I have witnessed an altercation between a passenger and a ticket agent over the problem of the unavailability of a seat in a non-smoking area, in spite of the fact that, according to Air Canada advertisements, anyone who announces himself to an Air Canada agent at least 30 minutes prior to flight time is guaranteed a seat in a non-smoking area.

Another thing that is happening on some Air Canada flights is that they place the non-smoking section right in the middle of the aircraft, sandwiched between two smoking areas, one in the front and one in the rear. On one occasion I brought this to the attention of the captain of the aircraft and was told by him that, on this particular flight, that had to be done. I then asked him about the complaints of passengers who were sandwiched between these two smoking areas and I was told that, in spite of the fact that the ventilation system is supposed to ventilate the air every four minutes, in fact, in this particular captain's experience, only a 50 per cent clearance rate was achieved by the ventilation system installed in the passenger cabins of Air Canada planes, and he wished that smoking on aircraft were banned.

So, even on airplanes, and more so in buildings, especially air-tight buildings, this toxic air is being recirculated and recirculated. Those who live or work in high-rise, airtight buildings are complaining more and more of irritations such as headaches, sore throats and coughing. Most of those complaints can be attributed to smoke from tobacco products.

For the past 35 years I have been a physician engaged in general practice and have witnessed the terrible suffering and the horrible death of people dying from emphysema and lung cancer. When a physician has to tell a patient that he has only a week, a month, or two months to live, and in that time he should settle his affairs with himself, his family and with his God, it is heartbreaking. That is the most difficult thing for a physician to do. That is why I have pondered about the desirability of introducing a bill in the Senate to protect non-smokers. As soon as the translation is made, I will present such to the Senate in the hope that a national debate will take place. I hope that that bill will be referred to the appropriate Senate committee, which will call as witnesses before it experts such as epidemiologists, representatives from the airlines, representatives of non-smoking associations, representatives of the tobacco companies, and representatives of smokers. I hope the result will be that in the future the workplace will be free of tobacco smoke, and that a passenger on all modes of transportation will be able to arrive at his or her destination without becoming ill or without being exposed to the toxic effects of tobacco smoke.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Bosa speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on this inquiry.

Senator Bosa: I should like to conclude this Inquiry by putting on the record some correspondence I have received in the recent past, and also I should like to thank Senator Frith for his intervention in this debate, Senator Macquarrie for his support, and Senator Haidasz for the dramatic way in which he presented the effects of smoking on the health of mankind.

I understand that Senator Hays wanted to speak on this inquiry. Since Senator Frith has a motion on the order paper to amend the rules of the Senate, which amendment would have the effect of prohibiting smoking at committee meetings, perhaps Senator Hays will have an opportunity to register his remarks in speaking to that motion.

Honourable senators, on February 5, 1985, I wrote to the Prime Minister of Canada. I should like to put that letter on the record. It reads as follows:

On January 24, 1985, I initiated an inquiry in the Senate concerning the "ill-effects of smoking on smokers and non-smokers alike". I am enclosing a copy of my speech, for your information. You may note that I made some specific suggestions which the government and the Speakers of the two Houses will hopefully consider implementing. To that end I have written to the Speakers urging them to consider providing areas for non-smokers in committee rooms, cafeterias and in the Parliamentary restaurant. The Council of the City of Toronto has recently enacted a by-law making it mandatory to reserve non-smoking areas in restaurants of a certain size.

I think it would be most encouraging if the government of Canada also made similar arrangements in those buildings under its jurisdiction. It would have the effect of focusing the attention of the country to this alarming subject. In so doing other governments and, hopefully, the private sector might emulate the initiatives of the Federal government.

There is a precedent that comes to mind. Following the International Year of the Handicapped a number of modifications were made to sidewalks and building facilities of the federal government to enable people with disabilities to have access to the amenities of life. Similar alterations were made by other jurisdictions. The same thing might, hopefully, happen in this case.

From consultations I have had in the recent past with members of both Houses and their staff on the Hill, there is great support for such an undertaking.

I urge you, Sir, to consider asking your officials in Public Works and Health and Welfare if it is feasible to initiate such a plan of action at this time in light of the increasingly and voluminous knowledge that is coming to light on the ill-effects of smoking on smokers and non-smokers alike.

That letter is signed by me.

I should now like to read into the record the reply from the Prime Minister dated March 25, 1985, which reads as follows:

Thank you for your letter of February 5 and your attached speech concerning the effects of smoking on smokers and non-smokers.

Given his responsibility for the public service and its working conditions, I have asked my colleague the President of the Treasury Board to reply to your letter. Mr. de Cotret is in the best position to inform you of recent initiatives taken to address this issue and of current action plans.

That letter is signed by Brian Mulroney.

Subsequent to that, I received a letter from the Honourable Robert de Cotret, which reads as follows:

On behalf of the Prime Minister, I am replying to your letter of February 5, 1985 which concerns the provision of non-smoking areas in government buildings.

The Treasury Board, as Employer for the Public Service, has recently addressed this important matter through the issuance of guidelines which direct departments and agencies to provide non-smoking areas in cafeterias, meeting rooms and other general service areas. The guidelines also prescribe a number of measures which are to be taken to minimize the effects of tobacco smoke in federal workplaces.

I trust that the implementation of these guidelines will prove to be effective and will result also in the desired atmosphere of courtesy and consideration between smokers and non-smokers alike.

That letter is signed by Robert R. de Cotret.

Honourable senators, we just came out of the National Anti-Smoking Week. Another year has passed very quickly, and it seems to be appropriate at this time to look at what has been done on Parliament Hill and in other parts of the country to combat the costs and hazards of smoking.

Government statistics have indicated that although cigarette smoking has declined among Canadians in general, young women are still not reducing their cigarette consumption as much as other groups. Anti-smoking activists have attempted to persuade governments to ban advertising of tobacco products and to encourage employers to declare work environments non-smoking zones.

● (1550)

Early in 1985, Treasury Board produced voluntary guidelines outlining measures which should be taken to reduce the negative effects of tobacco smoke in the workplace. It was suggested that government offices create non-smoking areas and that smoking rooms be located near return air vents to help prevent smoke from being sucked back into the work areas. In June of last year, the Auditor General set a precedent by banning smoking in that department. In October 1985, Jake Epp announced that, effective January 1, 1986, smoking would be restricted at the Department of National Health and Welfare to designated areas apart from the normal work areas. A similar policy is in effect in the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion. The Kingston Whig-Standard and the Toronto Globe and Mail have both announced that smoking will not be permitted in general work areas. Gradually, employers are realizing the potential health risks of second-hand tobacco smoke.

The Department of National Health and Welfare has launched a $1.5 million anti-smoking campaign, much of which was granted to a rock-video type of television advertisement geared to young people. Ironically, the government employed the same company to make the video that advertises for Imperial Tobacco Ltd. This irony was well discussed by the media, as was the recent $90 million "prepayment" given to tobacco farmers who could not sell their 1985 crops.

Although we can feel some sympathy for farmers in debt, caught by falling national and international tobacco prices, should one department of the government be conducting an anti-smoking campaign with the taxpayers' money while another department is trying to prop up the dying tobacco industry? In December 1985, newspapers reported that as many as 1,000 angry tobacco farmers demonstrated on Parliament Hill, demanding that the federal government establish a federal tobacco marketing board. This board would essentially try to expand present markets. Tobacco companies are already looking for new markets in the Third World, especially among young people and women. At the same time, the World Health Organization, an agency of the UN which Canada supports morally and financially, as well as the Canadian Non-Smokers' Rights Association and the Canadian Council on Smoking and Health, have called for a total ban on tobacco advertising.

In Ottawa, concern about combatting cigarette smoking in public places and at work is growing. The Non-Smokers' Association of Ottawa-Hull conducted a poll of MPs in 1985 and found that 86 per cent either supported or were sympathetic to non-smokers' rights in the workplace. The majority of MPs agreed that: non-smoking areas in the workplace are a good idea; Treasury Board should order all deputy ministers to establish non-smoking work areas for public servants, where feasible; Treasury Board should set up independent arbitration for cases where employees and management disagree on the feasibility of such areas in the workplace; the government should establish segregated smoking areas; and Treasury Board should issue a directive banning smoking at meetings unless everyone consents.

In December 1985, an adjudicator for the Public Service Staff Relations Board concluded that the Department of National Health and Welfare was breaching its collective agreement by not protecting its employees from cigarette smoke which can be considered a "dangerous substance." The federal government is appealing this decision for legal reasons and, presumably, because they are concerned about a flood of similar grievances.

Debates continue on the effectiveness of various campaigns to reduce smoking. Health warnings on cigarette packages and bans on advertising appear to be less effective than raising prices by initiating higher taxes. Higher taxes may, however, be politically costly. By one estimate, as reported in the Globe and Mail on June 20, 1985, tobacco and alcohol interests contributed about $6 million to Canadian political parties in 1984, and it is unwise to bite the hand that feeds you.

Tobacco smoke, however, causes an enormous drain on the economy in health care costs and lost work days due to illness, as was very ably demonstrated by Senator Haidasz. Considering the importance governments are placing on reducing health costs in the last few years, one would think that preventive medicine is essential. Cigarette advertising could be banned in all media and prices could be raised. Warnings on cigarette packages could be much more explicit. Tobacco farmers could be encouraged to change crops or occupations as quickly as possible and smoking could be banned in all indoor public places as well as in working environments.

On January 23, 1986, the Ontario government agreed in principle to a private member's bill prohibiting smoking in indoor public places, including public vehicles. There is no reason why the federal government could not make a similar move within its own jurisdiction, such as banning smoking on short-distance flights. I happened to be on the flight Senator Haidasz described earlier. I was sandwiched between two smokers who had no regard for non-smokers.

For a start, smoking could be prohibited in committee meetings on Parliament Hill, as was suggested by Senator Frith, and in some sections of parliamentary cafeterias and the restaurant. We cannot afford to jeopardize the health of our colleagues now that we know the toxic effects of tobacco smoke.

I realize that smokers have rights, but non-smokers also have rights. I think we cannot legislate people to stop smoking, but there is something we can do in order to assist them to give up the habit. For instance, when I quit on January 3, 1969, I had been a heavy smoker, smoking in excess of 50 cigarettes a day.

Senator Petten: Born again!

Senator Bosa: Unlike many people who quit the habit because of a fear of ill health, I quit because I was running out of cigarettes all the time.

I read an article in The Toronto Star by Ann Landers, published on January 16, 1986.

Senator Doody: Ann Landers?

Senator Bosa: Yes. The title of the article is: "Some tips to help smokers butt out." I should like to put this article on the record. It states:

Some 320,000 Americans and 30,000 Canadians will die prematurely this year of diseases linked with smoking.

If you haven't already quit smoking, be kind to your family and yourself and make a start today, the beginning of National Non-Smoking Week. Here are some tips from the American Cancer Society to help you quit the filthy habit.

Wet down all cigarettes in the house and throw them in the trash can. Clean out all ashtrays in your home and office and store them. Discard matches; hide lighters, or give them away.

When the urge to smoke hits, take a deep breath. Hold it a second, then release it very, very slowly. Taking deep rhythmic breaths is similar to smoking, only you'll inhale clean air, not poisonous gases.

Exercise to help relieve tension. Climb stairs rather than take the elevator, park the car a block or two from your destination and walk the rest of the way. At home, practise touching your toes, jog in place, do jumping jacks.

When tempted to reach for a cigarette, think of a negative image about smoking. Select your worst memory connected with the habit. The time you burned a hole in your suit or when you were left completely breathless running for a bus that pulled away. Imagine this experience for 15 seconds whenever the urge occurs.

Reward yourself with oral substitutes in the same way you may have used cigarettes. Good examples: chewing sugarless gum, lemon drops, pumpkin or sunflower seeds, apple slices, carrot sticks, unbuttered popcorn or stick cinnamon.

Senator Doody: Is this Ann Landers?

Senator Bosa: Yes.

Senator Doody: That is remarkable. Have we got the date on that?

Senator Bosa:

● (1600)

Eat three or more small meals a day. This maintains constant blood sugar levels, and helps fight the urge to smoke. Avoid sugar-laden foods and spicy items that can trigger a desire for cigarettes.

Scramble your day and change habits connected with smoking. Drive a different route to work; eat lunch in a new place; leave the scene of the urge. At home, avoid your smoking chair after dinner, reach for gum rather than a cigarette when answering the phone.

Cleanse your body of nicotine. Drink liquids—lots of them. Water (six to eight glasses a day), herbal teas, fruit juices and caffeine-free soft drinks are recommended. Pass up coffee, caffeinated soft drinks and alcohol, as they can increase your urge to smoke.

Senator Doody: We have to give up drinking, too.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I think that these are excellent suggestions for anyone who tries to give up the habit.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

Senator MacEachen: Ann Landers had the last word!

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF SENATE

Leave having been given to revert to Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to put formally the motion for the sitting on Wednesday while the Senate is sitting of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a):

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Wednesday next, February 12, 1986, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, February 11, 1986, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, February 11, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-65, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I have taken note of the practice in the Senate of presenting bills that come to us from the House of Commons marked "as passed by the House of Commons" without explanatory or technical notes. When a bill is introduced at first reading in the House of Commons, the bill contains notes explaining the reasons for amendments, notes which give the original text being amended, as the case may be, and assorted other useful commentary so that the legislator in the other place is in a position to make a rational judgment as to whether or not he should accord his support to the bill, as presented.

In the Senate we do not, of course, have the benefit of that information since bills introduced in the House of Commons come to us "as passed by the House of Commons."

One could always say: "Well, Senator Corbin, why don't you refer to the bill as introduced in the House of Commons? Then you will see spelled out the technical information which you are seeking." But that does not in any way, shape or form answer all of my concerns. I am prepared to do that, but what happens is that the bill is often amended by the committees of the House of Commons and at the report stage in the House of Commons. We do not have the benefit of the technical information as it relates to those amendments to a bill. I think that as a member of a house which is supposed to "sober second think" everything that comes to us from the other place, we ought to have that information.

I suppose I could always go back and read the verbatim evidence presented to the committees which dealt in detail with the bills and read all of the debates that took place on the floor of the House of Commons, but what time would I have left to do my other chores around this place? I think that is an unreasonable demand.

I am not saying that I will look with a magnifying glass at all of the technical information, but I feel I ought to have that information at my disposal if I do, in fact, want to examine it.

I raised this matter previously in a committee of the Senate with the Honourable Senator Doody. I think he will recall that discussion. I must say that he was most forthcoming in his response to me, which indicated that he would inquire into this matter. Other senators thought there was a time in the history of this institution when senators, in fact, were given bills which contained these technical notes. I have not done any research on that topic and, therefore, I cannot add to that.

If it is for reasons of economy that we do not print those explanatory notes and technical information, I think it is a miserly attitude which prevents one from giving proper consideration to the legislation which comes to this house from the other place, and I submit that this whole matter ought to be examined. I would, perhaps, be disposed on some other day to go so far as to suggest that we ought not to consider legislation passed in the House of Commons unless the copy of the bill sent to this house contains that technical information. I do not believe we should get any different treatment from that which is accorded to members of the House of Commons. We have a job to do and we must be given the proper tools to do that job in a fitting manner as is expected of this chamber.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as he has indicated, Senator Corbin raised that point with me several weeks ago. At that time, I made an inquiry of the officials of the chamber, asking them to look into the matter to see what would be entailed in providing that sort of information. As of this date, I have not received the information requested.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-80, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

PUBLIC PENSIONS REPORTING BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-255, to impose reporting requirements with respect to public pension plans and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read the first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Brenda Robertson, who has been in Edmundston, New Brunswick, wrapping bandages, but who is expected later this afternoon, I move that this bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next.

Motion agreed to.

YOUTH

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e) I move:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth be authorized to publish and distribute its report next week if the Senate is not sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

NEWFOUNDLAND

OCHRE PIT COVE, CONCEPTION BAY—REQUEST TO UNITED STATES FOR "THIRD WORLD" TREATMENT AND FINANCIAL AID

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we realize that this is Senator Roblin's first appearance in the chamber since his visit to Africa, where he dealt with important questions of foreign aid on behalf of the Government of Canada. We are glad to see him back—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: —although I must say that his replacement performed extremely well; so the Leader of the Government may feel free to depart at any time secure in the knowledge that his duties will be ably discharged.

In order to ease the honourable gentleman into the domestic scene, I should like to ask him a question about foreign aid. In this case it is reported that the Conception Bay fishing community at Ochre Pit Cove, Newfoundland, has applied to the U.S. government for $1 million in foreign aid after requests to Ottawa for a wharf extension went unheeded.

The Newfoundland fishermen have become so frustrated that they have asked the United States government to classify them as a Third World municipality or province, and accordingly they have addressed a letter to Secretary Shultz asking for $1 million in foreign aid from the United States.

I want to know whether it is the intention of the Government of Canada to support this request from the Newfoundland fishing community.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, dealing with the first part of my honourable friend's remarks, I must confess that I thought I had better come back, because if my honourable friend to my right was left alone any longer I might find that I had no job left here. I am delighted to know that he fulfilled my expectations and, I suspect, the expectations of others.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: I am not quite so sure that I recommend that anyone else take the trip that I recently took, because I found myself spending four nights in the air and seven days on the ground. That is not the most desirable combination of events.

Nevertheless, we come to Newfoundland. This is a free country, thank God, and any citizen is entitled to take whatever action he may desire within the ample four corners of the law. It appears to me that this incident, of which I am hearing for the first time, is one such application by a citizen or citizens of the country. I do not think that it has any bearing on the policy of the Canadian government.

Senator MacEachen: Would the honourable gentleman tell me whether the Canadian government would support this request?

Senator Roblin: I think the Canadian government would think that this private enterprise should be left in the hands of those who began it.

Senator MacEachen: Therefore, the Leader of the Government would have no objection if Secretary Shultz responded affirmatively and provided extraterritorial assistance in the form of $1 million to this Newfoundland community?

Senator Roblin: I have a better suggestion. If Secretary Shultz were to support the Government of Canada in its effort to secure markets for fish in his country, that would be a far more acceptable policy to me.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

CANCELLATION OF FISHING VESSEL SUPPORT PROGRAM

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): On the subject of fish, will the Honourable Leader of the Government tell me whether the removal of the vessel support program from the fishermen of Canada was the result of pressure or suggestions from the United States that this was an unacceptable form of subsidy to our Canadian fishermen?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, has already answered that question in the negative.

Senator MacEachen: Did he not say that it was a factor in his decision?

Senator Roblin: As far as I am concerned, he made it quite clear that he was not moved to his action by the American view on the subject.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I, too, wish to welcome the Leader of the Government back to the Senate chamber. I want to join with those who have indicated that the deputy leader handled all of our questions with good humour—

Senator Doody: That's right, but with no information.

Senator Olson: —with entertaining wit, on occasion, and at all times with courtesy, but he usually provided no information. In fact, Hansard will show that on one occasion he acknowledged that he was trying to talk without saying anything. Therefore, I wonder whether the leader could now answer some of the questions to which we have been awaiting answers.

When can the producers in southern Saskatchewan and Alberta expect to receive their payments under the drought assistance program?

Senator Fairbairn and I have expressed a great deal of interest in the announcement of a sugar policy at a time when it is not too late to get a crop seeded for the 1986 season. When can we expect such an announcement?

Finally, is the government contemplating any action to deal with the major oil and gas projects, whether they be drilling programs or more specific projects such as Syncrude or the Lloydminster upgrader?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am glad that I did not stay away longer or my honourable friend might have still more questions to serialize at me, which is not really the most helpful attitude, as far as I am concerned, because then I have to remember what he said.

To begin with, the drought assistance payments on the prairies are being processed as expeditiously as is possible. My honourable friend knows that offices have been set up on the ground to deal with those and, insofar as the machinery of the bureaucracy can work, they will be churned out just as quickly as possible. I have no positive information to add to that. I am well aware that that answer will not satisfy my honourable friend, but that is all I can tell him at the moment.

With respect to sugar-beets, I am glad to see that my friend has not given up hope; neither have I. I think that he may expect to hear an announcement in very good time for the new crop year.

His third question had to do with what?

Senator Frith: Oil.

Senator Roblin: Yes, oil and gas. I think that the government would probably be well advised to watch the development of events in the oil pricing system, because nobody is quite wise enough to predict how that will come out. Some wise men are saying that prices may settle at around $20 U.S. per barrel. That may or may not be the case; it may be lower. I think we must wait and see how those matters develop and how they affect various projects seriatim. Then if circumstances indicate that government action should be taken, it will be given some consideration. However, I think it would be wrong for me to rush into that particular arena at the present time with any concrete statement of policy, because I think it would be premature.

Senator Frith: Rather an oily answer.

● (1420)

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary, honourable senators. Can the Leader of the Government be a little more specific as to the date that the producers can expect the cheques to be mailed under that $150 million assistance program? Surely you must have some target date. I know that the applications are out and there was some confusion about certain aspects of that program. I understand that there were offices set up to expedite this matter as rapidly as possible, but surely by this time, or even as recently as a week or two ago, there must have been some projected date set.

I do not wish to confuse the Leader of the Government, but the other part of my supplementary question related to oil and gas projects. There are a number of projects in Canada, and to be more specific the Lloydminster heavy oil upgrader, the expansion to the Syncrude plant at Fort McMurray and several others which are involved. Is it the government's intention merely to watch the situation, or do they have some program in mind?

The Premier of Alberta, I understand, is making some noises about going it alone on some of these projects if the federal government intends to withdraw, for example, or if they do not intend to change some of their policies so that the industry can justify their investment on the usual grounds that are used for making such investments.

Senator Roblin: I will try to give my honourable friend some satisfaction on the date of the payments, but I will need to make inquiries in order to do so.

On the oil question, I do not think I have anything further to add to my previous answer.

ENERGY

NATURAL GAS EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—
REPRESENTATIONS BY ALBERTA AND BRITISH COLUMBIA

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning natural gas pricing.

Senator Doody: We missed you.

Senator Austin: It is wonderful to be missed by the senators on the government side. Perhaps you will miss me less in the weeks ahead.

With respect to natural gas pricing, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate will know, the government regulated price regime will come to an end this summer on approximately July 1. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can tell us whether the government of the province of Alberta or the government of the province of British Columbia have made representations to the federal government with respect also to removing barriers to free sale and allowing market-negotiated pricing mechanisms relating to the export or removal to the United States of Canadian natural gas.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer a question such as that because questions concerning negotiations between governments are not subject to answers at Question Period. When other governments are concerned, I can only answer as to what those provinces have done if I have their consent.

Senator Austin: As I understand it, if provincial governments make representations to the federal government, it is possible, in many cases, for the federal government to advise Parliament with respect to the nature of that business without, of course, disclosing the specific representations. I am not asking for details, but it is the case that natural gas pricing has now moved to the point where a free market regime on a continental basis is being contemplated by the federal government, and I am merely asking whether it is being urged to that position by those two provincial governments which represent over 90 per cent of gas production in Canada.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is correct in assuming that there are continued discussions between the two levels of government on the question of natural gas pricing. I do not think they have reached the point where a statement on policy can be made.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT—
GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I, too, would like to welcome the Leader of the Government in the Senate back and to assure him that Senator Doody did his best to keep a finger on the shaky pulse rate of the sugar-beet industry of Canada in his absence.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government could be more specific about what he meant by his comment, "word would come in very good time for seeding for this crop year" in terms of word on the government's sugar-beet policy and, presumably, the 1983 stabilization payment. Given that the House of Commons is off next week, is there a possibility that we could have the news this week?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am afraid that I am not able to give my honourable friend a specific answer. I can only assure her that the matter is right at the top of the agenda.

Senator Frith: A sugary answer this time!

Senator Doody: You need a new script writer.

DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY
CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—NOTIFICATION OF U.S.S.R.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on December 17 last and again on January 22 by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition respecting Raoul Wallenberg.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would the leader read it, please?

Senator Roblin: Certainly.

The Department of External Affairs advises that a meeting to notify the Soviet authorities of Mr. Wallenberg's new status as an honorary Canadian citizen took place on February 11, which is today. The Soviets were encouraged to be more forthcoming about Mr. Wallenberg's situation. Until such time as the Soviet Union satisfies the government's concerns, we shall continue to pursue this matter to ascertain the fate of this courageous honorary Canadian citizen. We await an official reply from the Soviets.

The Canadian government requested this meeting soon after Mr. Wallenberg was made an honorary Canadian citizen, but the Soviets requested the February date.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Did the meeting take place in Canada or in the Soviet Union?

Senator Roblin: I am afraid that I do not know the answer to that question.

Senator MacEachen: Presumably, the leader does not know what took place in the conversation today, but I inform him that later my interest will centre on what transpired at that conversation, particularly as to whether or not the Soviet Union has acknowledged that Mr. Wallenberg is alive and whether or not they have told the Canadian officials where he is living and under what conditions he is living. The Honourable the Leader of the Government probably cannot tell me now, but I shall be back for more later.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can take a stab at it. The Soviet Union has maintained for these many years that this gentleman is no longer alive. I would be very surprised if, in the course of the meeting today, we learned that they had changed their view on the matter and had discovered him. There is, of course, a widespread feeling among some well-informed people that he is alive. The official position of the Soviet Union to date is that Mr. Wallenberg is not alive. However, I believe that the question was undoubtedly pursued at the meeting, and if there is any information I can get for my friend on that meeting, I will be glad to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Just on that point, it might be useful to the Soviets to know that the House of Commons of Canada and the Senate of Canada have asserted that Mr. Wallenberg is alive.

Senator Roblin: If our assertions bring him to life, I will be satisfied.

PENITENTIARIES

CANADA-ALBERTA AGREEMENT AND MEMORANDUM OF INTENT—EFFECT ON EMPLOYEES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on January 22 last by the Honourable Senator Hastings regarding Penitentiaries—Canada-Alberta Agreement and Memorandum of Intent—Effect on Employees.

(The answer follows:)

Approximately 70 employees of the Correctional Service of Canada will be affected as a result of the Correctional Service of Canada/Alberta Corrections Exchange of Service Agreement and those affected have been advised no employees will suffer loss of employment.

Priority placement via lateral transfer will be available to affected employees within the Correctional Service with any relocation costs absorbed by the Service. All remaining affected staff will be absorbed by Alberta Corrections. The Correctional Service of Canada will ensure no loss of salary or benefits as a result of transfer to the province.

The National Union of the Solicitor General Employees have been advised of the plan of action and assured that it would be fully involved in implementation planning.

The Grierson Centre is being taken over by the Province of Alberta and the Drumheller Trailer Units (referred to as Drumheller Minimum Institution by the Honourable Senator) are not affected by the Alberta Corrections Exchange of Service Agreement.

[Senator MacEachen.]

CANADA-ALBERTA AGREEMENT AND MEMORANDUM OF INTENT TABLED

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on January 22 and again on January 30 by the Honourable Senator Hastings regarding penitentiaries and requesting the tabling of the Canada-Alberta Agreement and Memorandum of Intent. I am tabling that document today, with a copy for the honourable senator.

Document tabled.

STONEY MOUNTAIN—CONSTRUCTION OF DOGHOUSE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate by Senator Hastings on January 23 regarding construction of a doghouse in the Stoney Mountain Penitentiary in the province of Manitoba. There is full information on that interesting topic.

Senator Frith: That is one cliffhanger out of the way. (The answer follows:)

The new dog-handling facility referred to by the Honourable Senator Hastings replaces temporary kennels built many years ago to house patrol dogs and which had insufficient space for the dogs. The new facility provides more humane conditions for the two patrol dogs, which are used as a component of the perimeter security system, as well as a work station for the needs of the dog handler.

Power is supplied to illuminate the work station and to provide lighting during the evening shift when the dogs are taken on duty. Water is supplied to feed and clean the dogs.

The dog handling facility has been built at a total cost of $10,019. No fees have been paid for design, consulting or architectural work other than normal Public Works Canada costs since work has been handled by Public Works personnel according to existing practices. A standard design was used and construction was carried out by inmates under the supervision of Public Works and institutional vocational training staff.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been waiting for some time for answers to a number of questions which go back to 1985.

● (1430)

I remind the Leader of the Government that a very long and unjustified lapse of time has gone by without answers to these questions being forthcoming. One question was asked on November 27, 1985, and that related to whether the government had commissioned studies of the impact of free trade on employment, and in particular, of its impact on the agricultural industries and other industries. That question was taken as notice.

Another question asked was as to the items that would be placed on the bargaining table. That situation is still unclear, because the Secretary of State for External Affairs has now declared that agricultural marketing boards will not be on the bargaining table.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate will remember the testimony given by Mr. Kelleher before a Senate committee to the effect that there would be no exemptions except those mentioned by the Prime Minister in his statement to the House of Commons on the question of free trade. Since then, of course, Mr. Clark has exempted agricultural marketing boards. So, my question is still more urgent because of those additional points.

I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether it was the view of Canada that in areas of shared jurisdiction the provinces would have a veto on items to go on the bargaining table. There is a series of questions on free trade that I should like to have answered.

There is also an outstanding question going back to December 4 last year with respect to the attitude of The Netherlands on nuclear weapons. I wanted to know what attitude Canada took at the NATO ministerial meeting where we were told The Netherlands was chastised because of its attitude on nuclear weapons. My question was: Did Canada come to the support of The Netherlands, or did it join in the chastisement which is reported to have occurred?

May I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to try to get answers to those questions at an early date.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I recognize my honourable friend's long experience in the technique of answering questions. So, I take what he has said about this matter very seriously. Indeed, I will try to get answers to some of these questions.

I think it must be recognized that there are some which touch on matters of policy, and it may not be appropriate to report on those at the present time. I will examine the questions again to make sure that the fullest information that can be given at the present time is given.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while on the topic, and since the leader is back with us, I ask him to look at Hansard of last week. I asked for answers to a number of questions that had been taken as notice. The life has been sandbagged out of some of them, but there is a bit of life left in others. I wonder if the leader would look at those questions when he is attempting to obtain answers for the Leader of the Opposition.

Honourable senators, the difficulty with delays in answering questions is that the life tends to go out of the question. We are almost in the position of asking questions for, perhaps, undergraduate students, because by the time we receive answers, they will possibly be doing post-graduate work and the answers, to borrow a word used by the Leader of the Opposition, will be mostly archival.

Senator Roblin: I am interested to know my honourable friend has reached that point of view; he did not hold it some time ago.

Senator Frith: Oh, always!

Senator Roblin: He did hold it some time ago; well, good for him.

I will certainly ask my colleague who took the questions to advise me of the status of the situation.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved third reading of Bill C-46, to amend the Divorce Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

DIVORCE BILL, 1985

THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved third reading of Bill C-47, respecting divorce and corollary relief.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FAMILY ORDERS AND AGREEMENTS ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved third reading of Bill C-48, to provide for the release of information that may assist in locating defaulting spouses and other persons and to permit, for the enforcement of support orders and support provisions, the garnishment and attachment of certain moneys payable by Her Majesty in right of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

INCOME TAX ACT AND RELATED STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved third reading of Bill C-84, to amend the Income Tax Act and related statutes and to amend the Canada Pension Plan, the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971, the Financial Administration Act and the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I should like to say a couple of words in respect of the excellent job Senator Murray has been doing as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Godfrey:—and to draw attention to the fact that he is following in the illustrious footsteps of Senator Hayden. As most honourable senators will know, often in the past the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, instead of holding up and amending bills where there were clauses the committee took exception to, worked out an agreement with and received an undertaking from the minister that within a certain reasonable length of time the minister would undertake to amend the bill to take care of the committee's objections. I want to congratulate Senator Murray for the effectiveness of his own negotiations with the Minister of Finance and getting the undertaking to amend certain provisions in the bill in his next budget, which is referred to in the report of the committee.

While I am on my feet, I should like to make a comment with respect to my advocacy for the outright abolition of the child tax exemption. I am extremely flattered at the suggestion of Senator Murray in his speech that what I said breaks new ground in Liberal policy. Alas, my fellow Liberals pay no more attention to me with respect to any new policy that I might advocate from time to time than does the Senate as a whole to my suggestions from time to time to improve the procedures and the effectiveness of this chamber.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable senator for his comments. When I saw him rise on third reading, I immediately dove for my briefing notes in the expectation that I or the bill was about to come under attack. Imagine how agreeable my surprise, then, to hear his complimentary remarks about the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce where his participation is an extremely valuable asset to all of us.

● (1440)

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make the procedural point which I began to make a moment or so ago, and that is that the printed proceedings of the committee's study of this bill have been made available as requested last week. I am pleased that has happened, and I draw to the attention of, particularly, the Leader of the Government who was absent at that time, that I made particular reference to two other bills upon which I intended to take a similar stand, namely, the Representation bill and the Family Allowance bill. I did so at that time so that there would be advance warning; a possibility that the necessary preparations might exist; and that my insistence on having the printed proceedings at the time the bills might come forward should not be regarded as necessarily indicating any disagreement with the substance of the bills.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am glad my honourable friend raised the point of order. Perhaps it would be appropriate to comment on it at the present time and to say that we should be well aware of what the consequences of it are. If the position is taken that third reading of a bill will not be dealt with until the printed committee proceedings are before honourable senators, then certain time elements will inevitably impose themselves.

In the House of Commons, for example, the best they are able to do, as a rule, is to have the printed proceedings available three days after the committee hearings. Our record is not quite so good since it takes us about six days.

Senator MacEachen: Oh, no.

Senator Frith: Two to six weeks, we were told.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Senator Roblin: It is a matter we can look into, but the Table has led me to think that a six-day period might be one that could be accommodated.

Senator Frith: A terrific improvement.

Senator Roblin: I hope that is so.

I should point out that in the other place what is required by rule is the committee's report. The proceedings before the committee are not required by the rule, although they are usually provided. I am not sure we have any rule which touches on the point.

It does raise the issue that if we do decide to do this on every piece of legislation, there will be an automatic delay of some kind—and I hope it will not be more than six days—before we can proceed from the committee report to the third reading stage of a bill.

I feel it would be worth while considering the element of priorities in respect of this matter, because, if there is a particular bill on which the printed committee proceedings are desired, that could be given priority rather than taking its place in the queue. There may be other bills which are not considered to have the same status and for third reading of which we would not be asking for the printed committee proceedings as a matter of principle but rather as a pragmatic matter.

I do not think this is the appropriate place for me to expand on the matter further. It could probably be considered by one of our committees, such as that chaired by Senator Molgat. He may think it would be useful to talk about this matter with his committee, or perhaps it could be discussed by some other group.

I simply address the point now that it has been raised. This is my first occasion to make reference to it. It will involve a time element, and we will have to give some consideration to that as we proceed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—
(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Whip tells me that Senator Thériault is not able to be here today, although it was expected that he would be.

Senator Roblin: He is in Edmundston!

Senator Frith: He might be celebrating; that is possible.

Senator Doody: He may be wrapping bandages, too.

Senator Frith: We had hoped that Senator Thériault would speak on this bill today, with Senator Gigantès following tomorrow. Senator Gigantès is prepared to speak tomorrow after Senator Thériault.

Senator Doody: Not today?

Senator Frith: No, not today. We will try to double up and, perhaps, both of them will speak tomorrow.

Senator Bonnell: Perhaps someone else wishes to speak today.

Senator Frith: As Senator Bonnell points out, anyone else who wishes to speak today may do so; otherwise, I would suggest that the order stand in Senator Thériault's name.

Order stands.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, intituled: "An Act respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as I have explained in the Senate on other occasions, the lead speaker on this bill on our side was to be Senator Stollery. He was detained, and I was going to proceed with it. However, he is back and he will deal with this matter either today or tomorrow.

Senator Doody: Tomorrow.

Senator Frith: I would suggest, then, that the order stand in Senator Stollery's name.

Senator Doody: There is a lot of uneasiness in Newfoundland about this bill. They think you are stonewalling it!

Order stands.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have some grave reservations about this motion. I want to make a couple of things clear at the outset. One is that I am speaking for myself and not, either directly or impliedly, on behalf of my colleagues on this side.

The second point I want to make is what my reservations are not, so that then I can focus on what they are. I have no reservations about the importance of the subject; it is an extremely important one on which I have made some remarks on previous occasions, as have my colleagues. It is, clearly, the most serious political disease from which our planet suffers. If I can continue the metaphor, it ranks with a serious cancer on the body in terms of political life—and I use "political" in the small "p" sense—for all of us here, for all of us in Canada, and for our brothers and sisters around the world. I have no reservation about that. It is a most important and very serious question for every single person. One way or another, everyone is affected by international lawlessness and terrorism.

The next reservation I do not have is that the mover of the motion, Senator Kelly, is and has been for many years seriously concerned about this problem. His concern is very sincere and he has no ulterior motive by way of publicity, partisanship, or anything else. I repeat that his motives are entirely sincere and, considering who he is, that weighs heavily in favour of his motion. The reservation I have is in moving from those particular premises—if I can speak syllogistically, they are not major and minor premises but are both major premises—to the conclusion that the Senate of Canada can usefully make a contribution to the solution of this serious problem; that such contribution to the solution of the problem would justify the setting up of a committee.

● (1450)

My next reservation concerns the scope of the investigation or the mandate contained in the motion. Let us refer to that. It appears at page iii of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Thursday, February 6. It says:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

So from a geographic and subject-matter point of view, the mandate is very broad and could involve a lifetime's work. The next paragraph says:

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism;

If one thing is clear regarding any government's policy with respect to terrorism it is that it is against it. I do not believe that the question of policy really gives rise to any nuances for study. The motion continues:

the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad;

Because of the widespread effect—in fact, the universal impact of terrorism—it seems to me that it would mean, at least, studying each one of our embassies—because the situation in each foreign post is different. It seems to me that there is no way that the committee could fulfil that part of its mandate without obtaining evidence from each of our foreign postings and, really, each of our representations abroad, be they diplomatic posts or otherwise. The motion continues:

the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That, it seems to me, is an interesting possibility. That would appear to be something that is manageable. It is at least more manageable than the other aspects of the mandate, and it seems to me to be an aspect of the question that has not been very carefully studied. The motion continues:

the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents;

I shall read the next sentence because it is connected:

[Senator Frith.]

and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

The difficulty I have with that part of the mandate is that those two subjects were studied by a Senate committee when the CSIS bill was referred to the Senate and we discussed the role of both the conventional law enforcement organizations and that of the CSIS; and the bill that was passed does provide for review proceedings as recommended by the Senate committee. Accordingly that system and that organization is comparatively new. Therefore, it seems to me that the Senate would be updating the work that was done by the committee on the CSIS. It seems to me that "the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada" is bad wording because there is already an anti-terrorist organization in Canada. But the mandate could include, I suppose, bringing the CSIS before the committee to give an account of itself in the year or two that it has been in existence. I question whether or not that is a worthwhile exercise. Perhaps it is. Perhaps other honourable senators may have different views.

The motion continues:

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That, of course, is a normal provision. I should point out that we do have some problems manning the committees that already exist, and therefore I would not want to load that particular problem on to Senator Kelly. Anyone who moves for the setting up of a committee will encounter that problem. However, I believe it is worth while commenting in passing that Senator Phillips, Senator Petten and all of the committee chairmen already have some problems in getting their committees manned; and that would place an extra burden on Senator Kelly. However, that obviously is not a reason in itself to refuse to set up this committee.

The motion then says:

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

My only comment there is that we must consider the work that the committee will have to do in order to fulfil its mandate. When we are looking at a motion of this kind, I do not think it is reasonable to say, "Well, it is true that the mandate is very broad, but, of course, the committee does not have to do all of those things." I do not believe that is true. We must take seriously what we do when we set up a committee; and if the Senate says, "Go forward and study the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities and to deal with the protection of Canadians, our diplomatic posts, the role of the media, the ability of conventional law enforcement, and the role of the CSIS," then it is the committee's duty to fulfil that mandate. So we can understand what the effect will be of such a broad mandate on the following paragraph:

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons—

And that could be from all around the world:

—papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

The next paragraph says:

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

It does not seek the power to sit outside of Canada. Can the committee fulfil such a broad mandate without leaving Canada? Is it not a corollary to the vast scope of the first part of the mandate that it would have to consider leaving Canada? Could it consider the subjects to which I have referred without at least getting evidence—and this is just one example—about the incidents that occurred in Vienna and Rome? If it did not go to Vienna and Rome, would it not have to bring people here from those cities? Those are just two recent examples.

An Hon. Senator: Or Libya.

Senator Frith: Or Libya. What would the approach be? Could the committee fulfil its mandate without considering the role of Colonel Khadafy?

The motion further says:

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee;

Again, in order to fulfil such a broad mandate, it would have to have a substantial staff. It seems to me that it would be starting on an investigation at least with the same scope as the Macdonald commission, and, in order to do its job, it would have to have that kind of staff.

The committee chairman has said that he feels that the job could be done for a cost of approximately $175,000. I know that he comes to this place with a reputation for being a very sharp-eyed and skillful administrator—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: —and as one who has run successful enterprises where his word, I am sure, was taken very seriously—and I take it very seriously. I do not suggest that the figure of $175,000, or, indeed, the question of cost, should be the determining factor if the Senate decides that it wants to launch such a broad investigation. I agree with Senator Hicks on that. However, the fact that the chairman thinks that it can be done for $175,000 does make me wonder whether he has thought through seriously the many dimensions of the wording of his motion. The committee would present its report no later than October 1, 1986. With that sort of scope, I can only say, "Good luck" if the Senate should decide to authorize the appointment of a committee with such broad powers and scope of activity.

● (1500)

Honourable senators, those are the reasons why I have grave reservations about this motion. That is why I think that there is, essentially, a giant illogical leap from the seriousness and dimension of the problem to the scope of the mandate that should be given to a committee to solve that problem. There is a general problem, it seems to me, with a mandate that is simply much too broad. Perhaps there is room for the Senate to set up a committee to deal with some aspects of this terrible worldwide problem, but I do not think that that dimension is reflected in the wording of this motion. Unless that wording is changed, I will be voting against it.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT DEFEATED—DEBATE ON MAIN MOTION CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cotteau:

That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after rule 77(7), the following:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate Committees.— (Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, since the Honourable Senator Frith delivered his epistle, I have had the opportunity to try to digest it. It has been very rough on the Roloids, I must say. That epistle came at an unfortunate time for me. I was in the middle of my second attempt to terminate smoking. It constituted a really serious setback. I was down to about seven cigarettes a day, and on the Friday following his remarks I was once more up to a full pack.

Senator Bosa: You should read Ann Landers.

Senator Phillips: That would require a pack and a half a day.

Throughout his lengthy and tiresome remarks, one question screamed at us—the same question permeated every paragraph and enveloped the entire missive. That question, honourable senators, is a basic and simple one: Why did the honourable senator take so long to say so little?

Senator Frith: Carry on and illustrate the point.

Senator Phillips: I listened to Senator Bosa on Thursday as he closed out the debate from last year's non-smoking week and I came to the conclusion that either they both had the same speech writer or Senator Bosa wrote both speeches. I say that because, in all fairness to Senator Frith—and I do like to be fair to him—he is not normally that bad.

I have had the opportunity to examine his research authorities again. I really was not impressed. There were no Nobel Laureates among them—no Nobel prizes are given for that sort of research. It is what we, as students, used to refer to as "ginger-ale" research. That, for the benefit of those honourable senators who are not familiar with the expression, relates to a story about a research scientist who drank rye and ginger-ale on Friday night, scotch and ginger-ale on Saturday night and gin and ginger-ale on Sunday night. He found the same results on each occasion—he became intoxicated and had a hangover. Monday morning he decided to determine what caused the intoxication and the hangover. He came to the conclusion that it was the ginger-ale because it was the only element present on all three occasions.

Shortly after I graduated, I attended a dental convention. It was held on a beautiful sunny August afternoon, but we were closeted in a dark, poorly air-conditioned room. Possibly some people were smoking on that occasion. A specialist on cancer of the head and neck lectured to us. He was showing us slides. Two of them dealt with cancer of the hard palate, and he suggested that perhaps tea and coffee were the carcinogenic agents involved in that type of cancer. I had difficulty following the rest of the lecture from there on in. In my practice, I looked at thousands of hard palates. I found two cases of cancer of the hard palate, one male, one female, both non-smokers. The female said that she drank very little coffee and no tea. The male really destroyed the theory that tea and coffee were the carcinogenic agents by saying that he had not been drinking anything except beer and water from the time he joined the Canadian army in 1940. I thought that possibly beer was the carcinogenic agent. Then I subtracted 40 from 76, which gave 36 years of relative happiness, and I decided that it was not worth while following that study.

Cancer of the tongue is a relatively rare condition, fortunately. As a young lad, I knew of an unfortunate lady in P.E.I. who had to go through the unpleasant surgery for cancer of the tongue. This consists of removing at least half of the tongue, half of the mandible or jaw, the parotid gland, the sublingual saliva gland as well as the lymphatic system of the head and neck. She was rather unusual in that, as a Prince Edward Islander, she did not eat potatoes—she was afraid of getting fat. Following the surgery, there is, naturally, difficulty in eating. She found that one of the few things she could eat was mashed potatoes soaked in milk. The lady survived the surgery and lived to be 92, giving full credit to Prince Edward Island potatoes for having cured her cancer.

I mention that case because there are all sorts of theories as to the cause of cancer and all sorts of cures are put forward.

Senator Frith: I have no objection to your eating potatoes in committee meetings, Senator Phillips.

Senator Phillips: That is not a bad idea. So far I have only found baloney sandwiches there.

Cancer gets somewhat the same publicity as does arthritis—100 causes and 500 cures are put forward for that disease, and none of them seems to solve the problem. Senator Frith seems to be worried that Senator McElman's pipe, or something of that nature, will cause his early demise. I would like to take a moment to point out to him that the two areas in the world in which people live the longest are the Ural mountains and the Andes. The natives in these areas begin smoking at about seven or eight years of age. It is not uncommon for them to reach the age of 120. When this fact was brought out, naturally someone had to do research to find out why these people lived so much longer. They looked at their diet. In both areas, the natives eat copious quantities of potatoes, but it is unbelievable what the natives of the Andes do to these potatoes. They dig a pit in the ground and store their potatoes in there. They stomp on them, jump on them, mutilate them, let them freeze, let them thaw and then eat them.

● (1510)

Senator Frith: They probably also take them out and smoke them.

Senator Phillips: But they still prefer tobacco, Senator Frith. A scientist took a look at this situation and decided that it could not be the potatoes, because these potatoes that had been mutilated are full of carcinogenic agents. The potato itself, until it is trampled upon, stomped upon, et cetera, does not contain carcinogenic agents. However, once put through the Andes mountain treatment, it does contain carcinogenic agents.

A few years ago, the CBC made a documentary that I recall seeing. It showed a native of the Andes, 122 years old, starting off with his son in the morning—the son being a mere youth of 98—going up the hill to work the potato patch. There were three things wrong with that documentary, honourable senators. For one thing, you do not plant potatoes on the slope with the rows running vertically. That causes soil erosion; secondly, you do not start smoking at seven or eight years of age and live to be 120, and you do not eat carcinogenic agents and live to be 120. Had the film not been shown on CBC, honourable senators, I would have had difficulty believing it.

Senator Frith referred to a Japanese survey on women whose husbands smoked. I would like to refer him to another Japanese study which showed that Japanese women who ate large quantities of carrots had a lower rate of cancer than those who did not eat carrots. Therefore it was assumed that there was something in carrots that counteracted cancer. Unfortunately, a similar study done in North America failed to achieve the same results. To ease Senator Frith's concern about an early demise, I would like to offer him a bit of friendly advice. That is: Eat Prince Edward Island potatoes and Japanese carrots, and you can relax and enjoy a long life.

Senator Frith: Also, don't marry a Japanese man who smokes! That is very helpful advice.

Senator Phillips: One aspect of American health statistics that is rather interesting is that it has been found that respiratory diseases such as asthma, bronchitis, emphysema and lung cancer are increasing among American women more rapidly than among American men. This applies to both smokers and non-smokers. Some people are now beginning to ask if this is due to the environment or to changes in habits. More American homes are now air-conditioned, and people are living in air-conditioned environments 24 hours a day. Also, more women are now in the workplace which was traditionally occupied by men. More women are in factories, automobile plants, mines, and so on, holding down jobs previously occupied solely by men. More women are working for a longer period in their lifetime. They travel back and forth to work in air-conditioned cars on congested asphalt roadways. Perhaps 20 years from now scientists will be listing these factors as causes of the increase in respiratory diseases.

I notice that Senator Frith did not include any of these aspects in his motion. He seems to still enjoy driving his automobile. Not too long ago, we heard him sponsoring a motion requesting that the engines of automobiles be turned off outside the building. If he is worried about the stone outside the building, I suggest he should consider what the exhaust fumes are doing to his lungs.

I do not think anyone can argue that there is evidence that smoking does harm to the human body, and in particular to the respiratory tract. However, certain types of smoking are not apparently as harmful as others. I noticed an advertisement from the Equitable Life Insurance Company advertising a special rate for non-smokers. Lower premium rates were available if you had not smoked for a year, or if you smoked only a pipe or cigars. I assume that actuarial people in life insurance companies have studied various documents to arrive at their formulae, since actuaries normally do not set the rates by the flip of a coin. They usually have a very good basis for deciding a certain rate.

On smoking in committees, I am personally willing to give it up, but I think there should be certain irritants removed from the committee proceedings that cause one to want to smoke a cigarette, a pipe or a cigar. I am thinking of Senator Frith's attitude in committee where he takes 10 minutes to explain why he wants to ask a question, 15 minutes to ask the question and 25 minutes to answer the question that he has already asked. He insists on asking his questions and answering them, and by this time we have used up 50 minutes of an hour-and-a-half or two-hour meeting. I find, honourable senators, that after I have endured this, I really am craving a return to the pipe and I look at Senator McElman's pipe with great envy. Perhaps if we removed a few irritants of that nature, then smoking would not be as much of a problem as it is. I was about to suggest, honourable senators, that after the first hour, if Senator Frith is still continuing to ask questions, the chairman could perhaps hand out Rothman's cigars and we could relax and possibly enjoy the proceedings. That suggestion was made in the spirit of compromise. I have tried to compromise with Senator Frith before. It is rather like dealing with Gorbachev. It is a lengthy, continuing process and I do not see my hope of a compromise being reached.

Therefore, in amendment, honourable senators, I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Kelly:

That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended by adding, immediately after the word "committees", the words "during the first hour".

● (1520)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion in amendment please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion in amendment please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. I declare the motion in amendment defeated.

Senator Nurgitz: It was close.

Senator Doody: Could we have a recount?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, no doubt Senator Phillips will be proposed for a Nobel Prize for his careful research. We should forward his speech to Stockholm to see that he is properly rewarded.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Phillips: He just spoke!

Senator Frith: I just spoke to the amendment.

Motion in amendment negated, on division.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before I move the adjournment of the debate, may I pose a question to the Honourable Senator Phillips? I was entranced by his relation of what happens in the Urals and the longevity of people who eat potatoes, as well as his reference to P.E.I. potatoes, which I enjoy almost as much as New Brunswick potatoes. Did the honourable senator forget to advise the house that it was common practice in Prince Edward Island, as in the Urals, to have a potato stomping, and that in P.E.I. stomped potatoes result in an elixir that is called "potato champagne"? There are those who circulate the story, myth or whatever, that this elixir is quite capable of eliminating all bacteria, viruses and other harmful things. Perhaps the honourable senator might be able to suggest that potato champagne is the answer for those who fear lung cancer.

Senator Macquarrie: Explain the "other things."

Senator McElman: Heath, I forgot you were in the house.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am a little bit confused. I thought that Senator Frith made a couple of comments which closed the debate. Then Senator McElman got up and adjourned the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator McElman was in the process of adjourning the debate by way of asking a short question.

Senator McElman: Senator Frith could not have closed the debate, as suggested by my colleague, because the traditional warning had not been given by the Chair. So anything that Senator Frith may have said up to that point really has no bearing on the closing of the debate.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that Senator McElman is quite right.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I was asked a question by Honourable Senator McElman. I am not aware of the potato stumping practice on Prince Edward Island. I have never participated in it, but I shall inquire about it. I always had the idea that the champagne came from fiddleheads and that, therefore, it was only available in the spring of the year.

On motion of Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.— (Honourable Senator Marshall)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with regard to this order, are we experiencing a sand-bagging or are we going to hear something from Senator Marshall on the matter? It has been on the order paper for quite a while.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, it has not been on the order paper any longer than many others, but I will be ready the moment we return from our week's recess.

Senator Doody: That is an optimistic comment.

Senator Phillips: If we get one.

Senator Marshall: Then, if not, I shall speak to it next Friday.

Senator Frith: Or Sunday.

Order stands.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD B. HATFIELD

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Simard calling the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's Fifteenth Anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

[Senator McElman.]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, before I resume my remarks on Order No. 13, I would observe for Senator Phillips' benefit that an addiction of any kind is bad and that a reasonable blend of New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island potatoes would counter the propensity to eat only Prince Edward Island spuds. Otherwise, if one is not careful, one could have red sprouts coming out one's ears. I highly recommend a blend of New Brunswick and P.E.I. potatoes. Certainly it would be to the benefit of the two provinces.

Earlier this afternoon, Senator Finlay MacDonald said that Senator Robertson had gone to Edmunston, New Brunswick, to wrap some bandages, soothe some wounds, wipe some tears or something to that effect. I met Senator Robertson early this morning in the Victoria Building. She smiled at me, but, frankly speaking, I had no idea at the time that the haemorrhage was so bad. For all we know, the patient may be in the throes of death by the time she reaches Edmunston.

Senator Leblanc: There she is.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Robertson: Now is not the time to get on my back.

Senator Corbin: I was going to say that she may even be attending a wake by the time she gets there, but I see she is back with us. I must conclude that the post-mortem has been completed and the patient pronounced dead.

Senator Phillips: You do not do a post-mortem unless the patient is dead.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to conclude my speech of December 5, 1985, on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Simard calling our attention to the Honourable Richard B. Hatfield's fifteenth anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick. Yesterday the people of the provincial riding of Edmunston, which is in my beautiful, former riding of Madawaska-Victoria, New Brunswick, went to the polls. They were blessed with glorious weather and they were favoured by advance public opinion polls. The results of the election are as follows: the NDP candidate was sprinkled with 276 votes; the PC candidate was favoured with 2,048 votes; and Mr. Roland Beaulieu, the Liberal Party candidate, was swept in with the largest single majority since the establishment of the Edmunston riding with a strong 3,849 votes. He won all 36 polls on election day. The Progressive Conservatives bagged the absentee and advance polls, a fact, some would say, which could have been significant last week, but with hindsight the entrails of the chicken did not bear evil tidings for the Liberals. Seventy-eight per cent of the electorate voted which, admittedly, is not as high a participation rate as we are accustomed to in Edmunston. Must I conclude that some Tory supporters stayed home? That, I suggest, is a plausible explanation for the relatively low participation rate. Mr. Beaulieu's majority was 1,801 overall. That is a great victory for the Liberal Party and its leader, Frank McKenna. The rest is history.

Honourable Eymard G. Corbin: Today, Mr. Hatfield is reported to be wondering with the poet: "Que reste-t-il de nos amours?"

That, honourable senators, concludes my remarks on the 15th anniversary of the accession of Richard B. Hatfield to the Premiership of New Brunswick; vox populi, vox dei, amen.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

Hon. Charles McElman: In deference to Senator Simard, I think the reference should be kept open until his return. If he wishes to speak, fine; if he does not, that is fine also. So, out of deference to him, I move the adjournment of the debate. I will be pleased to yield to him on his return.

On motion of Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish- Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we should like to have this matter voted on as soon as possible. We hope that the amendment will carry and that the motion itself will be referred to committee for study.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Frith. This was discussed on several occasions. Senator Flynn has expressed more than an ordinary interest in this particular order. My understanding is that he is due in Ottawa today, so I presume he will be here tomorrow. Perhaps he can deal with the matter himself at that time.

Order stands.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-FIFTH MEETING—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Stanbury calling the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-fifth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Dorado, Puerto Rico, from 8th to 12th March, 1984, and to the Report of the said Meeting.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Since Senator Frith was watching my motion very closely as to the length of time involved—it has only been a couple of weeks—I wonder if he would inquire about Order No. 21, which was first posted on March 12, 1984.

Senator Hicks: That is not right; it was November 29, 1984.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I shall make inquiries.

Order stands.

DIVORCE

FAMILY ORDERS ENFORCEMENT ASSISTANCE

INQUIRIES ON REPORTS OF LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-47 and BILL C-48 WITHDRAWN

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I understand from Senator Neiman that she would like to withdraw these inquiries, if honourable senators agree.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Inquiries withdrawn.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 67(1)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, January 29, 1986, moved:

That rule 67(1) of the rules of the Senate be amended by striking out paragraph (n) and substituting the following:

(n.1) The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to agriculture and forestry generally, and the Canadian Wheat Board; and

That the following new paragraph be added immediately after paragraph (n):

(n.1) The Senate Committee on Fisheries, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to fisheries generally.

He said: Honourable senators, may I say at the outset that this matter has not been discussed by the Rules Committee, and that I am not presenting this motion in my capacity as chairman of that committee. I am putting this motion forward on my own behalf.

The reason I am putting it forward is in no way because of dissatisfaction with the present chairman of the committee. The problem is that that committee simply has too much work to do, and the subject matters are simply too important to try to bulk all of them into the one committee.

At present, all matters dealing with agriculture, fisheries and forestry are dealt with by that one committee. It is true that in today's Canada these are not the greatest employers of Canadians, but they are still the most important Canadian industries from the standpoint of our export trade. The biggest single source of exports in Canada currently is forestry. Agriculture remains one of our great dollar earners outside of the country. The fisheries, as honourable senators know, is a particularly important one from a regional standpoint. It is discussed very frequently in this house, and I think that those particular spheres of Canadian activity require more attention on the part of the Senate than what we give to them now.

Let us take, for example, what is taking place now in the committee. The committee is well into an inquiry into the marketing of fish in Canada. We started with a very small segment of the fisheries industry, the freshwater fish industry, the smallest of the three elements, and we are finding as we proceed that it is taking much more time and it is much more complicated than we had anticipated at the beginning. It is not that the committee is not working—in fact, the committee worked during the parliamentary recess last fall. At that time, the committee held meetings in western Canada and in northern Canada. It has met regularly since then. The fact of the matter is that the subject matter is sufficiently complex that it requires all the time and the effort that the committee is putting into it. That means that other demands, whether they be concerned with forestry or agriculture, cannot be dealt with adequately by the committee.

We know that in the field of agriculture there are extremely serious problems. The situation today is as serious as it was back in the 1930s. The crisis of the 1930s is being duplicated now, and we are dealing with the basic element of feeding ourselves. So, I think we have to devote more time to those matters.

I can point out as well that in the House of Commons there are 39 ministers in the cabinet, and that four of those ministers deal with the very subjects that this one committee of the Senate deals with. There is a Minister of Agriculture, and a Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board), two ministers dealing with agricultural matters. In addition, there is a Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, and a Minister of State for Forestry. Ten per cent of the cabinet is devoted to responsibilities dealing with what we deal with here in one committee.

● (1540)

I submit, if we are to do justice to these very important fields, we should separate the committee. That is the purpose of this resolution. I know the argument is going to be made that there are insufficient numbers of senators to staff these committees. I recognize that this may mean we would have to change some of our sitting hours and spend more time in committee, but I think the importance of the subject warrants our doing so.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, before Question Period is called, I wonder if I could have the attention of the Senate for a moment to introduce six young Manitobans who are in the gallery today. They are the first group of parliamentary interns in the Manitoba Legislative Assembly. They are visiting Ottawa for a week, and they are accompanied by the Clerk of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, Mr. Binx Remnant.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps the Senate will allow me to join with my colleague, Senator Molgat, in expressing our interest and acknowledging this delegation of parliamentary interns from my own province of Manitoba.

We are pleased to see them here because, as they know very well, there is nothing like the Senate in our province—indeed, there is nothing like the Senate in any other province of Canada; it is a unique institution. I hope that during the course of their visit they will be able to inform themselves as to the way in which this particular parliamentary institution fits into the grand scheme of Parliament in the Canadian federation, and perhaps form some appreciation of the valuable role that it fills.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacDonald: The Manitoba campaign has begun!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—TIMING AND EXTENT OF MARKET INTERVENTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government will have noticed that last week I asked some questions of the deputy leader with respect to the massive borrowings of the Government of Canada to replenish its international reserves and also with respect to the market intervention undertaken by the Bank of Canada. I anticipate that those questions will be answered in due course—I hope very soon.

What I want to ask today is whether the Leader of the Government can throw any light on a matter that has been puzzling me, namely, why the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada waited so long in order to take action to support the Canadian dollar. The dollar, as we know, had been slipping for some days, and indeed it had gone through the 70-cent mark; and at that point the government acted. My question is: Why had not some firm but gentle response been made in the market earlier so that the very costly intervention which took place might have at least been reduced somewhat, if not avoided?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: I am asking: Why was it too much too late?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, I will advise my honourable friend that the questions he asked the other day have been taken note of by my colleague and answers will be forthcoming in due course. I would hesitate to trespass on the thin ice of financial policy when talking to my friend, because he has had a good deal of experience in that field. However, it would not be inappropriate for me to say that the question of the movement of the Canadian dollar is something that one cannot foresee. One can observe what it does, and one can look at trends. One then has to make up one's mind as to how far those trends can be allowed to move without bringing to bear the full force of the government and the bank in respect of the matter. For some time the bank was trying by its regular methods to moderate the changes in the price of the dollar, but when these methods proved to be inadequate, other methods were employed; and I am very pleased to say that they were extremely successful.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wish to follow up on the point made by the Leader of the Government that for some time the Bank of Canada had been attempting to moderate the effect on the dollar. Is it true that for, say, four or five days the bank had intervened prior to the massive intervention of last week? Can he confirm that the management of the bank had been active in the foreign exchange market in support of the Canadian dollar?

Senator Roblin: I have no information on the activities of the governor of the bank. My impression is that when he was asked similar questions in the House of Commons committee the other day, he declined to elaborate on the situation. But I do know that the Minister of Finance made a number of statements in the course of the last few weeks that were intended to strengthen the Canadian dollar.

Senator MacEachen: Of course, the Leader of the Government is repeating what we might say are obvious simplicities or obvious facts that we know. What I want to know is why did the government and the governor of the bank wait so long to intervene? The Leader of the Government said, "Oh, they have been intervening all along." Then, when I ask him to confirm that, he says that he cannot talk about it.

What kind of clarity exists on this point? I think it is very important to know. Was there a reason for the delayed action or, indeed, was it delayed action? Last Thursday there was a very hefty increase in the Bank of Canada interest rate. We have a rate that is considerably higher than the rate in the United States, and some very competent people are saying that the government and the Bank of Canada acted too late, and that because they acted too late they are now paying the price in much higher interest rates than would otherwise have prevailed. I think it is fair to ask the government to throw some light on this action and on this puzzle. I must say that I am not satisfied with the refusal of the minister to say anything that is intelligible.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I congratulate my honourable friend on his excellent exercise in second guessing and second sight. If we were as smart as all that, we would have very few problems in managing the finances of the country. I point out to him that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is subject to the orders of the government only if they are delivered to him in writing. I am not aware of any written instructions that were delivered to the governor of the bank in writing. The question to which my honourable friend wants an answer is, "Why did the Governor of the Bank of Canada act in the way he did?" I suggest that he ask him. If my honourable friend wishes to pursue this matter, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or another suitable committee of this house could invite the Governor of the Bank of Canada to appear before it. It has happened before in the House of Commons. Then, my honourable friend could address his questions to the man who was actually on the scene of the action.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, perhaps we could invite the Governor of the Bank of Canada to appear on the floor of this chamber to answer questions, in view of the refusal of the minister to answer questions on behalf of the Government of Canada and the Minister of Finance. Maybe we should ask the governor to come in, take a seat next to Senator Roblin and answer questions which it is the duty of Senator Roblin to answer, not the governor of the bank.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, it is not the duty of Senator Roblin to answer for the Governor of the Bank of Canada. He is an officer independent of Parliament and of the legislatures of this country. He is not subject to my orders or my instructions in any way whatsoever, unless the Minister of Finance sends him an order in writing, and we all know what would happen if that took place. It would be very unfortunate. There is no reason why the Governor of the Bank of Canada cannot be questioned by honourable senators. It has been done before. I myself have done it. We have done it in committees of this chamber which every member of this chamber is entitled to attend, take part in and ask questions. If my honourable friend wants to pursue that course, I invite him to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, why can the Leader of the Government not answer questions on behalf of the government with respect to the financial policy of the government?

Senator Roblin: Well, if my honourable friend wants to frame his question in a specific form that does not involve making me responsible for the Governor of the Bank of Canada, I will do my best to get him answers from those qualified to provide them.

Senator MacEachen: I have asked several questions, and if the minister has not caught the gist of the questions, may I repeat: Why did the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada wait so long before they took action to support the Canadian dollar?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I shall endeavour to obtain the answer as far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, but I recommend to my honourable friend the other route with respect to the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not accept the interpretation, nor would any other legislature, of the Leader of the Government that the Minister of Finance does not answer for the governor of the bank. Obviously, he knows that there has to be compatibility between the governor of the bank and the Minister of Finance in the exercise of exchange policy and financial policy. Therefore, the minister is duty bound to answer and explain the actions of the governor until, at a certain point, he is in such disagreement that he wants to send him a directive. Since that has not happened, why cannot the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain the actions of the Governor of the Bank of Canada on behalf of his colleague, who, apparently, is in total agreement with the actions?

Senator Roblin: I will have great pleasure in referring this specific question that my friend has just asked to the Minister of Finance to see what answer he gives me. However, my honourable friend understands perfectly well, I think, that as I do not hold that portfolio, I am not in a position to give an authoritative answer on my feet and on the spur of the moment.

INCREASE IN INTEREST RATE

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. Surely the Leader of the Government accepts the responsibility to answer in this chamber for the whole government, including the Minister of Finance.

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Olson: He does not? I might say that Senator Flynn has learned a lot of things in the last short while, because when he sat on this side of the chamber, he expected the senators occupying the front bench on that side of the chamber to answer every time. However, we can disregard Senator Flynn since he has a different view from day to day.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not he is aware of the consequences of what has happened. As a result of what Senator MacEachen was talking about, Canadian business is now paying somewhere around 4 percentage points more in interest charges than the rate charged for similar loans in the United States, now that our prime rate in Canada has gone up to 12.5 per cent. Does this government expect Canadian business to compete on that basis?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend knows perfectly well that there is a very close trade-off between interest rates and the price of the Canadian dollar. When one affects the other, you must expect those consequences to follow. That is just as clear as day follows night. When my honourable friend was on this side of the chamber, he was giving those answers very effectively.

Senator Olson: No, your honourable friend was not giving those kinds of answers. Nevertheless, I would not want Senator Roblin to expect Canadian business to rely on what the failings of the previous government or the Leader of the Government in the Senate may have been. I want to know now what they can expect from this government. The fact is that the delay in the action taken by the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance, in other words the decision to intervene in the market, has, in fact, moved the interest rate up approximately 2.5 percentage points from 10 to 12.5 per cent. I would also like to point out that it has not moved up that much in the United States during that same time, so that the spread has widened substantially and thereby changed the competitive position between Canada and the United States. I would like to ask whether that is acceptable to the government.

Senator Roblin: No, it is not acceptable to the government any more than it was acceptable to this party when interest rates, under the direction of my honourable friend, were 15, 16 and even as high as 21 per cent. We remember it all very well, and we are quite pleased that during our term of office, so far, interest rates have come down as markedly as they have done. I think that has been a satisfactory outcome as far as Canadian business and the Canadian economy is concerned.

However, if my honourable friend is asking me if I think interest rates are too high, of course I think they are too high. Furthermore, I think that having stabilized the dollar as we have and reinforced our position, I look forward in the relatively near future to interest rates in Canada declining somewhat, thereby reducing that gap between Canadian and American interest rates of which my honourable friend speaks. However, I must say that when I consider the record of this administration in respect of interest rates, I feel very pleased and I have nothing to apologize for.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I will then report to the people who have made inquiries of me that the government is satisfied with their performance and that Canadian business being compelled to pay anywhere from 60 to 70 per cent higher interest rates in Canada vis-à-vis the United States is satisfactory to this government. That is what my honourable friend has said.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is not what I said. When my honourable friend asked me the direct question, did I think interest rates were too high, I said yes. Why does my honourable friend not admit that?

Senator Olson: I asked my honourable friend if the spread was satisfactory to this government, a spread which has widened very dramatically in the last ten days.

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: No, it is not satisfactory, and we are going to do our best to get it down.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to get some information from the Leader of the Government today, since I have already been trying to do so for two weeks. The March spot price for crude oil is now down to under $16.

Does the government feel that it is down far enough now so that they need to indicate some positive action with respect to this, or do they hold the view, as some commentators and, indeed, some people in the government are saying, that these lower oil prices will, in fact, have a positive effect on the Canadian economy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If I were to get into an economic argument with my friend, and I do not intend to do so, I could make an argument for higher oil prices being good for some and bad for others; and lower prices being good for some and bad for others. That is the fact of the matter.

With respect to the price of oil today, which is around $17, that is a pretty difficult figure for some people in this wide world to accommodate, particularly the Mexicans.

I can say that only yesterday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources was in Newfoundland talking to representatives of Mobil Oil and to people on the Hibernia site, and there seemed to be a firm determination on the part of all concerned that that project, which is the closest to maturity, would certainly proceed.

Senator Olson: Can I take it that so far as the government is concerned, where the price of oil is today and where it appears to be heading, which is down still further, is not any cause for this government to do any more than maintain what the leader describes as a "watching brief"? In other words, they do not intend to do anything to take some of those projects out of the difficult position that they find themselves in, which may be jeopardy. As far as Syncrude and the heavy oil upgrader at Lloydminster and a number of others are concerned, I take it from the minister's response that present prices are satisfactory to the government in economic terms.

Senator Roblin: All I can say is that at the present time all those projects are on course.

Senator Perrault: Straight down!

STATUS OF WOMEN

EQUAL PAY FOR WORK OF EQUAL VALUE—GOVERNMENT DELAY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I believe he has already learned that the enlightened Government of Ontario has introduced legislation boosting basic pay scales for female-dominated jobs in the civil service considered of equal value to higher-paying ones usually held by males.

I should like to ask him this question: Why is the federal government delaying in bringing in any measures to give equal pay for work of equal value?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I want to tell my honourable friend that he is right. I learn something every day, even if it is from the Government of Ontario, and I expect to learn a good deal more before I am through.

All I can say with respect to his question is that the government, I believe, has introduced legislation with respect to equal pay for work of equal value, which is presently being considered by the House of Commons and, in due course, will appear here.

Senator Perrault: In due course.

[Senator Roblin.]

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PUBLICATIONS—REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF PERMISSION FEE

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The government, through the Department of Supply and Services, is now charging writers, historians and researchers a permission fee of $25 per page for excerpts from government publications used in their books or publications. In addition to that, they are charging a 3.5 per cent royalty on the retail price of the book written by the historian or writer.

Apparently these fees were imposed without any prior consultation with either the writers' community or the publishers' association. This obviously takes the form of taxation and acts as a barrier to the wide accessibility to, dissemination of, or analysis of government publications or materials. It appears to be contrary to the public interest and to the long-established policy regarding the wide dissemination of government publications. Could the Leader of the Government consult his colleagues to see whether this odious and punitive fee could be removed?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, I will, honourable senators.

"HOW CANADIANS GOVERN THEMSELVES"—UNAVAILABILITY OF BOOKLET

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wish to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It is not a matter that I would normally bring to this chamber, but I have been unable to get any satisfaction otherwise, although I have attempted to do so. Perhaps this is the best place in which to try once more.

Some time ago, a publication entitled, "How Canadians Govern Themselves" and, in the French text, "Les canadiens et leur système de gouvernement," written by one of our former colleagues, Senator Forsey, was produced and widely distributed by the Canadian Unity Information Office. Originally, it was issued as one booklet, with the English and French versions reversed. Subsequently, it was published as two individual language booklets.

Honourable senators, this booklet is no longer available. I have made inquiries of various government departments and I have been told that it is no longer in print. The government has abolished the Canadian Unity Information Office, yet there is a very wide demand by young Canadians for this book or something similar to it. We cannot get any satisfaction from any government department. We are simply told—and, more recently, they have been getting rather curt when requested—that it is not in print and that it is not to be printed again.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate find out why this booklet cannot be made available when there is a public demand for it? Presumably, he will be told that there is no money for its republication and that that is due to cost cutting. Let me just remind him that the government is printing many extra booklets these days. Last year I asked him for one about the Shamrock Summit, which I never did receive, but which was a very fancy publication, as he will recall. I am still waiting for my copy.

This year, in commemoration of the visit of the Prime Minister of Japan, we have had published a lovely booklet. In it, on the facing page, there is a beautiful picture of the Prime Minister—not the Prime Minister of Japan, but the Canadian Prime Minister—but that is all right. If we can print things like this, surely we can print something that will be useful to young Canadians. Will the government leader please find out why we cannot get copies of Senator Forsey's booklet?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend has come to the right place, because I will certainly get an answer for him if he cannot get it anywhere else.

Senator MacEachen: Hear, hear—the answer man!

Senator Roblin: I have read that booklet written by Senator Forsey and I think that it is a very well written and researched document. It is a good description of how Canadians do govern themselves. I must say that I rather fancy the idea that it should be made available in the future as it was in the past. It is true that money is a problem, but, in view of the fact that my honourable friend has approved of the Prime Minister's picture in the publication commemorating the visit of the Japanese Prime Minister, I will undertake to do my best to give him some satisfaction.

METRIC CONVERSION

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to metric conversion. On January 30 of 1985, the Honourable Michel Côté announced in the other place that:

The metric system is here to stay . . . the Government is committed to metrification . . . small retailers . . . will be allowed to continue to use imperial scales.

Nearly one year has elapsed since that time and the minister still has not produced the new regulations to give effect to his new policy. He has given assurances to a number of people in Canada, including those associated with the Canadian Metric Commission, that the holdup is due to a possible conflict between the exemptions and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but no detail of any kind has been provided.

● (1430)

Further inquiries, honourable senators, have led to the information that regulations will allow a merchant to have any number of imperial scales, provided he has one metric scale. The difficulty, apparently, is in deciding who, because of economic hardship, does not need to have even one metric scale on his premises. What we may be seeing here, honourable senators, is a looming chaos.

It is the opinion of the Canadian Metric Association that the department is approaching the problem from the wrong direction. The regulations, in the view of the association, should allow every retail food outlet, without any exemption or exceptions, to use not more than one or two imperial scales.

I am looking to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to provide enlightenment, if possible, on this subject, which is of serious practical concern to many merchants from coast to coast, who are endeavouring to comply with the regulations and who are endeavouring to obey the law.

Apparently the fear, honourable senators, is that if the regulations are promulgated as at present planned, allowing an unlimited number of imperial scales, we may expect to see a gradual conversion of scales back to imperial, together with continuing chaos in the market.

According to an article in the Globe and Mail recently, this will waste the expense and effort put into the conversion to metric, will confuse consumers, and will require a third conversion back to metric, under a new government at a future date.

I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate can provide some information on this point. If he does not have detailed information available today—and I can understand if he does not—perhaps he could bring some information to the Senate at the earliest convenience.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend appears to be representing to us the opinion of the Canadian Metric Association, which is perfectly legitimate for him to do, but I must point out to him that there are a great many Canadians who do not agree with what that association is advocating.

Senator Perrault: That is correct.

Senator Roblin: A great many Canadians do not agree that imperial measure should be entirely abandoned and proscribed by law. In fact, so strongly held is that view that it was an issue in the last election, and it was made clear by this government that arrangements would be made to take care of that particular problem, and this government has been doing its best to do so.

My honourable friend complains that the regulations have not been published. He seems to know what might be in them, at least he has given me that impression. I confess that I do not know what is in the regulations. But the question he has asked me, in particular, is: When will the regulations be produced?

Senator Perrault: That was the first question.

Senator Roblin: I will try to find out.

Senator Perrault: What was the reply?

Senator Roblin: I will try to find out.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Senator Perrault just mentioned in his eloquent way a looming chaos, which brings me to my feet yet again on behalf of the sugar-beet industry. With the cabinet meeting tomorrow, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can assure the Senate that he will be renewing his efforts to see that the item which he told me was at the top of the agenda yesterday goes over the top tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I acknowledge the persistence of my honourable friend. I do not think I have been in the Senate recently on a day on which she has not asked a question about the sugar-beet industry.

I have given the best answers I can; I have nothing to add to what I have said previously.

ENERGY

OIL-PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Thomas H. Lefebvre: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I posed a few questions to the deputy leader two weeks ago requesting certain information with regard to the price of gasoline to the retailers and consumers of Canada. Senator Doody, at that time, said he would look into the matter to see if he could bring back a reply.

I wonder if I could ask the government house leader, now that he is back in the chamber, if he would use his good offices to check out answers to the questions I addressed to Senator Doody in his absence, and try to bring an answer to this chamber tomorrow.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Without wishing to be too picky, I should say to my honourable friend that the government house leader is not here; that is Senator Doody, and he is someplace else.

I will undertake to answer on his behalf, but I cannot pledge myself to produce an answer tomorrow. An answer will be forthcoming as soon as possible.

THE ECONOMY

VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—TIMING AND EXTENT OF MARKET INTERVENTION—APPEARANCE OF GOVERNOR OF BANK OF CANADA BEFORE THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to raise the rather intriguing possibility that the Leader of the Government put forth in answer to questions by the Leader of the Opposition to the effect that we might have a session with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. I wonder if the leader could look into that and let us know tomorrow just how possible that is, logistically, and how we would bring it about by way of procedure.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that that is a matter that the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is traditionally well-equipped to handle. That committee can meet, and if the members of that committee so desire, they can issue an invitation to the Governor of the Bank of Canada. On past occasions, as far as my recollection goes, he has always accepted such invitations.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Senator Frith: I understood that the possibility existed of having the governor appear before a committee of the Senate, but it is the other intriguing possibility that was also included in the response by the Leader of the Government that I would ask him to explore. I know about his availability to committees, but the possibility of having the governor appear in the Senate for questioning and discussion is, as I said, an intriguing possibility. I think it would be very beneficial to the Senate and, perhaps, even very beneficial to the government.

Senator Roblin: It may be an intriguing suggestion, but it certainly was not made by me, nor would I support it.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I should like to draw Senator Roblin's attention to the fact that the committee before which the governor has appeared in the past was the National Finance Committee.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend; it was the National Finance Committee.

Senator Frith: Unless something happens between the "blues" and the "finals," the Leader of the Government will see that he did say that it would be possible for him to be here, and that is what I would like him to explore.

Senator Roblin: I do not think I said that; I am positive I did not say that. If I did say it, I "unsay" it, because that is not my idea and it does not have my support.

Senator Frith: All right. That is clear. In that case we will explore it.

Senator Flynn: That was suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: Yes, and acceded to. We will see; we can explore it.

Senator Flynn: I was intrigued by the suggestion.

Senator Frith: We can explore it, if you will not.

Senator Roblin: Go ahead.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the third reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons",

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1. Strike out paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 2(2) and substitute the following:

"(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption, or

(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood."

2. Strike out subclauses 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I note that the motion to amend the report of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs on Bill S-2 has been pending since December 19, 1985.

I do not recall who telephoned me while I was away from the Senate, but I did indicate I had no objection to the question being put in the Senate. In fact, I thought somebody had done so.

In any event I have already explained why I introduced this amendment motion. I had reservations about adopting the committee report because it introduced new prohibitions.

In that respect I was supported by Senator Hicks and other senators.

Then I had an opportunity to discuss the matter with Senator Neiman and Senator Nurgitz, respectively Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, and, as I recall, with my friend Senator Stanbury. We raised the possibility of amending the report so that only marriages between father or mother and an adopted child would be prohibited.

At the time we all seemed to agree it was the only solution. I thought all senators would have time to read the amendment during the holidays and find out its full meaning. The debate on this matter has lasted long enough and I do not see any point in going over the same arguments. As far as I am concerned, the question can be put. If there are objections to my proposal, perhaps I will respond. However I had the impression that those who were interested in this matter agreed with the contents of the amendment I introduced on December 19 last.

● (1440)

[English]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I am not sure whether it is in order for me to speak at this point, but I would be happy to have this matter resolved one way or another, because we have been considering it for some time.

I should like to adjourn the debate to enable me to consult with some of my colleagues in order that we might come to some agreement that would find favour with most honourable senators.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate on motion in amendment adjourned.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Richard J. Doyle moved the second reading of Bill C-65, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and other Acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question. What in the world was the world like in June 1974? Well, the big stories of the day had to do with $1 million prizes for the Olympic Lottery, the negative Albertan response to federal support of western oil, and the curious case that the Micheners, and indeed the Queen, had watched television on stolen sets inside Rideau Hall.

"The Honeymooners" was showing on television, and Merv Griffin was also appearing. Over at the movie houses we were lining up for "Blazing Saddles," "The Exorcist," "The Great Gatsby," and "The Apprenticeship of Duddy Kravitz."

In 1974 there were a lot of people who felt—who had good reason to feel—that the government's determination to establish new rules to deal with public complaints about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and internal complaints within the force, would be given a broader and more reasonable examination and prompt expression in legislation—that such justifiable consideration was just around the corner.

If you were aged 35 in 1974 and in the force, you would not be that far from retirement age before government good intentions seemed capable of realization. There is, of course, a good deal that could be said by way of explanation about why things went wrong—or, more explicitly, why things went nowhere.

To begin with, there was the Canadian tradition of appointing a commission of inquiry—in this case under Judge René Marin—to look into existing methods of handling complaints by the public against members of the RCMP. The commission was also asked to ascertain whether existing laws, policies, regulations, directives and procedures relating to discipline and grievance within the force were "susceptible to improvement." If they were "susceptible," how should the government respond to that susceptibility?

Honourable senators, bear in mind that Judge Marin undertook his onerous chores on the thirtieth anniversary of D-Day. By January 16, 1976, he was back with a sensible and sensitive report. The executive summary noted that the Marin commission's recommendations are characterized by and synthesized under a remedial approach which would seek to ensure that the rights of citizens and members of the force are clearly recognized and respected.

In short, the judge understood his terms of reference and proceeded to deal with them—incidentally, proffering advice along the way on such related matters as native policing, remote postings, pensions, promotions and transfers.

Parliament got the word from Judge Marin on March 19, 1976. All members of the force received copies; internal committees at all levels in the force were established to provide studies of the recommendations. For a time there was a great flurry of anticipation that things were about to happen!

After all, in October of 1976 the Deputy Solicitor General had been appointed chairman of an interdepartmental committee of implementation. Thus were drawn in the assistant deputy minister for police and security, officials of the Privy Council Office and the Treasury Board Secretariat. Way to go! It went nowhere.

The committee reported its findings in July and August of 1977. A bill to amend the RCMP Act was at last introduced into Parliament in April 1978. It died on the Order Paper and was reintroduced in November 1978 and again in June 1981. It did not go beyond first reading. Back it bounced in 1984 and it died with dissolution. Sail on, oh ship of state!

It is not couth for a very junior parliamentarian to deal cynically with the majesty of process, but there are days when I am reduced to believing that the only thing we have in common with the gods is our infinite capacity to grind slowly. We must not be discouraged, although we can forgive our constabulary for losing faith in much-touted good intentions and we must understand the despairing of our citizens that government will ever give them the opportunity to vent their honest grievances.

● (1450)

As honourable senators are all aware, the government pushed forward undeterred with its consideration of the Marin report and the substantial studies of its merits and made some very useful amendments to previous legislative proposals and, on June 27, 1985, introduced Bill C-65 for first reading. That bill is now before this house, imperfect as all bills are, but a substantial contribution to Canadian justice in a context where there is not always understanding of the responsibilities shared by those who must enforce and those who must accept and understand the fairness of enforcement. The report, for the most part, represents vintage Marin, and for that we should all be grateful, as the bill proceeds through this chamber.

The commissioner and the minister are to be authorized to establish boards of inquiry to report on any matter linked with the organization, training, conduct, performance of duties, discipline, efficiency, administration or government of the force or affecting any other person appointed or employed under the authority of the act.

The bill provides for protections for those who participate in such proceedings—rights to counsel or other representation; the rights of those whose conduct or affairs are being investigated by the board to present evidence, cross examine witnesses and make representations to the board.

Establishment of the RCMP External Review Committee is intended to provide a mechanism of review by a committee composed of Governor in Council appointees. Here is another opportunity for ventilation of formal disciplinary sanctions, demotion or discharge and certain types of grievances. Under Bill C-65, any member of the force may grieve any administrative action, provided no other process for redress exists.

[Senator Doyle.]

Under the bill there will be a set of statutorily expressed standards of conduct which will form the basis for a code of conduct to be enacted through the regulations. Of course, a process will continue for the discharge or demotion of members of the force who fail to perform their duties, but protections and rights to re-consideration would be vastly improved.

The case for the public is: Anyone, whether affected or not by the subject matter of a complaint, will be able to lay a complaint concerning a member's conduct before the commission, any member of the RCMP or the provincial authority responsible for receiving complaints. Every citizen has a right to make his or her case in respect of such complaints through the public complaints process.

I must thank honourable senators for their patience in hearing me through this examination of Bill C-65. Those of you who have endured the bill's tedious proceedings through incarnation and reincarnation are well aware that I have neglected to touch upon many of the wise reforms that have been included in this accommodation of public and private concerns in our relationship with the great and good force that serves us all. But permit me a moment to give credit to the contribution the force itself has given to bringing this bill before us. I speak to the work of the RCMP division staff relations representatives, which was warmly welcomed by our Solicitor General. While not all of the recommendations made by the division staff relations representatives were accepted in the bill as it now stands—I was reminded the other day by my seat-mate that no act is forever—important changes were made on such matters as representation at all hearings of the External Review Committee. Again, I point out the Solicitor General's acceptance of the provision that off-duty activities not be subject to examination by the public complaints commissions, as they have been in the past, on the grounds that members are entitled to the same privacy rights as apply to other citizens.

Perhaps what is best about this bill, after all the versions of its gestation period, is that it represents the best views of those who govern and those who serve. I am pleased to recommend to my colleagues here its swift passage.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard moved the second reading of Bill C-80, to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-80, an Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof, is an important piece of legislation arising from the May budget brought down by the Minister of Finance. The main purpose of this bill is to raise substantial new revenues in order to reduce the deficit.

When we examined the bill in the Committee on National Finance, a number of concerns were raised regarding the fairness of some of the proposals. This is an important matter, and I would like to take advantage of this opportunity to comment on this point today.

While no government likes to raise taxes, this bill clearly reflects the government's determination to achieve the economic renewal goals of the May 1985 budget. These measures emphasize the government's continued commitment to fairness in its approach to policies, programs and people as outlined in the May budget. These measures reflect the need for greater fairness in our tax system.

The tax measures introduced in the May budget are aimed at bringing the deficit under control and managing government more effectively, to achieve and sustain the benefits of economic growth which we are just beginning to enjoy. The government's policies to wrestle the deficit and manage the government better, are, I feel, part of a comprehensive set of actions designed to deal with a wide range of economic and fiscal needs.

This bill concentrates heavily on the control of the national debt through a number of revenue-raising measures and reductions in tax expenditures. To achieve more effective government management, this bill implements many of the recommendations of the ministerial task force on program review.

To improve tax fairness, the bill introduces a comprehensive system of assessments, objections and appeals. It provides protection for taxpayers from collection action with respect to amounts in dispute until the issue has been settled by the courts.

The national debt, I believe everyone will agree, is unacceptably large and growing at a dramatic rate. The deficit affects us all and it threatens us all. Deficit control measures must be shared as broadly as possible if results of the magnitude required are to be achieved. The government has tried to collect the additional revenues it needs by proposing tax increases in a number of areas, thereby minimizing the impact on specific sectors and individuals. All Canadians are being asked to make their modest contribution towards reducing the deficit. Changes both in the scope and rate of federal sales tax and excise tax are being proposed to ensure that the burden of increased revenues is shared as broadly and as fairly as possible.

• (1500)

[English]

First, honourable senators, the bill addresses the scope of the federal sales tax system. Over the years, there has been a substantial erosion of the tax base as new exemptions have been introduced to implement specific government objectives of the day. These exemptions have increased pressures for additional tax relieving measures, created complex boundary problems and contributed to the deficit problem by significantly reducing revenues.

The bill addresses these problems by repealing sales tax exemptions for candy and confectionery, soft drinks, pet food, certain health goods and energy conservation products. It also proposes changes in the taxation of prefabricated construction goods, which were previously taxable on the cost of materials only, so that all construction products will be taxable on their sale price.

Second, the rates of federal sales tax are being increased by 1 percentage point on January 1, 1986. Although this is only a small increase on individual products, in aggregate it will add an estimated $825 million to government revenues in 1986.

Third, this bill implements a two cents per litre excise tax on gasoline, diesel fuel and aviation fuel, effective September 3, 1985. This levy will generate approximately $930 million in the 1986 calendar year. The bill also proposes an additional increase of one cent per litre in this levy effective January 1, 1987. This increase was proposed to help meet the continuing costs of fully indexing old age pensions.

Canadians have shown their preference for broad based measures such as this to reduce the deficit in preference to measures which might raise anxieties and concerns of financially vulnerable groups.

Finally, the bill eliminates the automatic indexation of the specific taxes imposed on alcohol and tobacco products. This government believes that increases in excise taxes based on a rigid formula are inappropriate. In place of the scheduled increase, the levies on spirits, wines and beer are being increased by 2 per cent, and on tobacco by 25 cents per pack.

These measures should be considered in the context of all of the changes and proposals which were announced by the Minister of Finance in the budget. The tax increases are balanced with government expenditure reductions, the impact of tax decreases, the freeze on unemployment insurance premiums and the release of existing RHOSP funds into the economy. The present government has openly asked a wide range of taxpayers to contribute in a fair way. Together, the expenditure cuts and tax changes are an important and fair way of restoring fiscal order to this country.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, many of the proposals contained in this bill are aimed at improving the efficiency of the taxation system and at defining the rights and duties of taxpayers.

Until now, the Excise Tax Act contained no provisions on the assessment of the sales and excise tax due and gave taxpayers only limited access to an independent appeal procedure in case of a taxation dispute. This bill contains a complete assessment and appeal system. It also gives taxpayers the right to delay payment of disputed taxes until the matter is settled by the courts.

Under the new provisions, the Minister of National Revenue will be required to examine quickly a refund application, to determine whether a refund is due and to advise the claimant of his decision. Payment of the refund will be required if an application is received and explanations of the grounds for refusal will have to be provided if an application is rejected.

In the case of an assessment, the taxpayer will be able to discuss informally the conclusions of the auditor with representatives of Revenue Canada before the assessment is made. In my opinion, this is an important step, even within an official appeal mechanism, because experience has shown that many disputes could be settled at that stage. If the taxpayer is not satisfied with the answers he receives, he can lodge a formal appeal.

A taxpayer can oppose an assessment or a ruling made on a refund application by producing a notice of objection. A taxpayer can also appeal the ruling of the minister about the objection to the Federal Court—Trial Division.

This legislation provides new rights of appeal for purchasers as concerns taxes charged on goods which they believe that they are entitled to purchase tax free. This mechanism will allow a purchaser to determine his own situation as concerns the sales tax and to receive any refund due. These provisions apply if the vendor has assigned his rights to the purchaser or has relinquished them.

This new assessment and appeal system reflects the recommendations of many studies and will better meet the concerns of many taxpayers. The tax experts are pleased that such a system will be implemented. It is an important step to increase the rights of taxpayers and provide a greater degree of fairness in the federal taxation system.

To conclude, honourable senators, this bill is certainly not perfect, but it is a tough, courageous and responsible piece of legislation. It would be difficult to describe otherwise a bill which aims at collecting $2.5 billion a year. As I have said, it has to be tough, but I also believe that it is fair. It asks all Canadians to take part in the efforts made to help our country recover its financial health, since all Canadians will benefit when the objectives set by the government are reached, which is why, in my opinion, this government was elected in September 1984. The comprehensive appeal mechanism proposed in this bill will guarantee that the tax rules for collecting these revenues are applied fairly to all taxpayers.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Hon. Fernand Leblanc: Honourable senators, I move that the debate be adjourned.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Leblanc (Saurel)—

● (1510)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Before the question is put, honourable senators, I wonder if I could speak to what I would describe as a point of order covering this bill, because I should inform the Senate that it is the hope of the government that this bill will be disposed of by this chamber before the budget address is delivered on February 26.

As honourable senators know, we followed our practice in respect to this bill by referring the subject matter for a pre-study. It was pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on two occasions: one being December 3 and the other being December 10. A wide variety of witnesses was present, including the minister and officials of the department. I believe there were about half a dozen witnesses in all, the names of whom I have here. The committee proceeded with its examination of the subject matter of the bill.

Because it was understood that certain amendments, which I do not think were of a major nature, were being considered by the House of Commons, the committee did not report the bill after pre-study, as is the custom. Nevertheless, this bill did receive some attention in the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and, in fact, as far as I am aware, at that time all the outstanding issues of major importance were reviewed, although some other matters were left standing.

My point in making this intervention is to inquire whether it is the wish of the chamber that we proceed expeditiously with this bill, which means that I would ask the chairman of the committee if he would be kind enough to speak today so that the bill can advance through one stage. While one never knows what may happen to a bill on second reading, it would be useful if it could go to committee very soon, if that is the wish of the Senate, so that we can clean up the tag ends which are outstanding and, thus, dispose of this bill in good time.

Honourable senators, I have no wish to appear to be urging undue haste in this matter, because I do not think that would be appropriate. I merely want to say that it is the hope of the government that the bill will receive Royal Assent before the budget and that, obviously, has to be considered in light of the proposed adjournment for next week. I think it only fair to senators to let them know how we view this matter and solicit the co-operation of honourable senators in getting this matter disposed of before the budget.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I listened carefully to the comments made by Senator Roblin. I do not agree with him on several points especially concerning the urgency of the bill.

The House of Commons sat about 175 days before proceeding with consideration of this bill. It found it so interesting that when the vote was taken there were only 86 Tory members and 36 members of the other two parties in attendance.

Moreover, the government cannot blame us for delaying the bill, because they are already collecting the money they want. The gas price increase was implemented in September and they are already collecting the money. They also implemented the one per cent excise tax increase and this already is in force.

From what I read in Hansard when the minister was heard a consensus was reached among senators who wanted to reconsider the bill as amended and get acquainted with it, because the bill which was then under consideration was not the one we have today. Some 20 to 25 amendments were made. The committee will have the opportunity to reconsider the bill as it now stands and not as submitted some 100 days ago.

Thus I do not intend to speak at second reading stage today, or tomorrow.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I may be allowed to offer a comment on this, I would simply say that it is a longstanding fact of parliamentary life that governments introduce bills but oppositions dispose of bills. In other words, the opposition really controls the timetable of a bill. That is, to a very large extent, the case now. I think it was the case in the House of Commons and it is certainly the case here.

I am not urging undue haste in examining this bill because we certainly will have all of next week to do so.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, debate adjourned.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, Senator Thériault being absent, may I take the floor?

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Does Senator Gigantès have leave to speak today instead of Senator Thériault?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Agreed.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: On a point of order, honourable senators, this will not prevent Senator Thériault from speaking after our colleague, will it?

Senator Frith: No, normally no one would rise if the adjournment motion is in the name of another senator. Leave is usually granted by the senator who has already moved the adjournment and whose name appears on the Orders of the Day. I discussed the matter with Senator Thériault and that is why I said "Agreed". Senator Thériault told me he would be glad if Senator Gigantès would speak today. I think he intends to follow Senator Gigantès or take the floor tomorrow.

Senator Corbin: I thank Senator Frith for this clarification. Since the Chair used the words "instead of Senator Thériault", I simply wanted to make sure that Senator Thériault would have the right to speak, even after Senator Gigantès.

Senator Gigantès: Well, the matter has been cleared up, thank you.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, one should say "during his absence".

Senator Frith: To be perfectly clear, honourable senators, what Senator Corbin wants to emphasize is that Senator Thériault has not lost the right to speak simply because we've granted leave to Senator Gigantès to proceed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: A wasted effort.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, Bill C-70, the legality and constitutionality of which remain somewhat fuzzy for the time being, in view of the fact that it is already being implemented without having been approved by the Senate

(which I find a little bit funny) cannot be considered in a vacuum; it must be viewed in the context of all the other measures taken dealing with the issue of assistance to families with children.

When we consider these measures as a whole, we realize that this government has attacked middle and low income families. We realize also that this same government, on the other hand, has spared the affluent and the major corporations. I intend to demonstrate this point to you this afternoon.

The government will be depriving 3.5 million families of a total amount of $15 million in 1985-86, and $40 million, in 1986-87. I find it quite immoral for this government to ask these families to tighten their belts, when it managed to find a billion dollars to save those people who had invested $60,000 or more in the two banking establishment which failed in spite of the government's bungled efforts.

The National Council on Social Welfare, an organization whose objectivity and good faith could not be questioned, estimates that the government's decision to deindex family assistance benefits will result in a loss of $22 for a very poor family with two dependent children in 1986. You may say: What is $22? It is not much.

However, if you take a hard look at the whole package of measures, as I did, you will discover that the costs are much higher, especially for the period from 1986 to 1991.

Senator Flynn: Why not until 2050?

Senator Gigantès: I could do it, if you insist.

Senator Flynn: That would not be relevant.

Senator Gigantès: Because I know that you love my computations, I have brought a pocket calculator especially for you. If you so desire, I am at your disposal.

Senator Flynn: You must be kidding!

Senator Gigantès: If you want to, I could even help you prepare your income tax return.

Senator Flynn: You are insulting the intelligence of the Senate.

Senator Gigantès: Finally, the Coalition of Women for Family Allowances has appealed to the Prime Minister through a petition which I hope you have read. This coalition does not question the need for fiscal responsibility. It simply asks: Does the government act responsibly and fairly when it deprives families with one dependant child of $175 million in 1986, while exempting hundreds of millions of dollars in capital gains tax, increasing by $80 million the capacity for affluent people to invest more in RRSPs, giving a one billion dollar tax break to the major oil companies, and $900 million to compensate the major depositors in the failed Commercial Bank of Canada.

According to this coalition, the cumulative total which the government will take from these families through these measures between 1984 and 1989 is $2 billion, and I will give you an in-depth analysis of this figure.

I should like now to quote some figures provided by the National Council on Social Welfare in a document entitled: "Giving and taking".

[English]

This was published to discuss the 1985 main budget.

● (1520)

The budget proposes changes to all three federal child benefits. These changes are to be phased in over the next few years. Despite assurances that these modifications "will provide increased support to low income families"—which was a government assurance given by the Honourable Minister of National Health and Welfare—many lower and all middle income families with children will receive less than they do from the current system. After 1990, even the poorest families stand to lose child benefits and, in the future, fewer and fewer families will be eligible for the Child Tax Credit.

Therefore, we are talking of three measures: Family allowance, the child tax credit and the child tax deduction. If all three measures are combined and if, in addition, we consider various advantages that have been given to families with high revenues—advantages such as the capacity for one spouse to invest in a retirement plan, thereby receiving tax deductions—we find, according to the National Council on Social Welfare, that by 1990 a two-earner family with an annual income of $15,000 and with two children—it would be difficult to get much poorer than that—will lose a total of $1,879. That is not taking into account the inflation rate of 3 per cent. If that were taken into account, that family will have lost purchasing power totalling $2,053. That is where my calculator came in. I regret that my dear and respected colleague, Senator Flynn, is not in attendance so that I could give it to him to play with if he wanted to.

A two-earner family with an annual income of $35,000 and with two children—we are entering the middle class here—will lose a total of $3,452 between now and 1990. If we apply to that amount the 3 per cent per year inflation rate, they will lose purchasing power totalling $3,772.

Unlike these families, the affluent couple will end up with a lower taxable income because of the budget introduced last May. Before the budget, the most that each spouse could claim as a tax deduction was $3,500 in combined RPP and RRSP. After the budget, each spouse can deduct up to $7,500 in RPP contributions in 1986, as well as an additional $2,000 in RRSP savings—assuming, here, that the husband earns $48,000 and that the wife earns $32,000. For a rich family with gross earnings of $80,000, they will make money out of these measures. Between now and 1990, a family with an annual income of $80,000 will make $6,187, while the family with an annual income of $15,000 will lose $2,647. The one hardest hit, of course, is, as usual, the lowest middle-class family. That family will lose $4,607.

● (1530)

If we look at a single parent with two children, the losses are higher for the low-income family, slightly lower for the middle-class family and lower for the rich family. Yet we were told that this was not going to happen.

I have heard the argument from some of my colleagues that what we should do, faced with this illegal—perhaps unconstitutional—situation in which the government is already making these reductions before they have been passed by Parliament, is pass the bill now and make proposals and suggestions to rectify the losses for coming years. We have been told there will be losses, but that those losses will not be felt in the first year.

Unfortunately, we come down to a question of trust in this issue. I trust every honourable senator; I would not expect any senator to say something that that senator does not believe to be true, but in September of 1984, the Honourable Jake Epp, Minister of National Health and Welfare, said in the House of Commons that the opposition was trying to create "a false image" of the Tory party as the enemy of the poor and the disadvantaged. The government, pledged Mr. Epp, would "demolish any such notion by demonstrating that it, too, can implement progressive social reforms." The minister said, "we also have compassion. We, too, have a heart." Well, a year later he said that unless there was de-indexing, and that money was taken to reduce the budget, it would not be possible to lower the deficit. He said previously that any cuts to the social security system, and to the family protection system, would not go to reduce the deficit. We are now being told, "Let this pass and trust us."

Well, it is difficult to extend this trust because it comes to a question of mentality, what people think is right, and what really perturbs me is where this government has started. Let us reduce the deficit. The government says a deficit is a bad thing. I agree. I agree that it is excessive and that we should cut it, but there are many places in which to cut. But who suffers the first blow of the axe? The poor retired pensioners. That was restored. Now it is the poor families, families earning $15,000 a year, not the rich families. The rich families get an increase. There are other places to cut. Canadians with incomes of more than $250,000 a year, 239 of them, paid no income tax.

Losses of revenue through deferred taxes to major corporations amount to two-thirds of the deficit. Why could that not be cut first? Why could those targets not be chosen for the axe? Did it have to be the poor, the old and the family?

What about the loopholes? What about the excess interest deduction taxes at only 50 per cent? That amounts to a $2 billion loss for the government.

What about the tax breaks and the systems programs to create investment? Study after study has shown that no investment is being created; that for every $2 of forgone tax revenue, business has created less than $1 of investment. In other words, we have been had. Here is a negative measure by the government, here is a rich field in which to find money without doing any harm at all, but that is not where the government has gone, not to the rich; it has gone to the poor families.

So, honourable senators, when I am told: “Pass this bill now to regularize a situation which is not regular because we are applying the provisions before they have been approved by Parliament and we will look at it and maybe try to amend it next year for the years that follow so that the poor families will not be hit, and the middle-class families will not be hit,” I would believe any senator, but can I believe the government? In view of its performance so far, I have to say that I cannot believe the government.

[Translation]

I oppose Bill C-70. I propose that it be referred to the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, to be amended. Those inequities, those undue attacks on the poor, and those privileges granted to the rich will be changed. Then there will be some fairness in our system.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Gigantès, do you move that the debate be concluded and the bill referred to the committee?

Senator Gigantès: No, this is not a motion, as such, Your Honour, merely a suggestion.

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: It is moved by Hon. Senator Thériault, seconded by Senator Le Moyne, that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I understood from Senator Frith yesterday that there would be two speakers on this order this afternoon. Now the debate is being adjourned with the usual tactic of only one speaker. What happened in the interval?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): First, let me say what happened yesterday before we get to the interval. What happened yesterday was that I said that Senator Thériault was not here, that Senator Gigantès was not ready to proceed, that we would try to double up—those are the words I used—today. We are just not able to, so Senator Thériault will speak on the order tomorrow.

I do not know why that is funny, but—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators—

An Hon. Senator: So much for a commitment.

Senator Frith: Just a minute. There was no commitment. I said we would try to double up. I could not say that we would double up because I had not spoken to Senator Thériault. So, if we are going to put this question on the basis of “so much for a commitment,” then so much for my trying to help. I said I would try to bring that about, and I promised to try to bring that about, and I did try to bring that about. It is not a matter of “so much for a commitment”; the commitment I made was that we would try to do it, and I have fulfilled that commitment.

Senator Phillips: The commitment was that Senator Gigantès would speak today after Senator Thériault. I have that straight from Senate Debates.

Senator Frith: That is not what I promised; I could not promise that Senator Thériault would speak today because he was not in the chamber yesterday. I said that I would try.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by Senator Thériault, seconded by Senator Le Moyne, that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Is the motion carried, honourable senators?

Senator Flynn: On division.

On Senator Thériault’s motion, debate adjourned on division.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS’ BILL, 1985

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-76, intituled: “An Act respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners”.—(Honourable Senator Stollery).

Hon. Peter A. Stollery: Honourable senators, I shall be quite brief. When I first looked at Bill C-76, I thought it was a fairly simple bill. However, as I read the bill in conjunction with the evidence in the other place, and as I know something about the Toronto Harbour Commission, I became less persuaded that it was as simple a matter as I had thought.

For the information of honourable senators, the area of Toronto from Union Station to the lake is built on landfill, and the Toronto Harbour Commission has a great deal of power over some of the most valuable land in Canada—land to which the title is unclear.

Some years ago I had the experience of assisting with the assembly of the land for the Harbourfront Park in Toronto, so I speak with some knowledge of the matter and of the Toronto Harbour Commission. As I read the bill, which affects rules and regulations concerning the airport—and the Toronto Island Airport is one part of the area to which I have referred—I found much of the testimony given in the other place confusing. I find the bill to be extremely technical in the sense that some of its implications should be more clearly set out than they are. Therefore, I am of the opinion that the Senate is the appropriate place to study the bill which could more greatly affect citizens of the area in question than might be considered at first glance. In my opinion, this bill should be referred to a Senate committee.

When I considered which committee it should be referred to, even that was not clear to me. Obviously, the airport is a transportation issue and the appropriate committee, I would suggest, should be the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. On the other hand, the bill seems to refer to what may be considered by those more knowledgeable than I on legal matters as being essentially juridical matters. Therefore, although I suggest that the bill should be referred to committee, I am unclear as to which committee it should be referred to. Quite naturally I thought at first that it should be the committee that deals with transport and communications, but the more I looked at the bill I realized that it could easily go to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

That really is all I have to say on the matter. I believe the Senate is very much the appropriate place to look more thoroughly at the impact of this bill.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax) speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill, in accordance with rules 28, 29 and 30.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Stollery for his thoughtful remarks. I was trying to anticipate what his concerns might be. As I looked back over the evidence that was taken in the other place, I thought that we might get into the matter of environmental concerns, or matters involving air safety. The question of birds seemed to be the common theme, whether certain parklands were going to be protected or whether or not the birds would be a hazard to aviation. Therefore, I was trying to anticipate what the honourable senator's concerns might be on a matter that arose in 1983 and which seemed to receive an enormous amount of consideration by all parties, including the City of Toronto, the Harbour Commissioners, the federal government and so on.

Since obviously there is a disposition to refer the matter to committee, I would have assumed automatically that it would be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I sent a letter today to the chairman of that committee asking for a reference of the Canada Shipping Act in connection with that committee. The matter is now becoming a point of concern to us. I would be inclined to suggest that we refer the matter to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, if that would suit the honourable senator.

Senator Stollery: Honourable senators, for the record, I checked with the other place, but I cannot say which committee it was referred to there. I would leave it to the experts in this chamber to decide as to whether or not it comes under the terms of reference of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs to which under rule 67(1)(j)(iv) "all essentially juridical matters" should be referred. My instant reaction was to refer it to the Committee on Transport and Communications. Whichever committee is decided on will be agreeable to me.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[Senator Stollery.]

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

THE HONOURABLE RICHARD B. HATFIELD

FIFTEENTH ANNIVERSARY OF BECOMING PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK—DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Simard calling the attention of the Senate to the Honourable Richard Hatfield's Fifteenth Anniversary as Premier of New Brunswick.—Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I adjourned this debate yesterday primarily to ensure that the Honourable Senator Simard, who initiated the debate, would have the opportunity to close it if he should so desire. Before deferring to him, I would like to say a few words in the debate myself.

In 1970 the electors of New Brunswick reposed their confidence in the Honourable Richard Bennett Hatfield and in a majority of the members of the legislature who were supporters of Mr. Hatfield. That confidence was renewed by the electors in 1974, in 1978 and in 1982. Now, in 1986, Premier Hatfield has achieved an unequalled record for longevity in office in the province of New Brunswick—15 years plus. It is quite an exceptional record. No previous Conservative premier has ever won more than two elections in our province and no other premier of either political stripe has ever served as long in office as has Premier Hatfield.

Honourable senators, it is quite appropriate that the Honourable Senator Simard, a long-time colleague and faithful supporter of Premier Hatfield, should draw to the attention of the Senate the fifteenth anniversary in office of the premier.

During those years the premier and his government achieved many measures that deserved and received the approbation and support of a majority of New Brunswickers of all political persuasions, and Senator Simard has referred to many of those measures. During that same period, they have also been responsible, as has any government, for acts of commission and omission that have brought upon them the disapproval of many electors and citizens of New Brunswick of all political persuasions. Both the attributes and liabilities of Premier Hatfield have been weighed on the scales of public opinion, and the result has been confirmation of his government in 1974, 1978 and 1982. Nobody can argue with the decisions of the electorate.

However, in May of last year the electors in what could probably be referred to as the safest Conservative anglophone constituency in New Brunswick returned, with a landslide vote, a Liberal. Again this week, in what could probably be described as the safest Conservative francophone seat in New Brunswick, the electors returned, with a landslide majority, a Liberal. So, as in most things in life, the scales tip back and forth, and it appears that the scales in the politics of New Brunswick are tipping again. That cannot take away from the fact that has been drawn to our attention by the honourable Senator Simard, that an exceptional record has been established in our province and is deserving of attention.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if the Honourable Senator Simard speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I shall try to be brief. First of all, I would like to express in this chamber my appreciation for the legendary courtesy and great generosity of Senator McElman.

We had an example of this yesterday. When Senator McElman realized I was absent, he remarked that the debate should not be closed until I was present, according to the custom of this chamber. I therefore wish to thank him. Senator McElman has shown once again that even in the heat of political action, there are still people, and he is certainly one of them, who are determined to be fair, come what may, who take the enlightened view and who remain in touch with reality. Once again, Senator McElman, I want to thank you.

I am told that the senator was a redoubtable adversary of my predecessors in my party. Your comments yesterday have given us another chance to express our admiration. Yours is an example worth following by each and every one of us who in the heat of battle may make statements that we are inclined to regret later on.

Honourable senators, my former federal MP and new colleague and desk mate also made a number of remarks on which I shall not comment any further. The purpose of my inquiry was to emphasize the exceptional contribution made by Premier Hatfield.

From what I have heard, his candidate's defeat in my former riding is not going to change my assessment of his record. In any event, it is far too early to make post mortems and write a new chapter in our history. It will take several years to establish the historical impact of the achievements of Premier Hatfield and his government.

Meanwhile, I would rather give a very quick overview of Premier Hatfield's major contribution, which consisted of creating a provincial party that is more open and accessible to both communities. In that sense, our party has caught up with the Liberal Party which had been recognized in New Brunswick as the party appealing the most to Francophones while enjoying the often repeated confidence of Anglophones. Together we have achieved that, and it is my wish that three months, six months or two years from now, our next provincial leader will agree to air his convictions and will not let himself be fooled, that he will not accept as politically viable for a matter of months such right-wing or reactionary positions.

I have always contended that I would rather lose with dignity and forthrightness than win on the basis of excessive slogans or positions that are acceptable in the short-term but that will not serve the interests of New Brunswick in the long run.

Coincidentally we are concluding that inquiry today almost at the very moment a conference is held in New Brunswick to announce the Canadian government's decision to join the Hatfield government's initiative. A trust fund is being established for the financing of a provincial newspaper over decades or for as long as the company which undertook to publish the newspaper will need that fund or as long the company will want to publish.

With all due modesty I want to take credit for and express my pride in certain measures which Premier Hatfield and Senator Robertson and also some other honourable senators and I have been associated with. I think that the establishment of that trust fund which provides a tool, not for propaganda but for communication and solidarity, will enable people from the three French-speaking areas of New Brunswick, if not people from all over the province, to come to know themselves better, to better exchange and better espouse common views where the need exists in the best interests of the community.

I am pleased to note that after three years—I know about that because I have led, at least informally, the negotiations with Mr. Trudeau's previous government and the present government since September 1984—Mr. Mulroney's government has agreed to join the project. To my mind, this will be a guarantee, an insurance policy against any attack on the Acadian community by the English-speaking press or other interests or pressure groups. There will be a newspaper secure from any political intervention, a newspaper that will have a stable financial basis. This will help it resist any form of blackmail or pressure. I very modestly submit that this will be a monument to solidarity and a marvelous fighting tool.

For the record, I would like to quote almost in its entirety the statement made today in Moncton by the Honourable Minister Benoît Bouchard concerning the Canadian government's decision.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Senator Simard: Minister Benoît Bouchard said as follows:

I am happy to announce that the Government of Canada, through the Department of the Secretary of State, has decided to make a contribution of $2 million towards the founding of a French language daily newspaper in New Brunswick. This sum is to be paid into a trust fund established for this purpose.

One-third of the population of New Brunswick is French-speaking. This is the second largest French-speaking community in Canada, and its presence and vitality are well known. It needs a daily newspaper to express its views and needs and to reflect its presence in the community. Despite laudable efforts by l'Acadie Nouvelle, various weeklies and the French network of the CBC, the closing of L'Évangeline in September 1982 has left a gap that must be closed without delay. A newspaper is still a vital tool for development. No one can question the importance of setting up a French language newspaper that will be read by a quarter of a million people spread out over the vast territory of New Brunswick.

In fact, my decision was in line with the recommendations of a study and conciliation mission I had entrusted to Mr. Jean-Louis Roy, then Editor-in-Chief of Le Devoir. He emphasized that the lack of an information medium reflecting the social, economic, political and cultural context of the Francophone community in New Brunswick was a major obstacle to establishing the communications essential to the development of this community.

He also underlined the urgent need for a provincial daily newspaper that would serve the Francophone community in New Brunswick.

We realize that the viability of a daily newspaper in New Brunswick, available throughout the province, cannot be guaranteed by its advertising potential alone. A form of financial assistance was necessary and was becoming increasingly indispensable to the social and cultural well-being of this community.

However, it was necessary to ensure that the organizational basis for this newspaper would remain strictly neutral and protected from any kind of interference. We have this assurance because our contribution is paid directly into the trust fund which, under the terms of the trust agreement, provides stringent guarantee against any kind of interference whatsoever. The only right both levels of government have is to recover their respective contributions in the event the trust fund is dissolved.

The contribution of the Department of the Secretary of State, which is about $2 million, will be paid out over three financial years, with the first payment of $700,000 being made before April 1 of this year. This type of assistance is part of one of the Department's long established programs which provide support for official language communities in the form of grants that may be as much as, but not more, than 50 per cent of the cost of certain projects initiated by the provinces.

The new daily will therefore be an independent newspaper, which, I am sure, will reflect various points of view, whatever their tendency, but will also focus on all the positive aspects of the Acadian and Canadian reality, in other words, on those aspects that are likely to stimulate the pride of this community and strengthen its faith in its own future.

Honourable senators, in concluding I would like to say that the outcome of this project, which made the headlines, has encouraged those who were looking forward to the departure of Mr. Hatfield. In fact, there are some who have been looking forward to his departure for as long as twelve or fourteen years. I suppose they will feel victorious, sooner or later, when the Premier decides or others decide for him that it is time to go. Nevertheless, this project is one of a long list of beneficial measures with which he has been associated.

I felt I ought to draw your attention to this matter. I am glad that Senator Corbin and other senators took part in the debate. Everyone said what he wanted to say. But one thing is certain, the message conveyed by Premier Hatfield and the contribution he has made to society will be an example for all those men and women who will have the courage, not just in their respective provinces but across this country, to defend the essence of Canada, which means a country where many different communities and at least two major communities are trying to live and work together and prosper in order to make their contribution to the development of this country.

Thank you, honourable senators.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES POLICY AND PROGRAMS

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the order:

Consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, presented in the Senate on 6th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator David).

Hon. Paul David: Honourable senators, after speaking with the senator concerned, Senator Wood, I would like to move that this report be placed on the orders of the day in the name of the joint chairman of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs, Senator Wood, if this is agreeable.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in the name of Senator Wood.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

MOTION RE CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS— MOTION IN AMENDMENT ADOPTED—DEBATE ADJOURNED ON MOTION AS AMENDED

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces.

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be amended by deleting the period after the word "Forces" and adding the words "and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly."—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, we have agreed to adjourn this debate to tomorrow. I have no objection to having the motion amended, but I adjourn the debate on the motion as amended.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Very well. However, we have agreed to amend the motion as proposed, which means that certain words must be added to the original motion. We therefore have an amendment motion and the debate on the motion as amended is adjourned.

● (1610)

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion as amended?

Senator Frith: We have to adopt the amendment. The motion will appear on the order paper tomorrow as amended, but the debate on the main motion, as amended, is adjourned.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate on motion, as amended, adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, just before we adjourn, I don't want to make a big production out of this business of my undertaking on the Family Allowances Bill, but now is the time to clear up the matter.

When Senator Phillips read what I had said, there was, apparently, some misunderstanding.

I would draw the honourable senator's attention to page 1991 of Debates of the Senate where it is stated:

SENATOR DOODY: Not today?

SENATOR FRITH: No, not today. We will try to double up and, perhaps, both of them will speak tomorrow.

Clearly, the misunderstanding was because of what I had said in the first instance and what I said in the second. That is my recollection of my commitment.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: I took the first statement as being a definite commitment. The first comment should be the commitment, because you cannot make a commitment and then start adding caveats to it.

Senator Frith: There was no caveat. The commitment is exactly as it appears and is exactly what I said it was.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, February 13, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE SENATE

ALLOCATION OF ROOMS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege for your consideration. First, the factual background.

Since this session—I believe “session” is the right word—since the election of 1984 and the beginning of our deliberations thereafter, the Senate Liberal caucus has set up a Question Period group to deal with the preparation of questions for Question Period. When the Senate is sitting, this group meets at 1.30 every afternoon in Room 263-S.

Senator Langlois: Are there any bugs?

Senator Frith: Senator Langlois has asked if we have swept it for any bugs. No, we have not.

Today Senator MacEachen’s office was given word that the Senate Conservative caucus required the room, and we were to clear out or not be there.

An. Hon. Senator: Nice guys!

Senator Frith: This word came from the government whip’s office, Senator Phillips’ office, not from him. Senator MacEachen then sent word back inquiring as to whether he was asking us to change our practice and to give up the room that has been reserved or whether he was telling us that we were to clear out or not be there. The response was simply, “We, the Conservative members of the Senate, require the room.”

I had the impression that it was a noon hour caucus and perhaps a luncheon caucus. Consequently, I sent a note off to Senator Phillips’ office in which I said:

Senator MacEachen’s office tells me that you require 263-S for a special noon-time caucus today.

As you know, the room is reserved for our Question Period group at 1.30 p.m. each sitting day.

We will require it for the same purpose today. No doubt you will have cleared out by that time.

Then I received the following message on my Code-A-Phone:

This is Senator Phillip’s office. In response to the note from Senator Frith to Senator Phillips, Senator Phillips has instructed me to advise that the P.C. Senate caucus requires their room—

The antecedent of “their” is not clear.

Senator Guay: It sounds clear to me.

Senator Frith: Is he saying “their room” meaning our, the Conservative’s, room or does he mean by “their room” the Liberal’s room? That is not clear. It is required by Senator Phillips and his caucus.

Senator Flynn: Lord have mercy!

Senator Frith: In any event the message goes on:

—and they will be meeting there at 1.30 and 260N has been reserved for the Question Period group, and the constables have been instructed to make it available to them. Thank you.

Senator Flynn: Thank you!

Senator Perrault: Shocking!

Senator Frith: That is the entire message.

Honourable senators, I believe that we need some clarification of how we are to determine whether or not a room is reserved. Is it the practice in the Senate—and I do not believe that it is—that the government whip can tell anybody, including a caucus that has reserved a room, that they are to clear out to make room for someone else—in this case his colleagues on the Conservative side? There is no question that the job of allocating rooms is a difficult one. The informal committee chairmen’s group decided some time ago to assign the duty, as far as committees are concerned, to the whips. Senator Lafond had been responsible for that, but it was decided to re-assign that responsibility to the whips.

I think we should understand that the government whip, be he or she a Conservative or a Liberal—depending on the times—does not have the right to do what Senator Phillips did today. If I am wrong about that, and if he does have that right, then we will have to pursue the matter in some other way.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I am glad that Senator Frith raised this matter. I am rather disappointed that he is acting as a proxy for Senator MacEachen; I always find it difficult to deal with a proxy.

As I was leaving my office last evening I was given a message inquiring whether that was a request or an order. I told my assistant to say that it was because of a caucus meeting. I think everyone understands that a caucus meeting has priority over other meetings. That has been the situation since I first came to Parliament Hill in 1957, and I am sure that is still the situation.

Senator Frith: In the event of two caucuses?

Senator Phillips: That was not a caucus meeting, Senator Frith; that was just a meeting.

Senator MacEachen: Who decided that?

Senator Frith: I am glad I brought it up.

Senator MacEachen: You are the great authority.

Senator Phillips: You could not put those docile dolphins in your caucus in that room; they would be packed in like sardines or tuna if you tried to do that. Your caucus room is room 356-S. The Conservative Party has traditionally used that room for its caucus meetings. We have been holding our caucus meetings in that room for years.

That is well known to the members of the Liberal caucus. It is well known to Senator MacEachen and is well known to Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: We are there on sufferance; you just allow us to use it. That is very gracious of you.

Senator Phillips: Perhaps we should consider the demands Senator MacEachen makes on space. Senator MacEachen has five offices, yet Senator De Bané, Senator Marchand and Senator Corbin are complaining about there being no room in the Senate for Liberal senators.

Senator Frith: So, it is because Senator MacEachen has five rooms that this happened.

Senator Phillips: And in addition to that, every morning Senator MacEachen, Senator Frith and Senator Fairbairn go through what I call a turkey trot and go down to receive their instructions from the Leader of the Opposition in the other place.

Senator McElman: You are pushing your luck. Be careful!

Senator Frith: Let him go on.

Senator Phillips: After that they want the smoking room reserved for an hour to go over their instructions, then they want it reserved again. On at least three occasions during the past two weeks I have gone into the reading room and found at 1.30 in the afternoon that it was occupied by the Liberal Question Period group, and that has been done without consultation with anyone. So, don't tell me you have always used that room.

Senator Frith: Except when someone was polite enough to ask us to use the other room.

Senator Phillips: You were asked yesterday at noon to vacate that room.

I think the honourable senator is reaching and grasping for something to complain about. If he wants to do that, that is fine, that does not disturb me. In fact, I rather enjoy it. The only difficulty is that I visited the dentist at 11.30 this morning to have a tooth prepared for a crown—that is what happens to you when you give up smoking—and my lip does not move as freely as it should, but I think I can still make myself understood.

● (1410)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I understand now what Senator Phillips considers his powers to be. I am very glad I raised the point of privilege, because I do not think those are his powers as government whip. We will have to pursue this elsewhere.

Senator Flynn: That is what you should have done in the first place.

Senator Frith: That is exactly what I tried to do. You heard the answer that was given, which made it quite clear that any pursuit was going to simply indicate the same thing as we have heard.

The opportunity was given to explain the situation, and the explanation given was that the government whip had the power to do all these things—

Senator Flynn: You could have discussed this in the lobby first.

Senator Frith: —and I do not believe that he does.

Senator Simard: You just will not accept his explanation.

Senator Frith: I do not find his explanation acceptable because it includes the implication that he does have the power to do what he did today. I know that Senator Petten, when he was government whip, never felt he had that power and never did it. He always consulted Senator Macdonald and worked it out on the basis of a request, not on the basis of a requisition.

We now know what Senator Phillips' position is. We know he is supported by his colleagues in that position, and we will have to consider what to do about it.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I wonder if I might be allowed to act as peacemaker in this interesting interchange and pour a little oil on the troubled waters.

Senator Perrault: Are you sure it is not gasoline?

Senator Roblin: No, it is oil this time. I will go no further than that.

I think the arrangement that has worked admirably so far in, as my friend opposite admits, the very difficult question of allocation of space around here, has been the exchange of views between the two whips.

I do not know of a single occasion on which my colleague or Senator Petten, as government whip, has had serious difficulty in arriving at a solution as to the use of the space here. That has been the record and a highly satisfactory one.

It is unfortunate that Senator Petten is not here today.

Senator Flynn: Senator Côtteau is here.

Senator Roblin: That is so, but Senator Petten has a way with him: He can charm my honourable friend off the trees without any trouble at all.

Senator Frith: I am sure Senator Côtteau has the same views.

Senator Roblin: I am simply saying that I think, having had this exchange of views, perhaps we should be satisfied to say to the two official whips—with no disrespect to Senator Côtteau—that we expect them to come to an amicable understanding in the future should a similar difficulty arise. I believe that might solve the problem in an appropriate way, because I am sure these two gentlemen, with their experience, will be able to agree on what should be done without serious controversy.

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am reluctant to rise on what I think is a question of privilege, but, since Senator Phillips mentioned my name along with that of Senator Corbin and Senator De Bané, I feel obliged to say a few words.

I am a little disappointed in the remarks of Senator Phillips since he is an old-timer around Parliament. I think it was totally silly, frivolous and ridiculous to mention Senator Corbin, Senator De Bané and myself in the manner that he did.

I was in the other place for 11 years and bargained for office space, but never before did I hear a whip or anyone else mention my request for office space on the floor of the House of Commons, and it should never be mentioned here in the Senate, especially in the personal way that Senator Phillips did so.

I am not a complainer—I have never complained—and I am not a whiner. I am quite offended by the ridiculous and silly way that he has handled this matter on the floor of the Senate. I would like him to apologize to me, to Senator Corbin and to Senator De Bané for the frivolous manner in which he treated our desires for better office space.

In my opinion, the Victoria Building is a pretty lousy place to be. The quarters are not good. The working conditions are not very good. I have never complained about them, but if you would like me to complain, I will give it to you. I have requested, in a sensible, decent and regular way, better conditions either in the Centre Block or the East Block, to which we are entitled.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in retrospect, perhaps I did err in mentioning the name. It would have been far better had I said “his supporters in the Victoria Building,” rather than name names. I am sure that the honourable senator would agree with that.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, if that is an apology, I will accept it.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

FIRST READING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz presented Bill S-8, to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Haidasz, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Wednesday next, February 19, 1986.

[Senator Roblin.]

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

COMMITTEE STUDY OF IMPACT OF REPORT ENTITLED “SOIL AT RISK—CANADA’S ERODING FUTURE”—REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON HERBICIDE PRICING TABLED

Hon. Jack Marshall, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, tabled the committee’s fourth report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Marshall, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 13, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

NINETEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-74, intituled: “An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census”, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, January 29, 1986, examined the said Bill and now reports that the Bill be reported without amendment but with the following comments.

The Committee regrets the loss, which will be caused by the passing of Bill C-74, of those seats to which the smaller provinces are entitled under the present law as a consequence of the 1981 census, and it further regrets the fact that the additional seats to which British Columbia and Alberta are entitled on the basis of the present law have been put in jeopardy for the next election by the introduction of Bill C-74.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN

Chairman

● (1420)

She said: Honourable senators, I should appreciate leave to make a few additional comments with respect to this report.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators will recall that Bill C-74 received first and second reading late in December.

Because of the pressure of numerous other bills before the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it did not have time to consider Bill C-74 until Parliament resumed in January. Since that time, the committee has held five very lengthy sittings, which concluded just last night.

Some members of the committee had serious concerns with respect to certain of the proposed amendments in the bill. Because the committee considered them serious enough to warrant further consideration by the minister responsible for the bill, the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, President of the Privy Council and Government House Leader, yesterday it prepared a number of suggested amendments to the bill, which were then sent to the minister's office for review. Mr. Hnatyshyn was good enough to take the time to meet again with the committee last night, after he had had a chance to look at its proposals. He declined to accept three of them on the grounds that the ideas they contained had been thoroughly considered by the government and in committee of the other place and were found to be less preferable than the provisions in the present bill. The minister considered that three other proposals had merit and deserved further review. He therefore gave his undertaking to the committee that if it would report the bill without amendment, he would refer those three suggestions to the appropriate officials in the Department of Justice, since they dealt primarily with the appropriateness and concordance of the language of certain provisions.

If those officials advise the minister that the suggested changes have merit, as the committee believes they do, then the minister further undertook to ensure that they would be included in the next omnibus bill which corrects anomalies and inconsistencies in federal statutes, and which is due to be tabled early this April.

The committee was pleased to accept the minister's undertaking and, therefore, has reported the bill without amendment.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: With leave, now.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I suppose that technically the immediate third reading of this bill requires leave. In considering the question of whether we should deal with it forthwith rather than in the usual way—that is, at the next sitting of the Senate—might we be informed of the date to which the Senate will adjourn?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this provides an opportunity to consider the work of the house over the next while and to see whether there is any possibility of a meeting of minds as to what we should do. I think that I made it clear some time ago that there were three bills that the government was interested in moving forward. They are: Bill C-70, having to do with family allowances; Bill C-74, which we have before us at the moment; and Bill C-80, which is a financial bill. Our hope was that we would dispose of these bills this week. It now seems that that will not be the case, so I have considered what alternative course of action might be suitable.

I hope that we will be able to conclude third reading of Bill C-74 today. It is the first item for debate, and I think that we will provide ample time in which to discuss it. We would like to have Royal Assent to this bill this afternoon. However, in that respect, I have to admit that I am in the hands of the Senate.

With regard to the other two bills, I should be grateful if we could conclude second reading of Bill C-70, which has been before us for quite some time, and second reading of Bill C-80, which is the finance bill. The reason for asking that that be considered is because we have the question of the adjournment next week. If we proceed with second reading on those two bills, and deal with Bill C-74, then we could take the adjournment that the House of Commons is taking and, during the week that we are adjourned, ask the two committees that will be looking into the committee stage of Bill C-70 and Bill C-80 to function. I would need to be assured by the Senate that those committees would sit next week and get on with their job. In that case, the Senate would adjourn and come back the week after, as the House of Commons is doing.

I put that forward as being a reasonable compromise. I realize that on Bill C-80, although it has been in the committee on two occasions, and although there has been quite a lot of evidence given by the minister and half a dozen people from the department, there is a disposition on the part of some senators to have that bill considered further by the committee in order to deal with other aspects of the bill. My proposal would make it possible for committee hearings to take place on the finance bill next week, even though the Senate was not sitting, and also on Bill C-70.

I am aware that Bill C-70 is a contentious bill and I am aware that there is a great deal of interest in it on the other side of the house. I am also aware that there have been many speeches made, but that the bill has not been proceeding very fast on second reading, because people who have adjourned the debate have either not spoken or have not been present to do so. For one reason or another, it has been pretty slow going. However, the point that I think the opposition party has been trying to make, namely that they have serious objections to this bill, is now well established and it seems to me that since we have been told there are some 18 individuals or organizations who wish to appear to discuss the bill, it would do no harm to anyone's interests if we gave it second reading today and then, next week, the committee could hold their meetings in order to hear these 18 groups so that around the week of March 4, if I am not too much of an optimist, we might receive the bill back in the chamber for third reading and final consideration.

However, if the Senate is not disposed to follow that suggestion and we do not get second reading of these two bills and third reading of Bill C-74—and I am reconciled to the fact that that might be the case—then we will simply proceed with our normal course of business, that is to say, we will meet next week and get on with it. However, as there is a workable alternative, which I think does no harm to anyone's interest, I thought I had better place this matter before the Senate to see what kind of response there would be to it.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the preference of the government is clear from the notice of motion that is on the order paper which suggests that the Senate adjourn today until next Tuesday. I must say that, with respect to the Family Allowances bill, as far as we are concerned it is possible, unless there is an unforeseen desire on some senator's part to speak, to give that bill second reading today and to send it to committee.

However, in light of what Senator Leblanc said yesterday, and knowing his strong views on the Excise Tax bill, I think it would be almost irresponsible for the Senate to give that bill second reading today when it was clearly indicated to us yesterday by Senator Leblanc that he was not prepared to deal with the bill either yesterday or today. I think it would be quite impractical for us to decide at this moment that we were in a position to give that bill second reading. Therefore, if the Leader of the Government feels in that circumstance that we must come back next week, then we do not consider it necessary to give leave for the Representation bill to proceed to third reading today. I think that if the Leader of the Government is prepared to adjourn the Senate for the same period as the House of Commons, then some consideration could be given to giving third reading to Bill C-74 today. However, I do not think that it is possible to give second reading to the Excise Tax bill.

● (1430)

Senator Flynn: Senator Leblanc is here. He should be able to speak for himself.

Senator Frith: He did.

Senator Flynn: Today.

Senator Roblin: I wonder if I might be permitted to ask Senator Leblanc, in whose name the adjournment stands, whether he intends to speak to the bill today, and, if not, when he would be speaking to it.

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I indicated yesterday that I was not ready to speak immediately. I want to congratulate Senator Simard of New Brunswick who introduced the bill on second reading. I would like to scrutinize all the material he has presented, particularly that on equity.

At first blush it would appear that I do not agree with some of the documents mentioned by Senator Simard, but I must take some time to examine them.

[English]

Senator Roblin: I take it then that my honourable friend does not intend to speak to the bill this afternoon. Would he inform the house when he intends to speak to it?

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Answer the question, it was directed to you.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): I did hear the question, honourable senators, but the answer is not easy. On the recommendation of my physician I will be out of the country for 15 days.

I will speak on second reading after I get back, on March 4 next. However, I discussed the matter with Senator Frith and he has my authorization to proceed while I am gone, if he wants to.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to put the matter into perspective. Even though Senator Leblanc will not be ready before March 4, if we do sit next week we will allow other senators to speak on this subject. There is no question of adjourning the debate to March 4.

Senator Flynn: It is not serious!

[English]

Senator Frith: Okay, then we won't. He said that it is not serious.

Senator Roblin: I find this an extraordinary situation. Here we have a government finance bill arising out of the last budget and the quite reasonable request of the government that the Senate deal with this measure before the next budget comes down, which is on February 26. Then, we have the information, given us by the gentleman who is the chairman of the committee that will deal with this bill, and in whose name the adjournment of the debate stands, saying that he is not going to speak to the bill today, that, in fact, he is leaving the country and will not be speaking on it until March 4.

Senator Frith: Keep going.

Senator Roblin: Am I to understand that, in spite of the fact that other senators might be speaking on the matter in the interval which, I am sure will be appropriate, we are to wait until March 4 when Senator Leblanc returns?

Senator Frith: That is the point I tried to make, and that Senator Flynn found so amusing. I said that that is not our intention. If we come back next week or the week after to deal with Bill C-80, we will deal with Bill C-80, and if the debate is completed we will not await the return of Senator Leblanc. The only thing now is that we believe that the bill should go to the National Finance Committee. But we will not go on saying, "Sorry, we are going to keep adjourning it in Senator Leblanc's name." That is precisely what Senator Leblanc said. He said that he discussed it with me, and he did.

Senator Simard: Send it to committee.

Senator Frith: Senator Simard has something to add to help us along.

Senator Simard: Then let's send it to committee.

Senator MacEachen: But not today.

An Hon. Senator: Why not?

Senator Frith: Sure, why not send it right now with no debate! Let me put it this way. It is not our intention to apply the Simard formula, which is to send the bill to committee today without further debate. Let us get that clear. We believe that there should be more debate on the bill. I do not think that I can make it any clearer. Having discussed the matter with Senator Leblanc, I said that if we come back to deal with this bill either next week or the following week or both, it would not be reasonable to hold the matter in his name for debate. So we would proceed with the second reading debate, and if we completed it we would not hold it in Senator Leblanc's name, but we would insist that the bill go to committee. That is all.

Senator Roblin: It seems to me quite unusual that a member of the Senate who is chairman of the committee to which the bill is to be sent, who knew at the time that he adjourned the debate yesterday that he would not be here to resume the debate, and who will not speak to the matter today, because, he says, he has matters of grave import that are bothering him that he wishes to ventilate in the Senate, is going to go away for two weeks and we will be dealing with the bill, anyway, in his absence.

Senator Frith: Forget it!

Senator Roblin: So his views will not be presented in that way.

Senator MacEachen: Forget it!

Senator Frith: Duff, come on!

Senator Roblin: This seems to me to be a very poor way to contribute to the operations of the Government of Canada in Parliament. Now, having said that—Senator Frith: For the very reasons you mentioned, I raised this matter with Senator Leblanc.

Senator Roblin: Good for you!

Senator Frith: And you are still saying that it is unusual and improper. All I get for my pains is a lecture. Forget it!

Senator Roblin: You may have raised it with Senator Leblanc, but you did not do anything effective about it, did you? Nothing at all.

Senator Frith: Yes, I did. I dealt with the very question you are concerned about; namely, whether the bill would be held awaiting the return of Senator Leblanc.

Senator Roblin: Good for you! That's fine!

Senator Frith: I said that to you five times.

Senator Roblin: How delightful. It still means that we had this charade yesterday, the adjournment of the debate by an honourable senator who knew that he would not be here to debate the matter. If that is not a charade, I would like to know what is.

Senator Frith: So it is a charade. Well, we will remember that on another occasion.

Senator Roblin: Now, we come back to the main issue, and that is, what do we do next? It is perfectly obvious to me from what we have heard that the proposals I have made are not acceptable to the opposition. I have to accept that because there are more of them than there are of us. That is a fact one can never lose sight of in this chamber. I think that the best thing to do is to forget about the adjournment for the next week, and let the House of Commons go. We do not have to go. We can come back next week and conduct our business in the usual way from Tuesday on.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: We can forget about trying to be helpful.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government said that we should forget about an adjournment next week. That seems to me to be a bit misleading, because when you pick up the Scroll, which was delivered to my office at 12 o'clock, you see a motion saying that when the Senate adjourns today, it is to stand adjourned until Tuesday, February 18. It was my assumption from the moment—

Senator Frith: Talk about charades!

Senator Flynn: You must be losing your mind!

Senator MacEachen: —that the Scroll arrived in my office that we would be meeting next week. Therefore, we shall meet next week in accordance with the motion which was put forward by the government early this morning. Why go through this blackmail, with the government saying, "If you pass three bills instantly, you can go away next week." We are not buying that.

Senator Roblin: I have to tell my honourable friend, without betraying any confidences, that he knows that this is not the first time that the question of our activities for next week was raised. That is a fact. It is also a fact that the resolution we have on the order paper is a customary one, but that by no means prevents the Senate from making another arrangement if it deems it advisable to do so. We have done this on many occasions.

Senator Flynn: Silly behaviour!

Senator Frith: I agree, your behaviour.

Senator Roblin: In the past we have had the order paper printed with the regular resolution on it and then, in order to deal with the particular situation, we have adjusted our program accordingly. I was hopeful that we would be able to do the same thing again, but we cannot, so we are going to meet next week on Tuesday.

Senator Frith: Good!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I have a further point. Yesterday the Leader of the Government told us, as is recorded at page 2009 of Debates of the Senate the following:

I am not urging undue haste in examining this bill because we certainly will have all of next week to do so.

That is the statement made by the Leader of the Government from his seat yesterday in reference to the bill that was to be spoken to by Senator Leblanc. I took him seriously, particularly when I saw the motion on the Scroll that we were to meet next week.

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: So what?

Senator MacEachen: We are meeting, so why come in now and say, "Give us leave for third reading of the Representation bill; give us the second reading of the Excise Tax Act without debate, and give us second reading of the Family Allowances bill, and if you do that, if you are meek and mild, I will change my mind and rescind my intention of calling the Senate back next week?"

Senator Roblin: It is perfectly clear that my honourable friend has got the bit in his teeth. He has expressed himself very clearly. All I can say to him is that I have tried to present a reasonable compromise, a compromise that I thought and hoped would meet with the approbation of the majority in this house.

I cannot be blamed for having some optimistic expectations as to how honourable senators will react, but now I see that I should have stood in bed.

Senator Frith: We feel the same way.

Senator Roblin: There is no point in trying to come to an accommodation, because an accommodation is not possible. I accept that fact and the adjournment motion will be proceeded with.

Senator Flynn: So, leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: No, leave is not granted.

On motion of Senator Flynn, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: What an incompetent government! That is the perception—

Senator Flynn: What an incompetent Leader of the Opposition! The Leader of the Opposition does not understand the Senate at all.

Senator MacEachen: That is the perception of this government all across the country and in the Senate.

Senator Flynn: You should not be proud of yourself.

Senator MacEachen: I would not want you to be proud of me; that would be a bad day in my life.

Senator Flynn: Don't be silly.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, February 18, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

OIL PRICING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to advise the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the situation respecting the oil industry is continuing to deteriorate. I was hoping that he would reply today because I thought that the Senate would not meet next week—certainly the House of Commons will not meet next week. I am still hoping he can do so.

Notice is being given now—not sometime later—by a number of companies that exploration and development activity is coming to a halt. There are drilling companies and service and supply companies severely curtailing their activities. The reason is that more and more oil and gas companies are giving notice of reducing exploration and development activity. They are cutting their budgets and they are laying off personnel.

I hope that the Leader of the Government is prepared to give at least some glimmer of hope that this government is contemplating action to deal with this very serious economic deterioration.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the statements I made previously on this subject.

INTERNATIONAL OIL PRICING—AGENDA ITEM AT ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Hon. Jack Austin: Following on Senator Olson's question, the Leader of the Government will know that an economic summit is to be held in Japan during the first week of May of this year and that the Prime Minister will be representing Canada at that summit.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether the subject of international oil pricing is an agreed agenda item at the summit meeting, as undoubtedly it should be, bearing in mind the impact international oil pricing has on the world's economy.

If it is the case that international oil pricing will be on the agenda, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise us what position the Government of Canada might take with its economic summit partners with respect to establishing, at least for those seven nations, a floor price of some kind to ensure that domestic production is sustained, that the service industries to which Senator Olson referred are kept intact, and that there is not a destruction of the structural part of our oil industry or our ability to carry out exploration and development as a result of a serious price decline.

If the Leader of the Government finds that these questions are not yet current, I wonder whether he would undertake to make representations, particularly on behalf of the oil-producing provinces of western Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I take the question very seriously and will see that my honourable friend's comments are conveyed to the appropriate quarters.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate once again whether he has anything to report on the progress of the sugar-beet deliberations. We are getting to the time when farmers will be under extreme pressure to place orders so that they can grow a crop this year. I wonder whether some kind of answer can be given to them fairly quickly. All the deadlines are fast approaching.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think the answer to the question is, yes, some answer can be given quite quickly, but I cannot give it today.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Essentially, that is the same reply we have been receiving for the past several weeks. We have heard that it will be soon, and as we move along, I guess it will be sooner, and so forth.

I should like the Leader of the Government to know that it may be that wholesale houses and other farm and agricultural product suppliers have put in the necessary chemicals—that is, herbicides, and so forth—that are specifically required for growing a sugar-beet crop, but that is not being done in Alberta because there is no agreement between the sugar-beet producers and the processors to grow a crop. The service and supply companies are not prepared to put in those supplies to deal with a 1986 crop until they are assured there is going to be one.

What is delaying an agreement between the producer organizations and the processors in Alberta is the lack of knowledge of what the federal government's sugar-beet policy, or sugar policy, is going to be. The time for that to be made known is not next week or some time soon, it is now. If those supplies are not put in, it will not be possible to cope with the physical requirements for producing a crop in 1986.

Senator Roblin: I am well aware of my honourable friend's point and I will take it into account.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a few delayed answers to oral questions.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BOARD OF DIRECTORS—REPLACEMENT OF MEMBERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first is in response to a question asked in the Senate some time ago by Senator Frith regarding CN.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What was that question again?

Senator Roblin: You wanted to know about the directors. Do you want to hear the answer?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Roblin: Some existing board members had philosophical differences with the policy changes the government is enacting at CN. Betty Hughes' resignation was solicited and offered. The three members who resigned on April 30, 1985, also had their resignations solicited following a re-organization of the management structure at CN.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT AND OTHER CONDITIONS— GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second question was posed by the Honourable Senator Olson and related to the question of the payment of drought assistance.

The cheques started to go out on February 10, so a good many of them are in the hands of farmers now.

I thought I would reply to that orally because it is a short answer.

MEAT IMPORT ACT

TABLING OF REPORTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on January 28 last by the Honourable Senator Godfrey regarding Meat Import Act—Tabling of Reports.

(The answer follows:)

With reference to the reporting period of the Meat Import Act, the Act simply states:

As soon as practicable after the 31st day of December in each year, the Minister shall prepare and lay before Parliament a report of the operations under this act for that year.

As a result of some procedural problems as to how these reports should be prepared and issued, as well as trade data verification and preparation, the tabling of the 1983 Annual Report was delayed. However many of these problems had been clarified by the time the preparation of the 1984 report had started. Therefore the release of the 1984 report overlapped with the issue of the 1983 report and this resulted in both reports being tabled at the same time.

In the normal course of events, year-end trade data is not available until the middle of the following year. Therefore the preparation of the report cannot begin until that time. It is expected that the 1985 report will be ready shortly after the trade data becomes available. Therefore the delays experienced with the 1983-1984 reports should not be repeated.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doyle, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-65, intituled: "An Act to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and other Acts in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the background to Bill C-65 was covered yesterday by Senator Doyle in his most engaging speech.

The principal provisions of the bill are twofold. The first is the setting up of a scheme for public complaints; and the second is some reform of the internal grievance and discipline procedures.

Most of what we need to know on second reading was provided to us by Senator Doyle when he gave us a history of this bill, going back, particularly, to the report of the Marin commission. What is left is a matter of the few nagging questions which appear through all these proceedings. By that, I do not mean all of the proceedings referred to by Senator Doyle, but I would particularly recommend to honourable senators the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs in 1984 when it was considering Bill C-13, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act. That bill is almost a duplicate of the present bill and, certainly, its very legitimate parent.

I specifically refer to Issue No. 6 of May 8, 1984, which dealt entirely with Bill C-13 when the witness was the former Solicitor General of Canada, the Honourable Robert Kaplan. There also appeared at that time Mr. Robert H. Simmonds, the Commissioner of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and Mr. J.M. Shoemaker, Senior Assistant, Deputy Solicitor General, Police and Security Branch. Honourable senators who are interested in the previous senatorial activity concerning this bill will find these proceedings most edifying.

The next issue is that of May 15, 1984, Issue No. 8. The witnesses at that time, from the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, were as follows: Mr. Roy Moffatt, Deputy Commissioner; Mr. Brian L. Campbell, Superintendent, Internal Affairs Branch; and Mr. Albert Gramolini, Inspector. Then there is Issue No. 12 of June 5, 1984, which dealt entirely with the subject matter of Bill C-13.

I am citing these proceedings and witnesses so that honourable senators will understand that in addition to the long history of this bill as outlined by Senator Doyle, there is a significant history of the predecessor bill in the Senate.

In Issue No. 12, the witnesses appearing from the Association of 17 Divisions Inc. were Mr. Gaétan Delisle, President; Mr. Bruno Lavoie, Vice-President; and Mr. Victor A. Carbonneau, Barrister, Solicitor.

Now Issue No. 14 dealt with Bill C-13 as well as another bill which is not relevant today. On that occasion, there appeared from the Division Staff Relations Representatives Program (RCMP): Staff Sergeant F.R. Davis, Chairman; Staff Sergeant R.H. Preston, member; and Sergeant D.G. Harrison, member.

You will be glad to know, honourable senators, that there are only two more issues to which I should like to refer. One is Issue No. 16 of June 13, which was again devoted entirely to the subject matter of Bill C-13, the predecessor to Bill C-65. The witness at that time was the Honourable Brian R.D. Smith, Q.C., Attorney General, British Columbia. He had an interesting perspective that had not been raised previously and one that you can imagine would arise from the fact that, in some of our provinces, the RCMP is responsible for the policing of the province. I recommend Mr. Smith's evidence about the extent to which the attorney general of a province has any active role in dealing with the RCMP when it is acting as the provincial police force.

The last issue to which I should like to refer is Issue No. 17 which dealt with Bill C-16, another bill, but it also dealt with the subject matter of Bill C-13. The witness at that time was Mr. A. Alan Borovoy, General Counsel, Canadian Civil Liberties Association. Mr. Borovoy was, in my opinion, a very important witness.

Honourable senators, I am not going to read through all of these proceedings, but I have underlined all the significant parts of the evidence of all of those witnesses. I would recommend that any honourable senator interested should read those sections of testimony.

I propose to tell you what seemed to me to be the essence of the doubts that remain with respect to Bill C-65 and its predecessor, Bill C-13.

As I mentioned, there are two main branches to this bill: There is the Public Complaints Commission and the reform of the force's internal discipline and grievance procedures.

I will deal, first, with the Public Complaints Commission. This has had a long history through to the Marin commission which Senator Doyle told us about yesterday. If you read all of these proceedings in the House of Commons and, particularly, those in the Senate—because the debates in the Senate received quite elaborate reference as sources of material for speakers in the other place—in essence, it seems to me that the problems left with regard to the Public Complaints Commission boil down to three or four complaints.

The first is the question of the bill's model for the Public Complaints Commission when compared with the recommendations of the Marin commission. The essential difference between them is that Judge Marin recommended a single ombudsman, whereas the bill before us and its predecessor set up a commission of 12. That point runs through the reports of the hearings. There was some concern about whether that was the most efficient method.

Honourable senators, still dealing with the first subject, the second complaint deals with the powers of the commission. This commission is much more limited than was recommended by Judge Marin. I am sure honourable senators understand that the question we are dealing with relates to complaints from the public. This is the first time the public has been in a position to have a formal structure for laying complaints against the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. This second area deals with the powers of the commission. It can make no final decision; it can only make recommendations.

Honourable senators, I notice that Senator Doyle has just returned to the chamber. I am going through the hearings and trying to isolate or focus on what is left of some lingering doubts or nagging questions concerning this legislation. The first matter I mentioned was the Public Complaints Commission and the bill model versus the Marin model. Secondly, I mentioned the limitation of the powers. What are those limitations? First, there is no final decision to be made by this commission; it can only make recommendations. Running through these proceedings there was quite a bit of doubt and reservation concerning the second problem with regard to the powers—which is, that they cannot conduct their own investigation. If any member of the public makes a complaint to the commission, the complaint is investigated by the RCMP. In other words, in essence, the defendant investigates the complaint against him. There is also the fact that the commissioner, despite the existence of this commission, still has the power to refuse or terminate an investigation of a complaint.

● (1500)

The third major branch under this heading—and I believe there are only these three, basically—is the definition of “complaint”. The problem with that is that the definition of “complaint” in the Marin commission was wider than the definition of “complaint” here. It boils down to the fact that a person can make a complaint under this legislation against an officer or other person with regard to behaviour, but he cannot make a complaint with regard to the administration of the RCMP, or whether it has sufficient force to police an area. If, for example, someone in a remote area wishes to complain that the area is not being properly policed, such a complaint does not fall under this legislation and could not go to the commission.

Therefore, for the first main branch of this bill—namely, the Public Complaints Commission—I believe there is a good deal of support. As Senator Doyle has pointed out, there has been a long history associated with this legislation. A good deal of work has gone into this bill, and it has many good features; but those three features are shown as Leitmotifs through all of the proceedings before the Senate committee that dealt with the bill's predecessor.

Now, on the second and main part of this bill—namely, the private or internal side dealing with the question of grievance procedures and discipline within the force—there is plenty of evidence of quite widespread support among members of the force for this aspect of the legislation. That, of course, should weigh heavily with us, because while I believe that we should be very particular about the provisions as they relate to complaints coming from outside, naturally, insofar as the discipline within the force is concerned, if most of the members of the force are in favour of it, then that should weigh heavily with us in supporting this part of the bill.

The only substantial—I think I can call it that—complaint about this branch of the bill came from the Association of 17 Divisions. I thought they had some rather serious reservations, which they outlined quite clearly. They were questions of interpretation, it is true, but they were questions of interpretation with important consequences, as they outlined them. Essentially they emphasized the question of suspension without pay where only a charge exists. There have been examples given of how, in their view, the power, which the commissioner has, to suspend without pay where any serious charge is made has had unfair consequences.

Therefore, honourable senators, I believe that we should support the principle of this bill on second reading. There are four or five subject matters which have a question mark, as I have outlined them from the material I have read, and I believe that quite clearly they should go before the very committee where the questions were raised. Certainly the committee should have an opportunity to update its work. It has held four meetings and has received very heterogeneous and eclectic submissions. The committee should have an opportunity to consider those matters which are the subject of question marks and which I found to be still outstanding, plus any other questions that might be raised. Therefore, I recommend that we give second reading to the bill—but, of course, if any other honourable senator wishes to speak on second reading, he may do so—and that we refer the bill to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for study and report.

Hon. Richard J. Doyle: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doyle speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doyle: Honourable senators, I apologize to the Deputy Leader of the Opposition for not being in the chamber for the first part of his presentation. I agree that we should give the bill second reading now and that we should be prepared to refer it to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for further study.

Senator Frith: Since Senator Doyle has been good enough to locate some quotations for me, perhaps he will not consider it impertinent of me to make the following comment. The honourable senator, in the course of his speech yesterday, said:

... the only thing we have in common with the gods is our infinite capacity to grind slowly.

It had occurred to me that it was not “the gods” that grind slowly; so I took the trouble to look up the quotation. I found that it came from a person who is not exactly a household name, namely, Friedrich von Logau who lived from 1604 to 1655. In a work called Retribution, he is reported to have said:

Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small.

Senator Doyle: I think the honourable senator will find that it varies according to which version of Familiar Quotations is used. There are several attributions for this. There have been several versions of it, and I would be delighted to be the author of one of them.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doyle, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-80, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof".—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask that this order stand in the name of the Honourable Senator MacEachen.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator MacEachen.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the second reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. Norbert L. Thériault: Very briefly, honourable senators, I would like to explain my position concerning Bill C-70 which, in my judgment, will have the effect of totally destroying the family allowances system as we have known it since 1943.

[English]

First, I wish to apologize to the government members in the Senate and to the Leader of the Government if I am responsible for delaying the sending of this bill to committee for study. Nevertheless, I cannot, in good conscience, let this kind of legislation go through without making my objections known.

● (1510)

Honourable senators, over the years the federal government, along with the provincial governments, in a complementary way, has established in this country what has become known as the social safety net for the poorer residents of Canada. That took a long time, and, while the great majority of social legislation that exists today at the national level was passed or enacted by the federal Liberal Party when it was the Government of Canada, nevertheless, I am convinced that many of these measures were urged upon the government by the New Democratic Party. For that reason, I believe that that political party deserves credit. I think that that has been recognized by a number of people, as it has been recognized by me.

Honourable senators, I am speaking about the principle of providing people with the means for a decent, or at least a half decent, way of life—of providing the poorer people with food, shelter, clothing and education, the necessities of life. Naturally, as a liberal thinker and as a supporter of the Liberal Party, I grew up thinking that the Conservative Party of the days when I was young or before I was born was a right wing party which did not believe in social measures. I thought that the Liberal and New Democratic parties were the opposite and believed that the state should, at times, interfere to assist those people who could not fend for themselves. Over the years, I have had to recognize that this was not necessarily true. The records are there to show that the Conservative Party of the day opposed the establishment of the family allowance because, in its thinking, the country could not afford it. Nevertheless, after 1957 when the Conservatives formed the government under the leadership of the Honourable John Diefenbaker, there were some social measures passed by that government.

I remember clearly how, during the campaign of 1956 or 1957, Mr. Diefenbaker accused the Liberal government of being niggardly because it increased the old age pension by only $6 a month; he called them the "six buck boys." And people listened to him. When Mr. Diefenbaker became the Prime Minister, he did increase the old age pensions by a larger amount, although I do not recall exactly what that figure was, and he did introduce other social measures at that time.

Naturally, the Liberals came back into office in 1962 under the leadership of Mr. Pearson. We then saw an avalanche of social measures, which almost completed the much needed welfare or social security system that is necessary in a country like ours. I recall that, in my own province in 1970, I was a member of the government. There was an election; we were defeated and the Progressive Conservative Party came into office. Because of the experience that I had during those years from 1957 to 1963, I felt that the government of the day would continue with the social measures that we had established in 1956. In fact, we had instigated what was almost a revolution in the distribution of social measures to the people of my province. I was not disappointed, because the government of 1970, under Mr. Hatfield, proceeded with further social measures. Two of my former colleagues in the legislature of New Brunswick have joined me in this chamber. They are the Honourable Senator Robertson and the Honourable Senator Simard. I must say that I was pleased that, in spite of the fact that their party had fought politically what we tried to do between 1960 and 1970, once it formed the government, it continued and improved upon some of the measures that we had begun. The people of New Brunswick, as has been pointed out by Senator McElman, recognized that and continued to re-elect that party in three or four consecutive elections.

In 1984, after a long period during which the Liberal Party had formed the Government of Canada, there arrived on the scene a politician who took this country by storm. He became the leader of the Conservative Party. He went from one end of the country to the other, saying to the people of Canada that it was time for a change—saying to the people of Canada that they did not have to worry about such change, that every bit of social legislation that had been put in place by the previous governments would be a sacred trust to him and that, not only would he continue with those programs, but he would improve upon them.

Honourable senators know that the people of Canada believed him. This is why I am speaking today. The government had only just assumed power when we started to hear rumblings. Honourable senators, in all political parties—at least, it has been my experience that this is so—there are the conservative thinkers and there are those who think more liberally. But, like the majority of Canadians, I believed that the Prime Minister was a liberal thinker. I believed him. He came from humble beginnings; he had worked his way up the ladder, and I believed that he recognized that there are people in this country who need the assistance of the government. I presume, without knowing this for a fact, that there must have been a heck of a battle in that caucus. But, to my despair, I believe that the right-wingers have won.

Honourable senators, I am concerned about that. I am concerned because there are all kinds of signs that the entire spectrum of the social life of this country is being placed in jeopardy. We know that the country has gone through a recession over the past four or five years. We know that the deficit is high—too high. We know that the government has had to restrain expenditures. As a matter of fact, that restraint began before this government took over. But the leader of the Conservative Party, who is now the Prime Minister of this country, has said to the Canadian people that although the government will cut expenditures, it will never do that on the backs of the poor, the weak and the unemployed. But that is not what has happened. I am surprised at this, and I plead with my colleagues—especially those I know on the government side of the chamber, two of whom I named earlier—people who I know have a social conscience. How can they, in good conscience, support this kind of legislation? As I have said, this is a great worry to me. We had a good example of this policy in connection with old age pensions and in connection with unemployment insurance. We have a concrete example of it in this bill, which, I presume, will be passed. At every turn, at every corner, there is a demonstration by this government that it will cut expenditures and that it will do so on the backs of those who cannot afford it. I think that that is wrong. I believe that this country can afford the kind of social legislation that we have. I believe we can afford still better social legislation. I am worried, and I think I express not only my own fear but that of all seniors in this country. Right now, the seniors in this country are wondering what will happen in the February 26 budget. They do not trust the Prime Minister any more. He gave them his word two years ago; he did not keep his word. The government tried to reduce the amount paid to old age pensioners with another piece of legislation. They did not succeed, but the threat is there, and this is important.

Now the people who are in need, especially single mothers and the poor people who need this measly little cheque of $30 per month that they receive, are wondering what will happen. They are worried not only that it will not increase, because it could very well not increase at all if the inflation rate is below 3 per cent, but they are wondering whether, in fact, the government will keep that program. I say to you, honourable senators, that if you examine the social programs of any given country, you will find that over the years those programs that have been established solely for the poor have become poorer programs. That is why universality is important and I tell you, honourable senators, that if you take a program and you fit it only to those who are really in need, what happens is that the majority of the taxpayers who, over the long haul, do not receive any benefit from that program will put pressure on governments, because governments are formed by politicians who must be elected, and, therefore, those programs will, year by year, become less and less. That is why I am so proud to have been and still to be a Liberal, because the Liberal Party saw that happening years ago. I say to you, honourable senators, that to me this philosophy of giving just a little bit to the poor is apparent throughout the operation of this government. I see it in the cuts to regional development programs.

Today, in February of 1986, and for the last year, the economy has come back. Jobs have been created, and I do not blame the government or the Prime Minister for taking credit for those improvements. When jobs are scarce and unemployment is high, governments are blamed and that is a fact of life. Not that I really believe that governments can create jobs, but that is the way it is.

However, I asked my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces to look at the situation as it exists today in New Brunswick, in Nova Scotia, in P.E.I. and in Newfoundland. The situation in those provinces today is worse than it was in 1981 and in 1982. The unemployment rates are higher and the need for social programs is greater; the need is greater for a more generous Unemployment Insurance program and for all kinds of social programs. I ask you, honourable senators, what is to happen to the Atlantic provinces?

I asked my colleagues from the Atlantic provinces on the government side to really take a look at the situation in their provinces and to look at the projections of this government. This government intends to cut again into the transfer payments to the provinces. I asked my two colleagues who were, until just recently, members of the Government of New Brunswick, where that government, regardless of its political stripe, will get the funds to continue with the social programs that exist in New Brunswick today. Where will it get the funds to try and operate the hospitals, because today in New Brunswick, hospital beds are closed because the government does not have the money to finance the hospitals and hire the staff that is required to operate those hospitals? Where will the Government of New Brunswick get the money to continue with the higher education programs, the post-secondary education programs and the training programs, because the federal government has already made clear its intention to cut back on the transfer payments? Again, it is the same philosophy that is being applied.

I presume that Ontario will get along fine. British Columbia may be all right and Alberta, we do not know. However, central Canada will get along fine. Jobs have been created there in the last two or three years, but not in the Atlantic provinces. I plead with the government of the day and with the members of this house who are members of the government to impress upon their colleagues not to detract from the situation as we know it today.

There are poor people in this country today and, honourable senators, poverty is a relative thing. The higher the standard of living, the more relative poverty becomes. In other words, you do not really need to be hungry in order to be poor. When your children go to school with no money to buy their lunch in the cafeteria or when they are not dressed like the others, they are poor and they cannot compete. This is why, in this country, we have had all these social programs and this is why I am concerned.

Honourable senators, I believe that this is wrong legislation; that it is bad legislation. It is a conscious decision by the government of the day to be concerned with budgets. I believe that governments must be concerned with budgets, but I think it was the Minister of Justice who said two or three weeks ago: "What is the sense of making all these cuts? We will not be there after the next election." Honourable senators, that is the truth and I tell you that if this government keeps on this track of withdrawing services from those who need them, and withdrawing transfer payments from those areas of the country that need those payments, and of withdrawing from the policies of attempting to create jobs in areas where jobs are needed, then they will be defeated at the next election, and they will have deserved it.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators—

[Senator Th]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Tremblay speaks now, his remarks will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, I did not intend to speak at length at this stage. I think I echo the views of all senators when I say that the sooner we adopt this bill on second reading, the sooner it will be referred to committee so as to accommodate those who have already made the request to appear, and the sooner those groups are heard, the better it will be.

However I cannot let go unnoticed some of the comments made by Senator Thériault. He told us he does not understand how people who have a modicum of social conscience would advocate provisions such as those contained in Bill C-70.

For my part, I find it hard to understand why Senator Thériault and several others who took part in this debate did not put Bill C-70 in the overall context of the government's legislative program. We said so from the outset and I say it again today: it is quite obvious that, by itself, exclusively and within a narrow scope, by proposing moderate rather than pure and simple indexation, Bill C-70 will indeed slow down the growth rate of family allowances.

The purpose of this bill becomes clear when taken in its wider context. Child benefits as a whole have to be considered if we want to have a fair idea of the results.

As a matter of fact, two days ago we adopted Bill C-84 which contains provisions concerning the child tax credit and exemptions. If we look at it from that angle, the conclusions are the same.

As evidence of this, there is what Senator Marsden said the other day. She said that she agreed completely that the tax credit should be improved.

The other day, Senator Godfrey mentioned that the child tax exemption could very well be phased out.

What do these two comments show? They underline the principle that the target group we should try to help is that of the disadvantaged, of the people with the lowest income. Future child benefit policy should therefore be directed at enriching the tax credit.

As I pointed out in my original intervention, this principle was implemented in 1979 by the previous government. I am personally convinced that this was a turning point which showed how we should proceed.

This government is following the same direction by enriching the tax credit. I do not understand why Bill C-70 should be criticized instead of being placed in the proper context, namely that the government is implementing a complete system. It is still not perfect, even with the improvements brought about by the two bills we have discussed. A lot remains to be done and it is with this in mind that we should be working.

In his speech, Senator Thériault associated the concept of universality with the comments on which I have just enlarged. Where does universality reside? It is only a myth. As concerns family allowances, pure and simple universality existed in the beginning because they were not taxable. They became taxable in 1973 at the same time as they increased from $12 to $20 a month. Well, where is universality? There is universality in the mailing of the cheques, but not in the benefits since the government takes back part of these benefits based on the income of the recipient.

What does this myth of universality mean? I do not understand it myself. The cheques will continue to be sent to everyone. There is no relationship between the amount of the cheque and its universal character, if we do maintain that there is universality at this time. In this case, universality is not based on the amount of the benefits. It is based on the mailing of a uniform cheque, which is the same for everyone. This would be complete universality if it remained the same. However, because of the later compensatory mechanism, it becomes what I would call adjusted universality. Universality no longer exists if it is adjusted. The concept of universality is always being raised during the debates. However, it does not exist.

I would like to add another comment about some observations made by Senator Thériault which I found really surprising. If I am not mistaken, he said at one point that programs aimed mostly at the disadvantaged, at the poor, would also be poor programs.

Senator Thériault: That is true.

Senator Tremblay: The formula is interesting, but it is only juggling with words. Let us look at the real problem: What are you saying actually? We should avoid targetting social policy—at the less well off.

Senator Thériault: Not exclusively.

Senator Tremblay: But there, I fail to understand. Any social policy, whatever the details, is targetted at people in need. Also, there are transfers from the haves to—

Senator Thériault: That is true.

Senator Tremblay: It is in the nature of things to use the income tax system, among other things. What should be done? If the tax is progressive, there is a transfer of wealth to the poor. You are not, for all that, going to give back to the rich what you have just taken from them in order to give to the poor. How is that possible? No system can be established on that basis.

No, I must be somewhat obtuse, but there must be something I do not grasp. Honestly, I do not see the logic in that approach.

This being said, honourable senators, I will go no further. The principle of transferring wealth by way of the income tax credit, a program that is really reaching the right target, those who are most in need, is a step in the right direction.

I will stress again that this can be changed. It is in that direction that the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has worked according to its own program. As I said in the beginning, this is where personally I feel I can propose with a clear conscience the adoption of the bill at second reading stage.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Tremblay, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF SENATE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1), I move: That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized, next week to meet during sittings of the Senate.

During the period of time when it would have to hear witnesses, the list of which is already quite long, and if the Senate is to sit next week for instance, I therefore ask that rule 76(4) be waived.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I am not mistaken, at the beginning of this session all the Senate standing committees were authorized so to meet, but I am not sure about it. In any event, you are now authorized. But I think that authority was granted to the committees individually. If I am mistaken, you have that authority in any case.

If leave is required, it has already been granted. If not, you have it already.

Senator Tremblay: Let us say if need be.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I believe authority is granted generally, to enable committees to meet once the Senate is adjourned. But when the Senate is sitting, there must be special leave from the Senate. Therefore, is leave granted?

Senator Frith: Yes, if need be.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by Senator Tremblay, notwithstanding rule 45(1), that the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology be authorized to meet next week during sittings of the Senate, and that rule 76(4) be waived in that respect.

Senator Frith: To make things clear, once the Senate is adjourned we do not need that, but when the Senate is sitting at the same time, I beg your pardon, we need it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PUBLIC PENSIONS REPORTING BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-255, to impose reporting requirements with respect to public pension plans and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

She said: Honourable senators, this week a private member's bill received House of Commons approval, the first time in 11 years that such a bill has been so blessed. Bill C-255 was introduced by Paul McCrossan, P.C., York-Scarborough, a Toronto actuary. The bill requires the government to give a regular public accounting of its financial commitments to public pensions. It requires that the Minister of Finance table triennial actuarial valuations of pension plans established under the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act. It also requires an actuarial valuation of the Canada Pension Plan every three years instead of every five years as is now the case. It also requires a detailed estimate of benefits payable under the Old Age Security Act.

Such reporting, honourable senators, has been called for by the Auditor General and a Special Parliamentary Committee on Pension Reform. The bill was introduced early this year and was referred to a legislative committee for study. The committee reported the bill to the House of Commons this week, and the bill was voted on and has the support of all parties. The McCrossan bill is regarded as a breakthrough for private members seeking to have legislation of their own making come before the House of Commons for debate and approval. The move is in keeping with the parliamentary reforms recommended by the Special Committee on Reform of the House of Commons which, last year, recommended the strengthening of the role of the private member of Parliament.

Perhaps in clear terms, this bill requires the government to file, for the first time, the estimated costs of the OAS, the Guaranteed Income Supplement and spouses' benefits. The Auditor General devoted an entire section of his most recent report expressing his concern that MPs do not have adequate information to assess the public pension programs, and calling for increased periodic disclosure of the ultimate costs of OAS and CPP programs, as provided for in this bill. The bill also ensures that government employees have full disclosure of the full and true costs of their benefits.

Bill C-255 was enthusiastically supported by both Liberal and NDP spokesmen, who referred to the expertise Mr. McCrossan could bring in ensuring that MPs receive current and adequate information about government pension commitments.

Honourable senators, if you have had the opportunity of reading Bill C-255, you will have noticed that there is an excellent explanation for each clause; however, because it is a technical bill, and because I am not sure how much we know about these matters—I confess myself that I have not studied these matters in detail—I suggest that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I understand that Senator McElman has a few comments to add, but certainly if that is the wish of the Senate, I would be prepared to move that it be referred to that committee.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Robertson for her concise explanation of the bill. It is a rather extraordinary circumstance by which it reaches us. As Senator Robertson explained, Mr. McCrossan, a private member, brought this before the other house, and he does have a great deal of expertise in this field.

The bill, as originally presented for first reading, received a very careful study in committee of the other place, and it was extensively amended, but not in principle; it was a matter of the bureaucrats advising how it could be put in better form for its administration.

Senator Robertson is quite right when she said that the bill did receive the enthusiastic support of all three parties in the House of Commons. In fact, debate on third reading took place not only in one day, but in a rather short period of time.

This bill, unquestionably, will improve the reporting procedures to Parliament with respect to pension programs that Parliament has put in place, and it will be to the benefit of Parliament to have a more thorough financial accounting, on an actuarial basis, of how these programs are being carried forward. So, the effects of the bill can be only beneficial.

I subscribe to the proposal made by Senator Robertson that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, for a number of reasons. First of all, I hold to the view that most bills, unless they are bills of absolute simplicity, should be referred to committees. I do not think consideration by that committee will take too long, but the bill should be referred to that committee.

That is all one need say without repeating the words of the sponsor of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

LITHUANIA

SIXTY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF PROCLAMATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, for many years it has been the custom of Senator Paul Yuzyk and Senator Stanley Haidasz to call to the attention of the Senate an important anniversary celebrated by Lithuanians living in Canada.

Honourable senators, February 16, 1986, marked the sixty-eighth anniversary of the proclamation of the Restoration of Independence of Lithuania. The establishment of the Lithuanian Democratic Republic is widely celebrated by Lithuanians in Canada, the United States, Australia and many European countries.

After a remarkable period of statehood and empire established by King Mindaugas in 1251, Lithuania was subjugated by the Russian tsarist regime from 1795 until 1915. But on February 16, 1918, at the end of World War I, by the will of her people, Lithuania again became a free country with an advanced democratic constitution.

This freedom, however, came to an abrupt end when the Soviet Union, after the signing of the Hitler-Stalin Non-Aggression Pact in 1939, occupied the three Baltic states, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, in June 1940 and forcibly incorporated them into the U.S.S.R. as "Soviet republics."

We must remember that the western powers and Canada promptly gave de jure recognition to the Baltic states when they regained their freedom, and have never at any time agreed to the de facto occupation of Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia by force in June 1940.

On the occasion of the sixty-eighth anniversary of Lithuanian independence, we pay tribute to Canadian citizens of Lithuanian origin. Their contributions to our country are many and significant. By preserving their cultural heritage, they are enriching the treasure-house of the Canadian multicultural heritage. Above all, their wholehearted dedication to the principles of freedom, democracy and human rights makes Canadians more conscious of these highest principles of humanity and of the fact that we, each of us, can do more for our great country and for humanity in every respect.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PHILIPPINES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—STATUS OF CANADA-PHILIPPINES RELATIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which relates to the Philippines, to the situation in that country at the present time and to the procedures and methods which were followed during the recent election. I ask him whether the relationship between the Government of Canada and the irregularly and unduly elected government of the Philippines has changed in any way since February 7.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to tell my honourable friend that I am not aware that any formal change has been announced to date. I do not think there has been any such change, but I can tell my honourable friend that the situation is under review in case such a change should be indicated.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I believe it fair to say that President Reagan has changed his official position in light of the process used in the elections in the Philippines. Indeed, he has questioned the legitimacy of that election. Does the Government of Canada accept it as having been an honest election?

Senator Roblin: I think it fair to say that the United States has a special relationship with the Philippines, while Canada does not; ours is quite a different situation. I, too, have noted Mr. Reagan's apparent change of mind. I am sure that that will be taken into account when we consider our own policy in the matter.

Senator Graham: In view of the fact that President Reagan has sent a special ambassador, Mr. Habib, to the Philippines to interview all parties concerned, I ask the Leader of the Government whether the Government of the United States has been in touch with the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the appropriate authorities in Canada in relation to Mr. Habib's visit to the Philippines and as to what his terms of reference are.

Senator Roblin: It may well be that in the course of normal diplomatic interchange the Government of Canada was informed of the intention of the United States with respect to their special emissary, but I think that that is a matter domestic to their own politics.

Senator Graham: Could the Leader of the Government tell us whether there is any direct government-to-government aid from Canada to the Philippines and, if so, whether the Government of Canada is considering the suspension of that aid? In addition, could he indicate whether there is non-government aid and, if so, whether the Government of Canada is considering maintaining or even enhancing non-government aid to the Philippines?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am not aware of Canadian aid to the Philippines, but the existence of such aid is entirely possible. I will make inquiries to see whether that is the case. I think that we would be reluctant to interfere in the affairs of non-government organizations.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I have one final supplementary question. It is some days since the election in the Philippines and we have heard pronouncements from many leaders in the world since that time. In view of the widespread interest of Canadians, particularly those in the Philippine community and all those who share concern for the democratic process and for free and fair elections, I wonder when we might expect some kind of formal statement from the Government of Canada with respect to the Philippines situation.

Senator Roblin: I share my honourable friend's concern about the legitimacy of the election in the Philippines. He has travelled there, he has seen what happened and he has brought back a very negative report on what he saw. That, of course, is an important factor which we will take into account. We want to do whatever we can to encourage the proper conduct of elections anywhere in the world, but we recognize the limitations both of our power and of what may be properly expected of a country in our position. However, my honourable friend has raised a good point and I will do my best to give him an answer.

Senator Graham: Honourable senators, I just wonder whether the Leader of the Government could give us some indication of when we could anticipate a formal statement from the Government of Canada with respect to the situation in the Philippines.

Senator Roblin: My friend has simply repeated his previous question, so the same answer applies.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

FAMINE RELIEF—REPORTED BREACH OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask the Leader of the Government some questions with respect to the francophone summit which is currently taking place in France.

A number of newspaper reports claim that the agreement reached between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec was breached by the intervention made yesterday by Premier Bourassa when he called for a substantial plan to relieve food shortages in Third World countries. I wonder whether it is the view of the government that the agreement between the Government of Canada and the Province of Quebec with respect to conduct at international meetings such as this has been breached in any way.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my answer is that it is the feeling of the government that no breach has occurred. There has been a conference in Paris within the last little while at which the ministers responded to questions by the press in respect of this incident, and the quotations that have been furnished me with regard to the statements made there include the following:

There is absolutely no problem between Canada and Quebec. There has been total consultation. The spirit of the entente is respected.

I think that deals with my honourable friend's question.

Senator MacEachen: I did not catch who made that comment.

Senator Roblin: The press conference was presided over by the Minister of State for External Affairs and the Secretary of State.

Senator MacEachen: Mr. Clark?

Senator Roblin: No, Mr. Benoît Bouchard.

Senator MacEachen: I will follow that up by asking the Leader of the Government whether he will consider the words of the agreement between Quebec and Canada which, in one paragraph, reads as follows:

On questions regarding the world political situation the Premier of Quebec will be present as an interested observer. On questions regarding the world economic situation the Premier of Quebec will be able, following consultation and with the agreement of the Prime Minister of Canada, on a case-by-case basis to intervene on matters of concern to Quebec.

I presume that the intervention made by Premier Bourassa was under the heading "Questions Relating to the World Economic Situation". I therefore ask the Leader of the Government whether Premier Bourassa's proposal for a substantial plan to relieve food shortages in Third World countries was issued as a result of consultation with and with the agreement of the Prime Minister of Canada?

Senator Roblin: I am informed that it did take place after consultation with and with the agreement of the Prime Minister, who himself has spoken in similar terms at the conference on the same subject.

Senator MacEachen: I am not aware that the Prime Minister has made a proposal to relieve the food shortages of African countries in the precise terms which Premier Bourassa has put forward; but the Leader of the Government states that the proposal made by Mr. Bourassa has the consent and agreement of the Government of Canada. Do we now take it for granted that the Government of Canada is prepared, having supported this substantial proposal, to make financial commitments in order to implement this plan?

Senator Roblin: I must first say that the Prime Minister has spoken on the same general topic. His exact words are not available to me, so I cannot quote them precisely. But I can tell my honourable friend that in the past year the Government of Canada has contributed generously, as indeed have the people of Canada—they have contributed very generously—toward famine relief in Africa in particular, and no doubt in other places also. It would not surprise me in the slightest if some new initiatives were in the offing, but I cannot give any details at the moment.

STATUS OF PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): May I ask another question? Does Mr. Hatfield, the Premier of New Brunswick, occupy precisely the same status at the francophone summit as Mr. Bourassa?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall have to take that question as notice.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. He will know that I have been asking questions for a number of days concerning what action, if any, the government intends to take as a result of the very seriously deteriorating oil prices in the international market and subsequently in Canada.

To date the Leader of the Government has given the fairly consistent reply that the government is watching the situation and, as yet, it is not prepared to make any statement about what it is contemplating to cope with the situation.

The reason I am asking this question today—and I hope that the leader has a reply in his delayed answers to questions—is because we are continuously receiving word from the oil industry that one company after the other is putting all its exploration and development plans and budgets in a holding position. The government and these companies seem to believe or seem to be hoping that it will be a temporary situation.

[Senator MacEachen.]

However, some of the OPEC oil ministers who are planning a meeting for mid-March—I believe, March 16—have indicated that at the March meeting they intend to discuss further increases in production in OPEC countries as well as in their total world-market share. With the glut that is on the market now and that indication from the OPEC ministers, it would lead any reasonable person to believe that this is not a temporary situation. Indeed, it will probably get worse before it gets better, notwithstanding the fact that the price is already down to slightly over $15 per barrel.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government would be a little helpful today and indicate what the government has in mind to deal with this very serious, deteriorating, economic situation.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is no question in my mind that that it is a very serious problem, and I share my honourable friend's view that we do not really see the shape of the future very clearly in this matter. We cannot really tell for how long these pressures of oversupply will persist and we cannot really tell how far the various actors on the stage will carry their policies. We will just have to wait and see. I am also satisfied that there is enormous pressure on the oil industry in Canada, because many of the companies will have to reconsider their investment programs and their development programs in light of circumstances as they develop. It does not surprise me in the slightest that many of their projects have been placed on hold. I think we must anticipate this action.

However, with respect to what my honourable friend wants me to say, I do not think that I can say it. I believe that he wants me to say that the government intends to intervene in the oil market in Canada to do something that will alter the situation. Well, it may be that that will happen, but I do not believe it will happen in the near future. We have seen the results on a previous occasion of massive government intervention in the oil market, and those results were far from satisfactory. The people of Canada made their views on that matter known very well indeed. So I would be very reluctant to contemplate further government intervention in the marketplace unless the circumstances are considerably more damaging than they are today.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. If the government leader is pinning his hopes on the belief that things are not sufficiently damaging to date, I want to say that the situation is sufficiently damaging, considering that from about three months ago to date there has been about a 40 per cent decline in the gross revenues of the industry. Certainly, it has been sufficient to shut down all the exploration and development plans in the conventional areas of western Canada as well as any ongoing exploration and development in the frontier areas such as the Beaufort Sea, off the east coast or wherever. If these events are not serious enough to cause the government to look at the situation, I am sure that I do not know what it would take. I am not sure that the Leader of the Government has prognosticated correctly when he says I am asking him to say that the government is going to intervene. Surely, however, when a government is governing a country, and when it sees a sector being damaged as severely as this one, it is up to that government to take its responsibility seriously and at least indicate that it is cognisant of the problem and to put forth some plans for the rules and regulations under which that sector of the economy will be handled. To date, the government has given no indication at all that it is doing that, other than holding a watching brief, whatever that means.

Senator Roblin: I would not encourage my honourable friend to think that I intend to make any further statement on that matter in the near future. After all, we are in a free enterprise economy and, in days gone by, the oil industry has proved itself well able to cope with the ups and the downs, if we just leave the industry alone. If we had left it alone on the ups, it might have been better able to deal with the downs than it is now, and I do not see any reason why we should expect that government intervention in the marketplace, under present circumstances, would be a sound policy for the nation.

Senator Olson: I take it, then, that I can advise the people concerned in Calgary and in other places, too, that the government does not intend to take any action, notwithstanding the seriousness of the situation and, indeed, that there is the prospect that the government will take no action even though the situation is going to get much worse.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can give any advice that he sees fit to give, but it certainly will not necessarily reflect the policy of the government. I can tell my honourable friend that up to the present time, although this may change, both the industry and the Alberta government have indicated that they are not pressing, at this moment, for government intervention in the oil economy. They have been bitten once and they are twice shy.

Senator Olson: It is my job as a senator from that region to attempt to ascertain, so far as that is possible—and I see it is very difficult—what the government's attitude and position is to be and then to convey that to the people who have made inquiries. If the summary of the situation that I made a moment ago is inaccurate, perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate would tell me what is the response of the government to the situation.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend need not worry himself about conveying the government's views to his constituents. He can convey his own views as much as he pleases, but the government is well able to say what it will do when it is able to make a statement.

Senator Olson: Except that it is not doing that.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend, in his usual patient fashion, must be content until I am able to give him some further information.

LABOUR

PROSPECTIVE CANADA-UNITED STATES FREE TRADE AGREEMENT—POSSIBLE EFFECTS ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and it concerns a statement by the Honourable Minister of Labour, Mr. McKnight, as reported in the Toronto Star on February 14. In that publication, we are told that the minister stated:

Workers should brace themselves for inevitable layoffs and job changes caused by a free trade pact with the United States . . .

We are also told that the Minister of Labour said he had no idea how many workers could have their jobs changed or eliminated by the free trade drive.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether studies have been made or are being made with the aid of modern techniques, such as input-output models, to take some measures in advance to alleviate the danger of unemployment for people who will be displaced by a free trade agreement with the United States.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend, the Minister of Labour, said a good deal more than that which has been credited to him by my honourable friend in his comment. In fact, he also pointed out that we have seen a continuing change in the status of jobs, of job creation and the ability to hold jobs because the economy is in a rapidly changing and volatile situation. The fact that we have reduced our tariffs over the life of the present GATT to the extent that we have, with its effect on job availability, job training and transfers, indicates that the Canadian economy is pretty good at making those adjustments. Therefore it gives me some confidence to think that if the free trade measures come about, the Canadian economy will prove itself to be competent to deal with those adjustments as well.

However, the government does not intend to leave it at that. We have made it perfectly clear that we intend to make sure, to the extent that governments can, that there is retraining and proper transitional periods and other appropriate adjustments so that those people who are affected have a reasonable chance of finding their feet again. My honourable friend is, no doubt, aware that there is a committee of labour and management that is working now to develop policies to do that very thing.

Senator Gigantès: I have a supplementary question. "Training for which jobs" is the government document on training and employment which has been referred for study to the subcommittee I have the honour of chairing. Making predictions about jobs in the past has been a fairly difficult thing to do, but what the minister is saying here is that "workers should brace themselves for inevitable layoffs and job changes caused by a free trade pact." Does the minister know that there will be such layoffs and job changes? If so, what are they, and could we be let into the secret and could the public be let into the secret?

Senator Roblin: When I consider the job layoffs and changes which have taken place in the last three or four years where there has been a dramatic dislocation in the employment of people in Canada, due to the economic circumstances they have had to bear, and when I consider the gratifying results that have been achieved in the last little while—over half a million new jobs have become available to the people of Canada—I think I can give my honourable friend some reason to believe that we will be able to cope with these things satisfactorily. I certainly have no intention of attempting during this Question Period to deal with the rest of his question, which is a matter of detail that is not known to me but is certainly under study by the private sector union and management committee that I have referred to.

Senator Gigantès: Will the honourable Leader of the Government do us the favour of looking into this issue and perhaps give us some information? Before he answers that question, may I say I am also pleased to have him refer to the creation of jobs as part of the record of the government, which the Prime Minister says is at a record rate. I would like to point out that the 17-month period to which the Prime Minister refers, from the beginning of September 1984 until the middle or end of January 1986, is not a record period; 579,000 jobs said the Prime Minister. But 597,000 jobs were created from August 1978 to January 1980—597,000! The percentage increase—that is the number of jobs created, divided by the labour force at the end of the period—under Mr. Mulroney's changes was 4.5 per cent. In the previous period it was 5.6 per cent. Perhaps the Conservatives would have done better to have kept Mr. Clark, because Mr. Clark's participation in that was better than Mr. Mulroney's. Mr. Mulroney has been producing 34,000-odd jobs per month on average, whereas Mr. Clark produced more and the Liberals produced still more—36,125.

So these little records are not really significant. What we want to know is what planning the government is doing and what studying the government is doing so as to be prepared for any further dislocations and to make the lot of the people easier. I would appreciate it if the Leader of the Government would inform us when he has some details.

Senator Roblin: When one considers the depth of the loss of employment in the period we were discussing, some 5 per cent actual loss of jobs, one recognizes the magnitude of the problem we have ahead of us. We are going to do our best to produce even better results for the people of Canada.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I just wanted to report that I have returned from a colossal blizzard in western Canada, which in the case of southwestern Alberta, this weekend, was great for the farmers. However, it did nothing to cool the fire in the ranks of the sugar-beet farmers of southern Alberta who have seen yet another deadline pass without an announcement from the government on a national sugar sweetener policy or, indeed, on their stabilization payment for 1983.

● (1430)

The attitude in that part of the country has hardened considerably since we had an emergency debate in the Senate a couple of weeks ago. It has hardened to the point of calling for the resignation of the Minister of Agriculture, and also to the point of planning a large demonstration on Parliament Hill on or about March 3.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could give us any indication of the timing of any possible announcement that might avert the kind of demonstration that I think makes a great many of us uneasy.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is a gratuitous exercise to predict when cabinet is finally going to deal with a matter, as those who have served in cabinets would agree. I am a little reluctant to accept my honourable friend's invitation to give a date.

I can tell the honourable senator, though, that I have every expectation that any demonstration on or about March 3 would be unnecessary.

Hon. H. A. Olson: What is your definition of "expectation"?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can suit himself in defining that. I have said that my expectation is that it would not be necessary to hold a demonstration on Parliament Hill on or about March 3.

Senator Phillips: Read Charles Dickens!

HEALTH

COMMUNICABLE DISEASES—CANADA'S PARTICIPATION IN WORLD IMMUNIZATION PROGRAM

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, a press release I received today conveyed some very good news. However, that press release also contains alarming facts. According to UNICEF, in 1985 measles alone killed two million children, tetanus killed one million children, and whooping cough was the cause of death of more than half a million babies. Polio, diphtheria and tuberculosis continue to take their toll among children, and our Prime Minister, at that great summit conference, made an announcement that Canada would contribute $10 million to the immunization program for countries that are members of the Francophonie.

I wonder when we can expect a similar announcement of support of such a program for member countries of the British Commonwealth of Nations so that more of the world's children can be saved from these dreadful diseases.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think a program with respect to the anglophone sections of the Commonwealth is already in force. One of the things I did during my recent visit to South Africa was attend in the remote rural part of one of the countries a health station that was built by Canadians. That health station serves the people of that area with great effectiveness. To form some idea of the illnesses afflicting those peoples, I examined the number of people—mostly children—who attended at that health station for vaccinations and other kinds of health services. I found it a satisfactory experience to know Canada had taken that initiative.

That is only one example of what is being done on a fairly broad scale, certainly in the country I visited. I think there are 40 other health stations scattered across that country.

Senator Bonnell: I agree with such a program, but I think there should be more work done in that regard. I thought this was the first step in a major program to save all of the children of Africa, regardless of their language.

Senator Roblin: I cannot share my honourable colleague's optimism that Canada can cure the diseases of all the children of Africa; we can only make a small contribution when one considers the magnitude of the problem, but that does not prevent us from doing the best we can.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, yesterday the Minister of Agriculture for the province of Prince Edward Island made an announcement of provincial government assistance to the potato growers of that province who are going through a difficult financial period. Agriculture in that province is in a crisis situation. The minister announced that $3 million would be made available to assist the potato growers of that province.

Senator Phillips: It was $6 million.

Senator Bonnell: Senator Phillips says it is $6 million. That's even better.

The minister also said he is going to pay $3 a hundred-weight, or 3 cents a pound, for the potatoes, and that they will be buried in the ground or will be fed to the cattle, or something will be done to get them off the market.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me what the Government of Canada and the Minister of Agriculture are going to do to assist those farmers, and what the Government of Canada is going to do in participating with not only Prince Edward Island but also New Brunswick and other provinces involved in the potato growing industry?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I know that the subject of potatoes has concerned the Minister of Agriculture for some time, but I am not aware of the situation my honourable friend speaks of. I shall have to take notice of the question.

Senator Bonnell: When the Leader of the Government is looking into that question, perhaps he will be able to tell us soon what assistance or what share of support the federal government might give to the potato growing industry.

Senator Roblin: I give my honourable colleague the same answer I gave previously.

TRANSPORT

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT FERRY—DELAY IN COMMENCEMENT OF 1986 SEASON

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, when I travelled our great eastern part of the country—Senator Fairbairn went west, I went east—I noticed a newspaper article stating that the Northumberland ferry from Prince Edward Island to Nova Scotia will not start until May 1 this year. Generally, that service starts on April 1, or as soon as the ice disappears. This year, for some reason or other, it has been announced that that service will not start before May 1. That ferry service has proven to be safer than train travel and airplane travel; no life has been lost yet.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could ask the Minister of Transport to commence that service on April 1 rather than May 1, because at the latter date it will be almost time to terminate service because autumn will be upon us!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am surprised to learn that May 1 heralds the coming of autumn in the Northumberland Strait district, but if that is the case, I will certainly ask my colleague, the Minister of Transport, what he is going to do about it.

Senator Bonnell: Could the leader approach the Minister of Transport to ask him to have that service commenced on April 1, as has been the case in previous years? Sometimes in that part of the country we have a bad year, with 11 months of winter and one month of summer.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to tell my colleague, the Minister of State (Tourism), what the honourable senator has just said, because he is trying to persuade a great many Americans that that is the place to go all summer long, and I support his views. I think my friend is too pessimistic, by far.

But, he has asked me if I can ask the Minister of Transport to start this service on April 1 rather than May 1, and I will certainly be glad to do that.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS—UNIVERSALITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In an article in the Montreal Gazette of 11 February, I was surprised to see the following statement:

Prime Minister Brian Mulroney has also recently hinted that the government may look again at whether to pay money through various social programs to everyone, regardless of need.

Are we to expect from that statement, apparently made by the Prime Minister, that we will have a full-scale debate on universality?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not make myself responsible for newspaper reports.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE MANUFACTURE AND EXPORT OF ARMAMENTS BY WEST GERMAN COMPANY FROM PROPOSED CANADIAN FACTORY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question with respect to a report that a West German arms manufacturer has applied to the Canadian authorities for a five-year export licence for the sale of military equipment to the Middle East from a location in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not personally familiar with the application. However, I have reason to believe that such an application has been made and is being considered. What the answer will be remains uncertain at the moment.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether the West German firm, which applied for the licence for the export of arms from a location in Canada, was indifferent as to where that plant would be located, or did that firm specify, as it is inferred, a location in Nova Scotia.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I will have to find out about that.

Senator MacEachen: Might I also ask whether this application arose spontaneously from the West German firm itself or whether it was stimulated in some way by the Government of Canada?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot make myself responsible for the motives of the firm in making the application; that is their business.

Senator MacEachen: I understand that, honourable senators, but I think there is a point in terms of whether the Government of Canada peddled, in West Germany, a location for an arms plant in Canada. That is what I want to know. Did the stimulus for that application come from the Canadian government or from the West German firm?

Senator Roblin: I cannot answer that question, honourable senators, but I would be surprised if the government were not consulting with a number of firms with respect to locating in the Cape Breton area because of the special circumstances there. Whether that amounts to peddling is something which is, no doubt, a matter of opinion.

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps the word "peddling" is distasteful to the Leader of the Government, but I want to know whether it was the Government of Canada which went to the Thyssen firm asking whether it would consider coming to Cape Breton. Did Mr. Stevens or his officials ask, in effect, whether Thyssen would consider coming to Cape Breton to build an arms plant because of so-called tax incentives, in return for which we would consider giving them an export licence? I think it is important that we know where this proposal originated.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: I will be glad to make further inquiries, but I would like to know whether I can count on my honourable friend's support for some of these measures.

Senator MacEachen: There is no question about my support for jobs in Cape Breton, but before I throw my support behind this proposal, I would like to know more of the facts. I want to ask whether this matter has been considered by the Government of Canada. Is it before the cabinet? If so, has a decision been reached? Is there any idea when a decision can be taken on this matter?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has encouraged me to think that perhaps there are some projects in that area that he would be glad to support. If so, I will call upon him to demonstrate his interest.

With respect to his question about where the matter stands in the government machinery, I can only say that at the present time it is before the department concerned. It has not yet advanced beyond that point.

Senator MacEachen: I ask the question because the Deputy Prime Minister is reported to have said that the matter was considered by the cabinet. I take it from what the Leader of the Government has said that it has not been considered by the cabinet, but that it is still being dealt with in the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Further to that, however, I understood that a decision with respect to the issuing of export licences is a decision taken, in the main, by the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I want to know whether he is considering this question and seeking advice from Mr. Stevens, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion.

Senator Roblin: I think the answer to that question is yes.

Senator MacEachen: Can the Leader of the Government throw any light on what is alleged to be a fact—and perhaps he could tell me it is not a fact—that is, that the West German government is seeking to do in Canada what it would be unable to do in Germany under its own law?

Senator Roblin: I, too, have read that report. I have no information on the policy of the German government in that respect. I point out, however, that, as far as I know, the company concerned is not an emanation of the German government but is a private-sector corporation. I am not aware of the relationship between that firm and the German government.

Senator MacEachen: I am not inferring that it is not a public-sector firm. What I want to clarify is whether that firm, which has plants operating in Germany, could not make such exportations under existing German law, and whether it is for the purpose of securing relief from the application of German law that the application is being made to locate in Canada. I really think that this is an important question, not only for Nova Scotia, because of the possible jobs involved, but also because of other considerations, including our foreign policy. Therefore, I want to get some information so that we can see whether we can make some helpful comments to the government at some point.

Senator Roblin: That is a temptation I cannot resist. I will give to my honourable friend as much information as I can and I will await his helpful comments.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to two oral questions.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

U.S. WEAPONS TESTING IN CANADA—CRUISE MISSILE MISHAP

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first is in response to questions asked in the Senate on January 23 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen and the Honourable Senator Fairbairn regarding Canada-United States Relations—U.S. Weapons Testing in Canada—Cruise Missile Mishap.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Leader of the Government read that answer, please?

Senator Roblin: Yes, I will.

As previously reported, during the January 22 test flight of the cruise missile the terminal manoeuvre was not completed successfully and the cruise missile went down within the area of the Cold Lake Air Weapons Range.

The missile was located and successfully recovered.

An Accident Investigation Team has been set up to determine the reason why the missile did not complete its terminal manoeuvre and why its parachute did not deploy.

The Accident Investigation Team has not yet released its findings.

With regard to future testing, if the problem is readily resolvable, the test program will continue on schedule.

If there is delay in identifying the cause of the malfunction, the test program will be delayed.

In that case, the test program will only be resumed when the problem has been rectified and the missile can resume operations in accordance with its prescribed safety standard.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

FITNESS OF MEAT FOR CANADIAN CONSUMPTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the second delayed answer is in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 5 last by the Honourable Senator Sinclair regarding Health and Welfare—Fitness of Meat for Canadian Consumption.

This is a very lengthy answer. It has attached to it a chart, and we will see that Senator Sinclair receives a copy of it.

(The answer follows:)

Tuberculosis is a disease that can become widespread throughout an animal's body, in which case the carcass of the animal should be completely condemned. In the majority of instances, however, the body is able to combat the disease, and it remains localized in the system in which infection entered. The two systems involved are the respiratory and digestive systems. Where the disease remains localized, it is normal practice for the veterinarian conducting inspection of the carcass to condemn the affected system and to pass the remainder of the carcass as fit for human food. This procedure has been followed since the start of federal meat inspection in Canada in 1907.

Furthermore, the procedure used in Canada is that recommended under the Codex Alimentarius Commission, under the Recommended International Codes of Hygienic Practice for fresh meat for Ante Mortem and Post Mortem Inspection. The Codex Commission is a joint World Health Organization and Food and Agriculture Organization standard setting body under the umbrella of the United Nations. The fact that no instance of a human catching the disease from eating meat is proof that this procedure is correct.

Laboratory tests have been completed on five of the six carcasses, and are 85 per cent complete on the sixth. To this point in the testing, no lesions were found to be caused by tuberculosis.

In this instance, there was no outside pressure from any source involved in the decision to pass the meat for human consumption. The Minister is convinced that the veterinarian followed the correct procedures and that the meat was, and is, safe. The comments in the newspaper article of two veterinarians outside of the department are not too relevant. The article states that neither claimed to be an expert. A more expert opinion was given by the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association which endorsed the decision made at the time of inspection.

The reason the meat could not be exported was on account of an international agreement not to do so. Between our trading partners, minor differences exist in how localized lesions are to be dealt with at the time of inspection. To maintain mutual recognition of meat inspection systems, it was therefore agreed that there would be no trade in such carcasses.

In regards to the reports, I am tabling them today, with a copy for the honourable Senator.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL—NOTICE OF MOTION

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, notwithstanding rule 43(1), I would ask permission of the Senate to give notice of a motion today, without having submitted the written text, so that I can speak to it tomorrow. I have learned that on Thursday I have to go out of town for committee duties.

Honourable senators, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, February 19, 1986, I will move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, and the document entitled: "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", or any subcommittee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.

I shall give the reasons why this should be so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted respecting rule 43(1)? And is the Notice of Motion agreed to?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to be quite clear as to what we have done. We have given the honourable senator leave to introduce his notice of motion today and to speak to the motion tomorrow.

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Senator Roblin: Thank you.

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the third reading of Bill C-74, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, the bill now before the Senate is one to which many honourable senators should pay close attention. I refer especially to senators from both the growing western provinces—I mean particularly Alberta and British Columbia—and some of the eastern provinces, particularly Newfoundland and Nova Scotia—and to that I would add Manitoba and Saskatchewan; in other words, two rapidly growing provinces and four smaller provinces which are not growing as rapidly.

One of the main functions of the Senate is to protect the interests of the provinces. This bill certainly affects the interests of British Columbia and Alberta, as well as those of four smaller provinces.

I suggest to honourable senators that the government is being unfair to British Columbia and Alberta by proceeding with this bill to change the method by which constituencies for the election of members of the House of Commons are assigned among the several provinces.

In 1974 Parliament enacted a law governing the redistribution of constituencies. Under that law, following the decennial census of 1981, British Columbia was to have gained five seats, and Alberta was to have gained six seats. That redistribution was well under way by the time Parliament was dissolved for the election of 1984. The redistribution under the existing law could have been completed in a relatively short period after the election.

For its own reasons the government decided not to resume the redistribution under the 1974 law. For its own reasons it decided to make a new beginning, to bring in a new method by which seats would be assigned to the several provinces.

However, it did not move immediately on this matter. It was not until September 16, 1985—over a year after the election—that Bill C-74 was introduced for first reading in the House of Commons.

I assume that the bill will become law fairly soon; but we have the testimony of the Chief Electoral Officer of Canada that it requires upward of two and a half years before a redistribution can be carried to the point at which it can be used for a general election.

I am not privy to the Prime Minister's intentions; nor indeed am I privy to the intentions of the backbenchers on the government side of the House of Commons. But it is conceivable that the Prime Minister or the backbenchers on the government side in the House of Commons will want an election in 1987. If an election were to take place in 1987 for any reason, the constituencies would be those drawn on the basis of the decennial census of 1971. That would be so unfair to British Columbia and Alberta that we would have to say that the government, by waiting until September 16, 1985, to bring in this bill was playing fast and loose with the representation due to those two rapidly growing provinces in western Canada. They have placed in jeopardy those new seats that British Columbia and Alberta would have been assigned under the existing law.

That is one reason why I believe that this whole venture is bad. I will not say any more on that, because I know that other senators feel strongly on that point and may wish to speak on it.

However, I wish to say a good deal more about another point. I believe the government is being unfair to certain small provinces, specifically Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba. I hope to be able to convince honourable senators that I am not making a mistake when I say that in this bill the government is being unfair to those provinces.

I will direct honourable senators' attention specifically to the application of the method, now being put before Parliament by the government, to the outcome of the 1981 census. There we have hard figures. There we are not dealing with demographic projections made by Statistics Canada.

Since 1867 the basic rule by which constituencies in the House of Commons are assigned to the several provinces has been that of representation by population. But that rule has always been moderated to give somewhat better than average treatment to the smaller provinces. Sometimes better than average has been a good deal better than average. We have only to think of the situation of Prince Edward Island to see how far Parliament has been prepared to go to recognize the principle that better than average treatment is needed by the smaller provinces.

Under the 1974 law, the size of the House of Commons would have increased from 282 members—its present size—to 310 members. British Columbia would have gone up from 28 members to 33 members. Alberta, another growing province, would have gone up from 21 members to 27 members. Saskatchewan, a small province, would have had 14 members, as it now has. Manitoba would have increased from 14 members to 15 members. Ontario would have gone up from 95 members to 105 members. Quebec would have gone up from 75 members to 79 members. New Brunswick would have remained as it now is with 10. Prince Edward Island would have remained where it now is, with 4 members. Nova Scotia would have gained a member; its representation would have increased from 11 members to 12 members. And Newfoundland would have increased from 7 members to 8 members.

What we see in this bill is that it will provide no increase for any small province in the foreseeable future. There are to be new seats—additional seats. But the government is following the rule that “to him who hath shall be given,” and in the redistribution based on the census of 1981, the new seats after 1991, and those after 2001, on the basis of the demographic projections, are all to go to the larger provinces with the exception of Quebec. Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia—the growing provinces—are to get seats. That is fair enough. The present method would have given them additional seats. But the other wing is being completely ignored. The principle that the small provinces should be given better than average treatment has been forgotten. That is why the bill is eminently unfair. For the foreseeable future, there are to be no new seats for Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland or New Brunswick. Under the law enacted in 1974, New Brunswick would have been eligible for an additional seat after 1991. Saskatchewan would have been eligible for two more after 1991.

● (1500)

Focusing particularly on Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, I should like to make two points. The first is that the share of the House for these two provinces will decline. It is not easy to grasp this projection because we are dealing with two different totals. We are dealing with a share of a House of a certain size according to existing law and a share of the House that will be produced if Bill C-74 becomes law. However, it is a fact, as shown by the calculations put before the Senate by the sponsor of the bill, that the tendency of the new method will be to reduce increasingly the share in the House of Commons assigned to Newfoundland and Nova Scotia.

I raised this point with the minister responsible for the bill, the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn, President of the Privy Council. I was unable to impress upon him the importance of this change. We are dealing here with percentage points and we have to remember that we are talking about only two or three members. These two or three members, looked upon from the point of view of Ontario or from the point of view of an Ottawa bureaucrat do not amount to very much. However, approaching this matter conservatively, that is taking the lower of these two figures, the one member that Nova Scotia loses amounts to just a little less than 10 per cent of our total representation. In the case of Newfoundland, another member amounts to considerably more than 10 per cent—about 13 or 14 per cent. In other words, in the case of these small provinces, we are talking about a very appreciable decline in share of the House. It is comparable to the kind of decline that would take place if Ontario were to lose ten members. We can well imagine—I say to senators from the smaller provinces—the outcry such a situation would cause in national newspapers and in other places. It would be said, “George Brown, wouldst that thou wert living this hour. Ontario has need of thee.”

My second point relates to the fact that the populations of the constituencies of the provinces of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba will increase in size. This is particularly important when dealing with provinces such as Newfoundland and Nova Scotia because, as any senator who has had experience in government will know, sea coast provinces tend to be very demanding in terms of what they want from their members of Parliament. There is always public business where you have wharves, breakwaters, navigation aids and the like.

Senator MacEachen: And the fisheries.

Senator Stewart: The fisheries create special demands upon members of Parliament, demands that a bureaucrat in Ottawa would not be likely to take into account when working out these statistics on a computer. It is shocking to think that according to the figures provided by the government, in every one of the three redistribution intervals—those based on the 1981 census, on the 1991 census and on the 2001 census—the constituencies which are projected to increase the most in population are found in Newfoundland. The constituencies in Nova Scotia will increase at the second highest rate. In fact, the government shows on its own projections that after the redistribution of 2001 the populations of the constituencies of Newfoundland will be the second largest in Canada. We are talking about Newfoundland, which, next to Prince Edward Island, is the smallest province, a province which has a very active fishery and which is likely to have very active marine activity in the near future. In terms of average population, the constituencies in Newfoundland will be around 99,714. Let us compare that figure with a large province such as Quebec, which is projected to have an average constituency population of 92,048, and Ontario, which is projected to have an average constituency population of 99,615—almost as big as Newfoundland, a small province, but not quite. Compare that Newfoundland figure to that of British Columbia, which is projected to have a population of 98,600.

It may be said that the demographic projections are not to be taken all that seriously. However, they are the projections on which the validity of this method of distributing seats is being explained and defended. Consequently, we have to take the projections seriously. What the figures show, whether we are talking in terms of the share of the House of Commons or of the size of the constituencies, is that Newfoundland and Nova Scotia are being treated unfairly. That is what the figures show. The President of the Privy Council appeared before the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. I found that he was unable to deal with these two objections. On January 23, I discussed with him the fact that the share was declining. He said, "Well, those are your figures." He went on to say:

I do not mean to trivialize the drop. It is a question of getting involved in these statistics. I guess I could quote my own, which I will do.

Then I said, "Please do." The reason I said, "Please do" was that I was using his statistics. I had not devised any new statistics. I was using the statistics provided to the Senate by the government. Mr. Hnatyshyn went on to say:

When we talk about these things, I want you to be assured that I am very interested in having a formula which does reflect the kind of sentiment that you express, senator.

That was the view of the President of the Privy Council. He wanted a formula which would reflect the kind of sentiment that I was expressing, the kind of sentiment that I am expressing here this afternoon.

● (1510)

The bill which is now before us does not do that. The bill fails both with regard to the share in the House of Commons assigned to the smaller provinces and with regard to the size of constituencies. It even fails to satisfy the minister himself. I can only conclude—and I will come back to this later, honourable senators—that, for one reason or another, the President of the Privy Council did not manage to focus on the problem.

During the committee hearings, when I was enlarging upon the problems, it was suggested that I was being unduly alarmed; that if the redistribution turned out to be, in the future, as unfair as the government's own figures suggested it would be, there could always be a modification of the law. I am reminded of what happened here about a year ago when the Leader of the Government was telling honourable senators that they should never buy a pup. I think that was his expression. If Senator Roblin is scared of being sold a pup, I do not see why I should not be scared of buying a pup. Honourable senators, I do not intend to buy a pup; I am not going to accept this bill on the basis of an assurance that future parliamentarians will be quick to rectify these defects should they occur, when the government's own figures show that they are very likely to occur.

If we look at the history of representation legislation, we find that there has been a good deal of stability, that new arrangements are not made frequently. The arrangement made in 1867 persisted until 1946, with an adjustment in 1915 for the benefit of a small province. The arrangement made in 1946 persisted until 1974, with an adjustment made in 1952 for the smaller provinces. The arrangement made in 1974 will continue until 1986. Then the formula put forward in this bill will apply for the foreseeable future.

[Senator Stewart.]

Honourable senators, I think we would be deluding ourselves if we assumed that Bill C-74 is some kind of temporary measure. This will be the basic law with regard to the redistribution of constituencies for the foreseeable future. Therefore I am not prepared to accept this assurance that if the government's own figures turn out to be right, future parliamentarians will do something to correct the results.

On Wednesday, February 12, I put a proposal before the committee, a proposal which I thought was a reasonable way to overcome the bill's unfairness to the smaller provinces. I have not yet seen the minutes or the record of testimony given at that committee, but I remember fairly well what went on there. I suggested that the bill could be amended in the following way, and this amendment was transmitted to the President of the Privy Council. I suggested that a new clause could be added which would say:

If the total number of members that would be assigned to a province by the application of rules 1 and 2 . . .

And here I am referring to rules 1 and 2 as set forth in the present bill, C-74—

. . . is less than 20, there shall be added to the number of members so assigned such number of members as will result in the province having the same number of members as would have been assigned to the province under the provisions of the Constitution Act, 1974.

The Constitution Act, 1974 is the one which sets out the present redistribution method. My proposed amendment would not have effected any great change in the size of the House of Commons. Honourable senators are aware that there has been considerable concern that the present method of assigning seats will cause the House of Commons to become unmanageably large. The bill which we now have before us, Bill C-74, will increase the size of the House of Commons from 282 seats to 295. The amendment which I suggested would have increased the number from 282 to 298. In other words, there would have been three additional seats and these three seats would have gone to the smaller provinces because, as the words of my amendment say:

If the total number of members that would be assigned to a province by the application of rules 1 and 2 is less than 20 . . .

In other words, the smaller provinces to which this rule would apply, namely, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba—and if this rule of less than 20 were to continue to apply, then after 1991, it would apply, presumably, to Saskatchewan and New Brunswick—would gain additional seats. I also proposed, honourable senators, that this new rule, which would be rule 3, was to be reviewed by Parliament prior to each readjustment of representation made after the readjustment passed on the 1981 decennial census. In other words, there would be no need for this to become a runaway situation. The immediate effect of my amendment would have been to provide three extra seats: one for Newfoundland, one for Nova Scotia and one for Manitoba.

Using the government's own figures, let us look at what my amendment would have meant. It would have meant constituencies of the following size: It would have meant that Manitoba would have 15 instead of 14 constituencies, and that the average population per constituency would have been 68,416; Saskatchewan would have had 14, as at present, and the population of the average constituency in Saskatchewan would have been 69,165; New Brunswick, as at present, would have been 69,640; Nova Scotia would have had 70,620 and Newfoundland would have had 70,960. I point out, honourable senators, that even with an extra seat, Newfoundland would have had the largest constituencies of those five provinces and the difference between the largest and smallest of the small provinces to which the formula applies would have been 2,544. In saying that, I set aside Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, because they are covered by another rule, being the Senate floor rule.

However, under Bill C-74, we get a much greater spread. Manitoba will have constituencies averaging 73,373; Saskatchewan with 69,165 will be as at present; New Brunswick, 69,640 as at present; Nova Scotia, 77,040; Newfoundland, 81,097. In other words, the spread here between the largest of those provinces and the smallest is 11,932, whereas under the amendment that I put forward, if it had been accepted by the government, the spread would have been only 2,544. Therefore, taking the small provinces as a group and adding those three seats—in other words, giving an additional seat to Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba—would have kept the House under 300 and would have made for fairer distribution of seats among the smaller provinces. This was a reasonable proposal. It was one which should have been adopted by the government.

Nevertheless, the minister declined to accept this proposal. He rejected it. I specifically asked the President of the Privy Council if he had consulted the ministers from Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba. He told us that he was speaking for his colleagues. I was hoping that the Leader of the Government, who is from Manitoba, could have been here this afternoon and that he would have been persuaded to go back to his colleagues and say to them, "Manitoba, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland are really coming off pretty badly—by reason of an oversight no doubt—but let us correct it." I am sure that he would have seen this as a desirable thing to do. Unfortunately even that avenue is closed because he could not be here.

So I think, honourable senators, this bill is quite unfair and if there is any kind of bill which should be thought of as fair, it is one which deals with representation. The 1974 bill went through Parliament without dissent. The present bill was put through the House of Commons at third reading with allocation of time; it is going through here over considerable sincere objection. I think this is not the kind of approach the government should take to a bill allocating representation in the House of Commons.

Now, honourable senators, I do not intend to delay the house much longer, but I do have two general observations which I want to put before honourable senators as a result of watching what has happened in the case of this bill.

I mentioned earlier that I felt I was not able to communicate adequately with the minister. He came before the committee on two occasions; the second occasion was a short appearance because he had other commitments; well, that is not unusual. Somehow there did not seem to be, shall we say, subterranean channels of communication. It was as if we were not being wire tapped. At times I was wishing that we were being bugged by the government so they would know what arguments were being made and could evaluate those arguments and decide whether or not they were valid. Somehow or other all the wires had been cut; they had been clipped and our proceedings were being ignored.

● (1530)

I do not blame the minister. I think that what has happened is that some of the Ottawa Valley statisticians got to work, as they do in so many areas. Ask some of our fishermen what they think of the Rideau Canal fisheries authorities' views on fisheries matters. Their views would parallel my views on the Rideau Canal statisticians when they came to work out proper representation in the House of Commons. They worked out a formula based as closely as possible on "rep by pop". They paid no attention to the time-honoured principle—which goes back to 1870—that the smaller provinces, in this case Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba, should be given better than average treatment. They paid no attention to that at all. They told the minister: "We put together a good package. Really, sir, you don't need to understand it, just go in there and smile." That's what happened.

I am not grieving for myself particularly; I am grieving for the Senate. The Senate deserves better treatment than that.

The second commentary I am driven to make relates to our hesitation to amend this bill. I have no reluctance in yielding to the judgment of the members of the House of Commons. After all, the members of the House of Commons are elected by the people and we are not. If the House of Commons, which is a busy body—

An Hon. Senator: That's right, a busybody!

Senator Stewart:—considers proposals put forward by the Senate—no, I do not think that honourable senators should say that the House of Commons is a "busybody." It is a busy body; the members are busy and have many legitimate concerns.

It seems to me that a reasonable stand for the Senate to take is that if we make proposals, if we suggest amendments, and if the members of the House of Commons look at those proposals and suggested amendments, together with the reasons adduced for those proposals and amendments, and then decide, with their greater legitimacy, that our proposals and amendments are wrong, fine, I am prepared to accept that. But I think all honourable senators have a reason to be unhappy when proposals and possible amendments made by the Senate, together with the reasons adduced for those proposals and possible amendments, are not even considered by the members of the other place.

In terms of the legislative process, that is ridiculous, unless one assumes that honourable senators, regardless of which side of the aisle they sit on, have nothing to say that is even worth considering. I do not think that is the true view of the members of the House of Commons.

The point I want to make, honourable senators, is that there is something wrong with a legislative process which makes it impossible for the House of Commons to accept, or indeed to reject, if the members of the House of Commons feel that that is what is called for, proposals and amendments suggested by honourable senators. I say that regardless of which political party happens to be in power at the moment.

To sum up, honourable senators, I think that this is an unfair bill, and I am frustrated because, given the existing process, I think that the members of the House of Commons are not likely to realize in time how unfair this bill is.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER TABLED

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. This is the final report on the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations made by Order in Council P.C. 1985-147, dated January 17, 1985.

On motion of Senator Langlois, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

YOUTH

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I take great pride today in tabling the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth, a committee that was constituted on April 10, 1984, but later dissolved when the last general election was called.

[English]

Re-established on December 11, 1984, the committee received 256 briefs, hundreds of letters, and heard 335 witnesses in 11 cities.

[Translation]

I sincerely believe that the report will bring a glimmer of hope to a large part of our youth who are bordering on despair.

[English]

These 140 pages should induce the public will and then the political will necessary to put an end to the situation of a large segment of our youth in peril—a situation that the members of our committee, in a unanimous report, qualify as intolerable; that is, not to be tolerated any longer.

[Translation]

I want to thank the deputy chairman, my friend Senator Yuzyk, who has been a loyal, attentive and extremely efficient collaborator. I would like to offer my heartfelt thanks to all members of the committee for the very substantial efforts they have made from the outset and for their truly personal contribution to the drafting of the report itself, and at this point I would also like to include our excellent researchers, our clerk and the many people who helped us.

Honourable senators, I have the honour of tabling the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth: "Youth: a plan of action".

Honourable senators, I move that the report be placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES—STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder whether the attention of the Leader of the Government has been drawn to the statement made yesterday by the Premier of Ontario on the subject of free trade talks. Is the Leader of the Government in a position to make any comment on what I consider to be some rather significant statements made by the Premier of Ontario on this important subject?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, that has not yet come to my notice.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not complain that the report has not come to the attention of the Leader of the Government, but I wonder whether the government might have given some consideration to the proposal made by Premier Peterson that now is the time for the provinces and the federal government to come together on making specific proposals for the trade talks and to move the debate from rhetoric to a more substantive phase. I wonder whether the government has that in mind and whether it welcomes the statement made by the Premier of Ontario. It seems to be significant that Ontario proposes and wishes to take a constructive approach at the bargaining table. The general impression up to the present time has been that the Government of Ontario was reluctant to participate in the trade talks. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government has anything to say by way of indicating whether this kind of proposal has been anticipated within the government.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as I have not yet read the statement, I do not believe that I should make too extensive a comment on it. But, naturally, if I get the news that the Premier of Ontario has a constructive role to play in the negotiations, as I am sure he has, then it is very welcome. We will need all the help we can get to devise a plan that fits the needs of the Canadian people, and undoubtedly that gentleman can be an important contributor. I would point out to my honourable friend that there is at the present time a meeting of officials who are seeking a way to define the relative roles that the spokesmen for the federal and provincial governments will play in this whole procedure, and I am hoping that that will be agreed upon before long. No doubt Premier Peterson's views will be closely examined when those recommendations are being compiled.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I thank the Leader of the Government for his comment, and give him notice that I intend to return to the subject tomorrow. I draw to his attention that the report to which I referred appeared in the Toronto Star of February 18. Possibly the Leader of the Government will have an opportunity to read that report; I may then direct my questions to him on the subject tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: I thank my honourable friend for his notice. I certainly will read the report and if it is possible to comment on it further tomorrow, I will be pleased to do so.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government a question, which is a continuation of the questions that I have been asking for some days, in the faint hope, perhaps, that the government will assume its responsibility and have some "made in Canada" policies rather than simply standing idly by and watching an important sector, namely, the energy sector—the gas and oil sector—becoming subject only to political decisions that are made outside of this country; and inasmuch as the March futures for crude oil slipped below $15 earlier today, down to $14.77—I believe the figure may have gone even lower since then—it means that the gross returns from sales of crude oil are now below 50 per cent of what they were three months ago. Therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government: Can I give some hope to those people who are vitally involved in this sector that the government will soon face up to its responsibility?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend should take note of the fact that often there are two ways of looking at a problem. In terms of the oil industry in Canada, the point of view that he is putting forward reflects a very serious problem to them—there is no question about that—but when one looks at other sectors of the economy—indeed, with our trading partners, on whom we depend for so much—the changing price of oil is a bonanza. It promises to reduce inflation; it promises to reduce the rate of interest; and it promises to increase the gross national product of those nations that are favourably situated in this matter. So it is not altogether a matter of gloom and doom. I admit quite freely that the problem is different in the province of Alberta. I suggest that my honourable friend wants a made in Canada policy. He had a made in Canada policy three or four years ago when the price of oil started to go up, and I do not think that anybody now thinks that that was a very good idea. Perhaps my honourable friend does, but most people, I think, would agree that it was not a good idea to try to isolate Canada's economic structure in this important matter from what was going on in the wide world. It did not work very well. As I said to him the other day, and I guess I will continue to say to him for some time, because, obviously, he is going to pursue this matter every day, I am not at all satisfied that government intervention in this matter is the correct course to follow at the present time. It is certainly not the course that is being followed at present in other important oil producing countries such as the one to the south of us. Therefore, I think we should be cautious before we accept his invitation to intervene in this particular matter.

● (1410)

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I thank the honourable Leader of the Government for his answer because, whether it was "advertent" or inadvertent, the revelations from that were substantially greater than anything we have had to date. I remember that only a day or two ago I asked him very directly if the government viewed these rapidly declining oil prices to be economically positive for Canada. Of course, the leader has indicated today that at least he, if not a larger number of members of the government, believe that there are a large number of positive economic considerations flowing from the declining oil prices. I am sure that the oil industry will be keenly interested to know that that is the kind of thinking to be found within the government.

However, the other part of the answer—and I did not ask the leader because I know that it would lead to a highly unsatisfactory answer—is whether or not the government intends to re-instate all the provisions of the National Energy Program as outlined in October 1980. I am not so foolish as to ask such a question, nor was I asking it. However, it seems to me that government policy at the federal level could include made in Canada policies that do not necessarily parallel what was involved in the previous policy, and that is what I am asking. Will this government face up to its responsibility and try to do something that will show respect for the fact that one sector—an important sector—of our economy will be in very serious difficulty unless some change is made? Will those changes be made by the people who are supposed to be leading this country, or is the government simply going to stand by and let political decisions made outside the country determine what the future of that sector will be?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I must go back to the first part of my honourable friend's question when he adverted to the general effect of changing oil prices and to my statement. He will recall that I told him a few days ago that in looking at this matter there were pros and cons, that some gained and some lost. My general comment had to do with the impact of lower oil prices in the great world of which we are a part. However, that does not by any means minimize the difficulties being faced in oil producing sectors of this country. I am rather pleased to hear that he does not want us to bring back the National Energy Policy.

Senator Olson: I did not say that.

Senator Roblin: I can set his mind at rest and tell him that we have no intention of doing anything of the kind. If my honourable friend thinks that the Government of Canada can isolate itself from decisions made in the oil industry outside the country, he is wrong. We could not do it before. We tried; God knows, we tried to insulate Canada from the effect of oil changes outside this country and, as he said, political decisions made by others. What was the result? I think even my honourable friend would say that it was not very good. So if he thinks that we will embark upon that same method of dealing with this question, he is wrong. If he has some ideas and wishes to tell me about them, I would be glad to hear them.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want the Leader of the Government to misinterpret what I have said.

Senator Flynn: Oh?

Senator Olson: I would not want Senator Flynn, who is shaking his head, to do so either. Considering that this government was elected on the promise that they were going to do certain things to expand the economy in all parts of Canada, I think it is sad that they now come, in sackcloth and ashes, and admit that they have no imagination or ingenuity whatsoever. I think it is sad that they cannot do anything except repeat what was involved in the National Energy Program, which they rejected. We understand that. But to say that there are absolutely no other policies that this government can imagine or that it has not the ingenuity to work out so that there can be some influence exerted by Canadians over this important economic sector in our country, and particularly by the federal government, I think, is an admission of bankruptcy of ideas and policy. Quite frankly, I am surprised.

However, setting that aside for the moment, I am simply asking the government if they intend to stand idly by with what my friend has called a watching brief and do nothing more than that, while political decisions that are made by people outside of this country—and in this case, I guess, mostly by Sheik Yamani and company, however large that company may be, whether it be OPEC or whatever—determine what the economic policies in Canada are going to lead to.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows that there are plenty of ways in which the government could act. We could subsidize everyone in sight if they ran into economic difficulties of one kind or another, but it simply would not be a good idea to do it. I think we shall continue our course at the present time and let economic forces have their play because, in the long run, no nation has been able to do anything else.

Senator Olson: I intend to be in Alberta this weekend and I will report, then, that the government intends to do nothing, no matter how serious the situation gets. The government has been telling us that the situation would not last, and predicting that the problem would not be this serious. The situation is now extremely serious and it has lasted longer than the month or two that some people thought it might in the first place. I can report that the government does not intend to take any action, even to smooth out the rough spots on this particular decline in this important sector.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend never heard from me that this was a short-run problem, because I have been warning him all along that no one could predict to what level the price of oil would drop. Today the price is $14.75 and one does not know what it might be tomorrow. All the wise men can tell you what the answer is, but you must wait and see what it is.

As to what the government intends to do, the government will do what it deems to be appropriate at the time and in the circumstances. If there is a policy to be announced that we think will be effective, then we will certainly make such an announcement, but I tell my friend that I have nothing to say to him today.

Senator Olson: My concern is with what I am to say to the people whose lives, jobs, income and entire livelihood depend on what is happening in this industry. As I understand my honourable friend, either the situation is not serious enough to warrant the government's taking some action, or they believe that the decisions that are made outside of the country, as I have mentioned, are appropriate for the internal economic activity of Canada.

Senator Roblin: I hope that when my honourable friend is talking to his friends in Alberta, he will remind them of the good advice and counsel he gave them several years ago when he was telling them that the National Energy Program was the answer to all of their problems. I suppose that they will pay the same amount of attention to him now as they did then.

Senator Olson: That is good.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NEW BRUNSWICK—LAY OFF OF CIVILIAN PERSONNEL AT CANADIAN FORCES BASES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate can enlighten me and help me answer the numerous queries I get on weekends, when I get to New Brunswick, from people who, for years, have been working around the military bases in New Brunswick—namely, CFB Chatham, CFB St. Margarets and CFB Gagetown.

The Leader of the Government in the Senate will remember that in 1984 the leader of his party travelled across New Brunswick and promised to enhance the military presence and the military establishment and thereby increase the number of jobs around those establishments, both in New Brunswick and in other parts of the Atlantic provinces.

● (1420)

On a daily basis those people are being laid off or are being told that they will be laid off, and if the leader wants to verify this, he can do so by checking with the member for York-Sunbury, the constituency in which Canadian Forces Base Gagetown is located. People are very concerned about this.

I was asked over the weekend to try to get an explanation as to why the current government is able to find what someone has said will be between $75 million and $100 million to replace the uniforms of the members of the Canadian Armed Forces while, at the same time, the government is trying to save money by laying off civilians working on military bases.

The government is cutting the number of jobs in two ways: first of all, by firing more people; and, second, by replacing civilian personnel with military personnel.

Of course, the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows that when military personnel are used as firefighters, mechanics, drivers, and so forth, this reduces the ability of the members of the Canadian Armed Forces to be flexible enough to do the jobs they are supposed to do.

Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate give an answer to my question that will assist those people in that situation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will refer the contents of my honourable friend's speech to the Minister of National Defence. No doubt, I will be able to provide further comments.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, yesterday we heard what I thought was a real ray of hope from the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the possibility of an announcement in the very near future on a sugar-beet policy.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can undertake, given the interest of members of this chamber in the topic over the past year, and because of the emergency debate which took place in this chamber, that when such a statement or announcement is made, it will be made in the Senate at the same time as it is in the House of Commons. If the Senate should not be sitting, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to see that those senators who have been interested in the issue shall be communicated with respecting that announcement?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate my honourable friend on her ingenuity, on her flexibility of mind and inventiveness. Every day she has asked me a question about the sugar-beet industry, and on each occasion she has been able to put a slightly different twist to the question, which has made it very interesting.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Thériault.]

Senator Roblin: So, I wait to see every day what variation on the theme she is going to play.

I have heard what she has asked today, and I will give it serious consideration.

Senator Olson: The best answer we have received so far was given yesterday.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: If I may, honourable senators, I have a follow-up question on the same subject.

The Leader of the Government has said that there is a new twist to Senator Fairbairn's questions every day. Unfortunately, the new twist is becoming much more serious as time goes on and no decision is taken.

Last week, for example, in Winnipeg—and I do not know if the leader has seen this or not—the headline was: "City Sugar Firm Issues 70 Lay-off Notices." So, the sugar-beet refinery in Manitoba has sent its workers a three-month notice dated last week advising that jobs will be lost. We simply cannot afford to let this industry go down the drain in the way it is going, and it is going down the drain because of indecision.

Can the leader not make a positive statement that this industry will continue, or, at the very least, give us a specific date in the very, very near future on which an announcement will be made so that these people can make plans for the future? As it is, the leader can see the results—workers are being told that they will be laid off.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend was here yesterday. He heard the reply that I gave yesterday to the same sort of question, and the same answer sticks.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question. Did the Leader of the Government promise yesterday that he was going to deliver a reply by March 3 or did he not? He left it a little hazy. You could almost take out of it that certain things like a march on Parliament Hill might not be necessary by March 3. You know, that is a little subtle. Can we get past this haze and this subtlety? Can you tell us whether or not we can expect an answer by March 3?

Senator Roblin: The answer that I gave yesterday speaks for itself, honourable senators.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

CANADIAN HEAD OF STATE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, as the bell rang today for gathering here, I was listening to a news report on the people's national network. It was reported that in Paris today the Prime Minister, the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, had advised that he—in order to explain, I guess, the difference between himself and the Premier of Quebec—

Senator Flynn: And New Brunswick.

Senator McElman: No, just between himself and the Premier of Quebec. He was advising that he is the Head of State for Canada.

My question to the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Have Her Majesty the Queen and Her Excellency the Governor General been advised of this startling development?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would not care to be the one to advise Her Majesty the Queen of this startling development, believe me. I think it is obviously a slip of the tongue, and I am sure that the Prime Minister will take an opportunity to rectify it when he is able.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SOCIAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS—UNIVERSALITY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked a question of the Leader of the Government with regard to universality and, in the light of a newspaper report, I asked whether there was a possibility of a major debate coming up on the subject. Quite properly, the government leader replied, "I do not make myself responsible for newspaper reports." I do not quarrel with that because, admittedly, my question was based on a newspaper story. However, prompted by his reply, I went and sought the original source of the information and I now have quotations directly from the Prime Minister. They are taken from a Canadian Press story of January 29, and are as follows:

"We will have to readjust our social philosophy.

We are not in a position to do everything for everyone, but we can do more for the less fortunate in our society."

And later he is quoted as saying:

... "it will take us more time than we thought to have this debate on the great social questions." But, "we have not ceased our efforts, as you will see in the budget."

I repeat again that these were in quotation marks. Admittedly, this is in the English translation and it refers to a lengthy interview with Le Devoir in Montreal, so I sought out the French text and again there, c'est la même chose.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister stated:

"We will have to readjust our social philosophy. We are not in a position to do everything for everyone, but we can do more for the less fortunate in our society."

It is difficult to engage in a serious debate on matters that become highly political. It will take us more time than we thought to have this debate on the great social questions. Meanwhile, our efforts have been unrelenting, as you will see in the Budget.

My question is as follows: Does the government intend to launch a debate very shortly on the question of universality of social services in Canada? Is that the position of the Government?

● (1430)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that my honourable friend has answered his own question. Obviously, the reference was made to what may be contained in the forthcoming budget. When my honourable friend is in a position to listen to the budget proposals; he may then form his own conclusions. I am sure that if he wants to debate the question of universality after he has heard the budget proposals, this house will be able to afford him that opportunity.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PHILIPPINES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—STATUS OF CANADA-PHILIPPINES RELATIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to follow up on an answer that was given yesterday to Senator Graham. He had asked whether we might expect some kind of formal statement from the Government of Canada with respect to the Philippines situation. Senator Roblin replied as follows:

I share my honourable friend's concern about the legitimacy of the elections in the Philippines.

That, in itself, constitutes a statement of government policy.

I wonder whether, now that the Leader of the Government has made this statement which questions the legitimacy of the election in the Philippines, he will arrange to have that view transmitted to the Government of the Philippines? I think that is a view which is justified. I think it would be useful if the Government of the Philippines were made aware of the existence of these concerns about the legitimacy of the election—concerns not only in the minds of Senator Graham, at least four U.S. senators and the President of the United States, but also in that of the Government of Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs will be a little surprised at my honourable friend's interpretation of my remark on that occasion as representing a statement of government policy, although I suppose that it might be interpreted that way. I must confess, however, that it was more a statement of my own feelings on the matter. I have not consulted with my colleagues on this particular point. The question, however, is this: Is the Government of Canada going to make a statement about the Philippines? I said yesterday that I would find out the intention of my cabinet colleagues in that respect.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think that I would want to encourage the Leader of the Government to have his own feelings, which he expressed so candidly yesterday, transformed into a statement by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who must be considering the matter and who, with the support of the Leader of the Government, might be able to make a statement to the effect that we are concerned about the legitimacy of the election in the Philippines.

Therefore, I encourage the Leader of the Government to follow up on the matter.

Senator Roblin: I take encouragement wherever I can get it. My honourable friend has expressed his opinion on this matter—he obviously wants Canada to make a statement expressing disapproval. I will certainly make that opinion known to my colleague, because I hope that the government will be able to make a statement on the matter.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, two weeks ago I brought to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate the concern of the people of Manitoba regarding the proposed nuclear dump south of the border between Manitoba, North Dakota and Minnesota. Consideration is still being given to the proposed dump, and the matter is causing ever greater concern. It was raised again yesterday in newspapers in Manitoba, which reported that the proposed Minnesota nuclear repository is viewed as a hostile act against a friendly neighbour. We are more concerned than ever because, as I mentioned on that occasion, such a dump would spoil the waters of the Red River and all of the fresh fish in our lakes.

Knowing that our leader is from Manitoba, I realize that he is personally aware of the problem. He sits as a member of the cabinet and is rather close to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. All of these people take part in the discussions that take place with our friends, the Americans. I request that the Leader of the Government in the Senate make a particular effort to place emphasis on this matter when he speaks about it to the Right Honourable the Prime Minister and his other colleagues so that the people of Manitoba will rest a little easier, feeling that appropriate representation is being made by the federal government. They will know that they do not have to depend solely upon the efforts of a few representatives of my province, but that our case will be put more strongly and that the results will be more to our advantage. That is my request.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is not only the people of Manitoba who have concern about where these nuclear dumps are located. The matter also concerns the people of New Brunswick because they are under the same threat. There are at least 30 locations in the United States which are being examined as "repositories"—if that word could be used—or dumps for these wastes. Two of those locations, in particular, are close to the Canadian frontier; one is close to New Brunswick and one is close to Manitoba. The Government of Canada is no more anxious than my honourable friend to have our territory or our people placed in jeopardy by the locations of these dumps.

We see it as a serious problem. As to what we are doing about it, first of all, it has been placed on the agenda for discussions between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary of State in the United States, as the court of first instance, one might say. At the same time, the Government of Canada is actively soliciting the co-operation of the provinces, which have a constitutional interest in natural resources, so that we may have a unified front as far as Canadians are concerned. It is my understanding, although I will have to confirm this, that representations have been made to the two provinces concerned to get a united policy in respect of the matter. I notice in reading the press of Manitoba, that the present government there does not seem to have thought it desirable to indicate the nature of its conversations with the federal government on the matter or, if it has, I have overlooked it. Let us hope that I have overlooked it, because I think this is one matter in which we need have no political differences.

Senator Guay: Supplementary to that, my concern, honourable senators, is the fact that the Americans have held meetings as recently as a few days ago. They call these "explanatory meetings," and this fact also creates some concern. There might well be other areas they are considering, but I believe that the two that have been mentioned—those near Manitoba and New Brunswick—are the only ones so far about which such meetings have been held. That is why we are very concerned. No doubt the Leader of the Government is aware of these meetings.

Senator Roblin: Yes, I am, honourable senators. I can say that a number of these so-called explanatory meetings are being held in the United States, one very recently in New Hampshire. The opposition of the people of New Hampshire to the whole idea was just as vehement as that which one sees in Manitoba and New Brunswick. But I want to tell my honourable friend that, if I understand the process correctly—and I think I do—it is not a matter that will be decided overnight. It will be a long time, perhaps years, before any determination is made. It is all the more important, therefore, that we should get our objections on paper and into the form of representations as soon as possible.

Hon. Charles McElman: By way of a supplementary, honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask his colleagues to pay particular attention to what I am sure he will appreciate is an important point. I ask that no site be even considered if its location will affect headwaters of rivers which have their origin in a state of the Union and which then drain into Canada. In the case of New Brunswick, such rivers might originate in the state of Maine. Manitoba might also have the same problem. The concern is properly being expressed in both areas of Canada. It has been shown very clearly in recent times in Ontario that no matter how deep the receptacles are placed in which chemicals or other wastes may be disposed of, they do not stay out of sight or out of mind. They have a habit of popping back as they are doing currently in the waters of Ontario. Even though it is proposed that these deep well and cavern disposal units may be between 2,000 and 4,000 feet underground in non-fractured rock, the area of which we are speaking, the border area of New Brunswick and Maine, is an area of not heavy but continuing small earthquake activity. Therefore, I ask that special attention be given to opposing any of these sites which may affect the watersheds that drain into Canada from the United States.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I will do so, because my honourable friend has put his finger on one of the main points at issue: What happens to the underground waters when these things are in place?

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is supplementary to that asked earlier by Senator Olson concerning the price of oil and assistance to the oil industry. The Leader of the Government suggested that it is the government's philosophy not to interfere in the marketplace. However, a former Conservative government—that of the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker—in the later 1950s and 1960s did interfere in the marketplace by dividing Canada into two parts with regard to the sources of supply of oil. East of the Ottawa Valley the oil was to be supplied from imported sources, whereas oil west of the Ottawa Valley was to be supplied by Alberta, which enabled that province to develop its infant oil industry; and Ontarians as well as western Canadians paid a premium for that. Also, Canada benefited through the National Energy Program, when Canadians were paying 85 per cent of the world price for that commodity.

Now that the price of oil has declined so dramatically, does the Leader of the Government suggest that the oil industry has reached the stage of adulthood that it no longer needs any assistance, and that if we were to have a future crisis similar to the one we had in the 1970s, Canada would have enough oil supplies and we would not face the same dilemma as that faced in 1980 when a ship that was to deliver 25,000 barrels of oil to Canada was diverted because it was needed in the United States?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should tell my honourable friend that he need not expect me to apply any strict ideological or doctrinaire test to what governments do in the economic field. It is a matter of what we deem to be practical and helpful in the circumstances. I am simply saying that I do not believe that we have reached the stage where we think that a move of the kind that is hinted at is appropriate. As for that tanker, they will be queuing up to get into Halifax one of these days, not to get away from it.

Senator Bosa: As a supplementary question, I realize that we are passing through a period of abundance at the present time, with an oversupply of oil; but what will happen if we have a crisis similar to that in the late 1970s?

Senator Roblin: "If 'ifs' and 'ans' were pots and pans, there'd be no need for tinkers." If I could see the future as well as my honourable friend can, perhaps I would have an answer; but I cannot.

Senator Bosa: But it is wise to be prepared, though.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning a very important industry in Manitoba, with which I know he is very familiar. I refer to the aerospace industry which over the years has been important to Manitoba, representing as it does, on the average, approximately 10 per cent of the Canadian aerospace industry.

Recently, following the Prime Minister's visit to Montreal where, it seems, he made a number of commitments regarding the aerospace industry, announcements were made of major contracts to Spar and Pratt & Whitney. The Montreal newspaper La Presse reported that crown-owned Canadair would get the multimillion dollar service contract for the CF-18 aircraft.

I believe that my honourable friend knows that the Winnipeg company, Bristol Aerospace, has also been in the bidding for that particular contract. Can the Leader of the Government now inform us of the situation, because no announcement was made about Canadair, although rumours were circulating that it was going to Montreal. Can he tell us where that matter now stands?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that the government announced just the other day that it thinks it has been able to assist in the development of some 2,500 aerospace jobs in Montreal. I, for one, have no dog in the manger attitude in respect of that. I am glad for their good fortune, and I am sure they have an industry there that is fully competent to do the things we expect it to do.

It is also true that we have an aerospace industry in Manitoba, and it has been very successful. While there has been the announcement to which my honourable friend referred, I will certainly do whatever I can, as a senator from Manitoba, to make sure that that province receives appropriate consideration based on its capacity and its efficiency to do the job in the whole aerospace industry.

With respect to the contract for the maintenance of the CF-18, what my honourable friend has told me is a rumour only and I certainly would not like to comment on it. No decisions have been arrived at in respect of that matter; nor do I expect them in the near future.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps I may ask a further question on the same subject. Can the Leader of the Government give us any indication as to when a decision might be made on the CF-18 contract? I ask because there was a further report on February 18 that according to a company spokesman, Bristol Aerospace will lay off 41 junior overhaul workers on February 28. The reason given is that the company's present aircraft overhaul contracts have come to an end and they are waiting for a decision on the company's bid on a $300 million contract to service CF-18 aircraft. May I ask when a decision might be made?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, as soon as the government has analyzed all the factors in the situation, an announcement will be made.

EMPLOYMENT AND IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF IMMIGRANT WIFE OF CANADIAN CITIZEN

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he would kindly intervene on behalf of someone who needs help. I refer to a young woman who has been wronged. A Canadian of Greek descent went to Greece, married her, brought her to Canada, gave her a child and then abandoned her. The Department of Employment and Immigration tells me that even though the child was born in Canada and is therefore a Canadian citizen, it will not grant the mother permission to stay here.

I would be most grateful if the Leader of the Government would agree to let me send him this correspondence, and if he would use his good offices on behalf of someone who has been wronged by a Canadian citizen. She is the mother of a Canadian citizen, albeit a very young Canadian citizen, who has the right to remain in this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it would be most useful if my honourable friend were to send me a copy of his information. But I would like him to do something else. I would like him to initiate action himself directly by representations to the Minister of State in charge of immigration. That is the direct route and I recommend it.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I have written to the minister, and one of the minister's officials replied, referring to my letter of December 20. So, I did write to the minister and received an official answer. However, I am grateful to the Leader of the Government for being willing to help.

THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie for the third reading of Bill C-74, intituled: "An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census".—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

[Senator Molgat.]

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, Bill C-74, an act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census, has now reached the final step of a difficult journey. The bill before us is the product of the government of the day. It says a lot about its notion of parliamentary democracy. The bill is flawed in more ways than one! It is flawed in its content, flawed in its timing and flawed in the process used to push it through Parliament. I will come to some of those matters in an instant.

● (1450)

Let me begin today by saying how grateful we should all be to Senator Stewart for his articulate and justified defence of the regional interest, the so-called small provinces' interests as they are being affected under the proposed legislation. In summing up his argument yesterday, Senator Stewart dealt a serious blow to the government's credibility arising from its lack of concern for the not-so-well-off regions of the country and, in my opinion, he is absolutely right. We have all taken note that government supporters from those regions, with the exception of perhaps one person, have remained silent. I recognize that that is their absolute right, but will the people remain silent? Perhaps it would be useful to quote from an article published recently in the "American Review of Canadian Studies, 1985, Volume XV, no. 3", written by Professor R.K. Carty of the Department of Political Science, University of British Columbia. Though he refers specifically to the modest improvement in apportionment of seats at the level of provincial legislatures, his general comment may well apply to the specific unfairness described by Senator Stewart of Bill C-74 as it affects the proposed redistribution and allocation of seats to Newfoundland, Nova Scotia and Manitoba. Professor Carty writes:

With the entrenchment of the new charter of rights in the constitution, the continuing poor apportionment of Canadian legislatures might be challenged in the courts as a violation of a citizen's right to vote.

He goes on:

Certainly, one might expect to see struck down those provisions of the Acts that provide for, or allow, excessive malapportionment.

And he concludes:

As in so much that is Canadian, one ends where many begin—with the Constitution.

Some of our colleagues on the government side have repeatedly argued that many, if not a sufficient number of witnesses, had testified before both the House of Commons Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections at the stage of study of the white paper and at the legislative stage, as well as before the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, and that we ought to move on. Yes, one must recognize that there were a number of witnesses, most of them professors, scholars of one shade or another, specialists in political science, and in the electoral process. All hues and shades of opinion were laid on the table, and in the opinion of some, enough to satisfy the pros and cons.

At the white paper stage of the exercise—and one must note that it took place in June of 1985, at a time when most members of Parliament are buried under a heavy legislative agenda and are under terrible pressure to get things moving and fast—the public was not invited to testify. Invitations were sent out to a select few professors, as a matter of fact, two of them. I am not commenting on the quality of the exercise. I am simply noting that it occurred and the circumstances under which it occurred. There was no advertising inviting comments from the public at that stage, an unusual omission or oversight, if you want to call it that, in the case of a document normally published for widespread examination by the Canadian public in general.

A few months later, in the fall of 1985, Bill C-74 was introduced and the general public was invited to present briefs and comments on the proposed legislation. Most of the responses came from the academic community, the Canadian Labour Congress being a notable exception. We all know in what high esteem that organization holds the Senate, so I will pass.

There is nothing wrong with having academics appear before a committee of either house. On the contrary, these people are generally helpful through their understanding of the process, the law and the historical patterns. But what was the response of John Q. Public and Jane W. Public? Practically nil. Is that to say that there was no interest out there? As I said in my remarks on second reading, the public will only understand when the act is being implemented and its provisions are being applied, but then it is generally too late to do anything unless some special effort is made to popularize, if I may use that expression, complicated matters at the legislative study stage. I do not believe that that was done in this instance. The law is the law and redistribution commissioners apply the law as they read and interpret it, not as the public feels it ought to be applied or as parliamentarians thought they would have it applied. Professor John C. Courtney made this point tellingly in the House committee when it was dealing with the legislation.

As to the argument that we have heard enough witnesses, that enough time had been provided, I quote a letter which came into my hands by direct mail, so to speak. It is dated November 4, 1985, and addressed to the Clerk of the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0A6. Although the clerk is a person of the other sex, it begins:

Dear Sir,

The advertisement in the Globe and Mail of October 31, 1985, states that deadline for submissions to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections must be received by you by November 15, 1985.

Two weeks to research, study, and submit recommendations on a matter as important historically as representation by population is completely inadequate.

As a representative of the Federal Progressive Conservative women in British Columbia who are interested in studying changes that a Progressive Conservative government proposes, may I request the Committee to extend the date for submissions at least to February 22, 1986.

Today is February 19, 1986. The letter goes on:

We trust that notice of reception of submissions to your Committee was adequately given in British Columbian publications.

Yours truly,
Margaret Maxwell
Director, FPCWABC

Copies were sent to the chairman of the committee and another member of Parliament. Who wrote that letter? It was written by an official of the Federal Progressive Conservative Women's Association of British Columbia who was genuinely concerned with the redistribution process. Was this person given the opportunity to appear in the other place or in this place? I do not know, but I do not think so. Perhaps she received one of those mysterious telephone calls from the Prime Minister's Office, but it is obvious that her request for an extension of the date for the submission of briefs at least to February 22, 1986, was not sustained by the committee of the other place.

● (1500)

Today is February 19 and we have reached what I believe is the final stage of Bill C-74. This woman's request was for an extension to at least February 22 for submissions. This is a member of the public making what I think is a very reasonable request dealing with what is perceived by many to be a complicated bill. Therefore, let no one point a finger at the Senate, at Senator Stewart or myself, for suggesting that enough witnesses have not been heard. We are well ahead of the schedule proposed by the supporters of the Progressive Conservative government. We, on this side of the house, would gladly give the FPCWABC the hearing they requested before the end of this week, if they so wished. I am in the hands of the house.

[Translation]

During the debate on second reading, Senator Flynn, the government's official spokesman, said as follows:

... the rules for drawing the boundaries of electoral districts substantially reflect the views of all parties. There were some differences of opinion, but according to my information, nothing substantial.

I am quoting from page 1751 of the Debates of the Senate of December 18, 1985. Senator Flynn went on to say:

In any event, I would say this is an area that almost exclusively concerns the House of Commons, and I think that we as a non-elected chamber and as appointed legislators are hardly in a position to tell the members of the House of Commons how they should proceed to draw the boundaries of their electoral districts.

Nevertheless, if there were some major questions of principle, the Senate would certainly have a contribution to make.

I agree that Senator Flynn is a perfect gentleman most of the time, and I say this in all sincerity, except when he indulges in untimely remarks which he usually ends up regretting and promptly tries to forget, as we do.

Senator Flynn: I forget yours too.

Senator Corbin: That's fine with me. But the words I quoted just now were not spoken in the heat of debate. They were spoken calmly before an attentive audience.

He interpreted what happened in the other place, that is, that closure was imposed at the third reading stage as a way to counter a simple strategy by the opposition.

Honourable senators, it was the first time a government used closure to put an end to what historically has always been a dispassionate and non-partisan debate, tending to lead to a broad national consensus, to the general satisfaction of all parties, and, if I may say so, of the electorate.

[English]

That, honourable senators, was one of the flaws affecting the process in Bill C-74; the use of closure, the guillotine, with the consequent result that we were sent an imperfect bill with imperfect solutions to a problem.

[Translation]

Nor do I agree with Senator Flynn's other comment, and I quote:

I would say this is an area that almost exclusively concerns the House of Commons—

On the contrary, we as senators are involved on four counts: first of all, as individuals we are voters like any other Canadian who is entitled to vote. We have the right to examine what is done in the House of Commons with respect to the government's legislative proposals. It is as simple as that. We are like any other member of the public.

Second, it has been understood ever since the beginning of Confederation that the Senate speaks for the interests of the regions and the provinces. Bill C-74, in terms of its nature and its impact on representation of the regions and the individual provinces in the House of Commons, is exactly the kind of bill that should be given thorough consideration by the Senate. To remain silent on a matter as fundamental as the readjustment of electoral boundaries, as Senator Flynn almost persuaded us to do, would be irresponsible in the extreme.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I want to raise a question of privilege. I did not discuss the kind of issues you have been mentioning since the beginning of your speech.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, if I have offended the sensibilities of Senator Flynn, I apologize.

Third, senators are very specifically involved in the adjustment process, as stated in Clause 7 of the bill. The bill says:

For greater certainty, any member of Parliament may make representations at any sittings held by a commission for the hearing of representations from interested persons.

[Senator Corbin.]

"Any member of Parliament" includes senators, as we were told and as was confirmed in committee.

Furthermore, honourable senators, when we read the following on page 1 of Bill C-74:

Her Majesty—

Do we or do we not respect Her Majesty?

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

What are we doing here, Senator Flynn? Do we or do we not have a right to examine?

Senator Flynn: Try to understand.

Senator Corbin: Do we have authority to comment on bills, yes or no? I say yes, and the proof is there.

Finally, we are the chamber of sober second thought and of correction when the bills we get are badly drafted. Such was the case of Bill C-74. It is full of inaccurate terms, ill-defined objectives and nebulous formulae, and our duty is to point out these errors and shortcomings and to amend the bill accordingly. Apparently the government and its supporters wanted us to expedite our review. I acknowledge their right to put pressure on us, but it does not mean they were right. In my opinion that was not correct. Nor did they want to accept the amendments required to correct blatant discrepancies between the English and French versions.

For all practical purposes we were asked to pass imperfect legislation, sight unseen as it were. Why? Because any amendment means the bill has to be sent back to the House of Commons, something which this government does not want right now. It is unfortunate for the government, for Canadians and for the elected representatives, for in the end they will be most directly affected by the inaccuracies and confusing wording of the legislation.

Over the weekend I read the study done by Professor John C. Courtney for the Royal Commission on the Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. This study appears in Volume 38 titled "The Size of Canada's Parliament: An Assessment of the Implications of a Larger House of Commons".

On several occasions when he appeared before the House of Commons committee, Professor Courtney referred to "regional concerns," the "search for ways to meet the requirements of regionalism in national institutions and better regional representation," and so forth. Those are the kinds of concerns expressed by Senator Stewart and myself throughout the study of this bill, so we are not alone in that respect.

Professor Courtney also refers to minorities in his study, and I quote:

A larger number of members in the House of Commons might have other consequences for the parliamentary, electoral and redistribution systems. If there were more MPs and smaller ridings, the minorities which for too long have been under-represented in Parliament might find it easier to appoint candidates for the main parties and win elections. Groups which are defined by their race or ethnic origin—such as native people and urban immigrants who settled here after World War II—might find their social intergration within the political system somewhat easier if they could run as candidates in smaller, more populous and less diversified ridings where their relatively greater electoral importance would have a stronger impact on election results.

Again I quote from the same page:

In a larger House it would also be easier for women to get elected. According to the 1980 results, women candidates stand a better chance of being elected in smaller ridings. In the past the size of the legislative assembly has probably never been considered as a likely explanation for the political success of women.

Finally, I sum up the conclusion of Professor Courtney's study, and this should not take me more than three minutes:

If however the gradual increase in the size of the House of Commons were to follow the forecasts inherent in the amalgam method, the political regime might gain non-electoral benefits with respect to representation. Since it provides for the gradual increase in the number of MPs, the amalgam method more faithfully reflects the democratic principle of representation by population and to the less populated regions of the major provinces. A larger House might lead to improved electorate participation, to the political commitment and participation of the citizens, and to the electoral success of women and minority groups.

That is the beauty and usefulness of the amalgam formula I tried to defend at the second reading stage.

The present government, by acting hastily with this poorly constructed piece of legislation, possibly with an election in the back of its mind and in its misdirected zeal to cut costs, is doing Canada a disservice, especially this country's minorities and less fortunate regions.

I would ask Senator Flynn to read and reread Senator Courtney's submission to the House of Commons committee.

Senator Flynn: Senator who?

Senator Corbin: Excuse me, I mean Professor Courtney.

What is the price of democracy? Too high, says the present government!

Today we are far from the spirit that inspired the Fathers of Confederation. Power is a heady brew!

I spoke and argued a great deal when the bill was being considered.

Although I had the satisfaction of forcing the government to realize that my criticism was well-founded and exacted from the government a formal promise to have the text corrected later, my conclusion is and I repeat . . .

Senator Flynn: Possibly—

Senator Corbin: But Senator Flynn, you are contradicting the minister.

Senator Flynn: No, just read the report.

Senator Corbin: I will remember that. But I prefer to believe what the minister said in committee.

Senator Flynn: He said he would submit it for consideration, nothing else. These are false representations, like most of your comments this afternoon.

Senator Corbin: Calm down, Senator Flynn, you will have an opportunity to take the floor at the conclusion of the debate.

Before doing that, however, check what the minister, Mr. Hnatyshyn, said before the committee.

Senator Flynn: I did hear and understand him!

Senator Corbin: Yes, much as you had understood the debates in the House of Commons before Christmas. Talk about understanding!

In conclusion I repeat that we could have benefitted from the expertise of other witnesses to improve this bill, had it not been for the sword of Damocles hanging over our collective senatorial heads.

We were subjected to that kind of blackmail last year. Again this time they would like to blackmail us, but it will not work.

Somebody somewhere said that the electors get the MPs they deserve. The Senate was established to uphold provincial and regional interests, and to protect the House of Commons against its own excesses. Beware the government that manhandles the Commons and does not listen to the Senate, for the electors will remember!

I thank you, honourable senators.

In the name of Senator MacEachen, debated adjourned.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Simard, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-80, intituled: "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof".—
(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, a few weeks ago I read a letter that the Honourable Donald Fleming sent to the Globe and Mail commenting on a review which had been written by Mr. Peter Newman about his political memoirs. That stimulated my memory to recall that when Mr. Fleming spoke in the House of Commons, he used to tell the members what he was going to say before he said it. I always thought that that was a useful habit because everybody knew when the speech was about to terminate or when they could take a short recess in the members' lobby. So, I will give the same opportunity to honourable senators.

I intend to cover, I hope briefly, three subjects: First of all, the committee treatment of this bill, which, as honourable senators know, was introduced in the May budget, and which contains tax measures related to the Excise Tax Act; second, I should like to refer to some of the provisions of the bill in the hope that the Senate Committee on National Finance, which will possibly conclude its study of the bill tomorrow, will take into account the comments which I will make in repetition of the comments which others have made on the bill previously; third, I should like to say a word or two about general economic policy as it is raised in the bill, and as it was raised by Senator Simard in his opening statement, wherein he referred to the substantial revenues which were to be raised through this bill, revenues which would make a contribution to the urgent task of deficit reduction.

● (1520)

I recalled, while Senator Corbin was complaining about the application of closure in the House of Commons to the Representation Bill, that this particular bill also was subjected to time allocation three days after the debate had commenced. Even though the Department of Finance and the officials of the Department of Justice took five months to transform the tax measures outlined in the budget into a bill unveiled in the House of Commons in October, the members of the House of Commons were asked to terminate their debate after three days. That, in itself, is an indication of the increasing tendency of the government to curtail debate and to limit the opportunities in the House of Commons and, as Senator Corbin inferred, in the Senate.

The government has put a great deal of emphasis on consultation and fairness. The Prime Minister and other ministers, certainly early in the life of the government—that tendency is becoming more muted at present—put a great deal of stock in listening to what the public had to say about measures coming before the House of Commons and about government policy in general.

The legislative committee of the House of Commons held 11 hearings and heard a large number of witnesses, all of whom voiced concerns about the impact that various measures in the amendments to the Excise Tax Act would have on their enterprises or on their livelihood or on the fairness of the tax system itself. There were, in fact, 17 associations or groups before the committee in the House of Commons. These groups included the Canadian Trucking Association, the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, the Canadian Bar Association, and the Canadian Solar Industries Association Incorporated. The bill was reported back with 19 amendments. Witnesses were heard, recommendations were made, and 19 amendments were proposed.

It is interesting that despite the large number of witnesses, the only representations that were cast into amendment form and accepted in the committee were amendments proposed by the Canadian Bar Association. These were technical amendments. No amendments relating to the substance of the tax measures or to representations made by the other bodies were accepted by the committee or by the government. The minister herself said that the government was pleased with the efforts of the groups making representations before the committee, but that it was not possible to accept all their views. She was, nevertheless, grateful for the effort.

● (1530)

One has to question what, indeed, is the impact of the consultative process. One must question whether the government has, so early in its life, abandoned its self-professed intention of listening closely to the views of groups in the country. One witness before the committee said:

We are frustrated with the whole process of consultation and co-operation which the federal government has invited, yet when we participate, we see no results.

That witness was Mr. MacDonald of the Confectionery Manufacturers Association.

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance began its pre-study of this bill in the Senate on December 5, 1985. Senator Roblin said at the beginning of second reading of the bill that the bill had gone to committee for pre-study, and that—

A wide variety of witnesses was present, including the minister and officials of the department. I believe there were about a half a dozen witnesses in all, the names of whom I have here.

The fact of the matter is that up to the present, as I understand it, no one has appeared before the National Finance Committee except the Minister of State for Finance, her parliamentary secretary and representatives of the Department of Finance. So there was not a wide variety of witnesses, unless the use of the expression "wide variety" is intended to state that there was presented before the committee a wide variety of views from the ministry. I repeat that up to the present, no one but the minister, her parliamentary secretary and departmental officials has appeared before the committee.

I understand that the committee will resume its deliberations tomorrow and that it is intended that at least one witness from the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants will be heard. That will be useful. I hope that he will be provided an opportunity to give his views on this bill, because not everybody is satisfied. One ought not to be surprised, because tax bills are notoriously unpopular, and the best that can be done is to ensure that the maximum fairness is provided in the legislation and that individuals have an opportunity to express their views. I hope that the concerns which I will express—and I will attempt to do so briefly—will be considered in the committee and that the committee will make some comments on the provisions of this particular bill.

One aspect of the bill that is quite surprising, at least to me, is the way in which energy and energy conservation is treated. The whole question of energy conservation and renewable resources has been uppermost in the minds of Canadians for quite some time. We now learn that energy conservation products, which include heat pumps, solar panels and thermal insulation, are to be taxed. All of these items are obviously important in reducing our dependency on non-renewable energy. The government, the Department of Finance and the minister have succumbed to the temptation to arrest the process of seeking alternative sources of energy, it would seem, by imposing a tax of 7 to 11 per cent on heat pumps, wood-burning stoves, solar and wind collectors and insulation materials. The minister decided, in his wisdom, that all conservation and alternative energy products should be fully taxed. Well, I question the wisdom of that decision at this time. One of the witnesses before the House of Commons committee said:

By imposing the tax, the government has ensured . . . there will be no revenue to tax. The tax has inhibited growth before it has begun . . .

He was referring to the new field of wind collectors. I draw this to the attention of this chamber because I think that it is a backward step that is not in the best interests of Canada.

I think that some pride was expressed in the idea that prefabricated construction goods are now to be taxed at their sale prices in order to put them on the same footing as all construction products. Perhaps that is fair—certainly the minister thinks it is fair—but the construction industry says that it is not fair. Let me inform honourable senators why the industry does not regard it as a fair tax. There are many contractors who had engaged in fixed-price contracts prior to the introduction and enforcement of the bill. These contracts often include prefabricated products which contractors assumed would not be subject to the 6 per cent sales tax in May 1985 and in January 1986. No notice was given to these people. No provision was made to allow them to apply for an exemption. The contractors now absorb these sales taxes with no recourse. They claim that it is not fair. On the face of it, it certainly does not appear to be a fair treatment of their situation.

The bill also raised the price of gasoline and diesel fuel by two cents per litre on September 3, 1985. One asks again whether revisiting the matter of tax on oil and gasoline was a wise move by the Minister of Finance. We have had in the past a defeat of a government on an increase in tax on gasoline, and one might have expected that the present Minister of Finance would be reluctant to revisit the scene of such a disaster.

Senator Flynn: Ours or yours?

Senator MacEachen: There is another provision which is worth mentioning, honourable senators, and that deals with the ad valorem tax on petroleum products and its replacement with a specific tax. This means that as of June 1, 1985, leaded gas is to be taxed at 32 cents per litre, while unleaded gas is to be taxed at 35 cents per litre. It is worth noting, honourable senators, that because of this proposal, we will now pay more tax on unleaded fuels than on leaded fuels at a time when we are fighting to keep our atmosphere clean, and when so much emphasis is being placed on a clean environment.

● (1540)

I turn now to another aspect of the bill. I believe this is the aspect of the bill which agitated Senator Leblanc (Saurel), the chairman of the committee, who considered proposing an amendment, or at least seeking some amelioration of this provision of the bill. In his introductory comments, Senator Simard spoke of how the bill gives taxpayers considerably more rights to appeal sales and excise tax assessments than ever before. That is true, and it is certainly a fair proposal. But he did not mention the injustice to taxpayers contained in the assessment and refund provisions of the bill. Because of the bill, the Excise Branch of Revenue Canada now has the power to audit and assess for a four-year period, while the taxpayer will be entitled only to refunds for the most recent two-year period. That inequity can be illustrated very easily. A taxpayer who made a mistake and underpaid taxes for a transaction that occurred four years earlier will be assessed and will be charged interest and penalty computed from the day the tax became payable. On the other hand, if the taxpayer made a mistake and overpaid tax for a transaction that occurred four years earlier, he cannot claim a refund in respect of the amount overpaid.

It may appear that all taxpayers are treated equally if inequitably by this amendment; but it seems to me that in addition to the inequity generally, there is unequal treatment. It is obvious that small businesses will find this particular amendment more difficult to deal with than will large businesses, because the mismatching of assessment and refund periods will be more onerous for small businesses than for large businesses.

So, honourable senators, there are certain aspects of the bill that are not pleasing, and I hope that when the committee meets tomorrow it will have an opportunity to take another look and to at least make some recommendations to overcome some of these generally recognized defects in the bill.

My third point has to do with a general proposition that was made by Senator Simard in his statement. I believe he was correct in reminding us that this bill was a key part of the budget of May 1985 and that it was introduced for the purpose of raising substantial revenues for the government in order to reduce the deficit.

As one is approaching a new budget in a very short time, one casts one's mind back to the period before the last budget and to the attitude of the government at that time. It was the prevailing rhetoric from the present Minister of Finance and his associates when in opposition that the important requirement of the country was to restore confidence in its investment opportunities. Indeed, the present Minister of Finance, when there was pressure on the Canadian dollar, constantly related it directly to lack of confidence. He said that if there were confidence in the economic management of the country, investors would be more apt to put their money in Canada, which would have an immediate effect of increasing the value of the Canadian dollar. As we know, not only was that theme put forward very strongly, but it was also clear from the budget itself and the budget papers that deficit reduction was to be, if not the obsession of the Government of Canada, at least a primary goal. It was claimed that steps to reduce the deficit would have a profound effect in increasing confidence in the management of Canada's finances and in restoring the investment climate in the country.

Well, it is interesting to recall the events of the last few days, because the country has gone through a very deep exchange crisis. The Canadian dollar pierced the 70 cent level and the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada had to undertake huge borrowings and operations in the financial markets. The Governor of the Bank of Canada himself has stated before the House of Commons committee that the actions were unprecedented. He stated that in his experience nothing like this had happened before, or words to that effect. I remind honourable senators what the Governor of the Bank of Canada said before the committee in explanation of the cause of the exchange crisis. He said:

Most of the problem on this most recent occasion has been the spread of negative sentiment regarding the Canadian dollar, based on pessimistic perceptions in financial markets about our economic and financial situation.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada, of course, went on to say that these perceptions were misinformed; that everything was not quite as bad as the international markets thought they were; that, after all, the balance of payments was sound, and the performance of the country, the economy, was better. But despite all of that, the markets had a very pessimistic perception of Canada's economic and financial performance. So it is as if the Minister of Finance, as he prepares his budget for later this month, is starting from the beginning again. As of early February, the international and domestic markets had a very negative impression of what was happening in Canada. The Chairman of the House of Commons committee, Mr. Blenkarn, in a number of trenchant observations, drove home the point that Canadian interest rates at that time were running ahead of American interest rates by 4 per cent, a very substantial spread. When it occurred in the days of Liberal Ministers of Finance, it drew upon their heads the most unrestrained assaults possible. I do not think it ever reached a 4 per cent spread. Occasionally it was below the American interest rate, but Mr. Blenkarn drew that to the attention of the governor of the bank. I must say that he was as scathing on that occasion as he had been on the number of occasions I appeared before the committee and he was a member of the committee. I give him marks for his consistency. However, perhaps his popularity will not be as great. Mr. Blenkarn goes on to say:

● (1550)

In other words, we have a 4 per cent competitive disadvantage in trade, in business, in activity, in everything that goes on in Canada. I was wondering why, in order to scorch a few speculators, we had to burn Canadians and burn the Government of Canada, which is carrying a $200 billion debt, to that extent.

[Senator MacEachen.]

I asked a number of questions of the Leader of the Government in the Senate in an effort to find out why this massive action was delayed for so long. I asked, "Would it not have been more prudent to have shown the hand of the government earlier to restrain the drop in the Canadian dollar and to avoid what became a very hefty increase in interest rates in the next two successive Thursdays?" I have been asking that question and I have not received a satisfactory answer. Perhaps it will be forever a matter of debate. It is my opinion that there has to be an answer given as to why there was the delayed response which resulted in those massive borrowings and that very hefty increase in interest rates in Canada. This is why Mr. Blenkarn said:

I was wondering why . . . we had to burn Canadians and burn the Government of Canada . . . to that extent.

I think it is a damned good question. Obviously, in light of what was happening, the Minister of Finance and the governor of the bank could not sit idly by. That is understood, but why the delay? Is it too much too late? The governor goes on to say:

Well, the objective, Mr. Chairman, was much broader than to burn a few speculators.

He goes on to testify later that, indeed, it was not speculation that had brought about the pressure, in the main, on the Canadian dollar, it was the negative sentiments. One of the members of the committee in the House of Commons had said:

—are you saying that the real culprits in the process were the speculators—

To which the governor replied:

No, I am saying the problem was—and I tried to make the point in my paper—the negative sentiment that had developed.

That is, the negative sentiment that had developed about Canada. It is unfortunate that the Minister of Finance is faced at this point with the necessity of taking another step in his budget to restore confidence in Canada's financial management, because that confidence, according to the evidence of the governor of the bank, is not present and that is what caused this crisis. The governor goes on to say, while listing the reasons why this happened, that the Bank of Canada might have been too soft in resisting this development. Later he says:

The government deficit has been mentioned, and people await the budget with interest.

So, Mr. Wilson is not getting any thanks at all for the substantial revenues and substantial effort which, as Senator Simard has stated, is found in this bill to restore confidence and to reduce the deficit. He is not getting any thanks abroad. Now, Mr. Wilson is even having further additional demands made upon him as he faces the budget. Mr. Rowland Frazee wrote an article recently in the Toronto Star in which he said to the minister those familiar words, that he had taken a step in the right direction. That comment is always made before the real punch comes.

Senator Flynn: You would know about that.

Senator MacEachen: His real punch here is that this is still insufficient, that it does not go far enough. The budget is now the test and he has to perform again. I do not know whether Mr. Frazee expects Mr. Wilson to apply to Canada in proportionate terms the Gramm-Rudman provisions of the United States. People are watching and saying, "Well, if Canada does as well proportionately in deficit reduction as the United States is required to do under its law, then we may have some restoration of confidence." Mr. Frazee said that the deficit has to decrease by between $5 billion and $7 billion over the next two or three years. That is strong medicine. It is easy for the Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of the Royal Bank of Canada to say $5 billion to $7 billion in two or three years. But is that enough? That is the question. Will that be enough to satisfy those members of the market who have such influence on our interest rates and our exchange rates, who are not always right and who can be wrong? Mr. Frazee says—and I find this very interesting—

The hard truth is that in our current fiscal situation, the vast network of social and economic programs that we have grown so used to, so comfortable with, are cumulatively unaffordable at current levels.

● (1600)

In other words, the hard truth is that our vast network of social and economic programs is unaffordable. We traversed that terrain following the last budget, and we know how unacceptable it is to the Canadian people to interfere with what is "unaffordable" in the mind of Mr. Frazee. However, he then goes on to say that reductions can be achieved without eliminating social programs or driving the country into recession. Honourable senators, that is true; you can make huge savings by not eliminating, but by remodelling social programs. That was attempted, and we are resisting a part of that remodelling to be found in the Family Allowance Bill. The government turned back from its efforts to "remodel" the Old Age Security program.

I just want to add one other point from Mr. Frazee's comments, which are very interesting and authoritative. He says the following:

There are three basic messages business should be broadcasting:

1. The deficit and the debt are the most serious economic problems Canada faces, by far;

One could add in parenthesis, as it were, a question: "Why is it that despite the huge swollen deficit of the United States, which has been added to by even the present deficit-cutting President, prosperity is existing and growth is pretty strong in that country? Why is it that in Canada we have our third year of growth, despite this large deficit?" I find that that question has not been addressed by Mr. Frazee, and I think it is an important question.

Mr. Frazee's second message is that major spending cuts are needed and needed urgently and, finally—and this is the hardest point—that business must make specific suggestions as to what should be cut, with a clear willingness to pay its share.

I point out to honourable senators that there are no specific suggestions in this article. There is a very rigorous call for major deficit reduction before the budget from this gentleman who, I believe, is also the chairman of the Business Council on National Issues. Honourable senators, my point is a very simple one. I have referred to it at least twice, and that is that the fiscal plan of the government, which it so boldly announced last May, has really gone up in smoke. It has not convinced the international community. In fact, it has not even avoided the negative sentiment which caused this exchange crisis of a few days ago and has not assuaged the passion of the business community for additional spending cuts and for additional deficit cuts in the forthcoming budget.

Honourable senators, all I can say is that I sympathize deeply with the Minister of Finance who has suddenly been faced with an exchange crisis and with drastically falling oil prices in the few weeks before the budget. I sympathize with him because the fiscal and economic plan which he announced last May has proved to be so inadequate and has fallen so short of bringing about the solutions which he found so easy to apply when in opposition criticizing the former government.

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honorable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Simard speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to thank Senator MacEachen for his lecture on economics and his historical overview. Had I not known that for a number of years, he presided over the federal government's financial administration, I would have been impressed, and I might have taken his predictions and advice more seriously!

Canadians who are tempted to admire the senator's oratorical style and vast experience should remember what the Liberal government was preaching at the time, and all the predictions that failed us financially, socially and economically. In fact, that is why most of the people of this country voted for the Conservative government in September 1984. I will not dwell on this any further, but at the end of my speech I would like to say a few words about Senator MacEachen's last comments, his sombre predictions, his notes of warning and his sympathy with the Minister of Finance, Mr. Wilson, and the problems he will have to solve in his next budget.

Meanwhile, I would like to get back to some specific aspects of Bill C-80.

[English]

Senator MacEachen referred to the government's professed intention of listening to people. I believe that the government did listen to people and did take great care in preparing the legislation. According to Senator MacEachen, only 19 so-called technical amendments suggested by the Canadian Bar Association were accepted by the government. Perhaps that shows to a certain degree the seriousness and the hard work that went into the preparation of the bill. I need not refer to the clauses and the many changes that were introduced, mostly concerning a greater degree of equity, whether we are talking about appeals or whatever, and that are now included in the bill. I suggest that the government did approve these many changes because it did listen to people and to our colleagues, both in the House of Commons and in the pre-study stage of the bill here in the Senate. Tomorrow we will listen further and we will hear what these people have to say about this bill.

● (1610)

It is not quite fair to say that we merely professed the intention of listening to people; we did listen to people—at least the members in the other place and the government listened to people, and I am glad that they did.

[Translation]

The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate referred to the problem that will arise for those working in the prefab sector. Well, we have heard that the problems were mainly a matter of administration and procedure, problems that were difficult to solve both for Revenue Canada and the business community. It is the best solution we have found up to now. If I understand correctly, the government is still examining the problem and will try to find a way to solve it.

I know that in 1963, the government was aware of the problem. (I do not know whether Senator MacEachen was Minister of Finance at the time). After he brought his budget down, he tried to provide some relief in the case of fixed price contracts. But there again, the method for determining what was taxable and what was not, and what was refundable, was extremely complicated, both for Revenue Canada and the business community. That is why the government has not been able to do more in this area.

When Senator MacEachen talks about energy conservation, deep down inside he realizes it would be politically profitable to mention the new tax in that sector. I think however he must admit that the problem is not quite as serious now as it was a few years ago. Perhaps at one time or another there was justification for exempting those products or taxing them at lower rates, but the current situation does not call for anything quite like that now.

Along with my colleagues, I will certainly attend tomorrow's sitting of the Committee on National Finance, and it will be interesting to hear what the Association of Chartered Accountants has to say. I dare hope that the evidence of the Association of Chartered Accountants will be rather challenging. If an amendment is to be introduced, and I hope not, it will not be because we have listened only to lawyers and accountants. I hope nobody will blame us for listening only to professionals, while in fact we did listen to the people before drafting the bill.

Senator MacEachen said that closure was imposed in the House after only three days of debate. I would suggest that those who resorted to—not invented—that method on several occasions are not on this side of the House. The Conservative government did not invent the guillotine. It has been used a lot of times; it was almost common practice in the other place a few years ago when Senator MacEachen was there, but I do not hold that against him.

In addition, Senator MacEachen spent the better part of ten minutes telling us all about Mr. Frazee's comments and concerns. I am duly impressed by Mr. Frazee's comments and advice, but I am just as anxious to hear what others have to say. I think that in the past the government has shown that it did not listen only to bankers, the lead actors on the national or international economic scene.

I am not really afraid, I am not the least worried about the fact that the government might give more consideration to Mr. Frazee's advice, namely the cut-backs he would like to see in social programs. I should think that the government will be able to make a judicious choice among the many recommendations it gets from ordinary Canadians, small businessmen or bankers generally.

Senator MacEachen tells us that confidence does not appear to have been restored. He points the finger at us, he blames us for the dollar crisis and its direct impact on interest rates. He also reminds us of the problems which plague the oil industry. I hope that for a while the government can continue and reach its economic goal. Honourable senators, I am aware that this is not enough and will probably never satisfy Senator MacEachen, a former minister of finance in another government.

I suggest that recent statistical data indicate a clear improvement in the areas of job creation, as well as unemployment and inflation levels. I recognize that a problem still exists. Positive indicators, however, seem to herald better days. I am willing to wait. I truly rely on the government's strategy. It could not be any worse than before 1984, anyway. I remember the time when we had four budgets a year. I could not say whether the Minister of Finance of the time yielded under pressure from Mr. Frazee or anybody else, but he had not much of a choice. In the end, it did not result in any major economic or political success.

● (1620)

In this connexion, I should like to repeat that my colleagues and I fully support the government's economic plan. I urge my honourable friends opposite to wait a few months or years and see. I suggest Canadians are ready to trust this government. Some would like to plead in favour of or protect all those Canadians who do not want to pay any taxes. They came forward last year when the government tried to make changes to the Family Allowance and Old Age Security Pension programs. When we dealt with the green paper on financial institutions and the resulting bill—Bill C-80 I think it was—to impose a minimum tax on banking institutions, some of our friends opposite, after having successfully defended students, as well as people on social welfare and family allowances, etc. felt the need to defend in turn the Royal Bank and the Bank of Montreal, as though the current problem was to continue forever without our ever trying to solve it. I suggest that the government's social programs are responsible and within our means. I urge my honourable friends opposite to give the government a break. I know that Canadians are mature enough to give it a little more time, following their September 1984 decision. Personally, I shall sit tomorrow on the Finance Committee to complete the study of Bill C-80

I should be delighted if the economy lesson given by Senator MacEachen could be the first of a long series of conferences on the subject. This brought to my memory the many conferences of ministers of finance or first ministers which I have attended, as well as Mr. MacEachen's good years, when he was fully convinced that his proposals would get Canada going again, while promising better days economically and socially. I am looking forward to many other lessons from Senator MacEachen. They would certainly be enlightening. To improve the situation, we would be well advised to remember that those years were not so fine and rich in employment for Canadians. I suggest that if we want to prepare tomorrow, we should not imitate the former government and maintain the programs which it implemented or failed to implement. Let us try instead to build a more stable and economically acceptable Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Simard, bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 3:

Hon. Stanley Haidasz moved the second reading of Bill S-8, to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport.

He said: I wish to express my thanks to honourable senators for allowing me to revert to Order No. 3 so as to deliver a few remarks on Bill S-8, to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport. In rising to launch this debate on second reading of this bill, which I introduced in the Senate on February 13, I would like to make it clear that the primary aim of this proposed legislation is to protect the rights of non-smokers, who are now in the majority in Canada. According to a Statistics Canada report of 1982, 62 per cent of Canadians do not smoke. Essentially, this bill is designed to protect non-smokers from the deleterious effects of combustible substances, especially tobacco, found harmful to health. Furthermore, I wish to make it clear that this bill is in no way intended to deprive of their freedom those persons who wish to smoke a legal substance. I am sure we all agree that smokers have the right to smoke. But I also believe that smokers have a definite responsibility, and I would emphasize that it is a moral one, to consider the effect of their smoking on non-smokers. Martin Dewey, a Canadian journalist, in his recent book entitled, Smoke in the Workplace, wrote:

Where the tobacco industry or smokers claim there is a right to smoke, they are talking in code. They are not really asserting a right to smoke, for it is generally conceded that people have every right to do so, just as they have every right to drink pop or chew gum or beat themselves over the head with a board. What they are asserting is a right to smoke at will; that is, to smoke without regard for the consequences to others. They are claiming the right to pollute, and the long and short of it is that there is no such right in society.

Dr. James Repace, a U.S. Environmental Protection Agency expert on the effects of smoking, wrote that smokers have the right to enjoy the risks of smoking, just as they have the right to play Russian roulette. He maintained that when they smoke indoors, however, in the presence of others, they are playing Russian roulette with non-smokers' health. This they do not have the right to do.

A few years ago, Mr. Justice Walter Tarnopolsky of the Supreme Court of Ontario, a former professor of law and a former president of the Canadian Civil Liberties Association, himself a smoker—at least, he was when he made this statement—said:

It would be misdirected to equate the "right" to smoke with such fundamental civil liberties as the right of free speech, the right of assembly, freedom of religion, et cetera. A person's freedom to act must certainly be limited when such acts injure or tend to injure others. The claim of a person to a right to unpolluted air must take precedence over a claim to smoke in public . . . A person's "right" to smoke might more accurately be described as a limited privilege.

Furthermore, I think that all of us would agree that people must be free to choose—at least, that is what we practise in Canada—but that is provided that it is an informed choice. Dr. George Godber, former Chief Medical Officer of England, stated at the United Nations WHO meeting in Geneva four years ago:

That informed choice is hopelessly prejudiced if it has to be made against the constant pressure of sales promotion, always presenting smoking as a sociable, attractive activity of normal men and women in pleasant circumstances. By now we have come to realize that smoking is essentially a form of addiction, which is cleverly reinforced by sales promotion.

The specious argument of the tobacco industry about a right ignores the fundamental interest and responsibility of governments in protecting public health. In all countries, government has the power to intervene to preserve the quality of the environment and to promote public safety and welfare. In the case of tobacco smoking, the scientific evidence of the high rates of lung cancer, cardiovascular disease and other serious tobacco-related diseases in smokers, as well as the ill effects of passive smoking, places an obligation upon governments to act to protect the public. The health of the population has to take precedence over the freedom of the tobacco industry to promote sales of what are known to be harmful products. If I may, I will add to these arguments the wise statement of a famous legislator, Cicero, who stated, in the year 40 B.C. in the Senate of Rome, that the laws of man should put the safety of all above the safety of one.

The World Health Organization's 1982 report entitled, Legislative Action to Combat the World Smoking Epidemic, identified tobacco smoking as one of the serious health hazards of modern times and, what is more tragic, as an avoidable and unnecessary one. The harmful effects of smoking are no longer questioned except, perhaps, by the tobacco industry and stubborn, ill-informed, inveterate smokers. Numerous epidemiologic studies have shown that smoking increases the incidence of carcinoma of the bronchial tubes in the lungs; carcinoma of the pharynx and larynx, pancreas and urinary bladder; cardiovascular diseases, one of which is the dreaded emphysema, bronchitis, asthma allergy. This smoking epidemic has now invaded developing countries, killing 2.5 million people every year. Canada has the shameful record of being the sixth highest per capita consumer of tobacco in the world, after Greece, Japan, the U.S.A., Poland, and Yugoslavia, in that order. Statistics Canada recently revealed that the 40 per cent of Canadians who still smoked in 1982 puffed their way through more than 70 billion cigarettes per year. That cost the smokers $4.4 billion, and that expenditure cost Canada 32,623 lives due to tobacco-related diseases. That is only in addition to the nuisance caused to other people, the incalculable suffering caused to those who died and the cause of 20 per cent of the fires in this country. Furthermore, the financial loss to Canada of this tragedy and folly in 1982 was $7.1 billion. This enormous direct cost to our economy was broken down into $4.6 billion in lost income due to premature deaths, $1.5 billion due to hospitalization costs, $860 million due to disability payments, $30 million due to physician care and $120 million due to fire loss. I should add that these figures did not include extra pharmaceutical costs at home, firefighting services, and the purchase and maintenance of ventilation systems. Our statisticians say that there are also many indirect costs incurred by tobacco smokers.

● (1640)

All this damage is caused by using a tobacco product. This product, as I am sure all honourable senators know, is derived from that wicked plant called nicotiana tabacum, and its other species, nicotiana rustica and persica, purported to have been brought to Europe by Columbus after one of his trips to newly discovered America.

An Hon. Senator: Don't blame us!

Senator Haidasz: Tobacco smoke contains at least 3,800 known toxic chemicals of which 50 are implicated as carcinogens, all affecting adversely certain bodily organs. The main constituents of tobacco smoke are nicotine, carbon monoxide and numerous tar compounds—all major health hazards—and their patho-physiological effects are many.

Time and practice does not permit me, in this circumstance, to go into specific and lengthy details about the patho-physiological effects of tobacco. This information is readily available in easily understandable material, appearing in medical journals and information pamphlets from such organizations as the Addiction Research Foundation in Toronto, cancer societies and anti-smoking advocacy groups. Statistics Canada and the Department of National Health and Welfare are other rich sources of special reports on tobacco smoking and its ill effects.

The essential noxious element dealt with in Bill S-8 is the harmful effect of passive smoking. Involuntary, forced or passive smoking is defined as the exposure of non-smokers to tobacco-combustion produced in the indoor environment. Tobacco smoke in the environment is derived from two sources: the "mainstream" smoke exhaled by a smoker, and "sidestream" smoke arising from the burning end of a cigarette, cigar or pipe tobacco.

Most alarming is the scientific evidence that sidestream smoke contains a higher concentration of dangerous and potentially dangerous gas-phase constituents and particulates; and that the gas phase accounts for approximately 85 per cent of the smoke found in a room occupied by cigarette smokers. About 90 per cent by weight of tobacco smoke is in the gaseous phase and 10 per cent in the particulate phase.

Tobacco smoke, both sidestream and mainstream, contains toxic gases and particulates that reach or are deposited in the tracheo-bronchial region during inhalation, and also in the distant tiny air sacs of the lung called alveoli.

The visible smoke from the tip of a burning cigarette, containing highly concentrated toxic chemicals such as formaldehyde, hydrogen cyanide, and the potent carcinogen N-nitrosodimethylamine become only slightly diluted as smoke drifts horizontally for distances up to three metres.

Furthermore, what is also alarming is that the toxic substances are not removed by standard air filtration systems. It has been estimated that a non-smoker exposed to air heavily contaminated by sidestream and mainstream smoke inhales as much of those toxic substances in one hour as a smoker does by smoking 15 non-filter or 35 filter tip cigarettes.

Passive smoking, or sidestream smoke, is responsible not only for irritations of the eye and nose, but also causes significant impairment of lung function, raised heart rate and also high blood pressure in patients with angina pectoris, as well as dangerous levels of carbon monoxide, which could impair one's driving.

Many pre-existing medical conditions are also aggravated by sidestream smoke. It also causes many acute illnesses of the respiratory system. Sidestream smoke also has long-term effects on the lung function and is also implicated in lung cancer among non-smokers. That is revealed in many scientific reports.

Chemicals present in tobacco smoke, or their metabolites, have been repeatedly detected in samples of blood, urine, saliva and even breast milk of non-smokers exposed to tobacco smoke. Furthermore mutagenic activity, which is cancerous, has been detected in cigarette-contaminated air and in urine samples from non-smokers exposed to such air.

Using data from American journals and other smoking surveys, Doctors Repace and Lowrey estimated that the proportion of non-smokers exposed to tobacco smoke at work or at home to be 86 per cent. They are also exposed to an average of 1.43 milligrams of tobacco smoke particulates per day. Dr. Donald Wigle and Neil Collishaw of the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare wrote an article in 1984 in which they stated that for several of the components in tobacco smoke the recommended exposure in the work place was either zero or not assigned, suggesting that there may not be a safe level for involuntary exposure to tobacco smoke.

Another interesting statistic from those people who are concerned about the dangers of involuntary smoking, particularly in the workplace, is that an average cigarette burns 12 minutes, but the smoker puffs on it for only about 24 seconds. This means that only a small fraction of the smoke produced by the cigarette is directly inhaled by the smoker. Most of the smoke from a burning cigarette is discharged into the surrounding air to be inhaled by others. The other sad fact, as I mentioned before, is that gases are not filtered even by the better mechanical filters that exist in many buildings today. Those gases are recirculated in airtight buildings. Furthermore, most filters do not filter the minute particles in tobacco smoke, as they are smaller than one micron in size.

So, honourable senators, if filters in ventilation systems, particularly in airtight buildings, do not remove the tobacco-generated gases from the air, and let 99 per cent of the toxic particles pass through, I ask, what good are those filters? According to Dr. Repace, a non-smoker who finds himself in a typical workplace situation, with standard ventilation and an average distribution of smokers, can expect to inhale three cigarettes a day, which means that over a working lifetime a non-smoker's risk of lung cancer is 250 times the maximum lifetime value of tobacco smoke considered acceptable.

Dr. Repace also estimated that in order to reduce just the lung cancer risk to non-smokers to an acceptable level, an indoor work area with a typical mix of smokers and non-smokers would require 226 air changes per hour. I maintain that that is an impossible task. Yet, the guidelines of the Treasury Board of February 18, 1985, for minimizing the effects of tobacco smoke in the federal workplace and designed for an interim period of three years, state as follows:

It is not the intention to invoke a smoking ban, nor to incur expenses in reorganizing operational activities, or changing the layout of the work areas or installing or supplementing ventilation systems in order to segregate smokers from non-smokers.

What a totally weak and inadequate effort by Treasury Board to protect smokers and non-smokers alike from the hazards of tobacco smoking! That is why, honourable senators, enforceable legislation is required to protect the health and lives of the workers.

• (1650)

Bill S-8, tabled by me on February 13, is but a first step to achieve better health protection in the federal workplace and in transport vehicles under federal jurisdiction. May I add here that municipalities such as Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg have already taken many steps and introduced ordinances to reduce the harm of tobacco smoke in public places, including restaurants. Mr. Sterling of the Ontario legislature introduced private bill No. 71 just a few weeks ago in which he envisages control of smoking in vehicles under provincial jurisdiction and in the provincial government workplace. Some Canadian airlines, such as Air Maritime and Torontair, have banned smoking on their flights altogether. Bill S-8 would ban smoking on flights of all Canadian airlines, excluding military aircraft, and prohibit smoking in all federal workplaces, as well as businesses under the Canada Labour Code, including Parliament. I believe that this is a first and necessary step.

I am at present working with my legal advisor in the Senate on other federal legislation to regulate the manufacture, promotion, sale and export-import of all tobacco products. This is the only way I believe we can achieve as soon as possible and as much as possible an environment free of tobacco smoke, which should be our ultimate goal in this very important health matter.

Speaking of other ill-effects of tobacco smoke, I think it is a tragedy to learn from Statistics Canada that deaths from lung cancer in women are predicted to surpass those from breast cancer, which is today the number one killer of women in Canada. After all, as I mentioned earlier, tobacco smoking alone took the lives of 32,623 of our fellow citizens in 1982 and cost the Canadian economy $7.1 billion. But the suffering and disability of these people dying from terminal lung cancer and emphysema is very difficult to calculate. As a practising physician for the past 35 years, it is heart-rending to tell these patients dying from terminal cancer and emphysema that their conditions are incurable, that they only have a few weeks or months to live and that they should settle their affairs with themselves, their family and their God.

Honourable senators, I am asking why the Canadian government has not done something about this matter. Do you know that 32,623 deaths in 1982 due to tobacco related diseases is the equivalent of 100 Canadians dying in a plane crash every day? What a great tragedy. Indeed, it is a great national scandal that Canada tolerates—yes, and permits this to happen by allowing the unregulated production, promotion and sale of a harmful and unnecessary product. What a grave indictment of governments that fail to bring in effective legislation to prevent this enormous loss of lives and money. Honourable senators, I ask you, why are governments so slow, so reluctant, so timid, so irresponsible? Is it apathy? Is it fear? Is it stupidity? Or is it votes? Is it the powerful tobacco lobby? Or is it their annual $100 million to advertising agencies? Is it the government's $5 billion annual revenue from taxes on tobacco products? Is it the tobacco companies' donations to political party coffers? Or is it all these reasons? Tell me. Tell the victims of tobacco. Tell Canadians who are burdened with this great human loss and economic cost why the tobacco epidemic is not attacked vigorously and totally by their indifferent fellow citizens, their policy-makers, their politicians, their legislators, their governments. I appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has spoken out against tobacco smoking, to show more courage, initiative and intelligence by bringing forth, without delay, legislation and enforceable regulations to curtail tobacco smoking in Canada. I call upon honourable senators who are associated with the tobacco industry to work within that industry to reform its practices.

Anti-smoking advocacy agencies have told us that there are numerous violations even of the voluntary code existing among the tobacco industries. There are only four tobacco companies in Canada that sell these 70 billion cigarettes. The largest is Imperial Tobacco, followed by Rothmans of Pall Mall and then by R.J. Macdonald Inc. and Benson and Hedges. Some of them are also in the business of selling alcohol, another toxic substance.

Senator Bosa: Leave that one alone.

Senator Haidasz: I appeal to honourable senators to co-operate with the movement to curtail tobacco smoking. Yes, impediments certainly exist, but that is our challenge, a challenge that we face together. I welcome your participation in this debate and a thorough study of Bill S-8 in the appropriate Senate committee.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to express my deep gratitude to my parents who gave me the inheritance of a smoke-free home. I thank my peers for their good example. I am grateful to our legal counsel, Mr. Raymond du Plessis, who helped me to put my ideas in the legal language in which it appears in this bill before us.

Honourable senators, if there is wisdom among us—and I believe there is—and if there is the will—as I believe there should be—and if there is experience—as I am sure there is—then these qualities should be mobilized and employed in the best way possible to improve the quality and quantity of life of our fellow citizens.

I therefore urge honourable senators to take up this challenge with a sense of urgency and determination. This would then be another great opportunity for us in the Senate to serve our people.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès, pursuant to notice of February 18, 1986, moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training and the document entitled: "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.

He said: Honourable senators, this motion and its attendant budget provisions has been approved by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on the recommendation of its steering committee, which agreed to a proposal by the Subcommittee on Employment and Training. The reason we have asked for a change in the budget and for the right to travel is very simple: We discovered that a professor, if asked to come from Toronto to Ottawa, wants a fee of approximately $600 if he is an economist, to which one must add the cost of his aeroplane ticket and his per diem. On the other hand, if a member of our subcommittee who may be travelling with another committee, or who may go to Toronto just for that purpose, visits that professor at his office, the professor is prepared to be taped for three hours for nothing, or perhaps for the price of a lunch.

Professors at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology are prepared to grant a Canadian senator the privilege of a three-hour interview for nothing if the senator attends upon them. However, if one of those professors is asked to come here, he requires a fee of $2,000 or $3,000. That is why we are asking for this privilege of travelling. There will be no increase in the budget of the subcommittee involved. The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has been so advised, and its permission has been granted.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

BUDGET SPEECH

ACCOMMODATION FOR SENATORS IN SENATE GALLERY OF HOUSE OF COMMONS

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators are aware, of course, that the Minister of Finance will deliver his budget speech in the other place on Wednesday, February 26, 1986.

May I be permitted to remind honourable senators that none but senators will be admitted to the Senate Gallery of the House of Commons on that occasion. This step is being taken for the purpose of providing accommodation in the gallery for as many senators as possible, and so that senators will not be excluded from the gallery on account of many of the places being occupied by relatives and friends of senators.

May I add that such instructions were first issued in 1931 by the then Speaker of the Senate, the Honourable P. E. Blondin, and this practice has been followed ever since by succeeding Speakers.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

MEMBERS OF COMMITTEE ON ECONOMICS AND SCIENCE OF NATIONAL ASSEMBLY OF REPUBLIC OF KOREA

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I draw to your attention the presence in the gallery of members of the Committee on Economics and Science of the National Assembly of the Republic of Korea. They are in Canada on a fact finding tour. The membership of the committee is: Mr. Han-Koo Oh, leader; and Mr. Jim Lee, Mr. Johng-Moon Park, Mr. Sang-Koo Chung and Mr. Young-Seng Kim, members.

I am particularly pleased, honourable senators, speaking as one who has spent a great deal of time in opposition, that the delegation contains two members of the official opposition.

Senator Hastings: Liberals?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I am pleased to table the third report of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence.

On motion of Senator Lafond, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

EXCISE TAX ACT EXCISE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. William M. Kelly, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, presented the following report:

Thursday, February 20, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

THIRTEENTH REPORT

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, to which was referred Bill C-80, intituled "An Act to amend the Excise Tax Act and the Excise Act and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof", has, in obedience to its Order of Reference of Wednesday, February 19, 1986, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment but with the following observations and recommendation.

The Committee commends the government for its effort to increase taxpayer rights by amending the collection and refund provisions of the Excise Tax Act. However, the Committee questions the proposed changes to this Act as found in clauses 34 and 37 of Bill C-80 which give the government power to audit and assess for a four-year period while entitling taxpayers to refunds for only the most recent two-year period. Under the current legislation, taxpayers are eligible for refunds for a four-year period in the case of routine transactions and for a one-year period in the case of judicial or ministerial interpretations. Because of the discriminatory nature of the one-year refund period, the government has proposed amendments which standardize and limit all refund requests to the immediate two-year period, but which leave the government with the power to assess for the immediate four-year period.

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants notified the Minister of Finance, the Minister of National Revenue, and the Legislative Committee on Bill C-80 of this inequity. Since the government chose not to make such a change at this time, the Committee wishes to remind the government of the comment made by the Minister of State (Finance) on third reading of this Bill in the other place. She said: "people who made representations concerning the provisions of this Bill can be assured that their views will be considered extensively and taken into account whenever further changes of those acts are contemplated." Accordingly the Committee recommends to the government that the refund and assessment period be the same and that this change be introduced the next time the Excise Tax Act is considered for amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

W. M. KELLY
Deputy Chairman

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that this bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, unless the mover wishes to speak to the motion, I would like to say something with respect to this bill. I want to underline the nature of the remarks that were contained in the report of the committee that was just read to us.

I feel quite strongly about this matter. Since I first became a legislator in the Legislature of Nova Scotia some 40 years ago, I have always been very strongly opposed to provisions of this kind which impose an obligation upon the citizen and do not impose a corresponding obligation upon the government. I think that the discriminatory nature of the right to re-assess payments that have been made in excess of those required and to obtain a refund therefor, which applies to citizens for only a two-year period and, on the other hand, applies to the government's review for a four-year period, is inequitable. I therefore hope that the assurance which the minister is reported to have given to a committee in the other place will indeed be taken seriously, and that before too long, this inequity will be corrected.

In the meantime, I am opposed to the passage of this bill and will ask that, if indeed it does pass in this house, its passage be recorded as on division.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I have no objection to the comments of Senator Hicks, but I would like to point out to him that if he were to defeat this bill—and I know that is not his intention—we will be faced with a one-year period instead of a two-year period, and therefore I think he might be going a little too far in his opposition.

Senator Hicks: I suppose half a loaf is better than none.

Senator Flynn: Yes, that is what I meant.

[Senator Kelly.]

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PHILIPPINES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—ATTITUDE OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, during the last few days I have been raising questions with the Leader of the Government about the attitude of the Government of Canada to the election in the Philippines. I was pleased when I received today a copy of a communiqué issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because I hoped that it would contain a clearcut questioning of the legitimacy of the election in the Philippines, as was the case yesterday in Washington when the Secretary of State there described that election as fraudulent. Therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government: Why is it that the statement of the Canadian government on this election is so wishy-washy? Is there any reason why the government has not been more definite, positive and firm, as the leader himself was a day or two ago, in questioning the legitimacy of the election in the Philippines?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to tell my honourable friend that the press release which he has just read is not the last word. It is a preliminary statement, and I expect that, probably tomorrow, further action will be taken by the Government of Canada which will, perhaps, be more in line with my honourable friend's views on this matter. I am not at liberty, at the moment, to say what action will be taken.

Senator MacEachen: I am surprised. I think I should make known to honourable senators the reason for my concern at this statement. The Secretary of State for External Affairs begins by saying:

The Canadian government is gravely concerned about allegations of widespread irregularities and abuses leading up to, during, and subsequent to the recent elections in the Philippines.

I cannot understand why the government expressed concern at the "allegations" and not at the "widespread irregularities." Why should we be concerned about allegations when, in fact, the irregularities have occurred? Maybe it is bad drafting, but it certainly gives a very wishy-washy impression of Canadian policy.

I go on to read a further paragraph which states:

The Canadian government notes, with concern, that a number of respected religious organizations, including the Conference of Catholic Bishops, has denounced the elections as fraudulent.

Why should the Canadian government be concerned that they have denounced the elections as fraudulent? Surely, it should be saying, "We agree with them." I do not believe that we should be expressing concern that organizations in the Philippines have denounced the election as fraudulent when the Leader of the Government himself, admittedly, as he stated, expressing his own feelings, questioned the legitimacy of the election. In view of the fact that the Secretary of State of the United States, who, the Leader of the Government in the Senate acknowledged several days ago, represents the country with special relations with the Philippines, went much further, I cannot understand this.

Has the Leader of the Government read the release, or has the Secretary of State for External Affairs read the release? Because it really worsens our situation rather than helps it.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry if my honourable friend does not like the wording of the release that has been issued. I have to tell him that I, myself, think that different words could have been used effectively.

But the real crux of the matter is: What does the government intend to do about it besides issue press releases? It intends to do something. I hope that an announcement may be made tomorrow as to what that action will be, although I may be mistaken and it may not be made tomorrow. To the best of my knowledge at the present time, my honourable friend can expect a further statement at that time.

Senator MacEachen: I take it, then, that the Leader of the Government finds this statement unacceptable. I find it unacceptable because it is very unsatisfactory.

May I ask whether the government has sent congratulations to the President of the Philippines, in view of this wishy-washy statement which expresses nervously a concern that anybody in the Philippines should question the election? Has the government congratulated Marcos?

Senator Roblin: I congratulate my honourable friend because he is certainly making the most of this little press release.

I am not exactly in a position to tell him that I share his views on this matter. I can tell him that no congratulations have been sent to the President of the Philippines.

Senator MacEachen: Has it been decided by the government not to have a Canadian representative at the inauguration of President Marcos, if that inauguration does take place?

Senator Roblin: I think that after further information has been made available to the country tomorrow, or by the beginning of next week, my honourable friend will find that his questions have been answered.

Senator MacEachen: Why is it that we have to wait? We have asked this question several times in the Senate. The minister has issued a press release which is clearly unsatisfactory and which the Leader of the Government finds unsatisfactory. Now we are told to wait until next week. Can the leader explain to us why we must wait if we cannot be told what is going to happen?

Senator Roblin: When my honourable friend has seen the measures the government is taking, he will understand that a delay of a day or two is not out of the question.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate agree to assist the Secretary of State for External Affairs in drafting the second statement of the government's intention so that the wording will be more felicitous than that of the first statement?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that I will respond to that in the affirmative because I am not entirely sure that I could do a better job myself. However, I will call upon my honourable friend if I get into trouble, and perhaps he can assist me.

Senator Stewart: I will be prepared to help.

Senator Flynn: God forbid!

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, Senator MacEachen complains about waiting for an answer on the Philippines question. He does not know what waiting is! I have been waiting for a year for an answer on sugar-beets.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Fairbairn: I should like to ask once again the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether there have been any skeleton cabinet meetings, or cabinet meetings of any description, in the past days or this morning which might place him in the position of being able to give us a date on which we can expect an announcement on the government's stand on a national sugar sweetener policy and the stabilization payments for the 1983 crop year for the sugar-beet industry.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think any member of the Senate is more conscious than I of the, perhaps, legitimate impatience of my honourable friend.

I can tell my honourable friend nothing more than I have already said to her this week on two occasions.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I thank the government leader. We have clearly placed a good deal of faith in his representations. He clearly has more opportunity to make them and to put some pressure on to expedite this matter further next week. I would ask him if, in his efforts to do so, I could assist him by giving him a copy of all of the questions that have been asked by me and my colleagues in the past many months. I have thrown a couple of speeches in, as well as some correspondence that I have had with the government on this issue. I should tell honourable senators that although it seems like there were some 923 questions, there are actually some 23 or 24 which I have asked, plus some others having been put by my colleagues. This material might be of some use to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: As a needler, my honourable friend ranks among the best. I have to tell her that I will be very happy to have any information that she cares to give me. If it makes her feel any better, I have a special file in my office which is headed up with her name and inscribed with the topic "Sugar-beets". Every question she has asked and every speech she has made in this house or wherever else I have stumbled across it forms part of that record. She can rest assured that she has a faithful ally in me.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

PHILIPPINES PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—POSSIBLE RECALL OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question with regard to the Philippines. I wonder if the government has given consideration to recalling the Canadian ambassador for further instruction on the clear disapproval of the Canadian government with regard to the activities during the recent election in that country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can give my honourable friend the same answer that I gave to the Leader of the Opposition.

RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH IRAN

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Canada has always played a prominent role in the promotion of peace and stability on the international scene.

Senator Flynn: Who has?

Senator Bosa: Canada, through Mr. Pearson and Mr. Trudeau.

Senator Phillips: You are saying that Mr. Trudeau did not?

Senator Bosa: Mr. Trudeau and Mr. Pearson played a very important role in international affairs.

Senator Phillips: By that you are saying that Mr. Trudeau did not?

Senator Bosa: No, I am emphasizing that Mr. Trudeau also played an important role in international affairs.

In light of the increased hostilities between Iran and Iraq in the Gulf area, has the government taken any new initiatives to re-establish diplomatic relations with Iran?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Not that I am aware of, honourable senators.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he tell us whether he believes that the Canadian electorate has indicated that it only wants to be blind-sided once?

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My beliefs are really not germane to the issue, but I know that my honourable friend does not like to be blind-sided.

Senator Sinclair: I did not realize that the government leader was active in these matters, but perhaps he could assist us by telling us why the Canadian dollar continues at a level below 75 cents U.S. when his leader is continually pointing out that he should be congratulated on all the things that he has done. Why is it that the Canadian dollar is still wallowing in the slough of despair?

Senator Roblin: I am not so sure that it is all that bad. The dollar is now approaching 72 cents U.S. which is a decided improvement over the level to which it fell in recent times. But I defer to my honourable friend; he is an expert in money.

Senator Sinclair: Perhaps the Leader of the Government would take some action, along with his colleagues, to try to assist those people who are suffering because of the very high real interest rate, which has followed as a consequence of the fall in value of the dollar.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has been around for some time. He has seen the activities of this government and of other governments in defending the Canadian dollar. He knows the role of interest rates in that struggle, so he can answer his own question.

Senator Sinclair: I would rather have the government leader's answer. I am not the government.

Senator Roblin: And rather a good thing, too.

Senator Sinclair: He is, though, for a while.

INDUSTRY

AEROSPACE—ALLOCATION OF SERVICE CONTRACTS

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, yesterday I asked the government leader some questions regarding the aerospace industry in Manitoba. I referred, in particular, to the problems that seem to be arising regarding a contract for the repair of CF-18 aircraft and the Bristol Aerospace Company in Winnipeg. Normally, when the Leader of the Government replies, he says that we cannot question him, as a minister, with regard to the advice he gives the government. However, in his reply yesterday he did not reply as a minister, but as a senator. He stated:

... I will certainly do whatever I can, as a senator from Manitoba ...

Therefore, I am asking questions of the Leader of the Government as a senator and not as a minister. Can he tell me what advice he has given to the government, and, as a senator from Manitoba, what action he proposes to take in this matter, which is now becoming urgent?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I really cannot be a split personality. I can tell my honourable friend that I will promote the interest of this particular issue as a minister of the government.

Senator Molgat: The Leader of the Government replied yesterday as a senator. As a supplementary, I point out that my concern is as to the advice he is giving the government as a senator from Manitoba. Right now jobs are being lost in Manitoba.

Senator Flynn: It would be out of order.

Senator Molgat: If Senator Flynn wishes to get into the discussion, he may do so.

Senator Flynn: On a point of order, the honourable senator cannot put a question to Senator Roblin as a senator, but only as a minister. The honourable senator should look up the rules. He is Chairman of the Standing Rules and Orders Committee.

Senator Molgat: Senator Flynn, I am quite aware of the rule. If Senator Flynn also read the rules, he would find that they say that senators should not interrupt other senators who are speaking. They may rise on a point of order.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molgat: The honourable senator is welcome to rise on a point of order whenever he wishes, but the house would really appreciate it, Senator Flynn, if you would not—

Senator Flynn: What are you doing now?

Senator Molgat: Let me get back to the question. I recognize that I must ask the Leader of the Government the question as a minister, and I did that; but he responded to me as a senator. It was his response, not mine. Therefore, I am asking him what advice he gave.

Senator Roblin: It is too bad that when a point of order is raised and it is legitimate, my friend does not respect it.

Senator Molgat: Yes, I did. I sat down.

THE SENATE

MEETING OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, in the absence of the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, may I put a question to Senator Macquarrie, the deputy chairman of that committee? It is rumoured that the Senate will not sit next week. I am wondering if the deputy chairman can indicate whether or not the committee will be meeting.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, having an orderly and tidy mind, I was waiting until the Senate had made some decision about what to do about next week. When it had done so, I was going to announce, as an exercise in supererogation, that Senator van Roggen had asked that the Committee on Foreign Affairs meet at the usual time, that is on Tuesday at 11 a.m., when the witness will be Mr. Horace Barber, the former Governor of the Bank of Jamaica and the Alternate Executive Director of the World Bank. We look forward to seeing Senator Bosa there.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

FAMINE RELIEF—REPORTED BREACH OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN GOVERNMENT OF CANADA AND GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, so that our records will be complete on this subject, may I return to another subject which I raised earlier with the Leader of the Government, namely, the francophone summit? I had asked the Leader of the Government whether there was any disagreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec with respect to the proceedings at the francophone summit. More particularly, I asked whether the Government of Canada felt that the agreement, or the entente, had been breached in any way by the substantive proposal made by Premier Bourassa made with respect to the provisioning of European food for African countries. The Leader of the Government said that there was no breach, that the ministers in attendance were satisfied that everything was as it should have been.

I am confused by statements emanating from Paris which state—and here I quote from today's Citizen. The Prime Minister:

added sternly that if Quebec breaks that rule at the next francophone summit to be held in Quebec City . . . that'll be the first and last time, it's just that simple. Do it to me once, blind-side me once, (and) you've got a problem the next time we have a meeting.

Of course, the newspapers are full of the statement by the Prime Minister, which is quite direct, colourful, and can only be associated with the Premier of Quebec.

Does the Leader of the Government now accept the view of the Prime Minister, or is he going back to the view of Mr. Bouchard, whom he quoted the other day, the view being that the Prime Minister is unhappy and dissatisfied that, according to his views, this entente has been breached.

• (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I confess frankly that I am having a hard time with newspaper reports. There seems to be a difference of nuance in what we have heard. My honourable friend thinks it is considerably more than that. I will say that my brief at the present time has not changed. However, I will be very glad to make further inquiries, and if there is any further information I can obtain on this matter, I will pass it on to my honourable friend.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I would appreciate it. I think we ought to know exactly what the view of the Government of Canada is and what incident the Prime Minister had in mind when he used the expression "blind-side." It is a pretty rough one. It is not quite "Versailles" language, if I may so say.

Senator Roblin: I know one thing for sure, if my honourable friend had been there, it would have been "Versailles" language.

Senator Flynn: I doubt it.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not want to be too insistent, but I want to tell the Leader of the Opposition—

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Opposition?

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government—that we will be wanting to know when we resume exactly what the attitude of the Prime Minister is. Was the “blind-side” comment directed to the President of France, one of his other colleagues or to Mr. Bourassa? We would like to know.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, now that we have my status clarified, I can say that I will take my honourable friend's observations under advisement.

Senator MacEachen: I do not want advisement, I want answers.

Senator Roblin: Well, I am using “Versailles” language.

Senator MacEachen: Good.

FISHERIES AND OCEANS

WHEREABOUTS OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, though I agree wholeheartedly with the Leader of the Government that one should not lend too much credence to reports of the media, there is one that appeared in the Globe and Mail of last Friday which concerns me as a Maritimer. It is very short, and I shall read it. It says:

After cutting 200 jobs from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, Fisheries Minister Thomas Siddon was eager to get out some good news in several places across the country, including Halifax.

As the minister was in British Columbia, his parliamentary secretary, Mel Gass,—

Mr. Gass is a member of Parliament for the constituency of Malpeque in Prince Edward Island. The quotation continues:

—was sent to Halifax yesterday to give the glad tidings to the East Coast fishing establishment. Trouble is, according to DFO sources, Mr. Gass caught the wrong plane, ended up in Toronto and missed the planned Halifax press conference.

As a Maritimer concerned for another Maritimer who is a colleague in this Parliament and who was acting in a quasi-ministerial capacity, could I ask the Leader of the Government, has he been found yet?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have had a number of questions asked of me this session, but that is one I cannot answer.

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, for the third reading of the Bill C-74, intituled: “An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 and the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and to provide for certain matters in relation to the 1981 decennial census”.—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make some comments on this particular bill. In fact, I want to weep some angry tears over the replacement of the amalgam method by the inferior system contained in Bill C-74. I want to express my deep regret at the loss of ten seats which were to have been provided to the Atlantic provinces under the existing law and which will now be removed by the adoption of this particular bill. I wish to express my own interest in this particular subject, since it was once my responsibility to provide a solution to the problems experienced in 1974 with regard to the representation of Canada. Prior to the 1974 election, as President of the Privy Council, I put before the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections a number of alternative proposals. Of course, a number of members of that committee also had ideas, but ultimately the method outlined in the act which is now being replaced was introduced into the House of Commons on December 2, 1974, by the then President of the Privy Council, the Honourable Mitchell Sharp. It was adopted by the House and, subsequently, by the Senate. In his statement at the time, Mr. Sharp outlined the principles which were the source of the provisions of that bill incorporating the amalgam method. The amalgam method was adopted because of the general dissatisfaction at that time with the then existing system. For example, provinces which had not lost any of their population were losing seats under the system that prevailed prior to 1974. Other provinces, such as Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland were already at their Senate floor level or were very close to it. Indeed, the province of Quebec was slated to lose two seats at that time. The urban centres were experiencing explosive growth and the rural members were faced, because of the freeze on the size of the House, with representing larger and larger areas and larger and larger numbers of electors. We had many discussions prior to the introduction of the bill. Indeed, a separate bill was introduced in 1973 to suspend the operation of the Representation Act. On that occasion Mr. Mazankowski, speaking on behalf of rural members, made the following comment:

—even those provinces which do not stand to lose seats under the redistribution process now before the House will lose rural representation very heavily. These rural ridings are swelling to unmanageable proportions and as a rural representative I simply cannot accept this proposition.

It may be of interest to honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: In territory or in numbers?

• (1440)

Senator MacEachen: In territory and in numbers. Pardon me, I should say in territory. Senator Flynn is correct, but the

REPRESENTATION BILL, 1985

THIRD READING

On the Order:

situation that existed at that time was brought about by the fact that, even though the population of Canada had increased by 7.5 million between 1951 and 1971, the membership in the House of Commons had remained virtually unchanged. What was then to be done to provide a representation system that would reconcile the undoubted principle of representation by population with the particular requirements of the smaller provinces which have been treated differently in our country for a very long time and, at the same time, to acknowledge the pivotal role of Quebec in the representation system? The value of the amalgam system was that it reconciled, in a workable way, those three contending principles and it did give some breathing room, for example, to the smaller provinces.

I find it very hard to understand why it is that the government has made a proposal which will have the effect of removing ten seats from the Atlantic provinces, to which they are entitled under the present law, and which would be available to them, according to present projections, after the census of 2001. Honourable senators, that is just 15 years away and it is not a very long time in the perspective of a region or a country. Not only will the Atlantic provinces be frozen at their present level of 32 seats forever, but their clout, their proportion, their influence in the federal system will be reduced. That is if we believe that a member of Parliament is a source of influence, and I happen to believe that.

Therefore, honourable senators, I make reference to the case of the smaller provinces because their needs are ignored in this bill, whereas they were fully recognized, or at least attended to, under the amalgam method. After all, it is not as if the amalgam method, which we are now discarding on the recommendation of the government, was shoved down the throats of the House of Commons or of the Senate. The fact of the matter is that at third reading the bill was adopted unanimously without a dissenting voice; not on division; not under closure, but by the consent and willingness of the four parties which existed in the House of Commons at that particular time. It is true that at second reading there were some misgivings which were reflected in the vote, but when the bill received third reading, obviously whatever problems that had existed had been removed.

Honourable senators, there were some rather good parliamentarians involved in the arrangements that were worked out at the time, including Mr. Stanley Knowles, who represented his party in the deliberations and who said in his speech:

I think an arrangement has been worked out that should see us through a few decades, and I think it will be looked upon as an improvement over what we had.

Senator Flynn: That was in 1974?

Senator MacEachen: Yes, in 1974.

Senator Flynn: Up to 1994?

Senator MacEachen: The representative of the Social Credit Party, the late Mr. Fortin said, and I quote:

Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Sharp) for having introduced Bill C-36 . . .

Generally speaking, our party is satisfied with Bill C-36. We are glad that the government accepted to propose, to use the so-called 'amalgam' formula which seems by far the best of all proposed formulas.

I agree with Mr. Fortin. It is the best of all the so far proposed formulas—and it is being rejected in this bill.

At that time, as I have said, there were four parties in the House of Commons and on third reading they all accepted the bill. There was no dissent and we proceeded with unanimity to its implementation. The situation today is quite unlike that situation. The New Democratic Party opposes this bill; the Liberal Party opposes this bill. The proposals of the President of the Privy Council, Mr. Hnatyshyn, have not received the consent of the two other parties in the House of Commons. In fact, in order to get the bill out of the House of Commons, the President of the Privy Council had to put the bill under time allocation or closure. That is my first point: The amalgam method as found in the present law was accepted unanimously. The method being proposed in Bill C-74 is opposed by the opposition parties and it has been put through by time allocation.

However, honourable senators, there is another point that must be addressed, and that is that when the dissolution of Parliament took place prior to the last election, the process had almost been completed. The commissions, under the existing law, had done their work. Their reports were before the House of Commons and were about to be debated. There was absolutely no outcry at that time from any party, that I can recall, against the system or about the number of seats that it would produce for any election subsequent to the 1981 census. Therefore, it comes to me as a deep disappointment that, with that background of general support, the government, on its own, following the election, saw fit to bring in a new system which, as I have stated, ignores the needs of the smaller provinces totally and freezes the representation of the Atlantic provinces for the foreseeable future, to the year 2001, at 32 seats when, under the present law, those four Atlantic provinces could grow, under the projections provided, to 42 members. The reasons given by the President of the Privy Council are not very convincing. I know it is more expensive to have a larger house, and he has given certain estimates of expenses. I do not think that that should be the decisive consideration, in view of certain expenditures made by the present government with which we disagree and which amount to billions of dollars. I take the example of the American Coast Guard vessel that went through our territorial waters without our consent while the Government of Canada remained silent. In order to recover the situation, the government subsequently committed itself to build a new vessel which will likely cost much more than the additional cost of the representation under the amalgam method up to the year 2001. I do not regard consideration of cost as a convincing reason.

● (1450)

The second reason is that a larger house will deny members an opportunity to participate. I cannot believe that a parliamentarian of experience would make that comment, because even today, with a house of 282 members, you will find that the burden upon the member of Parliament is so heavy, in terms of attendance in the House of Commons, in committee, in the constituency and elsewhere, that there is difficulty in manning the committees themselves. At least, that was my experience when I was Leader of the Government in the House of Commons for quite a number of years. Even though we had a majority, it was difficult to man the committees; not because members were goofing off—not at all—but because they had a great amount of work to do. Anyone who has been a member in the House of Commons knows that even today members, particularly from the Atlantic provinces, are over-stretched. Don't tell me anything about that. I represented a rural riding with six counties, and if it so happens under this bill, as it will, that the eastern areas of Nova Scotia are rearranged so that there will be only two seats, for example, on the Island of Cape Breton, then the work of those two members will be almost unbearable.

Senator Stewart proposed an amendment to relieve this situation for three provinces—Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Manitoba. Why was it not possible to accept that amendment so that at least the pressure would be lightened upon the members from those provinces?

I regret very much that this bill has been introduced, and I regret very much that, because of the circumstances of the Senate, I cannot defeat the bill, because it is a bad bill. At the first opportunity, the House of Commons will move to correct the defects of this bill.

Why is it, honourable senators, that the additional seats that are provided for in this bill must all go to the three large provinces—Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia?

● (1500)

The President of the Privy Council introduced a bill which provided, initially, for 289 seats. The additional seven seats were conferred upon British Columbia, Alberta and Ontario. Please believe me when I say that I respect absolutely the requirements of these growing provinces. But in further debate, the number of additional seats already given to those three provinces was further enlarged. The bill was amended to increase the representation in the House of Commons to 295 seats, an increase of 13 seats in total, and all going to the larger provinces, with the smaller provinces being ignored and Quebec frozen. I speak about the method, but, as a senator from the Atlantic provinces, I express my displeasure and my regret that some lightening of the burden imposed upon those provinces was not effected.

Honourable senators, I am not appalled at the idea of growth in the size of the House of Commons, for the reasons which I have already stated. It would require some alteration in mentality, and some rearrangements in the operation of the House of Commons, perhaps, but I do not think that that is a decisive consideration. If, as the projections reveal, the ultimate increases by the year 2001 under the amalgam method were considered to be beyond what could be accepted by the government, then why was some consideration not given to an increase in the representation of the smaller provinces? Why all the growth to the larger provinces? And why was it not possible for the government to accept the reasonable amendment that would have provided some abatement for three smaller provinces? The case of Newfoundland is really a scandal. The size of the province has been disregarded, as has the burden caused by the greater numbers of people that members will have to represent.

I make the case for the Atlantic provinces, but I also make the broader case that the provisions in this bill have twisted the needs of the country and put them into a straitjacket in which the country will not live as it had to live for a long period of time, with a growth of 7.5 million people and no growth in the membership of the House of Commons.

I am not going to go into all of the political considerations which occur to me, but I must say that I do not understand why the government could not have given some consideration to the Atlantic region of Canada.

With the projected increases in population, the present law would have given the Atlantic provinces 42 seats by the year 2001. That law is being amended and the Atlantic provinces are being frozen for the foreseeable future at 32 seats. Newfoundland would have received some additional seats, as would Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Prince Edward Island, of course, would have remained with the Senate floor.

Another bizarre result of this bill is that the election of 1988 will be fought on the census of 1971. The provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, which, under this bill, and under the present law, are entitled to substantial increases in the number of seats, will be denied those increases unless one can guarantee that the Prime Minister will not hold an election until the late fall of 1988. It would be very normal and, indeed, likely that the Prime Minister would consider calling an election in the spring of 1988.

Senator Flynn: That is what you did before!

Senator MacEachen: That would be normal and likely. But there would be a great hue and cry from the provinces of Alberta, Ontario and British Columbia, saying: "Do not have an election until we have our additional seats." The Prime Minister has put himself into the situation where the timing of the next election is no longer in his hands. The next election should be fought on the conclusions of the representation commissions, which had almost completed their work following the census of 1981. The Conservative Party in the House of Commons had participated and had raised no objection to the system in place, yet suddenly after the last election the process was arrested and now we are being cast into a totally new representation system.

Honourable senators, I make these points because they are very important points and because we have not heard the end of this bill. It may receive Royal Assent at an early date, but it is a "sleeper" that will come back to bedevil the country in the year 1988, and at the earliest possible moment Parliament will move to change the unfair provisions of this bill, particularly those unfair provisions relating to the smaller provinces.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Just for clarification, and with a short preamble, would Senator MacEachen permit a question?

I do not want to get into a discussion as to whether or not we should have a larger House of Commons, as was anticipated under the amalgam formula, but since we have no quarrel with regard to the projection of population, and since you have twice mentioned what you refer to as the "reasonable amendment" proposed by Senator Stewart, and since those of us from the Atlantic region do not want to take a back seat to anyone with respect to the protection of our interests, and our entitlements—which I refer to as our rightful claim—I ask Senator MacEachen to tell us how we could defend our credibility if we were to promote the consequences of Senator Stewart's formula, which shows our population remaining constant at 9.2 per cent, at 9.1 per cent and at 9.3 per cent, and our representation in the House of Commons going to 11.4 per cent from 9.2 per cent, to 12.7 per cent from 9.1 per cent, and finally to 13.5 per cent from 9.3 per cent? Could we be credible in the eyes of the other provinces if we were to promote that?

Senator MacEachen: I think that Senator MacDonald has raised a very interesting point. Never has this country established its representation system solely on the basis of population. That is the answer—that we represent provinces and that if they are to have their place in Confederation, then—if I understood the question, perhaps I did not—I do not think that we can rely entirely upon strict representation by population. We are not modelled on a Greek city state in this country. That is why, please believe me, I am not opposing the necessary increase of members in those provinces with very rapidly growing populations, but I am conscious of the role of a province like Nova Scotia and Manitoba. If the amalgam formula had not been adopted, Nova Scotia, in the Commons today, would have one fewer seat, as would Manitoba. I do not think that, for a province like Nova Scotia or Manitoba, one more seat would stretch my credibility very much, particularly if one does not believe that arithmetic is the sole determinant, and the country has never agreed to that.

● (1510)

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, would Senator MacEachen permit a question? Does not Senator MacEachen realize that the amendment which I was proposing addressed itself, in its first part, specifically, to the redistribution based on the census of 1981? My proposed amendment would have imposed a statutory obligation on the Parliament of Canada to review the situation immediately after the next census, so that the kind of situation that Senator MacDonald refers to could have been anticipated and dealt with adequately by Parliament.

Senator Phillips: The answer is no.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, I realize that. I thought that the amendment which Senator Stewart put forward was the minimal amendment that could be made in the circumstances, because it would not be possible for the Senate to redraw the whole bill; it would not be unreasonable to ask the minister to consider adding three more seats in addition to those which he had already added for the larger provinces. The review that would subsequently be made would consider what the next phase might be. I thought that the purpose of the amendment was really an effort to overcome an immediately urgent unfairness. I had certainly thought of other amendments, but here was one that was hard to turn down, in my opinion, because it was for a term specific.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have no desire to hold up passage of this bill this afternoon, so I will be brief. I have followed the discussion of Bill C-74 with care and with a mounting anxiety. I wish to thank Senator Stewart in particular for his efforts to force attention on the basic issues involved in this legislation. I use the word "force" deliberately because it really is the case. This issue of changing the representation in the House of Commons is so complex that it has been extraordinarily difficult for Senator Stewart and others to impress upon their colleagues some of the very basic concerns which ultimately will affect the regional balance in Parliament for years to come. This has not been an area in which I have had any particular expertise, and it has been mainly because of the persistence of Senator Stewart and others on the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs that I have made a point of trying to come to grips with the implications behind the reassuring words that have accompanied the introduction of this legislation by the government. My uneasiness has grown into some alarm at these future implications, which, in terms of my province of Alberta, might not be that far in the future.

I, like Senator MacEachen, have a feeling that this bill is a "sleeper" in that many people, even those active in politics and political organizations, may have the impression that the system is unfolding as it should simply because a bill has been passed. They may be in for one heck of a shock if an election is called in a year or so and the old rules are still in place. It is for this reason, honourable senators, that I wish to register my very real concern that the process which has produced this bill may already have jeopardized the opportunity of the province of Alberta and its sister province of British Columbia to finally claim the extra representation which they deserve in the House of Commons because of the growth of their populations over the last two decades.

Currently, as honourable senators are aware, Alberta has 21 seats in the House of Commons. Had the present system of electoral adjustment been completed and ready for the next election—a process which was in the final stages, as others have said, prior to the 1984 election—based on the census of 1981, Alberta would enjoy six more seats, for a total of 27; British Columbia would have five more, for a total of 33. Under this process, the number of seats in the House of Commons would have risen from 282 to 310, in total, which obviously would have entailed physical adjustment to accommodate such an increase and, indeed, even larger increases in the years ahead. Certainly that is a substantive change, but, in a democracy such as ours, I do not believe that the fairness of regional and provincial representation of the Canadian people in their Parliament should be a secondary consideration to the physical accommodation of members in the House of Commons. Naturally, that point of view is debatable. That is why, in part, we are wrestling with this current bill. The government did not choose to proceed with the work that had already been done and nearly completed prior to the last election in 1984. It decided to begin again and to work out a system whereby the physical size of our House of Commons would not be dramatically changed in the foreseeable future, but a new arrangement of distribution would be made which, in some way, would fairly reflect population growth areas of this country without being unfair to the smaller provinces.

Unfortunately, as Senator Stewart, Senator MacEachen and others have tried valiantly to warn us, this bill does contain mechanisms which will act to the disadvantage of smaller provinces, most particularly Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, in the future. The bill will provide five new seats for Alberta, which is one less than the current formula would have done, and it will provide a similar increase for British Columbia. However, because this new bill did not get under way in the House of Commons until last fall, these additional seats are very much at risk in terms of the next election, when these two provinces may experience the worst of all possible electoral worlds. Should the government choose to call an early election in 1987 or in 1988, which is quite possible, the machinery to carry out such an election under the provisions of this new bill will not be in place. There will be no extra seats for Alberta—not six, not five, but the same old 21, which is highly unfair to the citizens of that province, as well as to the citizens of British Columbia, where the same situation would prevail.

● (1520)

As I said earlier, I fear that this issue is a “sleeper” and the cold reality may not hit in the affected areas until it is too late to protest. Given the scope of the issue in that it touches every area in this country, there really has been very little debate on this bill in this chamber, which did not receive it until just before the Christmas recess.

The government, despite all the best efforts, has not been persuaded to have a second look at the implications of the bill, or to let the formula currently in force carry over pending such reconsideration, so that equity would be assured for the next election. For that reason, honourable senators, I wish to register my own personal concerns today that the passage of this bill may well jeopardize fair treatment in terms of electoral representation for the citizens of my province of Alberta in the next election.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I have not studied the detail of this bill. It is not my intention to enter into the debate on the specifics, but listening to the debate here today it does raise in my mind an issue which I believe is germane to the matter of representation.

Senator MacEachen quite rightly raises the issue that he is concerned that some of the less populous Canadian provinces will not enjoy proper representation. On the other hand, Senator MacDonald says that it would be ludicrous to increase the representation of Nova Scotia if, indeed, the population did not increase.

I must say that both arguments appealed to me, because I believe that what we are dealing with is really an inevitability. We may be able to discuss here and in the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs the possibility of not having representation by population. Historically we may have been able to provide greater representation for the less populated provinces; but the fact of the matter is that over a period of time the House of Commons will be operating under the system of representation by population, and the populated areas will enjoy the greater proportion of representation. This leads to the inescapable conclusion that it is the Senate's function to provide for any discrepancy resulting from lack of that representation from those provinces. It always has been that function since Confederation—

Senator MacEachen: Amen!

Senator Everett:—and it has to be done on that basis. But the fact of the matter is that an appointed Senate cannot do it; and that is why, in essence, we are discussing this problem. Somehow we want to solve it by counteracting any imbalance in representation in the House of Commons. Well, the mechanism to do that exists here. All that we really have to do is institute the processes necessary to bring about an elected Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: The representation problem would then be solved. Senator MacEachen's point of there being too much pressure on individual members of Parliament would also be covered. The smaller provinces, by virtue of the kind of representation that the Senate has, would be represented by the electoral process in the Senate. If we chose a system of proportional representation, such as the single transferable ballot, then not only would we have fair representation of the less populated provinces of Canada, we would also have fair representation of a broader party nature across the country.

It seems to me that the outcome is just inevitable. I do not see why it cannot happen now. At one time I took the attitude that perhaps the Senate could make a declaration that it was going to protect provincial, regional and minority rights, and that for this purpose it would examine every piece of legislation that came before it from the House of Commons. If any piece of legislation offended those basic principles, then the Senate would reject it until the Commons had an opportunity to appeal to the electorate. Then, if they did so—and not in the way they did it in the case of the wiretap bill—and if the electorate gave them the go ahead, they would re-pass the legislation and the Senate would also pass it.

I thought that was a possibility. But after seeing several examples—of which the wiretap legislation was the most prominent—I realized that that was not going to happen; that if we really wanted to have legitimacy in that regard and if we wanted to do the job that we were put here to do, we had to be elected. So all that this debate tells me, and all that the consideration that is being given to this bill tells me, is that this body should be elected!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, by way of correction, I believe that Senator Everett attributed to me the word "ludicrous", when I referred to the matter of having representation in the Atlantic that was out of proportion. If I said "ludicrous", then I did not mean to, and I hope the record will not show that. If Senator Stewart can pull this off, then I am all in favour of it. I was making reference to the fact that I think the attempt would strain our credulity. I did not say it was a ludicrous idea.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, I had not planned to speak to this particular issue. However, Senator MacEachen brought up an issue that concerns me when he referred to the great workload of MPs. Certainly I do not disagree that, under the present system, our members of Parliament are greatly strained and that their time does not stretch sufficiently to meet the demands that are placed upon them. But what has concerned me for many years is how the federal government has grown and how the federal government has got into duplication and multiplication of programs that normally were once considered to be delivered by the provinces or the municipalities. It seems to me that if the federal government were to pull back and do only those things that the federal government should do, and allocate to provinces and municipalities those responsibilities which quite properly rest with them, the workload of MPs would certainly be much lighter than it is now. I could cite honourable senators example after example.

Surely the role of the federal government, in many areas, particularly in those areas where we are contributing dollars—and in many instances large amounts of dollars—is not to deliver the program, messing up someone else's backyard, where that someone else has the capability of delivering the program? Its role is to be there in a monitoring capacity, setting standards and ensuring that those standards are met.

I would be one of the first to urge my own government to step back and let someone else do it, because I believe that the federal government is not the best agency for delivering many of the programs that are being delivered to the provinces today. There is a lot of waste, there is a lot of duplication as we all know. Personally, I would like to see the federal government, where it is involved with dollars being spent, concentrate more on setting standards and ensuring that those standards are met having regard to the money that is provided for whatever the service is.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honorables senators, I listened with interest to the debate on third reading of this bill which has been before the Senate since December 18.

I must say I find it very difficult to understand and to reconcile the various positions taken by Senators Stewart, Corbin, MacEachen and Fairbairn.

Their comments led Senator Everett to make his remarks on the subject of Senate representation, which is relevant to some extent. I will get back to this later on. Senator Robertson spoke about the territorial aspect of electoral districts. I intend to comment on this as well. I found nothing in what was said by the senators who were opposed to the bill which actually came to grips with the problem.

I think there has been an attempt to create a false impression. They have been trying to make a mountain out of a molehill. And of course, the champion of them all was Senator Corbin!

Senator Corbin: Thank you!

Senator Flynn: He exaggerated in every way he could. He distorted my comments. He invented a host of imaginary monsters which he then proceeded to attack most viciously.

And what is left of the objections that were formulated? I had the misfortune to say there had been no fundamental objections in the other place. I repeat, there were no fundamental objections, but there was a strategic objection. We know that the Liberal Party is finding it very difficult to live with its opposition status. It keeps looking for an excuse to provoke debate and create controversy. It is happiest when it gets the government to impose closure. This means they are no longer talking about the bill but about the fact they are being prevented from speaking to the bill. They shout that they can't speak, that they can't express their objections to the bill because they don't have time to do so! The Liberals spend hours repeating they don't have time to say what they want to say.

Senator Corbin gave us the prime example of this when he said: "We don't have time, you are pushing us."

Imagine, this small group of Conservative senators trying to rush the majority! The bill has been before the Senate since December 18 last year. It has been referred twice to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. The debate on third reading has been going on for several days. Often, when the Order of the Day was called to resume debate on the bill, no one took the floor.

Apparently, the Liberal Party's tactic is one of silence, what we could call a silent filibuster. There was nothing to prevent debate, Senator Corbin. You had your chance to say everything you wanted to say at least twice.

In fact, after all your complaints about the Liberal Party being rushed, you said at page 2055:

I spoke and argued a great deal when the bill was being considered.

You certainly did speak a great deal and you argued a great deal, but you didn't say much of any substance, to be quite honest.

Senator Corbin: That's your opinion. You weren't even here.

Senator Flynn: I read your comments.

Senator Corbin: You should have taken part in the debate!

Senator Flynn: Finally, what was the position of Senator MacEachen?

You wanted the system in effect today to continue and thus let the increase continue. Fine. But would the representation of the smaller provinces increase as well? No one has been able to prove this. In fact, the figures that were mentioned and which you used in your arguments, especially Senator Stewart, show that proportionally, and this is important, the position of the smaller provinces would have diminished in any case. However, the proportion in which this occurs is not as great under the proposed system as under the present one.

Is there any difference in principle between the proposed formula and the existing one? There is none, except the numerical result. And I don't want anyone telling me that if we have more members representing fewer people, these people are better served. We are not better served from the territorial point of view, as Senator Robertson pointed out. You can't resolve the territorial problem under the present formula. That is just not true.

The principle that consists of taking account of the territory is in the bill. Twenty-five per cent may be added to or subtracted from the quota to allow for geographical circumstances. But you will never solve the problem of Cape Breton as compared with Manicouagan and the Northwest Territories, that is a joke!

I would even suggest that in many cases the arguments put forward were nothing but pure and simple demagoguery. It is false, it is not the intent of the bill. The bill simply provides that the number of members in the House of Commons will increase more slowly.

Is that not a good principle? Did you know that on the basis of the population—Senator MacEachen mentioned an increase of 7 million—taking the United States as an example, their House of Representatives should have in excess of 3,000 members as compared with our House of Commons?

Still the representative of a large riding will always have problems, and the only way to come to grips with that is to apply the principle which was in the legislation to begin with.

Referring to Clause 6 of the bill:

—but in departing from the application of rule (a)—

Namely the quota.

—the commission shall make every effort to ensure that, except in circumstances viewed by the commission as being extraordinary—

That might be the case of Cape Breton Island.

—the population of each electoral district in the province remains within twenty-five per cent more or twenty-five per cent less of the electoral quota for the province.

That has always been the principle and it is the only way to solve the problem. This bill does not change anything at all.

People complain about the loss of additional seats. The opponents complain because of the seats the provinces will not have as a result of the implementation of the new legislation.

[Senator Flynn.]

However nobody complains about the fact that the proportions are reduced.

Under the existing rule Quebec would automatically have won four seats on the basis of the 1981 census, and four more seats in 1991 and in 2001.

The way things are now Quebec loses those seats. If you add three seats in the Atlantic provinces, as suggested by Senator Stewart, British Columbia will complain. Senator Fairbairn will immediately stand up to defend the cause of Alberta. All the others will complain.

We must keep the essential element, the proportion of representation. In that respect, they seem to have forgotten all about the constitutional provisions.

I think I should read from the British North America Act sections 51A and 52 which are not amended by this bill.

Section 51A:

51A. Notwithstanding anything in this Act a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province.

Since every province has a minimum of representation in the Senate, this certainly provides some protection for the smaller provinces.

Section 52 reads:

52. The number of Members of the House of Commons may be from time to time increased by the Parliament of Canada, provided the proportionate representation of the provinces prescribed by this Act is not thereby disturbed.

The only exception provided in the case of the smaller provinces is in section 51A. There is no other. The additional compensation is representation in the Senate. The Atlantic Provinces have 30 senators. They have more than Quebec, more than Ontario and far more than all of Western Canada. This is a way of correcting the imbalance.

The important thing is, that the proportionate representation referred to in section 52, except for the senatorial minimum which benefits the smaller provinces, remains intact. There is no other way to solve this problem.

Of course we can have a House of Commons with 400 members. If you want more, if there is no problem about increasing the number of members indefinitely, fine.

● (1540)

But if the proportional representation or figures go down, it is not much of an improvement.

The province of Quebec has been steadily losing representation in the House of Commons as a result of shifts in the population. Alberta will become more important, and that is quite normal. Senator Fairbairn says that her province would have had more, but if that were the case, other provinces would have had more as well.

I think the provinces that have a legitimate complaint about the present figures are Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, because the population of these provinces is increasing at a faster rate.

As for the projections for 2001, I don't think Senator MacEachen should be so pessimistic as to refuse to consider the possibility that his party would be back in power by that time and could amend the legislation accordingly, circumstances permitting. I think it was rather amusing to hear Senator MacEachen say that the present government might be thinking of calling an election on the basis of the 1971 census figures. When the last Liberal government called the 1984 election, it was not based on the 1981 census. Everything was ready. It was up to the Liberal government to give the new electoral boundaries force of law. It did not. What did it have in mind? I think it takes a lot of imagination to accuse the present government of having partisan intentions with this bill. What does a party have to gain by providing that the House of Commons will have only 295 members in the next election instead of 310 if the election is held in 1988 or even later? No one can accuse the government of having sinister or partisan intentions in this respect.

If we look at the figures in the tables appearing in the Debates of the Senate of December 18, 1985, we see that the smaller provinces will increase their representation proportionally during those years. They are not losing out in any case. Ontario and Quebec are the losers. Alberta is losing, proportionally, one-tenth of one per cent, for the information of Senator Fairbairn. Nothing in these figures suggests any injustice or inequity exists with respect to any of the provinces.

The only valid argument that can be raised would be that they are in favour of a larger representation in the House of Commons. Senator Stewart did not go that far, he was satisfied with getting three more ridings. But then, if we do give his province three more ridings, we will have to give something more to the others. That would be starting from scratch, back to square one, and there would be no end to it.

The 1974 formula is the brainchild of Senator MacEachen, if I may put it that way. I can easily understand why he would be in favour of it. He pointed out that all parties had endorsed his formula. Just fine, but is that an argument? Perhaps it is, if only to show that the opposition then was more reasonable than it is today. Perhaps in those days the opposition did not try to trip the government on every single issue. That may be the difference.

Once again I want to emphasize that the arguments made by Senators Stewart, MacEachen, Corbin and Fairbairn do not really amount to much, unless they seek to increase the number of seats in the House of Commons.

If we claim to take something away from a province, we must keep in mind that the balance is restored through the existing formula, for it guarantees a higher proportion if not larger representation. The regional balance is what really matters.

If you attempt to thwart the principle of proportional representation in addition to the senatorial compensation, all I can say is that you are opening a debate which will never end.

Had Senator Stewart been successful in getting his amendment through we would have had to adopt another one to correct such or such anomaly, and the end would be nowhere in sight.

In all fairness, honourable senators, unless we want the number of seats in the House of Commons to increase and multiply—not a good principle under the circumstances, I am sure—we must consider that nobody will be slighted under the principle contained in this bill and nobody will be treated unfairly.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.
